On the evening of the 20th Grant began to manœuvre his left with the purpose of drawing Lee out of his intrenchments. The position had been attempted over and again, sometimes with partial success and frequently with failure. The greatest success gained was that of the 12th, when Johnston and his division were captured; and if the disposition of the Federal forces had been favorable the advantage gained on this occasion might have been pushed to more decisive results. Having determined to shift his position, Grant extended his left until Spottsylvania Court House stood over on his right. Lee at the same time extended his right, intrenching at every move. In order to compel a retreat Grant had to flank Lee outright by massing his force on the left. On Friday, the 20th, then, Hancock shifted over to Lee's extreme right, and in the evening advanced southward. He continued his march the next day, and on Saturday evening occupied Bowling Green. About an hour after Hancock started, Friday night, Longstreet also moved southward. On Saturday Hancock was followed by Warren, and Longstreet by Ewell; during Saturday night both armies were on the march.

Monday, Grant effected the crossing of the North Anna, in the vicinity of the Virginia Central Railroad. This was not accomplished, however, without an obstinate resistance on the part of the Confederates. The railroad bridge crossing the river at this point was burned by the Federal forces, and Wednesday night found the entire army between the North and South Anna, and within 25 miles of Richmond. On the north bank of the latter river was General Lee's new line of defense.

To all appearances Grant's purpose was to march up and attempt this new line by a series of assaults similar to those directed against the former line along the Po. But Thursday found him preparing to recross the North Anna, and on the last day of May he had his whole army south of the Pamunkey and within ten miles of Richmond, with a new base of supplies established at White House.

The new line ran nearly north and south from a point on the Pamunkey River near Hanover Court House, across Tolopatemoy Creek three miles south of Hanover town. Grant's head-quarters were on the spot on which McClellan's right had rested two years before. The Confederate line stretched from Atlee's Station, along the line of the Chickahominy and the Virginia Central, to Shady Grove Church, five miles north of Richmond. Our forces, ever since crossing the Pamunkey, had been pressing steadily up to this line; and on the 28th a cavalry engagement had been fought, the advance of Gregg's division having met and driven the enemy. On the 30th Warren had pressed close up to Shady Grove; and Crawford's division, getting detached from the main body, was attacked and pushed back. The same day Hancock gained ground on the right.

It was inevitable at this juncture that whichever of the two armies should first acquire a commanding position between the Federal left and Richmond would gain an important advantage. It was for this position that the contest of the next few days was carried on. If Lee should prove successful, then he would be able to cut Grant's line of communications with the White House; while if Grant should succeed, Lee would be compelled to leave the way open to Richmond. On the 31st there were cavalry engagements both on the right and left flanks, in both of which the Federals were successful. The success on the left opened the way to Cold Harbor, on the road from White House to Richmond. On Wednesday, June 1, the Sixth Corps took a position near this place, where it was joined by the Eighteenth and part of the Tenth, sent around from the James; and here a battle was fought by this portion of the army, the result of which was the possession of Cold Harbor by the Federal Forces. Cold Harbor is the key to Richmond on this line of approach; and it only remained to cross the Chickahominy a short distance south to outflank the Confederate army.

It was for this purpose that Hancock was shifted to the left during Wednesday night, and an attack was ordered the next day. This was postponed on account of a severe storm, and the enemy thus gained time to complete his preparations for defense. Thus it happened that on Friday, June 3, the Confederates were as strongly posted on the Chickahominy as they had been on the South Anna. On that day a battle was fought early in the morning, the main interest of which centred on the left. Here the army was carried up in close proximity to the enemy's works. Some important positions were gained at great expense of life, but to no purpose. On the right a heavy cannonade went on, but without sensible effect on the main issue. The attempt to carry the Confederate position by direct assault was given up. In the evening an attack was made by the enemy on a portion of Hancock's corps, but was repulsed, with great loss to the assailants. Several assaults of this nature were subsequently made on Grant's left, with the view of cutting his communications with the White House; but these were uniformly unsuccessful. On the 7th an arrangement was concluded between the two armies for the humane purpose of attending to the killed and wounded on the battle-field; and with this the operations along the Chickahominy were substantially concluded.

The approach to Richmond from the North having been given up, Grant removed his entire army to the south side of the James River, and formed new combinations. The preparations for this movement were in contemplation before the battle of Friday had fairly ended. For more than a week they were going on; and on Sunday night, the 12th, the movement commenced, and was completed by Wednesday morning. The Eighteenth Corps went back to Bermuda Hundred by water; the rest of the army crossed the Chickahominy at Long Bridge and James Bridge, and proceeded thence to the James River, crossing at Powhatan Point. During the march there was no very serious interruption from Lee's army. Smith's corps arriving at its destination sooner than the others, marched forthwith to Petersburg, the other corps following in the same general direction soon after landing.

At the close of our last Record we left Butler in his intrenchments at Bermuda Hundred, to which he had been driven as the result of the fierce assault made by the enemy on the 16th. In the battle which followed, Hickman's brigade suffered severely, and Hickman himself was taken prisoner. After Butler's withdrawal to Bermuda Hundred the Confederates closed about him with great vigor, and made several assaults on his lines, which were repulsed. On the 20th the Confederate General Walker was captured.

With the exception of important reinforcements sent to General Grant, there has since been no occurrence of special interest in Butler's department. Kautz on the 19th of May returned from his second great raid, having cut the Richmond and Petersburg and the Danville railroads at various points, destroying a large amount of stores.

Nearly at the same time important successes were achieved in Southwestern Virginia, by Generals Averill and Crook. Besides burning the railroad bridge at Newbern, on the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad, several engagements occurred with the enemy, in which the latter, under Morgan and Jenkins, was severely punished. In one of these Jenkins was taken prisoner.

After Sigel's defeat in the Shenandoah, Hunter was appointed to supersede him. On the 5th of June a battle was fought near Staunton, between Hunter and the Confederate General W. E. Jones, resulting in a complete victory. General Jones was killed, Staunton was captured, 1500 prisoners and several guns were taken, and the rebel force was driven to Waynesboro. After the capture of Staunton a junction was effected on the 8th with Crook and Averill. In the mean time Sheridan's command having crossed the Pamunkey on the 7th, were marched to a point south of Gordonsville. This point—Trevilian Station—was reached on the 11th. Here an important victory was gained, and a large portion of the Gordonsville Railroad destroyed; four hundred prisoners were taken.

In the West Sherman, having occupied Kings-ton and the line of the Etowah, resumed his march on the 24th to Dallas, where he came up with the enemy; on the 28th M'Pherson was engaged, and the Confederates were driven back, with a loss to them of about 3000 men. On Thursday, June 2, Schofield and Hooker moved upon Marietta, a few miles to the left of Dallas; Stoneman's and Garrard's cavalry at the same time taking possession of Allatoona Pass. This advance brings our army out of the mountainous region of Georgia to the fertile plains in the central portion of the State. In regard to the value of Allatoona Pass, Sherman said, in his dispatch of June 7: "I have been to Allatoona Pass, and find it admirable for our purposes. It is the gate through the last, or most eastern spur of the Alleghanies. It now becomes as useful to us as it was to the enemy, being easily defended from either direction. The roads hence from Ackworth into Georgia are large and good, and the country more open."

On the 10th Wheeler, with a Confederate force of cavalry, interrupted the railroad communication between Sherman's army and Chattanooga. At about the same time Forrest, in conjunction with Roddy and Lee, gained a decisive victory over Sturgis at Guntown, Mississippi. General A. J. Smith, who had been operating successfully against Marmaduke, was, after this disaster, placed at the head of the forces against the rebel cavalry acting in Sherman's rear.

In the Southwest affairs have at least assumed a less critical aspect as compared with the situation a month ago. General Banks with his army have returned to New Orleans, having fought two battles on the way, in both of which the rebels were repulsed. Porter's gun-boat fleet was relieved on the 11th of May through the ingenious efforts of Lieutenant-Colonel Bailey, who brought it safely out of its perilous situation by the construction of a dam at Alexandria. General A. J. Smith's army has also been brought down the river, and dispatched against the forces under Marmaduke, in Arkansas. General Canby was at the mouth of the Red River on the 14th of May, where he was collecting together forces to assist Banks. Banks's position remains the same as hitherto; the significance to be attached to Canby's appointment being simply that the Trans-Mississippi Department is now organized under a single command, and Banks reports to Canby just as Thomas reports to Sherman.

Early in the month John Morgan, with 2500 men, made another raid into Kentucky. Entering by Pound Gap, he, with great rapidity, got possession of Paris, Georgetown, Cynthiana, Williamstown, and Mount Sterling. He attacked the Louisville and other railroads, interrupting communications for several days. This force was met by Burbridge on the 9th, and severely beaten, but not so badly used as to prevent further destruction; for Lexington was afterward captured and plundered by Morgan's men, and two Ohio regiments were taken at Cynthiana. On the 12th, however, Burbridge again attacked, and this time with a decisive result, completely routing the enemy and capturing a large portion of his force, besides a thousand horses, which were probably the main object of the raid.

The navy has lost three gun-boats by capture during the month; the Granite City and the Wave at Sabine Pass; and the Water Witch, which was taken by eight rebel gun-boats under the guns of Fort M'Allister, Georgia.

The Cleveland Convention met on May 31. John Cochrane was elected its President. A platform was reported and adopted, made up of resolutions in favor of the Union, the suppression of the rebellion without compromise, of an expression of gratitude to the army and navy, of free speech, free press, the habeas corpus, the abolition of slavery, the right of asylum, the Monroe Doctrine, a one-term Presidency, the confiscation of rebel lands, and their division among the soldiers and sailors of the Union army. John C. Frémont was nominated for President, and John Cochrane for Vice-President. Mr. Frémont's letter of acceptance was every way remarkable. He said that the right to have candidates in the coming election was disputed. He said that the Administration had violated the liberties of American citizens; and that abroad its course had been marked by feebleness and want of principle. Mr. Frémont—the same that in 1861 had, without authority, carried out the widest system of confiscation against Missouri rebels—said, also, that he was opposed to that part of the platform in favor of the confiscation of rebel property. He said that the Administration had disgraced itself by denying the right of asylum, meaning, of course, in the Arguelles case, which is treated of in its legitimate place in this Record. And, finally, he wound up by saying that if the Baltimore Convention would nominate some other candidate than Mr. Lincoln he would support him; but Mr. Lincoln's election he thought it proper to oppose, and, if possible, to prevent, and in that contingency he accepted the nomination of the Cleveland Convention.

On the 7th of June the Baltimore Convention met. Ex-Governor Denison, of Ohio, was elected President. A platform of resolutions was reported and adopted. It was resolved that the rebellion be suppressed without compromise; that slavery be abolished by Constitutional amendment; that an expression of popular gratitude was due not only to the army and navy, but also to the President; that foreign immigration be encouraged; that the railroad to the Pacific ought speedily to be constructed; and that the Monroe doctrine should be maintained. The Convention then nominated Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, and Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, for President and Vice-President. The nomination was first carried by a call of the States, all except the Missouri delegation voting for Lincoln and Johnson. The nomination was then made unanimous; a National Committee was elected, and the Convention adjourned.

MEXICO.

Maximilian, the new Mexican Emperor, arrived in Mexico on the 28th of May, and received from the Municipal Council of Vera Cruz the keys of that city. The French authorities had made extraordinary preparations for this event, and especially for the entrance of the Emperor into the capital, which was announced for the 10th of June, that being the anniversary of the entrance of the French troops into that city last year. But there has been no grand popular reception of the Emperor, notwithstanding that he began his proclamation, issued on his arrival, informing the Mexicans that they had longed for his presence! Generals Santa Anna, Almonte, Miramon, and Marquez were appointed Grand Marshals of the new Empire.

CUBA.

On the 20th of last November Thomas Savage, United States Consul-General at Havana, informed Secretary Seward of the arrival in Cuba of over one thousand African negroes, notice of which was promptly given to Lord Lyons and transmitted by him to the British Government. On the 28th of the same month Secretary Seward informed Earl Russell through Lord Lyons that if a communication should be addressed by the British Government to the Spanish Cabinet, with a view to procure an amendment of the laws affecting the introduction of slaves into Cuba, the President of the United States would communicate with the Government of Spain in the same sense and spirit. On the 4th of February Seward received from Lord Lyons a letter inclosing a memorandum of the communication to be addressed by Her Majesty's Government to the British Minister at Madrid.

According to this memorandum the present Captain-General of Cuba has done all in his power to carry out the treaty obligations of Spain relative to the suppression of the slave-trade; so that for the year ending September 30, 1863, the number of slaves introduced into Cuba is estimated at from seven to eight thousand as compared with 11,254 of the previous year. This diminution would be satisfactory if it were not dependent upon the exertions of the present Captain-General, who is at any moment liable to be removed; and this officer complains of the want of sufficient power conferred upon him, and of the inadequate provisions of the Spanish penal code for the suppression of the Cuban slave-trade.

In the mean time General Dulce (Captain-General of Cuba) had seized the cargo of slaves. The negroes had been landed in Colon, a district on the south side of the island. Now, the Lieutenant-Governor of this district was Don Jose Augustin Arguelles. It was through this officer that the expedition was captured, for which service he received from the Spanish Government $15,000. Immediately after the capture he obtained leave of absence for twenty days on pretense of a visit to New York to purchase the La Cronica, a Spanish journal published in that city. He did not return from this visit, and it was subsequently discovered that he had retained one hundred and forty of the negroes belonging to the expedition and had sold them into slavery at a profit to himself of a hundred thousand dollars. The United States Consul at Havana forwarded to Secretary Seward a statement of these facts on the 27th of March.

There was no extradition treaty between Spain and the United States by which the former could claim the rendition of Arguelles; but in view of the infamous crime committed by the latter General Dulce was informed that if he would send to New York a suitable officer steps would be taken, if possible, to place Arguelles in his possession. This action on the part of the United States Government was the more urgently demanded by the fact that without the presence of this notorious criminal in Cuba it would be impossible to emancipate the slaves who had been consigned by him to slavery. Arguelles was arrested on the 11th of May, 1864.

EUROPE.

The London Conference having decided upon an armistice for a month, the Danish Government raised the blockade of the German ports. The conditions of the truce are, that a week's notice must be given before hostilities are again resumed; the allies to hold their position in Jutland and the Danes Alsen, but the former to impose no further contributions. When the Conference met on the 2d of June this armistice was prolonged for fifteen days.

A severe naval engagement took place off Heligoland on May 9 between the Danish fleet and that of the allies. The latter, consisting of three Austrian frigates and two Prussian gun-boats, returned to its moorings on the Elbe, bearing evident signs of having been severely handled.

The Liberal party in England have received great encouragement from a speech recently made in Parliament by Gladstone, Chancellor of the Exchequer, on Paine's Reform Bill, he having on this occasion declared in favor of an extension of the right of suffrage. The news of Grant's movements has created unusual interest in England. The contested case of the rebel rams has been finally disposed of by the British Government; not finding any law for the detention of these vessels, and yet fully aware of the consequences which must follow their release, Her Majesty's Government has freed itself from the perplexing dilemma by purchasing them. The ship-owners of Liverpool, fearing that some time the policy pursued by the British Government in relation to the Alabama might be turned against itself, have presented a petition to Parliament urging that, in case the existing law be insufficient for the preservation of a strict neutrality, such amendments should be introduced into the Foreign Enlistment Act as would secure the end desired. The matter was presented in a very effective manner in a speech made by Mr. Cobden on May 13. He said that the British Government had already done its worst against the American mercantile marine. The injury, considering merely the amount of property destroyed, amounted to fifteen millions of dollars; but this was not all, that which had not been destroyed had been rendered useless. In 1860 one-third of the American commerce was carried on in foreign bottoms, in 1863 three-fourths; and this was owing to privateers armed and equipped in English ports.

Literary Notices.

History of Frederick the Great, by THOMAS CARLYLE: Vol. IV. In this volume Mr. Carlyle carries us through a dozen years of the life of Frederick. The volume opens with an account of the Second Silesian War of 1744-5, in which occurred the fruitless capture of Prague by the Prussians; the battle of Fontenoy (May, 1745), where the French and their allies—Prussia being one—beat the Austrians and their allies—England being one; the battle of Hohenfriedberg (June, 1745), where the Prussians beat the Saxons, now the allies of Austria, and yet won no great advantage from a victory the like of which “had not been seen since Blenheim;” the battle of Sohr (September, 1745), where the Prussians got the better of the Austrians; the battle of Kesseldorf (December, 1745), where the Saxons, still allies of the Austrians, fought their last battle as a nation, and were utterly routed by the Prussians. This Second Silesian War was really, in the world’s history, but an episode in the general European war then raging. It was closed by the peace of Dresden (December, 1745). In describing the once famous battle of Fontenoy, Carlyle pricks a wind-bag which has long done duty as the last instance of modern chivalry. According to the story—finally polished up by Voltaire, after the manner of his famous but exploded “Moriamur pro rege nostro,” etc. Lord Charles Hay—so runs the story—Captain of the English Guards, and M. le Marquis d’Auteroche, of the French Grenadiers, found themselves with their commands fronting each other. Each stepped forward, bowing politely, hat in hand. “Gentlemen of the French Guards,” said the Englishman, waiving precedence, “Fire!”—“No,” replied the equally polite Frenchman, “we never fire first.” Chivalry satisfied, the English Guards did thereupon fire, to the terrible loss of the French Grenadiers. Mr. Carlyle has fished up the genuine account of this transaction, fearfully spelled, by Lord Charles Hay himself. What he did say, in effect was, “We are the English Guards, and hope you won’t run away before we can get at you, as you did a while ago at Dettingen.” The sublime courtesy of the affair thus resolves itself into a bit of “chaffing.” After this episodic war followed, as far as Frederick was concerned, ten years of peace. Half of this volume is occupied with a minute and picturesque account of the private life of Frederick. Then follows the opening campaign of the great Seven Years’ War—Prussia and England being now on one side, France and Austria on the other, with all Europe as allies on one side or the other—during which Frederick first manifested his great capacities as a Captain and Ruler. Those who have followed Mr. Carlyle thus far in his History of Frederick will need no other inducement to go on with him to the end. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

The Life of Napoleon, by Baron JOMINI, translated by Major-General H. W. HALLECK. Napoleon is hardly more indisputably the great master of the Science and Art of War than Jomini is the greatest military historian and commentator. He is acknowledged to be first, with no rival unless it be Sir William Napier, who can fairly claim to be second. His “Critical and Military History of the Wars of the Revolution” is the foundation upon which and the quarry out of which all the military histories of that period have been built. His Life of Napoleon is an almost necessary complement to that work. As a biography of Napoleon, in his personal and political character, we can not accord to it a very high place. The very form in which it is cast—an autobiography recited in the Elysian Fields by the shade of Napoleon to Alexander, Cæsar, and Frederick—would of itself preclude any high degree of merit as a memoir. This form, however, gives no slight advantage for presenting the military history of Napoleon. The Great Master might be supposed to present his career as a commander in the best form before such an audience. In this main aspect the work is of inestimable value, and the labor of presenting it in our language could have been undertaken by no one more capable than General Halleck. These five large volumes, with the accompanying convenient Atlas of Military Maps, should be in the hands of every one who wishes—and who now does not?—to gain some idea of what war in modern times implies. Every officer who hopes to command a regiment, much more a brigade or division, should study them as the lawyer studies his Blackstone or Kent, or as the divine studies his Turretin or Calvin. (Published by D. Van Nostrand.)

Pulpit Ministrations, by GARDINER SPRING. In these two volumes the venerable and venerated “Pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church in the City of New York,” whose charge over a single church has extended over two full generations, dedicates a series of discourses on Christian Doctrine and Duty to the great multitude who have been, who are, and who may hereafter be connected with his pastoral charge. To a circle even larger than this large one these sermons, the ripest fruits of a long and earnest life, will be more than welcome. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Expository Lectures on the Heidelberg Catechism, by GEORGE W. BETHUNE, D.D. This work, a fragment of the author’s design, must be accepted as the best literary monument of one of the ripest scholars and most eloquent divines who have adorned the American pulpit. The denomination to which Dr. Bethune belonged formerly required its pastors to deliver a series of expository lectures, on the successive Sabbaths of every year, setting forth and explaining the doctrines of the Church in the order in which they are presented in the venerable Heidelberg Catechism, each Sabbath of the year having its assigned topic. Afterward four years instead of one were assigned to this course, one lecture being delivered every month. These lectures of Dr. Bethune embrace about two-thirds of such a course. To their preparation in a permanent form he had consecrated the study of years. Although only a portion of the design, these lectures will be regarded as a permanent addition to the theological literature of the day. (Published by Sheldon and Company.)

Barbara’s History, by AMELIA B. EDWARDS, which forms the 240th volume of “Harper’s Library of Select Novels,” is by all odds the best of the scores of tales which have grown out of Charlotte Brontë’s three or four novels. The plot is essentially that of “Jane Eyre,” there are scenes and characters which might have formed parts of “The Professor” or “Villette.” Although Miss Edwards has borrowed so largely from Miss Brontë, she has brought enough original matter into her novel to take it out of the category of mere imitations. She has made one of the best of the second-class novels of the day.—Cousin Phillis (Harper's Library of Select Novels, No. 242) is an exceedingly graceful little story. It is brought to an abrupt close just at the point where one would expect that the real story was to begin. Unless we greatly mistake the capacities and purposes of the author, we shall have some day a novel in which the character of Cousin Phillis will be more largely developed.

The Potomac and the Rapidan, by ALONZO H. QUINT. (Crosby and Nichols.) The Chaplain of the noble Massachusetts Second republishes with additions a series of letters describing his experiences with that regiment from the time when it was with Patterson in the Valley of the Shenandoah down to the time when it was sent to reinforce Rosecrans in Tennessee. The record embraces Cedar Mountain, Antietam, Fredericksburg, and Chancellorville. The author promises a record of the doings of his regiment. We refer to this work mainly for the purpose of suggesting that some one connected with every regiment in our service should take upon himself the office of its historiographer. For many reasons the chaplain of the regiment will be, in ordinary cases, the proper man for the work. If at all fit for his post, he knows every man in the regiment and every event in its history; the nature of his duties gives him leisure to record them. He should consider it a part of his official duty to write, and deposit in the national archives, such a history. Probably hereafter all of these accounts would be published. But even if they existed only in manuscript, a thousand or two of such documents would be of inestimable advantage to the man who will at some time write an adequate history of the Great Rebellion.

Savage Africa, by WINGWOOD READE. In another part of this Magazine we have given an extended account of this somewhat noticeable book on Africa and the Africans. It forms an indispensable adjunct to the library of works on Africa which has been issued by the publishers. Most of these works tell how that country and its people appear in the eyes of explorers, missionaries, and men of science. It is worth while to show how they appear to a rather clever but superficial "club-man," who chose to make a trip to the Equator rather than to the Arctic regions. The book, though far enough from being profound, is lively and readable. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

The Life and Times of Benjamin Franklin, by JAMES PARTON. Mr. Parton possesses in a high degree the prime requisites for a biographer. He is unwearied in his search for facts; he has the faculty of grasping the significance of his materials, so as to gain a clear idea of the man who is to be presented to his readers; he is unswervingly honest, presenting the man as he believes him to have really been, not merely as he should or might have been. Thus, he does not attempt to make Burr a patriot, or even grand old Jackson a saint. The honest purpose of knowing and telling the truth, and the power of telling it graphically, are as conspicuously shown in depicting the quiet life of Franklin as in narrating the more turbulent careers of Burr and Jackson. To say that this Life of Franklin is the best yet written would be a very slight recommendation; for, apart from Franklin's own autobiography, we have had nothing even approaching mediocrity. But we can go much further, and say that Mr. Parton's Life is in every way very good. (Published by Mason Brothers.)

Nineteen Beautiful Years. In this touching little volume a sister undertakes to tell of a sister whose circle of life was completed within nineteen years. Yet so completely rounded was it that it could hardly have been more perfect in threescore and ten years. It is the simple story of the development of a girl endowed with exquisite sensibilities, and fine, though not extraordinary, faculties. She loved Literature, Art, and Music; yet there is nothing to indicate that she would ever have become a great writer, artist, or musician. In the very fact that her life presented nothing very extraordinary lies the charm of this loving record of it. The nineteen beautiful years of the life of Mary Willard lie within the reach of thousands and tens of thousands. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

First Principles of a New System of Philosophy, by HERBERT SPENCER. This volume is an installment of what is intended to be a series of works unfolding the principles of a "New Philosophy," embracing an explanation of all the phenomena manifested in the universe of Matter, Force, and Mind, so far as they are cognizable by the human faculties. It is impossible, within the space at our disposal, to give even the baldest outline of the philosophy whose inauguration is here attempted; and no one who has not devoted months to its examination can be qualified to pass absolute judgment upon its validity; or, if it be partly valid and partly invalid, to draw the line between the true and the false. All that we dare say is that it is a work of great ability, which deserves and should receive the careful consideration of those who have leisure and capacity to pursue the investigations through which the author proposes to conduct them. (Published by D. Appleton and Company.)

Guide-Book of the Central Railroad of New Jersey. This railroad, with its connections, passes through one of the most picturesque portions of the United States. It traverses the great coal region of Pennsylvania, touches the Delaware Water Gap and the Wyoming Valley, passing every where through scenes of romantic and historic interest. This modest little volume is in the best sense of the word a guide through this picturesque region, with which no tourist who proposes to visit it can afford to dispense. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Seven Stories, with Basement and Attic, by DONALD G. MITCHELL. This volume, as is indicated by its punning title, consists of seven Stories—mainly reminiscences of foreign travel and residence—a considerable part of which were originally contributed to this Magazine. They are marked by the delicate fancy and graceful style which characterizes all the writings of the author. (Published by Charles Scribner.)

Harper's Hand-Book for Travelers in Europe and the East. The third annual revision of this admirable Guide-Book is now ready. The editor has again gone over most of the ground described by him, for the purpose of making all necessary changes and additions. Much entirely new matter has been introduced, and the information as to routes and charges has been brought down to the present month.

Editor's Easy Chair.

THE death of Nathaniel Hawthorne is a national event. In original creative genius no name in our literature is superior to his; and while every body was asking whether it were impossible to write an American novel, he wrote romances that were hardly possible elsewhere, because they were so purely American. There was never, certainly, an author more utterly independent than Hawthorne of the circumstances that surrounded him. In his style, even, which, for a rich, idiomatic raciness, is unsurpassed, there was no touch of any of the schools of his time. It was as clear and simple as Thackeray's, and as felicitous; but there was a flush of color in it, sometimes, of which Thackeray has no trace. But of the literary influences of his time, and even of his personal association, there is no sign in his writings. The form in which his world was revealed, like that world itself, was entirely his own.

Nor was there any foreign flavor whatever in his genius. It was not a growth of the English, or the German, or the French; nor was it eclectic. It was American. It was almost New England, except for that universality which belongs to such genius, and which made the "Marble Faun" no less a characteristic work of Hawthorne's than the "Scarlet Letter." Yet in both there is the same general quality, although one is a story of old Puritan days in Boston, and the other of modern life in Rome.

It is remarkable that Hawthorne was an author, and a copious one, long before he was generally recognized. His delight, in former days, was to insist that no writer was so obscure as he; and it is one evidence of the vitality of his power that he still wrote on. He piped, and the world would not sing; he played, and it would not dance. But he was sent to be a piper, and so he piped until the world paused, charmed by the rare melody, and acknowledged the master. His place in our literature he took at once when the "Scarlet Letter" was published, and in that place he was never disturbed, and will always remain.

Personally, Mr. Hawthorne was doubtless the least known of all American authors. He was insuperably shy; and although the most fascinating of companions to those with whom he could converse, he was "silent as a stone" in society, and was seldom seen except by the interior circle of his friends. His youth and early manhood were passed in Maine and about Salem in Massachusetts. He was then called to the Custom-house in Boston by the historian Bancroft, the Collector. Thence he removed to Concord, in Middlesex, Massachusetts, where he lived in the "Old Manse." Again entering official life, he was made Surveyor of the Port at Salem. With the change of Administration he retired to a cottage at Lenox, in Berkshire, Massachusetts; presently returned to Concord, and upon the election to the Presidency of his friend Franklin Pierce, Mr. Hawthorne was appointed Consul at Liverpool. At the expiration of his term he traveled upon the Continent, and passed a winter in Rome, a visit which supplied him with material for his wonderful work, "The Marble Faun." Two or three years since he returned to this country, and settled himself quietly at "The Wayside," as he called his pleasant little house in Concord, on the edge of the town, upon the Boston road. There he devoted himself to literature, until the war disturbed him. The peculiarity of his temperament, and his old political affinities and friendships, prevented him from sympathizing fully with the national movement. But, however his friends regretted his feeling, his position was unassailed by the least suspicion. For several months his health had failed. A general weariness oppressed his powers. His desire of work, and even of life, seemed to be relaxed. He made little journeys, one especially to Philadelphia, with his friend and publisher, Mr. Ticknor, of Boston, who died suddenly at the hotel in that city. It was a painful and probably injurious shock to Hawthorne, who returned to his home, only to leave it soon afterward with his life-long friend Franklin Pierce, for a trip through parts of New England. The journey was scarcely begun when, at Plymouth, in New Hampshire, quietly in the night, without a sigh, apparently without a pang, Nathaniel Hawthorne died. He would have been sixty years old had he lived until the 4th of July.

The charm of his writings is imperishable. The fresh glow of genius which pervades them, apart from the essential interest of the stories, is indescribable. They have an individual pungency which does not always mark the works of our authors of an equal fame. The sparkle of humor which glitters every where upon his page, often weird but never dull, and a certain steadiness and self-possession of tone, equally free from rhetoric or baldness, certify a manly vigor and character which does not necessarily distinguish so subtle and poetic a nature. Hawthorne was brought to his home, and buried from the church amidst throngs of famous and honoring friends upon the softest of May days. One of that honoring multitude, in words which reveal the quality and depth of his feeling, says: "The interior of the church was perfectly white and fragrant with flowers, and upon the coffin lay a wreath of apple blossoms from the old Manse and Mr. Hawthorne's last unfinished manuscript.... Few and fittingly chosen were the inspired passages read, and the calm, comforting, and unaffected words of his friend the preacher (Rev. James Freeman Clark) who stood by his coffin, and gave the only audible utterance to thoughts which were pervading every breast.... Up to the highest eminence of their beautiful cemetery, under groups of pine, overlooking the streets Hawthorne had walked and the river consecrated in his story, they bore him, their noblest dead, and buried him in sunshine and flowers; and the pilgrim who saw for the first and last time, then, the mortal face and form of one so greatly loved, though slightly known, will own a new and life-long association whenever 'waves the pine-tree through his thought,' and he resumes the immortal company who encircled that spot, which is evermore hallowed ground."

THE discussion which was opened by our correspondent, "A Disappointed Man," is of so interesting and friendly a character that the Easy Chair, while not inviting debate, nor promising to give a public hearing to every correspondent, is very glad to welcome "A Hopeful Man," whose communication follows:

"I have read with delight and, I trust, much profit the plaintive outpourings of your correspondent who signs himself 'A Disappointed Man,' and your frank but generous replies, and I have been puzzled to come to any definite conclusion as to whether the correspondence is bona fide or merely fictitious. In either case it matters but little. The real question is, which of the two positions is right? Doubtless there is much truth in both. That an editor should, and, as a general rule, does seek to supply his readers with what in his judgment is the very best in the market, no sane man will for a moment call in question. But that does not solve the problem that perplexes not only your 'Disappointed Man,' but the whole family to which he belongs.

"Now I will be frank. I own that the gentleman alluded to is in a certain sense a relative of mine, and I feel interested in his welfare, for upon his, in some degree, depends my own. I am not an editor—never was, and do not know that I ever will be; but—do not laugh—I have had fifteen years' experience in writing for the press—for newspapers of all grades, and magazines not graded at all—and surely I ought to know something by this time about popular literature. I sent you a poem once—'hardly available' was the answer. That was the most crushing declination an editor ever hurled at me. 'Hardly' implies almost but not quite. Think of Tantalus. It was my highest octave, and yet I had to fall, and such a fall! To have reached the very rim of the vessel containing the sacred waters; to have felt their cool moisture sprinkled on my thirsty lips as they bubbled and sparkled in my face, and then to see them suddenly recede. Oh, Sir! that was agony double-refined. But no matter—it was an offspring of the soul, that little idyl, and I love it all the same.

"But I digress from the subject I set out to discuss—gratification of the popular appetite in literature. Ah, that is it! But it is a strange appetite. It is at this moment gulping down its voracious and capacious maw such a variety of provender that it is impossible to tell which it likes best; and, to say the truth, I do not believe it really knows. Look, if you please, at the huge piles of trash that are daily dished up in New York city alone, and sent out smoking hot to every village and hamlet in the land. Is an editor's judgment of the intrinsic merits of a given literary article governed by what he believes will be the judgment of his readers? Has he nothing to do with creating and regulating as well as supplying the popular appetite? Does he keep nothing but cakes and ale because cakes and ale are in the greatest demand? Is he fixed in his purpose to have nothing to do with any article that is not called for?

"A wise Easy Chair, elevated at a great height, and commanding a view of the whole world of literature, can see where reform is needed, and its word will be law. I do not complain at my ill-success. Doubtless the judgment that condemned me was honest, and may have been correct. It must be an exceedingly difficult matter always to discriminate between that which is barely, and what is 'hardly available,' and even a wise Easy Chair is entitled to forgiveness if it sometimes mistakes the one for the other. That it does sometimes make such mistakes itself can hardly doubt. Or does it presume upon the manifest and undoubted superiority of every article it publishes over every other article it rejects? If it does I should like to appeal from the decision of the chair to its readers upon the relative merits of certain articles published and others rejected.

"But what does it mean when it expresses 'its conviction that the gems of purest ray serene do not languish in the depths of ocean,' etc.? Nobody has asserted that they do. Gray does not say so. He did say 'full many a gem,' etc. Does an Easy Chair doubt that? Or does it mean to insinuate that all the genius deserving reward is always rewarded? Does it doubt that there have lived and died Bacons and Platons in intellect and genius, but lacking in ambition and energy, without having made any noise in the world? I do not. Do not think I have a personal reason for thinking so, for I have not. I have in my mind a man whose resplendent genius as an orator has been testified to by all who have ever heard him speak, and yet the probabilities are that he will never make himself known to the one-hundredth part of the people of his own State, and to none of any other. One day he mounts a stump or enters a pulpit or a lecture-room and electrifies his whole audience with the brilliant scintillations of his burning eloquence, and the next day he dignifies himself and assumes the rôle of 'The Gipsy Doctor,' and roves about from place to place treating old sores and chronic complaints generally, and telling fortunes by the aid of astrology. Crazy!—No, Sir, not a bit of it. He is as unstable as the wind though, and 'that's what's the matter,' and nothing else. He has for a short time filled the first charge of a certain church in Cincinnati, and could have kept it at his own price, but he didn't do it. Why? I don't know, neither does he. I have heard a few of the first orators of the United States both North and South, and I would as soon listened to the 'Gipsy Doctor' as to any of them. It is my opinion he will never win a name among the nation's orators, and yet I have no doubt he might, if he would, surpass many who have been ranked as such. I might introduce many other examples illustrative of the truth of Gray's sentiment, but I will not pursue the subject any further now.

A HOPEFUL MAN.

"P.S. I wish to say to your 'Disappointed Man' that I approve of his idea in regard to the establishment of a 'Mutual Admiration Magazine,' and that in case he should get rich and start one, I have several 'good rejected articles,' and quite a number which I am sure would be rejected if I were to send them to a certain magazine which shall be nameless—all of which I will dispose of on reasonable terms."—Ibid.

Does it occur to the hopeful and to the disappointed men that an editor must often choose among very good material, and decline much that he would gladly print, from mere want of room? The experience of every editor shows him that the accumulation of manuscript is overwhelming, and he often has more really valuable material than exactly fills the limited number of pages in a single issue.

—The Easy Chair hopes that the caustic reader will not look back over this number, and say, "Where is it, then?—why not print it?" because that is so easy a fling, and unworthy the enlightened readers of these pages.

Certainly no Easy Chair, and no wise Editor—for the Hopeful Man will remember that these personages are not synonymous—suppose that every article they publish is superior to all that are not published. They merely believe that, upon the whole, in view of the objects of the Magazine, the one published is superior for the purpose to those that are not. There may be a question whether, even for that purpose, it be superior; but there can be none that the editor thinks so. There may be an appeal to the judgment of readers against that of the editor, but such an appeal decides nothing, except that judgments differ; and there is no need of appealing to readers to ascertain that fact. Often the publication of most important and valuable articles is a question upon which the half dozen people in and around any editorial office may naturally and properly differ. But the power of final decision must rest somewhere, and it is vested, in the case of periodicals of every kind, in the editor. If experience shows that he can not, with due regard to the interests of the proprietors, be vested with that power, he is removed, and another depository of the power is found. But the power itself remains; for it is as much an essential attribute of an editor as that of arbitrary force is of a government in mortal peril.

Now the Hopeful Man asks one really vital and important question, "Has an editor nothing to do with creating and regulating as well as supplying a popular appetite?" This is the question of the moral responsibility of the press; and, as a matter of fact, the reply to it, under the actual circumstances, must be negative rather than positive. An editor is bound by every honorable consideration to print nothing which in his estimation can injure public morals. So much is clear. Is the converse equally clear, that he is bound to print every thing which in his estimation will purify public morals? Clearly not; because he can not.

But there is another view. It is better to do some good than none at all. It is better that people, for instance, should read James's novels than Paul de Kock's. Now if a publisher can make money by printing James's novels to take the place of De Kock's, ought he to refrain from doing so because he can not afford to print Paley's Theology or Butler's Analogy for the same purpose? Let us take the Hopeful man's own illustration: "Shall the editor keep nothing but cakes and ale, because cakes and ale are in the greatest demand?" That is not the way to put the question. The point is here: Will he give cakes and ale to customers who want them; or, by replacing them with the purest, heaven-descended water, which they do not want, will he turn them back to stone-wall and rot-gut? That is the practical question.

For what is a newspaper or a magazine? Name which you will, it is of one of two kinds. It either belongs to a scientific or religious class, which are published by the benevolence and at the expense of those who wish the truths it discusses circulated, or else it is an individual enterprise for the advantage of the enterprisers. If it be of the first kind, it pursues its course, without regard to circumstances, so long as the money holds out. It says what it was established to say, and if nobody will buy it, it is stopped or gratuitously circulated. If it depends partly upon the proceeds of the sales, then its tone is regulated by that of the buyers. In other words, it is merchandise, subject to all the laws of trade. But if it be the property of an association of two, three, or more proprietors—as are most of the newspapers in New York, for instance—it is a business established for the pecuniary advantage of the owners, precisely like any other business. Thus a journal is designed for those who sympathize with its views, and who therefore buy it. If they are many, the circulation is large, and it thus becomes a desirable method of advertising, and the advertising is the source of profit. Now the editor of the journal conducts it so that it shall maintain its buyers by maintaining the principles which they favor. He is morally bound to admit nothing immoral into it. He is bound to make it as elevating and purifying an influence as he can, subject to the cardinal condition that it shall be profitable. If he destroys that, he destroys the paper; and disappearing, it ceases to be an influence of any kind whatever.

In a word, if his customers want cakes and ale, he will try that those refreshments shall be of the best quality. If he finds that, without dispersing his customers, he can cultivate a taste in their potations for that heaven-descended water, he will do it, believing water to be better for every body than ale, but ale infinitely better than hardscrabble. He will use his common-sense. He will do what he can. If he wishes to convert Choctaws to the inductive philosophy, he will not begin by reading Homer to them in the original Greek. He will not starve because he can not have the whole loaf. An editor is bound, in the sense meant by a Hopeful Man, to create and regulate as well as feed the popular appetite. But he must begin with the appetite he finds. From that he is to "create" the higher one. All that we can ask of him is that he do his work soberly, honestly, and unfalteringly; and the Easy Chair is sure that he hears "A Disappointed Man" and "A Hopeful Man" saying Amen!

Just as the great Sanitary Fair in New York ended the campaign opened, and soon afterward the Fair in Philadelphia. It was not less successful than that which we rather proudly called "The Metropolitan." Nor is that surprising, for no city has been more patriotically devoted since the war began than Philadelphia. Men, money, and sympathy she has lavished upon the cause; and we can easily imagine with what kind feelings the wounded or suffering soldier, or the brave men flushed with the glory of the magnificent campaign, have read of the noble outpouring of the national heart of which the Fairs all over the land are an imperfect proof. Indeed, the tie between the citizens at home and those in the field is much closer than some of the latter sometimes imagine. When they reflect that for every man in the army there are scores of hearts interested, and some at least painfully watching, they will see that millions of human beings have the directest interest in the campaign.

In this great system of Sanitary Fairs also, we can see how wisely the vast sympathy and benevolence of the country are now directed. The war has educated us in every way to make every effort and all emotion tell. The ardor which three years ago was concentrated upon havelocks, not to be remembered without a mingled smile and tear, is now organized into the most substantial and systematic relief. In all this we see the old national quality—a quality which certifies success. And if our opponents partake of the same, while the circumstances and conditions of the contest make the result undoubted, that very fact shows also how final the result must be.

The history of the Sanitary Fairs will be one of the most significant and characteristic chapters in the annals of the war.

WE hope that no reader omits the new novel of Dickens, "Our Mutual Friend," in the vain expectation of reading it when it is finished and published collectively. If he does, he loses a great deal of pleasure every month, and declines to prolong his delight. The sale of the first number, separately, in London, was forty thousand copies within the first few days. Nor is that surprising, for the work is as gushing and exuberant as any of his long list. The humor is more rollicking than in any tale he has written for many a year, while its curious and various revelations of the lower strata of London life are as much contributions to history as the extraordinary pictures of Paris in "A Tale of Two Cities."

The fertility of Dickens's power is amazing. There is a general resemblance of manner in his stories, but there is very little repetition of character. His profusion is Shakespearian. But that which Shakespeare could do perfectly, and beyond comparison in literature, Dickens can not do at all. He can not draw a gentleman. Noble men and transcendently heroic women he delineates with love and skill. Common and uncommon people he pictures as few have ever done. But a figure like Hamlet, like Mercutio, like Sir Philip Sidney, like the Master of Ravenswood, does not move across his page. Of course the absence is noted only because the company is so rich and various. Upon the Rialto we look to see representatives of all the world.

Never forget that every number of the tale has a certain completeness, and that serial reading in these days is a most desirable and economical habit.

IN this number of the Magazine ends the fourth part of "Denis Duval," the last part of the last story that we shall ever have from Thackeray. In this bright summer the roses bloom and the birds sing upon his grave. Yet at the very height of the opulent year the loss of that immense vitality seems only the more incredible. We cling to these last pages because, when they have been read, and other numbers of the Magazine succeed, and other months and years, and the inexorable lapse of time, he must be spoken of no longer with a tender personality, as of one dead but not yet buried, but rather as we speak of Scott, and Béranger, and Irving, and of the longer dead and immortal.

Well, the moral is, the greatness of childlike simplicity. Keep that if you can, whatever you lose. He knew the world, as the technical phrase is, as few men knew it. The weakness of men and the complex motives of human action he comprehended more profoundly than most modern authors. But he was himself a child through it all. His greeting, his talk, his faults, his face, they were those of a generous child. That, also, is the impression of this last story. What unaffected hate of meanness and admiration of manliness and truth there are in every line! How every parent would wish his son to have the same emotions in regard to the various people and events of the tale that the author evidently has! Surely none of us who have always loved and admired Thackeray would wish to have had the last words from his pen other than those which he has written in "Denis Duval."

THE verses which follow have a tender ballad pathos which in spirit is not unlike some of the most beautiful strains of Wordsworth. There is something almost too painful in the incident, but the poet has touched it with an art which justifies his choice.

THE LOST LAMB.

The marsh and meadow lay in fog,
The night was chill with drizzly rains,
The gude-wife turned the smould'ring log,
And spread the snowy counterpanes.

The child within its downy bed
She tucked with more than wonted care,
Then laid her own thrift-weary head,
And into dreams slipped half her prayer.

Past midnight, and the dame awoke,
A cry of anguish filled the room!
She listened: not a murmur broke
The silence of the household gloom.

Again and yet again she stirred
In startled slumber through the night,
As oft her fevered fancy heard
Some wild, strange summons of affright.

Toward dawn it sounded yet again,
Plaintive and lone, and faint and far;
'Twas like a childish cry of pain,
Or utterance, as, "Mamma, mamma!"

She sprang from bed, and sought her child:
Soft nested in its crib it lay,
And on each sleeping feature smiled
The first faint promise of the day.

Back to her bed the gude-wife crept,
Her eyes half blind with tender tears:
"In God's own hand my darling's kept—How foolish are a woman's fears!"

"Some lamb, most like, has strayed the fold,
The poor lone thing was bleating 'ba,'
Which, borne upon the fog and cold,
Seemed to my mother ears, 'Ma, ma.'"

Next day a piteous tale went round,
The village street was all agog;
A child's dead body had been found
Stiff standing in the meadow bog!

The little feet had strayed away;
The clinging mire had held them fast
Till death, slow dawning with the day,
Brought her its blest release at last.

And there, throughout that livelong night,
A helpless child of tender years,
Fainter and fainter with affright,
Had called "Ma, ma" to sleeping ears!

I knew her not—I only found
In printed page this tale of fear;
But when I cease to hear that sound,
I shall have ceased all sounds to hear.

DORINDA" wishes to have the last word, and says that it is a pity we should let John Bull and Jean Crapaud know what ill-mannered people we are. Does Dorinda also think it a pity that the clergyman should reprove the shortcomings of the saints lest the sinners should discover that even saints are not perfect? Mrs. Grundy is a formidable being. But there is something worse than Mrs. Grundy, and that is, caring what she will say.

The one thing which the times will establish, whatever they may disturb, is our independence of foreign criticism. Not that the judgment of the wise and intelligent can ever become indifferent to a sensible man or nation; but the overpowering and morbid deference to foreign judgments, as such, is passed forever. We have learned by a somewhat sad experience how much that judgment owes to the poorest prejudice. We have seen in the persistent falsehood aimed at the happiness of a nation, the utterly unworthy and contemptible spirit which may dictate apparently the gravest verdicts. We have seen that nothing is precious to so many of our judges but their own passion. And we have seen in their own proper persons the individuals who have been especially delegated to communicate the information upon which judgment has been rendered.

After that last fact it is impossible that any self-respecting American should longer value a foreign opinion upon any subject whatsoever in this country, merely as a foreign opinion. Neither in manners nor morals do we know of any European who can claim a superiority for his nation over ours; while the political problem, whatever the result of the war, will have been settled quite as satisfactorily as it has ever been in any other land. When American citizens suffer themselves to be hired to go to England, for instance, in the agony of a great revolution involving the highest interests of the race and civilization to which both America and England belong, for the purpose of caricaturing the truth and ridiculing the cause which has made England what it is, we may properly own a sense of degradation of which we have hitherto had no experience. Until then, whether John Bull, whose name was generated from a consciousness of its propriety, or Jean Crapaud, who will see a standing woman drop rather than yield his seat, like or dislike our manners, is a matter of profound indifference, Miss Dorinda!

"If you could read my verses," writes a young poet who sings "at night," "on a breezy, moonlit, mid-summer midnight, in the presence of an invalid who is sleeping the first quiet slumber that has been his for many weeks, I think you would accept them. But you will probably read them in your office when you are weary, impatient, annoyed, and perhaps hungry in a double sense, and you will, I greatly fear, throw them in the waste paper basket."

Listen, then, poet, and know that the Easy Chair read your verses on a day in June—

"And then, if ever, come perfect days," as Lowell sings. It was in the afternoon, and the air was exquisite. From the open window your judge's eyes looked along ranges of rounded trees toward the delicate west. The soft air was sweet with the scent of clover and roses, and thrushes sang in the thicket by the stream. A vague occasional hum of distant voices, the cry of boys, a call to cattle, the tap of a hammer, the lowing of cows, the crowing of cocks, the gusty bark of dogs mingling with the rustle of leaves in the gentle, pleasant breeze and the incessant sound of birds—these were the only annoyances he knew. Sitting at the window, and listening and looking was his only weariness—entire rest his utmost impatience; and for a double hunger—O poet! it was after dinner.

These were not the circumstances you had fancied for favorable reading; neither were they those which you had deprecated as most probable and most unfavorable. Yet they were those under which the Easy Chair read your verses, owned their sweet feeling, wished they were better, and—doing as he would be done by—dropped them in the basket.

Editor's Drawer.

A CORRESPONDENT in Michigan says: I have this from the physician in whose practice it occurred. Doctors are often annoyed by patients who will not follow directions. None could complain of this one:

Mike was taken "bad," and Pat was dispatched for the doctor, who, after due inquiries into the case, sent some effervescing powders, with directions to have Mike swallow the draught while effervescing. Fearing that the word "effervescing" might not occur in Pat's dictionary, the doctor substituted the word "boiling." "When it boils and foams up," said he, "let Mike drink it." The next morning the doctor called round with the inquiry,

"How are you this morning, Mike?"

"Most well intirely; but it gave me an awful sore mout."

Sure enough, upon examination, the poor fellow's mouth and throat were found to be literally skinned.

"What made your mouth this way, Mike?"

"The medicine you sint, to be sure."

"Did you take it as directed?"

"To be shure I did! I put the two in won, and put thim on the coals till they boilt, and thin I dthrank them. Holy Mother! but it did me a power of good."

MRS. PARTINGTON writes a letter to the Drawer from which we make an extract:

"I declare! I wish I could find out about these politics, for to tell you the truth I have got so mixed up I don't know now whether I am a foreigner or an alien. When Partington was alive he was a real Andrew Jackson Wig, a real Nullifier; and if we had only nullified those South Carolina folks we shouldn't have had so much fuss with those rams and things.

"I can tell you one thing, though: I am in for Union; and I always was ever since I got big enough to get married; and I expect I always shall be, if I live to be a hundred; for I think 'tis a blessed institution, and inoculated by Adam and Eve in the Garden of Edom; and I think we ought to follow their suspicious example, even if Eve did have a fall; for, considering the circumstances, there ain't none of us as could throw the first stone; and if we was all shook up in a bag there wouldn't any body come out first.

"I hear a good deal about Copperheads; but specia is so scarce I don't believe there is any solid copper agoing: I expect the heads must be Wood, with a little Bell metal over them; but I don't profess to be a politician, so I hope you won't put my remarks in the Drawer, as I am only a furlong widow, a relic of Partington's, a good house-keeper, own my homestead—forty acres of woodland—and have got counterpins and linen enough to last twenty years, all made up, besides two boxes of yellow soap up in the garret, all cut up into squares, and so hard you can't stick a knife into it."

THE following circumstance is true, and the subject of it has long since "ate his last goose:"

There used to live in Stony Lane, Washington County, Rhode Island, a man by the name of David Lawton, who was proverbial for a huge stomach and an insatiable appetite. Once upon a time he visited the neighboring town of Newport on business, and, in order to help pay his expenses, he took a fat, nicely-dressed goose along with him. This he sold at a bargain, for seventy-five cents, to a poor widow who kept a boarding-house, agreeing to take dinner with her in part payment, for which she was to charge him twenty-five cents. Learning that her dinner-hour was usually at one o'clock, he requested her to serve up his at twelve, on account of his business engagements, which she consented to do. Accordingly, at the time fixed David presented himself at the widow's board, where, upon a huge platter, the self-same goose that he had reared and fattened lay smoking from the spit, flanked by the usual varieties of vegetables and sauce which serve to make a roast goose doubly palatable. Down our gourmand sat, alone (for of course none of the regular boarders had arrived), and soon devoured goose and "fixins," and nearly cleared the table; he then arose, and, without apology or comment, deliberately received a silver half-dollar (the balance of their account) from the widow's hand and departed. What the boarders did for a dinner that day tradition does not inform us.

THERE used to reside in our State a man of rather miserly propensities, who was very negligent in providing for his household. His children were never more than half fed or half clothed. At one time his wife was taken sick, and he was obliged to hire an Irish servant to do the housework, over whom he kept a vigilant eye. Whether she was thievish or not she was certainly witty, and indulged in frequent remarks upon the leanness of the larder. One morning Skinflint brought in a pound of butter, expecting that it would last for a week in a family of five children; but at supper-time it was considerably reduced in quantity, and as he could not account for such a rapid disappearance he accused Bridget of purloining it. Straightening up to her full height, and with eyes flashing with rage, the excited woman exclaimed, "Steal!—I steal from you! If I was going to turn thafe I'd steal something to bring here!"

ONE of our clerical correspondents says :

I was preaching in the town of A——, on the Susquehannah River. Down the river two or three miles is a little hamlet, where I had established an appointment. A company of young men, with Bill S—— at their head, occasioned me some trouble by whispering, laughing, etc., during service.

Bill was a returned Californian, who pretended to have made his pile in the land of gold. He talked big, drove a fast horse, and, like Mrs. Tony Weller's shepherd, had a "wonderful power of suction" for that "particular kind of vanity" called bad whisky. Having tried milder measures with the boys I administered to them a pretty sharp rebuke, which Bill appropriating all to himself breathed out terrible threats of revenge.

The next time I went down to preach he drove his horse up to Brother Jones's, where I had left mine, and asked the privilege of hitching it in the barn till after meeting. When the services were over Brother J., myself, and Bill, who, by-the-way, had been very gracious all the evening, went to the barn in company. While we were busy hitching on my horse Bill was looking after his own. All at once he broke loose. You may have heard some very powerful swearing, but I think you have never heard any thing that would go ahead of that. Brother J. came around with his lantern to see what it was all about. A single glance at Bill's $250 horse explained it all. Mane and tail were gone as close as sheep-shears could cut them. Just then the boys, who were lying in wait to see the fun, exploded, and the shout which accompanied their yells of laughter—"Old Mose has sheared the wrong hoss!"—was a sufficient explanation of the matter. Bill had hired Old Mose, a regular old bummer, to shear the parson's horse; and being both in the same barn, and both harnessed, he very naturally made a mistake, of which Bill has not heard the last to this day.

FROM one of the United States ships now in service a friend writes :

There is in our mess a young and self-confident officer, who is always ready with remark or opinion on any subject. One day, while at sea, we were looking over the engravings in one of Harper's publications, when this young gentleman burst forth with,

"I get very tired of Harper's engravings; there is a deal of sameness about them."

Some one answered that they could not be all alike, for of course there must be many different artists and engravers employed upon them.

"Oh no," says Omnosco, "I know that they are all made in Delaware, and they must be by one person."

"Ah!" says one, "how do you know that?"

"Why," replied he, "all the pictures in Harper's books are marked D-c-l in one corner."

The laugh which followed this announcement woke up the Captain from his nap, and presently his bell rang, and we heard that he wished to know what the noise meant.

The young gentleman remains unconvinced to this day that Del in the corner of a picture does not stand for Delaware.

THIS is very good: it comes to the Drawer from Annapolis:

During the battle of Hanover Court House, on the Peninsula, the Sixth United States Cavalry supported a battery with drawn sabres in an exposed position. Now it is well known that supporting a battery is any thing but a pleasant job, especially when the enemy's shot occasionally goes crashing through the column; and in this case the men, having to remain mounted, sat on their horses with tightly drawn lips, every one apparently expecting his turn to come next. The enemy's guns were posted at the distance of 600 yards, and hidden by a tall growth of wheat. The fight had progressed about half an hour, and the cannonading very brisk, when a soldier in Company F, rising in his saddle, turned to a comrade and remarked, "Why don't some one go over there and read the riot act to them fellers?" It is needless to say that the expression, with its earnestness of tone, brought a hearty laugh from the company, and with it a sense of relief from the suspense of a moment before.

ELDER B——, of R——, in Michigan, was discoursing from the text of Christ's entry into Jerusalem, and gave the following version: "Christ came with his disciples, mounted on an ass, and the men, women, and children came out of the city, throwing their hats, shawls, and clothes, and even pulling bushes from the trees to throw in his way; but, spite of all obstructions, he rode into Jerusalem in triumph!"

WE have a "scion," not yet advanced to the dignity of jacket and trousers, who, as the genial "Country Parson" would say, seems to understand the art of "putting things." It became necessary the other day to inflict upon him a dose of castor-oil, and the little fellow took the sickening stuff as bravely as any veteran could face a bayonet charge. A wry face or two, and his opinion of the medicament found expression as follows: "Mother, I don't think I quite like castor-oil; it's a little too rich!"

A LADY in Colorado Territory sends the three following:

When Sammie, the minister's little son, was happy in the possession of a new lot of toys, a young lady friend came in, to whom he wished to exhibit his treasures and explain their uses; and wishing to have his friend all to himself, his wits devised a way of keeping his brother quiet, so he made this proposition: "Tommy, you play dead while I show Miss B—— these playthings!"

THE venerable and venerated Bishop M—— having noticed that many of his congregation were in the habit of sitting during the singing of the Te Deum, and that others would sit down from time to time during its progress, he requested them to rise while the Te Deum was sung, and to "continue rising until its close!"

THE Rev. Dr. B——, who was always very precise in his speech, once gave the following notice: "Next Wednesday being Ash Wednesday, or the first Sunday in Lent, Divine service may be expected here!"

Apropos of such a mistake, how many of your readers can without hesitation or study read correctly, on the first trial, the 15th and 16th verses of the 15th chapter of Judges?

A CORRESPONDENT of the Drawer in the famous city of Vicksburg writes:

Clements Rolfs, a burly, double-fisted German—honest, faithful, simple-minded, and possessing a high sense of his duties as a newly-made citizen of the great State of Ohio—was the hero of the following: The Irish laborers from a neighboring public work visited town one "St. Patrick's day in the morning," and after imbibing liberally in honor of their patron saint got up, as usual, "a bit of a scrimmage," attracting quite a crowd, of whom honest "Clem" was one.

Our magistrate undertook to quell the riot by "commanding the peace." All obeyed except two, who were too busily engaged to hear or heed. The magistrate ordered the by-standers to separate the belligerents. No one obeying, he called out, "In the name of the State of Ohio I command you to separate those men!"

Thus invoked, "Clem" considered himself bound to obey, and seizing one of the b'hoys round the body, over the arms, dragged him out of the melée. Pat, highly incensed, wriggled and squirmed about in "Clem's" arms, exclaiming, "Who's got houl't of me? Who's houlding me?"

"Der State von Ohio!" was "Clem's" half-apologetic answer.

The laugh which followed broke up that fight; and "Clem" was duly christened "Der State von Ohio" thenceforward.

A CALIFORNIA lady writes to the Drawer from Benicia:

Master Will is three years old, and has been very much interested lately in an old set of bedroom furniture his mother has been having repainted and varnished. He has heard all of us say that the things looked just as nice as new. Will has one aunty quite old, who told him the other day to pick up some things he had thrown about the floor—for, said she, I am getting old, and can't stoop as well as you. Will looked at her very earnestly, drew a long sigh, and said, "I have been thinking why you don't get painted and varnished; then you'd be just as good as new!"

ONE morning, not long since, Captain H— was going down town, and met three little boys of from seven to nine years of age. As they came up one raised his cap, bowed very politely, and said,

"Good-morning, Captain!"

"What did you bow to that man for, Hal?—what's up?" said one of the other boys as soon as they were by.

"Why," said the young swell, looking very important, "don't you know he's got two of the prettiest girls in town; and of course a fellow wants to keep in with the old man, you know!"

Who ever heard of "Sailor Diggings, Oregon?" but from that far-away place a friend writes to the universal Drawer. He says:

I think every man who knows of a good joke ought to communicate it to your laughter-provoking Drawer.

Our village has but one physician, and he has but few calls; but when he is called he hastens to see his patient, fearing recovery ere he can secure his fee.

Not long since he had a call to see a patient living a few miles out of town, and as his mule was nearly as far away as his patient, he concluded to go on foot, and started about eight o'clock in the evening. When about half-way he heard some animal stealthily creeping toward him, and knowing there were grizzly bears in the country, he at once surmised he was about to be attacked by one. He made up his mind that discretion was the better part of valor, and made hurried tracks for the nearest tree. After ascending about twenty feet he found a convenient limb on which he could hang, and watch and listen to his enemy. He soon heard him approaching, and could see his great eyes glistening like balls of fire. The grizzly approached to near the tree and seated himself, keeping his great fiery eyes steadily fixed upon his victim, as if confident he was yet to furnish him his supper. Thus beleaguered the poor doctor was compelled to hang and watch the huge shaggy monster through the long weary night; and he says his prayers for daylight and relief were deep and heart-felt. At last daylight appeared; and as objects began to appear more distinct the size of the monster began to diminish and appear less frightful, and after wiping the mist from his eyes he found he was treed by his own big dog!

WHILE reading in the May number of your Magazine the sketch of Captain Hall's "Life among the Esquimaux," my memory ran back some years at the mention in it of a well-known name.

I was at Rockaway for a short time one summer, trying to get better health from sea-bathing, when one morning, just as day was dawning, I started for the beach, expecting to have a long and solitary walk before any one else was stirring. There was a man ahead of me, who had a basket with him, and was digging something out of the sand. As I passed by I noticed that he was an old fisherman, with a coarse white shirt, coarse duck trousers, rolled up to his knees, an old straw-hat upon his head, and bare-foot. I discovered that he was digging a small species of crab out of the sand, the like of which I had never seen before. I asked him what use he made of those crabs. He said he was catching them for bait, and he told me how to find them. "The sand of the beach is all white to you; but by looking closer you will see small circles, or rings, of darker sands, which the crabs work to the surface from beneath; approach the ring carefully, shove your hand in it quickly, turn the sand over, and you are apt to throw out the crab." I thanked him for his information and proceeded on my walk. About an hour later I found myself in the barber's shop of the Pavilion Hotel waiting to get shaved. There was only one gentleman in it on the same errand. He sat in the chair, and was nearly through. I noticed his face—knew it was one I had seen before, but I couldn't remember where. After he had put on his hat and gone out, I asked the barber if he knew who that gentleman was. He did. He told me his name—said he had just come from the beach, where he had been gathering bait, as he was going a-fishing that day, and had only finished dressing for breakfast.

And who was the old fisherman? Just about that time, if I mistake not, owing to his princely munificence and generosity in aid of science, Dr. Kane and his companions, amidst the ice and snow of the farther polar sea, was writing his name upon hitherto undiscovered lands and making it immortal. It was Henry Grinnell.

ONE in the Queen City of the West writes:

Two years ago I came to Cincinnati to engage in business, and soon obtained the assistance of a German porter, by name Barney. Finding in a short time that the muddy water of the Ohio was not as palatable or healthy as it might be, I bought a porous stone filter and sent to the store. I told Barney to take it down in the cellar and keep it filled with water until wanted. A few days after I asked Barney to "bring up that stone jar from the cellar." Said he: "I can not." "Why not?" "I gave the ashman sixpence this morning to carry it away; for I had poured four pails of water in it, and it leaked so that I knew you would be glad to get rid of it."

A "CONSTANT READER" writes again to the Drawer:

Many New England readers of the Drawer recollect old Elder T——, of meeting-house building notoriety, and those who were accustomed to hear him preach will remember with what peculiar unction he used to hold forth from the text, "Is there no balm in Gilead, and is there no physician there?" More than once has the writer hereof found "the saut tear trickling down his cheek" while listening to the delivery of this sermon by the good old elder on various occasions. Meeting the old man at the sewing-circle one night, in the course of our conversation I spoke of the impression produced on my mind on hearing him preach it a few Sabbaths previous. "Well," said he, "I have preached that sermon a good many times, and, with one exception, I have faith to believe the effort was blessed; but on that occasion I could only hope for the best. Once," said he, "on a begging tour to raise money to build a church, I stopped to preach one Sunday in the town of Gilead, and wishing particularly on that occasion to produce a favorable impression, I chose my old favorite text. Now it happened that among my hearers was an old negro who had lived for a great many years in the family of the village doctor, and nothing would rile the fellow so quick as the mere suggestion that the doctor didn't know every thing. Every time I repeated the text I noticed the old darkey manifested much emotion, which I attributed to the peculiar fervency of the African temperament; but, warming with the subject, I repeated the text with unusual pathos—"Is there no balm in Gilead, and is there no physician there?" Old Pomp could stand it no longer, and, springing to his feet, said, 'Don no nuffen 'bout de balm, massa, but dere's jes' as good doctor here as dere is in de world.'

BROTHER NATTY, a good honest old bachelor, who does "chores" round town, but has not had time to digest Webster's Unabridged, was speaking the other day of having lived formerly in Virginia.

"Then your people came from that State," I remarked.

"Yes, my progeny all came from old Virginny."

ONE snowy winter night I found a drunken Irishman half covered up in a snow-drift, and utterly helpless. I picked him up and restored him to the bosom of his family. I supposed him perfectly unconscious until I opened the door to go, when he broke out with, "Mr. T——, I am vary much obleeged to ye, indade; and if I iver find ye in a similar condition I'll be sure and return the favor."

A LADY who knows whereof she writes tells the experience of a Yankee Miss in Dixie, years ago:

In other days, when the Southern States were regarded as a Land of Promise by New England teachers, one of the sisterhood obtained a situation in a thriving seminary in Virginia, and at once bade adieu to the land of barberry bushes and cranberry vines, for a home which was reasonably supposed to combine the advantages of the Fifth Avenue Hotel and Smithsonian Institute.

"Dis am your room," said the Topsey of the occasion, who had been deputed to attend the Yankee teacher to her apartment; "and laws, missus, I'll have a fire for you in no time; the stage done got in sooner than I 'spected to-night, that's the truth."

Miss —— wearily proceeded to make such toilet as she might with the aid of a pint of tepid water and six by nine looking-glass, until, suddenly being made sensible of a heavy smoke, she turned, and saw that it proceeded in thick volume from the fragment of stove-pipe, which stood like a broken column, wanting nearly two yards in measurement from the hole in the wall intended for its egress.

"I can't endure it," said Miss ——.

"I should think not," returned Topsey, showing her white teeth. "I wonders at you! It ain't the style at all."

"What did you do it for, then?"

"I didn't. I wouldn't do my hair in a three strand braid on no account; it is too poor-white-folksy for me. We doesn't plait our hair in this establishment in less than fifteen or twenty strands; and it's lucky you had me to tell you, for if our young ladies had seen you to-night at the table your character would be gone forever!"

"Oh-h!" said the teacher, doubly suffocated. "Please put out the fire, and send a man to put up the rest of the pipe."

"Stove's done finished as it is," said Topsey, severely. And, alas, it was.

In Madame C——'s school pails of water stood about in convenient situations, with cocoa-nut dippers, for the convenience of thirsty pupils; but dippers will not bear too rough handling, and the mortality thereof had been irritatingly great.

Madame was upon her knees on the platform, one morning, devoutly conducting the devotions of her hundred pupils, when in the distance was heard the crash of the devoted vessel. There was a pause in the prayer, and these words audibly interluded by the oblivious speaker, "Good gracious! if there isn't another of my cocoa-nut dippers gone!" and the prayer went on.

FROM a friend in Baltimore we have the following:

Some years ago there was a very clever but illiterate man named Tate elected to the Georgia Legislature, from Pickens County. When he arrived in Milledgeville he inquired of the first one he met—who, unfortunately for him, was addicted to practical jokes—the way to the Capitol. The gentleman directed him to the Market-house, where, with all the dignity imaginable, he seated himself behind one of the stalls. After a while the vendors of meats commenced assembling and hanging their merchandise in a very tempting manner. Tate seeing, as he thought, the members of the Legislature, gazed in awe-struck wonder until he thought he had solved the mystery, and then he said: "You members from the lower counties, I see, know a little more than we Cherokee people. You don't intend to be swindled by these rascally hotel-keepers, so you bring your provisions along with you!" There was some excitement until the matter was explained, when some kind-hearted "member" pointed out the Capitol to him.

WHEN canvassing not long ago for an office, I had to address an evening meeting in a small country village. The meeting was called, and the school-house, where it was held, was crowded. A German friend, keeper of a small lager-beer saloon, who reminded me that he once chopped wood for me, and had now risen to be a leader of the party, called the meeting to order. He mounted a bench, with a great flourish with his hand nominated a chairman, and said, on taking the vote, "All dem dat sez I, sez I." There was no answer. With great anger he repeated, "I sez, all dem dat sez I, sez I!" Seeing that there was a difficulty of comprehension, or simple misunderstanding, I alone responded with a loud Aye! My Dutch friend got down from his perch with a victorious look, saying, "It is harmoniously agreed!"

FROM the head-quarters of the One Hundred and Eighth Illinois Infantry Volunteers, Corinth, Mississippi, we have the following:

While the regiment was stationed at La Grange, Tennessee, we received orders to prepare five days' rations and be prepared to march, with the expectation of a fight. Our meat-rations had been rather small for several days previous to this, because of the low stage of water, which made transportation difficult. A few barrels of hard bread were found to be wormy, and to save cursing the Quarter-master divided them equally among the companies, thereby giving none a greater right to complain.

The rations were issued, conveyed to company-quarters, and divided. Shortly after a group of men could be seen around the old quarters of Company I, all busy cursing the Quarter-master, when old Jack Smith (called, for short, "The General") stepped up to where they were talking, and in a half-whisper remarked:

"Why, you 'tarnal fools! don't you see a God-send in this? Here you have been cursing the Quarter-master for the last week because your rations of meat was small; and now the Lord has taken pity on us poor d—ls, and is sending us 'fresh meat' in a mysterious way, so that the Quarter-master won't know it and stint us in the supply!"

This caused a general laugh, and the grumblers went away well pleased.

BERKSHIRE, Massachusetts, contributes several anecdotes to the Drawer:

VOL. XXIX.—No. 171.—D D*

"HERE'S RICHNESS!"

Gus B——, long well known in Massachusetts as the prince of bon vivants, on his return from his first visit to the West was glowingly describing the beauty of the situation and the fertility of the soil of a town where he had spent about two months. "How about the water, Gus?" asked an inquisitive friend. "I forgot to try it!" responded he, and the crowd believed him.

THE proprietor of our store, a very dignified man, returning from dinner one day, found on the middle of the floor a pail turned wrong side up. He inquired, with some asperity in his tone, "What's that pail there for?" A waggish clerk responded, "There is a wood-cock under it." Supposing it of course to be alive, with considerable difficulty he got down on the floor and lifted the pail carefully, and discovered a wood faucet!

EVERY body who knows Charley H——, and every body does, will rejoice in the following specimens of his ever-genial and abounding humor:

The Rev. Dr. T——, of Berkshire, is as well known for his temperance principles as his eminent piety; but having suffered from a severe attack of diphtheria, during his convalescence he was advised by his physician to use a little good brandy. Of course his parishioners, most of whom are not loyal disciples of John B. Gough, responded to the suggestion by liberal donations of the "critter." Charley being asked, "How is the Doctor this morning?" promptly replied, "If he don't die of the delirium tremens I guess he will get well!"

CHARLEY—a manufacturer, by-the-by, of the most villainous quality of "army shoddy"—attired, as is his wont, in a suit of the best French broadcloth, was one day expatiating upon the excellence of his goods. "Why don't you wear them yourself then?" interposed a malicious by-stander. "Can't afford it!" was the ready reply.

A RETIRED merchant, who was somewhat proud of his own success in business, asked Charley one day, who is an inveterate smoker, and often in the street, "How is it that you can do business successfully and be around the street smoking as much as you are?" "Give me twenty-five dollars and I will tell you," responded he; "it cost me more than that to learn."

CHARLEY having a note against a Corporation not noted for paying its debts promptly, and getting anxious about it, consulted the president of one of our banks. He thought it was good, and offered ninety cents on a dollar for it. Charley hurried off and obtained the note for the purpose of completing the bargain. The president, repenting of his offer, said, "I do not want to take advantage of you, and I will help you collect it." "No," said Charley; "you buy it, and I will help you."

In the bar-room of one of our principal hotels, about the time the Great Eastern was launched, quite an excited discussion arose among the wise ones as to her safety, on account of her great length. Charley, acting as self-appointed referee, called the house to order, and gravely said, "After hearing all the arguments, I think she ought to be cut off about three feet, and I think some of you ought to write the owners to that effect."

"You have been sorely tried," said a sympathizing neighbor to old Joe Crawdon, weeping over the coffin of his third wife. "Yes," responded the bereaved one, "I have always had the dreadfulest luck with women!"

THE saying that "misery loves company" was fully realized by me on the following occasion. Last July, while traveling from New York to Washington, and when within a few miles of the latter place, the train was brought to a full stop within a few rods of a bridge. The conductor came along and informed the passengers that the recent heavy rains had rendered the bridge unsafe for the train to cross, and that we would have to get out and walk. Most of the passengers having taken his advice, I concluded to do the same, and was walking leisurely along when I noticed, just ahead, several peddlers with their wares (in fact, I brought up the rear). As the last one was passing a baggage-car a brakeman looked out and said to one of his companions,

"Just look at that pack of Jewish army swindlers!"

The last of those thus addressed looked around to me and said,

"Vat vas dat he says to us?"

AN ADVENTURE ON THE COAST OF AUSTRALIA.

THE STORM.

SOME thirty or forty miles east of the coast of Australia there lay, during the night of the 26th of July, 1853 (which is the depth of winter in that part of the world), a very small vessel, cutter rigged, and of only 16 tons register. Her condition was deplorable. Her bulwarks were all washed away, and every thing, including the only boat she carried, swept off the decks. In addition to this she was leaking considerably. Her crew consisted of the writer of this, who was captain, a mate, four sailors, and a young man who acted as steward and cook. Besides these the captain had his wife on board. This little vessel was called the Thomas.

About three weeks previously she had left Sydney; but from the moment of departure a succession of heavy gales had so disabled her that she was now little better than a complete wreck upon the water. All the crew were thoroughly worn out; and no hot food could be well obtained, except some coffee at the small cabin stove. On deck the hatches and the entrances to below (except a small opening large enough merely to admit a man crawling to the cabin) were securely fastened and covered with tarpaulins. Ropes ran along where the bulwarks had been; and the man at the pump (relieved every quarter hour) had to be lashed there to prevent him from being washed away by the sea, which broke furiously over the apparently doomed craft. Yet, despite this disastrous state of things, the crew, sailor-like, were not a whit dismayed. They cracked their jokes, ate their cold food, drank their grog, and smoked their pipes as if nothing extraordinary had happened. Nevertheless, not a man on board but fully expected the coming night would be his last if the gale continued; for, without a boat to aid in escaping, or any material to make a raft, all hands must perish should the vessel no longer be able to withstand the storm.

At this time the cutter was hove to under a balance-reefed mainsail, and about two yards of the throat of a storm-jib. It was blowing a perfect hurricane from the southwest, and in the small cabin, where the whole crew (except the man at the pump) had assembled for shelter, every lurch of the vessel covered the lee-side of the floor to full eighteen inches of water. To face the wind on deck was impossible, and the sea burst so incessantly over the little craft that half the time she was as much under the water as floating upon it. But her very diminutiveness saved her from being broken to pieces or wholly swamped. She succeeded in living through this unusually heavy storm, while three or four large ships of more than twenty times her tonnage were wrecked and totally destroyed close by. My all was embarked in the venture. The little craft and her contents were my own. The object of the enterprise and its ultimate result may be learned from the following extracts from the Australian newspapers of the day:

"Yesterday Captain Snow got to sea in his own cutter, bought, stored, and provisioned at his own cost, for Behring's Straits. The little vessel is ballasted with goods for trading at the various islands on the way, and nothing can be more interesting than his undertaking the voyage in so small a craft."—Sydney Herald, July 1, 1853.

"We now have to record with regret the failure of Captain Snow's Expedition. He met with a succession of heavy gales after leaving Port Jackson, and was obliged to make for Shoal Bay."—The Same, August 5, 1853.

It will be unnecessary here to give more details of how we did eventually weather this storm, and what occurred during that night. The events of those three weeks, ending with the day following the dark hours I have just referred to, were not few nor tame; but they belong to a narrative of sea life, and must be passed over for the present. They are alluded to only by way of explanation as to the cause of our getting among the wild natives of Australia in the manner about to be narrated.

The night passed on, and still we lived! The half-wrecked cutter floated upon the waves, and incessantly came the sound in our ears of the clang, clang of the pump trying to keep the leak from increasing, while the howl of the gale could be heard even in our closed up, stifled cabin below. But though every sea that went over us seemed to be our doom, and though amidst all we found ourselves close to the shore, and had to pass through other dangers from that proximity, we were still almost miraculously preserved.

Morning saw me on deck, where I had been for some hours; and now, with an eager eye, I scanned the rocky shores as the dawn of day broke upon them. Fortunately the wind had lessened, and was veering to the eastward. A high sea, however, rolled heavily in, and it was utterly out of the question for us to think of remaining thus another night. It was decided, therefore, to run for the first place that would give us shelter. The Clarence River, not far northward, seemed to offer this; but neither myself nor any one on board knew the locality. The mouth of this river was marked on the chart as Shoal Bay, having an ugly bar at the entrance, and a dangerous reef of rocks connecting that bar with the main land. Still, it was our only chance, and try it we must. Accordingly, after making sail, and a few hours' manœuvring, we succeeded in getting the cutter in a good position to enter. But what was our vexation when, on nearing the place, we saw such a tremendous sea breaking on the bar that to attempt a passage there was sure to be instant destruction. We should be inevitably swamped. Yet not to get shelter somewhere would also be as bad. What was to be done? A moment's consideration determined me. I had gone aloft to examine, and noticed among the rocks forming the reef what appeared to be a narrow tortuous opening. This, as the last alternative, I thought we might try; but inasmuch as every man's life was as dear to him as mine to me, I descended and consulted my crew. One and all saw the necessity of immediately attempting to get through that apparent opening, trusting to good management and likewise to the sea heaving our small craft over such rocks as might be in the way. This agreed to, every man was stationed at a certain post. The mate went to the helm; one hand took the lead, though of not much use, to try the soundings; another went forward; and the others attended to the sails.

A few words of direction as to what each should do in trying to reach the shore if we struck, and a moment to the care of her who was sharing my fate—and who, with life-belt and a cask near by to help save herself, was securely placed on deck—and I then went aloft to con the ship, which had been headed for the opening. The lives of all on board depended on my nerve and calmness. I dared not yield for an instant to one thought other than what was necessary to try and guide the little vessel through or over that reef of rugged, jagged, and frowning rocks before us, now not a half mile off. I could perceive that the sea was beating upon them furiously, though at intervals leaving a faint blue line of smoother water in the opening I had noticed. As we approached I also beheld the south headland swarming with naked savages, gesticulating in what seemed a most threatening manner. But though alarming at other times, it had no effect upon me now. I steadied myself by the mast-head, and thence sang out my orders to below. "Port! Port your helm! Steady! Starboard! Mind your helm! So-o! Watch her well!" and such like came rapidly from my lips as required. And now we were near!

On to the fierce breakers the little vessel rushed! A towering sea lifted her on high—the next moment, trembling in her whole frame, she was in the vortex of the surging foam! Here, there, every where, rocks around, and showing their black and craggy heads menacingly amidst the angry waters. Life and death were at the poise of a balance. For an instant every one on board held his breath. I could feel myself bedding my teeth into the flesh beneath with the intense excitement of the moment. But no thought was there for any thing but the crooked space of water, some thirty or forty yards in length, in which we must keep.

"Water! What water have you?" I shouted, as the cutter again bounded forward.

"Touch something—rock—at half four," was the prompt reply, void of the usual sailor's drawl.

"Starboard! Starboard again!" I shouted, as we now moved in the dangerous channel, lifted by another wave; and quick was the answering response from below. But even as the words came from my mouth, and while the cutter was on the crest of that sea, I beheld right before us, almost under the bow, one of the rocks now uncovered by the recoiling wave.

"Look to yourselves below! Hold hard all of you! Port! Port the helm if you can!" I shouted at the top of my voice.

The next moment down came the cutter amidst a chaos of boiling surges, and with a blow that seemed enough to shake the hull to pieces, while the mast quivered beside me: her after-keel came against the rock.

"Struck! struck!" the mate and crew screamed aloud; but hardly had the words escaped their lips, when up again, and onward, the tiny craft sped her way. I breathed anew. A few yards more and we were safe. The channel turned somewhat now to the south. In it, if possible, we must go. But the look was appalling. I almost felt my head swim as I gazed upon the whirlpool below. Still I could think; I could speak.

"In with the main-sheet! Starboard your helm! So-o! Steady now, steady!" And thus, with another bound, another struggle, as if the entire hull was being torn to pieces, a leap on one more lessening wave, a rush forward, and the little cutter had cleared the rocks, and was in smooth water inside the reef.

"Well done! Well done! Well done!" was ejaculated by one and all, loud enough for me to hear, and with an unmistakable sigh of relief, as we found ourselves once more free from immediate danger. And so said I as, still at my post aloft, the vessel was directed along the south shore to the inner part of the bay.

But we were not yet free from danger. I knew nothing of the place, nor had I any chart of it to guide me. Therefore I deemed it best to anchor as soon as we were sufficiently far in. Meanwhile I could hear the talk of my crew as we sailed on, not far from the beach, where scores of natives, with their wild and nude appearance, followed our movements.

"Safe at last," said one of the men. "She got over well, though her keel had an ugly knock. But," added he, "glancing back and looking at the roaring waters astern, 'what a devil of a place to get through!'"

"Yes," chimed in another. "Once that way is quite enough. However, here we are, and I suppose down anchor will be the next thing."

"Why, that's out of the frying-pan into the fire," here rejoined another. "I don't see that we've much mended our condition. Look at those naked devils running about like mad on each side of us!"

"Ay, there they are, sure enough. 'Guess they're reckoning up a good feast, now we're here. Bad for the Missus, won't it be?"

"Well, she's a trump, that she is. Devil a cry or word did she utter all the time, but was as cool as any of us. 'Twill be bad if these niggers gets foul of us now. What'll the captain do, I wonder?"

"Why, he must put up with it. We're here now, and can't help ourselves. If we can humor the blacks there'll be no harm done. If they get sulky, then we must fight it out—cut and run—or let 'em make a meal of us."

"Pretty consolation for half-wrecked men, truly," here observed Richardson, the mate. "But maybe 'tisn't so bad. We've got through some of the worst, and must try to master this also."

At this moment I descended, having got the cutter to a part that seemed safe to anchor in. One word I gave to her who had so bravely stood the trying scene—ever like woman in time of danger—and then I went forward to the men.

"Mr. Richardson," I said, "we will anchor here for the present. Make all snug. Keep one man to the pump and to watch. Then let the rest go below if they like."

"Ay, ay, Sir!" was the mate's quick response. "I will see all right. You yourself need some rest. I'll keep watch, and if there's any danger let you know directly."

"But what about these darkeys, Sir?" asked Morgan, with evident alarm. "There seems more than a hundred of them, and I never see such a lot of wild dancing devils before."

Poor Morgan! I saw that he, and not he alone, was evidently frightened, and, truth to say, with some reason. For it is a fact well attested that the native Australians, on that part of the coast especially, are, or were then, cannibals when necessity, or even a good opportunity, placed white men in their power. But it was not the first, nor second, nor third time I had been among these wild tribes, and many a strange scene I had passed through with them, alone and absolutely in their power. I felt, therefore, that though caution was necessary, over-fear need not be felt. Consequently, with a laugh, I replied:

"Well, we must take our chance, Morgan. I don't think they will molest us here, even if they do at all. We have got clear of the greater danger at sea. And now only keep a good look-out, allowing no canoes alongside, and we shall be safe."

I went below, and the moment I reached a dry part of the cabin I fell like a log upon a couch, and was soon asleep. But I was not allowed to remain long so. Directly I left the deck the anchor had been dropped and the sails loosely rolled up. No sooner was this done than the blacks were observed manning their canoes to come off. Instantly the men came to the mate with a request that I should be called up, and upon my reappearance there was a simultaneous demand for the cutter to be moved away from the supposed new danger. A look through my glass told me that undoubtedly some movement was going on among the natives, and it behooved us to be on our guard.

I need hardly observe that, at such times, it is always best for a vessel to be under sail. Accordingly I gave the necessary order, and soon the cutter had canvas upon her, and was moving about the bay. But here it will be necessary to say a word concerning the place.

Though now well known, a few years ago the Clarence River—one of the finest in Australia—was rarely visited except by a few coasting craft for cedar, which grows abundantly on its banks, and for the wool of the New England farmers, generally sent to the settlement of Grafton, some forty miles up. Previous to my arrival this river had not been surveyed, and the few persons who knew aught about it kept their knowledge to themselves. The general communication between the settlement of Grafton and Sydney was overland, and the native tribes roamed about the banks of this river in all their primitive, wild, and independent condition. Knowing of this settlement at Grafton, though ignorant of the navigation to that place, I determined to try and get so far, trusting to care and management for avoiding any rocks or shoals in the way. Thus, then, I gave the order to go on. But no sooner was it found that I intended such than Morgan and two of the other men openly expressed their fears that we were making matters worse, and that we should be captured and made food of. Johnson laughingly took sides with the others, more to see, as he afterward said, whether I would not think it best to remain under sail in the bay than go farther up the river in uncertainty. But I knew what I was about, and determined to proceed.

By this time the natives had got in their canoes, and were about paddling off, when suddenly they ceased, and returned on shore, many of them running about in various directions, as if mad. Nude, shaggy, and repulsive-looking, their lank forms and matted hair presented the idea of so many fiends dancing about, intent upon the white man's destruction. Those on a sandy spit at our right were very conspicuous, being perfectly exposed, and, if I had so desired, might have been quickly lessened in number by the discharge of some shot and ball. But I had never yet adopted such a course, nor ever intended to do so, except in the last extremity.

The bay was a singular one. It was formed by the mouth of the Clarence River being diverted from its natural straight course to the sea, and turned aside by a long and moderately-high sand-spit running from the coast of the north shore inside of the outer entrance and the south headland reef toward a deep bend on the right bank of the diverged stream. On this south side thick trees run up to a goodly height, leaving a pleasant little beach, and opening out near the headland so as to form a grassy knoll, on which were a few shrubs. Beyond this outer bay and inside the sandy spit were several shoals and banks, at that time unknown to me or any of the crew. It was on the south shore, among the trees, that a great number of natives were seen, as well as on the sandy spit, but only the latter appeared inclined at first to come off.

Directly the cutter was again under way, and standing more up the river, some of the blacks were noticed watching her very carefully, while others had run on toward a thick clump of trees that now appeared on the north shore as the little vessel turned round the sand-spit and opened out new places. But the attention of all on board was more directed to the ship than to the natives. The soundings were for a short time regular, and then became very uneven, from five fathoms to three, and changing rapidly. Presently a "quarter less three" was hastily shouted from the leadsmen, and before an order I promptly gave to turn the ship's head seaward could be executed the cutter went heavily on a hidden shoal, and was immovably fixed. Here was a dilemma! The tide had taken the ebb, and as we had no boat it was impossible to do any thing in the way of extricating ourselves. The only chance was to make a raft, get out an anchor astern, and so try to heave off; and this all hands immediately set to work doing.

My vexation, and the dismay of those of the crew who were alarmed at the natives, may be imagined. It seemed as if we were really doomed, and Morgan again openly bemoaned his fate in thus having to run the risk of becoming food for Australian blacks. But as it was no use repining, every one went vigorously to work, and in a short time an extempore raft was made, an anchor planted in a direction where, after sounding, it was hoped the vessel could be hove off, and then a strain put on. It was, however, too late. The tide had fallen so much that the cutter already began to lean over, and therefore it was necessary to wait until near high-water. Nothing then remained but to have patience; and this, with a very ill grace on the part of Neil and Morgan, was resorted to. Orders were given for a good watch to be kept on deck, and after seeing every thing as safe as could be, I once more went below for a few moments. But hardly had I left the deck when a small boat, with two figures in it, was seen rapidly approaching from the clump of trees on the north shore. As it neared the cutter one of the figures was observed to be a middle-aged white man, and the other a native black. On reaching the ship's side the former asked, in English, what was the matter.

"Matter!" said Richardson, in reply. "Why, you can see we've had bad weather outside, and, having lost nearly every thing, came here, it appears, to be deprived of the remainder."

"What's the name of your craft, and where are you bound?" again queried the stranger.

"The Thomas is our name, and we were bound on a cruise 'mong the islands," was the mate's response. "But who are you?"

"Oh, I'm cedar-cutter just now," he replied. "What's your captain's name?"

The answer was given, and then the mate added, "But here he is, if you want to see him."

I again appeared on deck, and was informed of what had passed.

"I see you have a boat, my friend," I said, addressing the stranger; "and if you can let us have its use, or would wish to dispose of it, I shall be glad to make terms."

"As for disposing of it, perhaps I can," was the stranger's response, "seeing that my partner, who is ashore, and I, have another. But we can talk of that by-and-by. You can make use of it now, if you like, and I'll come aboard to lend a hand."

"Thank you heartily," I replied, as the stranger leaped on to the deck, followed by his sable companion, void of the slightest attire, and who immediately passed the boat astern. "What name shall we call you by?"

"My name is William C——, and the black there is Billy," replied the cedar-cutter, at the same time pointing to the native. "He is a good pilot for this river, and so are all of them about here. If you'd had one on board he would have kept you clear of this."

"What! Are they civilized blacks here, then?" I asked.

"No, by no manner of means: not as Government folks call them," he answered. "But they will not harm people when there's no cause first given. I know them pretty well, and it was they that told me of your coming in here."

"Then," said I, "they were not bent on mischief a while ago, when we saw them running about so, and some taking to their canoes?"

"Not a bit of it!" said he. "They saw you making for this place when out at sea, and wanted to warn you that the reef couldn't be passed. And here again they tried to show you where the best water was, but when they found you didn't understand them they came away to me."

"You see, men," said I, now addressing the crew, "these poor natives turn out much better than you expected. It's lucky after all that we came here."

"Ay, Sir," said Neil; "it's well enough just at present. But we can't tell how they may be by-and-by. I've known them afore, and they're treacherous enough when they please."

"Well, perhaps they may be sometimes," the stranger remarked. "But it's most when some of the whites behave bad to them, as was done down there that time on the Darling."

In a few moments I had arranged with William C—— for himself with his boat, and what assistance could be obtained from the natives, to aid in getting the little vessel clear and taking her to where he and his brother lived with their wives, and one more white man, some fifteen miles up the river. Strangely enough I soon found that, though calling himself only a

"cedar-cutter," he and his brother were shipwrights, located on the Clarence by themselves among hundreds of the natives. He was building a schooner to order for some one at Sydney; and, on the present occasion, had come to the "Heads"—as this entrance bay was called—for the purpose of selecting suitable timber, good pine for masting, in addition to cedar, being plentiful.

In course of conversation he stated that the blacks were all friendly just now, and never did harm unless driven to it. "You see," said he, pointing to a canoe—one of several now approaching—"you see that man there with a red shirt on him and a brass plate hanging on his breast? Well, some months ago there was a vessel wrecked off this bar and all hands perished. One of the bodies was washed on shore by the sand-spit. Peter, as we call him, discovered that body, and instead of treating it badly, he dug a hole and decently buried it. When the Government people heard of this they gave him that brass plate with an inscription upon it to hang round his neck, and the red shirt to wear. He is very proud of his shirt and decoration whenever strangers come here, and his tribe do every thing they can for white men, provided they are kindly treated. There are a few ugly ones among them, it is true; but me and my brother, with our wives, have lived here some few years and never had harm yet."

"Are these blacks," said I, "all of one tribe on the river?"

"Oh no," he replied. "The ones about here belong to the Igloodik tribe; and those where I live are what we call the Rocky Mouth natives; a little further on there is another lot under their chief, "King Billy," an old man with an aged wife and numerous family. Those lower down on the Narraganset and Billingen rivers, as also the tribes on the Richmond river farther north, are distinct and separate from all the rest, never infringing upon each other's territorial rights unless by permission, or when they fight, which they often do. Indeed, at the present time there is going to be a battle among them, and perhaps you may have a chance to see it."

"It will not be the first I have witnessed," was my reply. "Some years ago I was a great deal among the blacks about Gipps's Land, and, though they treated me well, yet I found them to be ferocious and devilish enough to strangers in general."

"Yes, that I know," said Mr. C——, "and these have been the same some time back. Indeed, all along the coast they are so now when enraged. You have heard of Mrs. Frazer's case when her husband, captain of a ship, and herself with all the crew were wrecked north of this place several years ago?"

"I know something of it," was my reply. "I happened to be in Sydney at the time when she was rescued and brought there. It was a terrible affair!"

"It was," he continued; "and perhaps worse than can ever be made public. You know that when they left the wreck in two boats it was several days before they landed, having meant to go along the coast to Sydney. During that time the poor woman gave birth to a child which soon afterward died. Her sufferings were great, for the boat was nearly half full of water, and their food exhausted. This made Captain Frazer run the chance of going on shore. But, upon landing, they were seized by the blacks and stripped entirely naked. One after the other the men—except two that escaped—were killed and eaten. Mrs. Frazer and her husband were kept for a while and made do all the drudgery of the camp, such as carrying wood for firing, and whatever else the devils of women—for they are such whenever it pleases them—delighted in making a torment to the two captives. Soon they were covered with filth and sores, and then the natives would apply burning wood to add to their agony. At last the husband sank under his sufferings, and was unable to do his task-work. They beat him, and when he attempted to run away a spear was sent through his body in presence of the wretched wife. She tried, but had no power to save him, for they immediately dragged her away, leaving her ignorant of what was done with her husband's corpse. Weeks was the poor woman a captive in their hands, until at length an escaped convict, roaming about with some blacks, heard of her position, and generously went to the nearest Government authorities with the information. Artifice, however, had to be resorted to for her release. A boat with an officer accompanied him to the place. He then stripped himself, and, disguised as a black, entered the camp—found means of communicating with her, and so contrived to effect her escape. On entering the boat (which had to be done quickly and at great risk) her condition was most deplorable. Some garments were thrown over her naked form, and she was taken to Moreton Bay. There she was properly attended to, and afterward removed to Sydney."

"And do any of the blacks about here belong to the tribe that was guilty of that horrible barbarity?" I asked.

"No," was the reply. "But I obtained all the particulars through some of them who had been taken prisoners during a fight with that tribe. The convict who effected her escape, was, as you perhaps know, pardoned and rewarded. As for the blacks they were hunted down as far as could be done, and this made them worse. So it went on, and, to the present day, similar outrages still occur. I could name two or three that have happened at stations between here and Grafton, and in the districts each side of the river; but they were all perpetrated by strangers and not by the natives I have most known. When any thing of the kind does occur Government generally sends the "Black Police" among them to secure or punish the offenders, and they do it so well that very seldom is there one of the guilty tribe that escapes."

"Yes, strangely enough," I remarked, "these native police are more deadly toward their own people than the white men are. I have heard that when sent against a party of blacks guilty of such crimes they strip off the civilized dress allowed them by Government, and with a sword or dirk go naked into the work of death. Have you known any instances of this?"

"Yes, it is the case," he replied. "And they never cease until their work of slaughter is ended. They are a bad lot, and much worse than either black or white in the lowest scale. But if you think well to go up the river and have the cutter repaired at my place, you will have good opportunity for getting better acquainted with some of these people. Occasionally we have near three hundred around us, and always a score or two of them may be found."

More conversation passed between us; but as I soon afterward personally learned for myself all he told me, I need not dwell upon it here.

Mr. C—— remained on board, and ultimately we succeeded in getting the cutter over the shoals and proceeding up the river under the skillful pilotage of the native black, "Billy." When we neared the known place of a hidden rock he would cry out "Gibba, gibba;" and sometimes he took us so close to the banks on either side that the yard-arm of our square-sail struck in among some branches of trees. But no further mishap occurred, and after about fourteen miles tortuous but pleasant sailing we arrived at our destination. Dropping the anchor, and fastening hawsers to some trees, we moored alongside the bank where it shelved down to the water's edge, opposite two neat-looking cottages belonging to Mr. William C—— and his brother. It was now just upon dark; but I could see a number of the natives quietly seated upon the shore watching our arrival; and among them were two white women, one the wife of Mr. William, and the other of his brother. Neither of them had any children of their own; but the younger dark-skins were all of them like adopted ones.

Directly the vessel was secured and directions given for a careful watch myself and wife went on shore with M. C—— to his house. It had been built by himself, and was a neat, and even a pretty abode, consisting of parlor, bedroom, kitchen, and spare loft above, with a garden under good cultivation around.

Mrs. William C—— received us with more than ordinary gratification. She was a woman of education and refinement, and as she rarely saw any one but themselves, it was, as she said, an unusual pleasure to have visitors so lately from the civilized world, and especially not a year since from her native home of England. To us it was strange to see her thus—her brother-in-law and his wife her only companions in this isolated place and amidst so many wild blacks. But she had got so accustomed to it that no fear was entertained, and her days passed on—monotonous, it is true, but without care or more than ordinary trouble. Alas!

poor lady, a change was soon about to take place; and the friendly footing maintained with the natives eventually was broken.

In passing to the cottage I had noticed a schooner of about 75 tons building, and Mr. C—— told me it was entirely of cedar. He and his brother, with one white man assistant, and several of the natives, had been the shipwrights. As we looked at it he naturally expressed some pride at his labors, this being the third and, as he said, the best he had made. Little did he then imagine that it was to be his tomb; and that the native blacks who were aiding him would afterward drive his widowed wife and his brother, with his partner, away from the place with danger to their lives! Yet so it was, as the sequel will show.

After an hour spent in the cottage, and a visit to the brother's, we returned on board.

Daylight next morning presented to my view a wild yet picturesque scene. On the bank of the river before me were a score or two of the natives squatted on the ground and intently watching us: a little behind, on the right, in a clear space amidst the trees, was the newly-built schooner, not quite completed, and the white men with some blacks busy at work upon her. Near the schooner on one side was Mr. William C——'s cottage, the mistress attending to her poultry and household duties, while on the left of the scene was a similar cottage belonging to the brother. In the background I could see one or two bark-huts in front of a perfect forest of trees and shrubs; and thousands of birds in beautiful plumage, with hundreds of white cockatoos flying about among them. On either hand of us the river wound its way through a dense grove of verdure, broken by an island at our right, and flanked by hills covered with cedars, the eucalyptus, and brushwood.

For a moment I contemplated the scene, and then with a will we set to work. A stage to the shore was soon made, and as it was necessary to discharge the vessel of every thing on board, preparatory to heaving her down for repairs, we began the task. Here, at first, I thought there would be some difficulty. I was afraid the temptation to steal might be too great for the natives, seeing that there was a large quantity of valuable things to be landed, and especially scrap iron, which ballasted the vessel. But I am bound to record the fact, that, though instruments, books, apparel, and much that the black man would naturally covet, were taken on shore, and remained there for weeks, not one article did I miss. True, every precaution was taken to guard them; but when I now reflect upon the numbers of wild men that occasionally visited and surrounded us I can not help feeling surprised, and thus bear cheerful testimony to the honesty of these uncivilized Australians.

Independent of there not being much accommodation in the cottages, I preferred living for the time among my effects. Accordingly boxes and cases were packed with the most valuable things, and these so arranged that my bed and bedding lay over them. Other things were then placed in due order, and over all came the sails supported by the small yards and spars, so as to form a good sized and comfortable tent. Outside were the heavier stores and such material as could not be injured by rain, and in front was the cooking-stove. Inside, and close to my bed, were some fire-arms, my rifle and revolver, well loaded; my wife also having a beautiful steel dirk always secretly carried about her to use if danger menaced, and other precautions were adopted as were deemed necessary. The mate and crew were quartered in the bark huts, and a ready means of communication established between us all, in case, as Mr. C—— said, any of the tribes of blacks, friendly or strangers, should be tempted to attack us. A beautiful canary-bird that my wife had brought four years before from New York, and that afterward accompanied us on a cruise among the natives of Fuegia, was fixed in or outside our tent as weather permitted, and by its sweet singing invariably charmed the blacks surrounding us. The mention of this may seem unnecessary, but most travelers in wild places well know that it is by these little acts of management in times of possible peril that security is effected; and a singing bird among the Australians is rare, none of their own birds being songsters.

As soon as my tent was fixed and well secured so that no one could enter except at the canvas door, a space in front was marked out and a rope passed round to indicate, as was done by a pretended ceremony, that none of the blacks were to come within it. This they understood, and the whole time faithfully adhered to. Never once did they attempt to infringe, and it was considered by them as a privilege when any were permitted inside the inclosure. The children were often allowed to do so, and the parents evidently appreciated the kindness we invariably showed them. Now and then I allowed to approach the tent a few sick adults or those of both sexes who did work for us; the females as washer-women, and good ones too they were, the men as laborers on the vessel, but it was rare, for if one came others would fancy themselves entitled also.

The work done by the males really deserved praise. In discharging the vessel a gang of them cheerfully aided in the task, taking every care not to lose or injure an article. Once something was accidentally dropped in the river, and instantly two of them dived and recovered it. Indeed, it was most gratifying as well as interesting to behold them thus employed. Yet tame, quiet, peaceable, and friendly as they then were, I have, at other times, seen the same people, men and women, in one moment roused to the aspect and the acts of demons! An instance or two I will presently mention.

My tent fixed, and all the material on shore, the vessel was hove down and the repairs commenced. While these were being done I took the opportunity to mix freely with the natives and enjoy myself as well as I could for the time. I soon found that kindness, tact, and management, combined with firmness, did all that was necessary. I could leave my tent with perfect confidence during the day, and often have I gone shooting for a few miles in the bush, with half a dozen or more blacks for my only companions.

On one of the first occasions I was out early in the morning, and for the following purpose had taken my revolver and rifle in addition to a double-barreled fowling-piece; a native that we called "Sam" carrying the latter unloaded. When at about a mile in the woods, I charged the piece, and making sure of my aim, brought down a couple of birds. Sam and his comrades were very anxious to try and do the same, and I thought it well to let them make the attempt. But first of all I bared the bark of a tree, and then at a fair distance sent in a rifle ball so that they well perceived the effect. I next took out the revolver (at that time revolvers were little known even by white settlers on that coast), and successively discharged four of the barrels, directing the blacks to mark the result. It greatly astonished them, especially when, still holding the weapon in my hand, a fifth barrel was discharged; and they evidently seemed to think there could be no end to its deadly power. But still more were they surprised and alarmed when I loosely charged the rifle again and, giving it to Sam, intimated that he was to fire. Seeing what I had done, he raised the gun to his shoulder and pulled the trigger. It was enough. The concussion he instantly received so frightened him that he dropped the gun and fell upon his back on the ground as if in convulsions. I offered the rifle to another one, but neither Sam nor any of the rest would again handle it, and ever afterward the whole of them were in wholesome dread of the white man's guns. It is true that Mr. C—— had before used such in their presence, but, as he said, he had never given the blacks such a practical trial as that. My object in this was to maintain the white man's prestige. However much we of civilization may despise the savages of wild lands, it is a fact that rarely do they not deem themselves equal to, if not superior to us, and verily in much with some show of reason. Few pale-faces can hunt, fish, track the animals of the bush, scent their game, or see the bird on a tree, so well as they. Then, too, the lazy, unfettered life of an Australian savage makes him positively look with contempt upon a civilized man, toiling and often slaving as we do, braced in garments that seem to the wild man much like what we should consider plated armor to be. Hence, when a voyager or traveler can, it is well for him to show as much superiority of tact, ingenuity, and physical power as possible.

One day I got them to ascend a high tree in that singular mode the Australians are so apt in. Directly the men had come down there was a grunt signifying that such was more than I or my men could do. Whereupon I fastened a piece of iron to a string, threw it over a low branch so that it should come down the other side, and then hauled over a line. By this I ascended, sailor-fashion, hand over hand, and by the same process got up to a higher branch, and thence to such smaller part of the tree that I could better climb. On descending again, the head man among the blacks came forward, and condescendingly said, in a mixture of two or three English words with their native tongue, "Budgerie you. By-by you tumble down, white fellow, and come up black fellow;" meaning, "Well done you. By-and-by you will die as the white man, and then have the honor to reappear as a black man!"

A few days after our arrival a coasting-vessel came into the river, and all my crew not liking to remain where they still felt themselves unsafe, left me, except the mate and steward. This was awkward, especially as no others could be obtained, and to prosecute the voyage or return to Sydney without men would be almost impossible. However, I made the best of it, and patiently awaited the cutter being repaired.

One day I found that Mrs. C—— and my wife had taken under their care a new-comer, a young woman belonging to another tribe. On inquiry, I ascertained that she was the captured bride of a rather handsome black called "Harry," who had been working upon the schooner. This Harry was a remarkably intelligent man, and really a good carpenter. He had been suddenly missed, and as we knew there was a fight to take place with the Richmond blacks, it was supposed he had gone thither. In this we were mistaken. Harry had wanted a wife, and, according to the custom of his people, went away to a different tribe for the purpose of finding one.

Now, in the civilized world when a man seeks a partner for life from the softer sex, gentle and persuasive means, with often a long courtship, are adopted to try and win the fair one's hand. But in Australia the aborigines have quite a different mode. They watch an opportunity when some damsel suited to their taste, and not belonging to their own tribe, is near, and then with the blow of a "waddie" (wooden club) very coolly knock her down, and carry her off as a prize. If he gets her thus away the affair is looked upon as perfectly correct, and all that has then to be done is for the two tribes—the husband's and that of his abducted bride—to fight it out. Of course it often happens that neither of the tribes have had a desire to fight, for it takes a long time to screw up their courage to a pitched battle, and, therefore, the ardent swain and his selected damsel frequently meet with ill-grace from their respective people. Harry's case was precisely this. He went away to a place where probably he had seen the damsel before, and there hiding himself in a thicket, waited for her approach. She came, poor, unsuspecting maiden! He knew she was not a wife, for the lapet or apron worn by females before marriage with a man, and thrown away afterward, was to be seen, therefore he determined to have her as his own. Watching an opportunity he suddenly sprang out of his lair, and, dear loving swain, with a heavy blow of his club upon her head felled her to the ground. He then bore her away, and, as we must suppose, by some other more tender means, persuaded her to be his wife. Certain it was that a day or two afterward Master Harry reappeared at our quarters, bringing with him the buxom young stranger. Immediately a fierce hubbub ensued. The whole of the female portion of Harry's tribe repudiated the poor girl, whether because she was really good-looking, or from fear of their own husbands having to go and fight about it afterward, I can not say. But "Kitty," as we white people soon christened her, was instantly refused admission into the family circle of the dusky dames around us.

Hence it was that protection was given to her in the way I have named.

A few days later I observed a great commotion among the blacks, and heard that two or three old men from Kitty's tribe had come to demand her restitution to them, or else to arrange about the necessary fight. Harry, of course, would not consent to relinquish her, especially as (strange though it may seem) the girl had got to really love him, and he her. Give her up, therefore, he would not, and the males of his tribe admitted his right to have a wife in such manner. Therefore there was no alternative but to fight. The messengers were hospitably entertained by Harry's people. They had a few presents from me; and away they went to prepare for the grand encounter, which was to take place in a fortnight's time on a clear space of ground some few miles from where we were. The result of this encounter I will presently state.

Meanwhile the affair caused an immense commotion among our friendly blacks. They can never do any thing important without great preparation; and now the furbishing up of the helmet or shield, the gathering together of waddies, boomerangs, and spears; the painting themselves over in the most hideous forms; and the grand coorobboree, that must always take place on such occasions, kept the neighborhood in one din of confusion during the whole time. Friends and connections were apparently called in from wherever they might be, for numerous strange faces daily presented themselves before me—some of them far from being so mild and peaceable to us as those we had longest known. Indeed one man, who seemed to have authority among the new-comers, was so ferocious and evil-disposed that the C—s and myself had to be carefully on our guard. Once he wanted to enter my tent with some of his roughest looking followers, and would have done so had I not very quickly intimated what I would do if he persisted, by igniting a train of powder quickly laid, and blowing up an empty cask within the inclosure, at the same time firing my revolver once or twice, and showing there was more powder within the tent. Yet I did not feel we were quite safe at that time, nor did the C—s. An incident that occurred then will show it.

One night, after I had been in bed an hour or two, I was awoken by a fearful noise. Taking up my fire-arms and rushing to the outside of our tent, I heard the most unearthly yells that could ever be uttered by mortal beings. For a moment I was all but paralyzed—for the night being dark, and the gloom of the forest making it still more sombre, I could not directly get to see what might be the danger. I had nothing but my shirt and trowsers on, and thus barefooted, with rifle in hand and revolvers stuck in the waist, I watched, for the moment, positively alarmed. Nothing, however, could I see to indicate where danger was. All around me was as black as Erebus, and thus while I stood I had that strange feeling of horror come upon me which will occasionally attack a man no matter how nerved he may generally be. This was, for a second or two, increased by suddenly hearing a stealthy footstep near me. I turned to the spot whence the sound came, and pointing the rifle, put my finger on the trigger ready to fire. One second more and I believe that I should have done so, but a voice in English came upon my ear as a figure approached.

"Hush! 'Tis I! William C—. My brother and his wife, with the mate and steward, are at my cottage. I have come to call you there. The blacks have a coorobboree to-night. There are about three hundred of them; for many strangers came here last evening, and some of them are fierce. Be on your guard." And while thus speaking he came to my side. "This is foolish of you," he continued, as I lowered my gun. "What a good mark for a spear you are in a white shirt. You should be more cautious at such times as these. Somehow or other they are not all friendly disposed. It may end in a fight among themselves, and then we shall stand poor chance. Latterly the blacks have been grieved about some of their number being taken to Sydney and imprisoned for offenses against one or two settlers farther up the river, and these strangers may break loose among us."

"What is best to be done, then?" said I. "Our wives! where shall we place them for safety?"

"I know not," he replied. "All the years I have been here nothing like this before has occurred. That fellow who tried to get in your tent is at the head of any mischief occurring. He had a brother hung at Maitland for murder, and he does not forget it. Another one called 'Sydney Bill,' a fine handsome chap, was sent, I believe unjustly, to prison for a year, and every settler within forty or fifty miles of this is aware that he means revenge. But the blacks also know that the authorities are awake, and that a body of native police are on the look-out. Therefore I think it will be all right yet for us. Only we must be on our guard, while showing no distrust, or seeming to know what they are about."

We went inside the tent. My wife was dressed, and, having been through not a few wild scenes before with me, was cool and collected. She had armed herself, and now calmly gave me such portion of my apparel as I had not put on. Ascertaining what was the matter, she showed no timidity, but readily accompanied us to the cottage. All this time the yells, the shrieks, the unearthly noises increased. They came from a clump of trees encircling a slightly cleared eminence at the right of us, about a quarter of a mile off. Presently, and directly after we had arrived, a sight met our view as we gazed from the window that was truly startling. Over a hundred of the natives, more resembling spectres than human forms, owing to their naked bodies being streaked in a peculiar way with white ochre, were seen in the dark night emerging from the wood toward the open space around the cottage. I held my breath. I looked around me. I saw the features of my companions pale with natural dread. I beheld my wife still calm but likewise colorless; and I could perceive the other two women absolutely overcome. Perhaps never before had I felt so strangely as I did then. We had been saved from the gaping ocean: we were now apparently doomed to be the victims of these ferocious cannibals. One mode of escape alone presented itself. "The boat! The boat!" I exclaimed. "Let us all to the river, and take that chance, if it is really going to be an attack upon us! But even as I spoke we could see the band of natives suddenly halt not above a stone's-throw off. A more hideous and uncouth lot of beings it was perhaps impossible to behold. There were now, at least, three hundred of them; and by the glare of a fire which had been lit we perceived they were engaged in fierce and angry altercation. Presently the sound of contention ceased. A low humdrum sort of noise then followed. A large portion of the number sat down; others, evidently females, took another position, and in a moment more we heard the singularly low and plaintive notes of their wild songs as they kept time to a sort of drum, which I was informed was made from an opossum rug.

We breathed again! We now felt safe from instant death and destruction such as we had feared might come upon us, and this was more confirmed when a soft tapping at the door was heard, and, on guardedly opening it, Kitty with two other females and a man whom we used to call Charley made their appearance. A few words from these faithful creatures convinced us of our safety. Our friendly blacks, though less in number than the strangers, were true, and, as far as we could understand, had influenced the rest not to molest us, even if such, as was probable, had been their intention. Whether so or not, I am unable to say. They were a wild looking lot; and events transpired, after I had left that part of the world, which showed them, and indeed many of our own blacks, to be bad in the extreme when once yielding to their evil passions. For ourselves on this occasion, it is enough to say that the night passed on without more fear of danger, and the morning saw the whole neighborhood free of the natives, who had all gone to Harry's fight, as I shall call it, except a portion of the women, the children, with the aged and sick.

Unfortunately I was not able to witness this particular fight for a dusky bride. So much on deck during our three weeks at sea had made me unfit to be long away from the medicine chest. My hands and legs were covered with sores, and though I could walk a few miles, yet I was not sufficiently recovered to be absent for days. The best medicine, however, was that obtained from the vegetable productions around us. The marshmallow proved very effective; and about a week after this time I was quite healed.

Meanwhile the battle took place. It was described to me afterward by one who had witnessed it. The contending parties were arranged in long lines facing each other. The girl, Kitty, was placed between them. The fight commenced. Spears, boomerangs, and nulla-nullas, were thrown backward and forward, more in wild confusion than with any regular system of warfare. Now Harry's tribe would gain the advantage, and then Kitty would be seized by them as their prize; presently her family's tribe had success, and again took her away; and thus, between the one side and the other, she was so roughly handled that it was almost death to her. Eventually, after an hour's fighting, the day went against the two lovers. Harry's party was defeated, and his new bride was seized and taken back to the family miams (dwelling-places). The result of this battle was known to us by several of our old friends coming back severely, and two of them mortally, wounded. One poor fellow, Charley, was fearfully cut by a boomerang. The leaders of his leg were severed under the bend of the knee, and a more wretched looking object, in his deplorable state, I had scarcely ever beheld.

The natives of Australia do not like white men doctors. They prefer their own simple cures, generally applying warm, soft black earth to their wounds. One man who had received a spear in his chest, left the shelter and food given him by a settler up the river rather than submit to medical treatment, and when I again saw him he presented such a sickly sight, with the still imperfectly healed place upon his body, that I was fain to turn away. He had applied the native remedy and was well in health, but, though the wound was closed, it was of a gangrenous appearance, and seemed to bode mortification.

In the case of Charley other causes combined to bring him near death's door. He had long been in a state of consumption—a complaint very common among the Australians, as also some other diseases said to be brought solely by white men—and now this wound so prostrated him that he could not move. We placed him within the inclosure; made him as comfortable as possible; and gave him such nutritious food as I thought would be of service. His wife was evidently much attached to the poor fellow, and prevailed upon him to allow poultices to be applied. This was done and other attention given by my wife, and never shall I forget the homage and devotion shown then, and, indeed, at all times by every one of those wild savages, toward her, and I may add to myself for the few kindly acts we ever tried to render. I think of it even now with something of a wish that once more we could see and hear the unmistakable tokens of affection and gratitude every one of those Clarence River natives evinced toward us. The numerous specimens we collected, birds, choice dainties (as they deemed them) of food in the shape of grubs (large maggots), snakes, sea-worms, roots of trees, wild figs, and cherries, oysters of the most luscious kind, etc., were brought to us by men, women, and children, without stint, and at our slightest wish. As for the children, hardly a step we took but a troop of them would follow, with pleased look and playful gambols, to see if they could do aught for us, and many a time have I had two or three in my lap swinging in a rope I rigged for the purpose. Thus our attentions to poor Charley and some other wounded ones, met a far greater return than the common humanity of the act sought for. If before then we had doubted our safety among the blacks, after that time it was evident all fear might be removed.

THE FIGHT FOR THE BRIDE.

THE WOMEN'S CAUCUS.

Even my wife could go alone any where she pleased and have no dread. The men were deferential to her; and the women would attend upon and gladly obeyed her slightest sign. Truly I can not forget that time, nor the dark-featured, grateful, and affectionate creatures, savages though they were, among whom we lived for weeks.

After the return of our defeated friends, I supposed that there was an end of poor Kitty's affair; but not so. One morning to my surprise I found her again located at Mrs. C——'s, having, with a love like that which often burns in our own fair ones' breasts at home, made her escape and traveled on foot several miles to reunite herself to Harry. Poor thing! she had been obliged to hide for the first day, and actually went without food rather than abandon the determination of rejoining her husband. Unfortunately he was away on some hunting or fishing expedition when she arrived, and the matrons of his tribe still refused to acknowledge her. It therefore devolved upon the white women to do what they could for her protection.

The return of Kitty again caused a fierce commotion, this time solely among the females of the tribe. I had now got my vessel repaired and every thing stowed on board again, when, one evening as I leaned over the bulwarks meditating how I should get to sea without a crew, my attention was attracted to where the natives surrounded a large fire on shore in a hollow between two hillocks near the forest at the back. The noise made there seeming more than usual

I landed to examine. The scene I beheld was indeed strange. There, closely seated round the fire, were about a score of women talking and wrangling loudly; behind them were the men lounging about in various attitudes and seemingly indifferent to the quarrel of their wives. Presently the women on a sudden rose, and, with flashing eyes, disheveled hair, and long arms, attacked each other like demons. Some of them, as I found afterward, were for Kitty remaining; others were against it; and the contention at last became so great that a perfect fight between them speedily ensued. It was absolutely terrific. There were those women, without a rag of covering, standing over and about the fire, with the glare of fiends in their eyes, struggling with and tearing each other's hair out by handfuls, while the men all the time calmly looked on. Talk of the passion and anger of men, why it would be as nothing compared to the diabolical fury that seemed to animate these women.

I determined to try and end it, as a thought struck me of the way perhaps to do so. I knew the Australians were very superstitious, and much frightened at any thing that had an appearance of the supernatural. I therefore returned to the vessel, got out two sky-rockets, and a blue-light, fixing the latter on a stick suited to the purpose. Then re-approaching the party of mad women, I secretly got behind them, and standing upon the nearest mound, suddenly dipped the blue-light in their fire, and immediately waved it over their heads. The effect was almost electrical! In the dark night, and coming thus unperceived, the ghastly glare that was thrown around by the blue-light so startled them as to cause an immediate cessation of their fight. In an instant they were silent, and looking with awe upon what was to them a strange phenomenon. Their wonder and fear was still more increased when I quickly sent up one rocket after the other; and, though they all recognized me, men and women alike recoiled backward and gazed with astonishment and alarm on their countenance. I then went up to them, and, in the best way I could, reconciled the parties by intimating that such conduct among themselves was bad. The result may be told in a few words. Peace was established: and I presume it was then decided what should be done with Kitty; for in a day or two afterward the poor damsel was taken away by the black women most in her favor, and located with another friendly tribe until Harry's return, which, however, did not occur till after my departure. Thus ended this little episode of Australian married life.

A day or two previous to my sailing, and in the middle of the night, I was aroused from my bed by the smell of something burning, and a great outcry on shore. Proceeding on deck I beheld one of those magnificent sights often witnessed in Australia. The forest was on fire. And there, before me, gigantic flames were encircling every tree and bush in the vicinity. Fortunately the wind was blowing inland, and away from the cottages, else both the buildings and the schooner would have been consumed. How the fire originated I never learned; but to see it, as I then did from the deck, was something worth beholding. It was awfully grand. And the whole picture was almost indescribable except by the pencil of an artist. But it did not last long. Before it had obtained much hold a heavy rain aided to extinguish it, and the next day charred remains alone marked the spot where it had been.

Soon afterward I bade adieu to our sable friends and the family of the C——s. I had arranged with the mate and steward for us to try and get back to Sydney, as no more men could be procured. Accordingly we went down the river, again piloted by Billy, and, after waiting in the bay for a favorable opportunity, passed the bar with no small difficulty and stood out to sea.

How we managed to sail that little vessel, with only Mate Richardson and myself capable of working and steering her, seems now almost beyond calculation. But it was done. We took alternate watch on deck, both of us, aided by the steward always coming up when necessity required. When the weather permitted my wife would take the helm and steer for a short time to relieve either of us, the steward being utterly ignorant how to do so. When, as was once the case, a gale came on, we have the vessel to and made all snug. Thus, after eight days anxiety and fatigue, we safely arrived at Sydney, and so ended my Australian trip for that occasion.

Some months afterward, when in another part of the world, I met the captain of a ship who had visited the Clarence River after my departure, and from him I learned the melancholy fate of William C——.

It appeared that when the schooner was completed C—— went in her to Sydney for the purpose of receiving payment. Unfortunately he persuaded one of the native blacks, a fine young man we had called Michaelow, to accompany him. They arrived in safety at Sydney, and were coming back in the same vessel, with her new captain and crew, when she was lost sight of by another ship in company during a gale of wind, and was never again heard of. It was supposed that she had capsized, and all hands perished; thus making it so that C—— had literally built his own coffin.

Time passed on, and the natives about the cottages began to make troublesome inquiries as to what had become of Michaelow. Mrs. C—— herself was alarmed, and soon displayed her grief; nor could the brother and his wife hide their feelings. Consequently the blacks speedily came to a conclusion that something was wrong, and again and again demanded their missing comrade. Of course no satisfactory reply could be given, and the result was matters became so serious and threatening that the C——s had to hastily vacate their residence, and seek safety at the settlement of Grafton. The blacks became enraged, and, as I was informed, determined, according to their custom, to avenge the death of their companion by the murder of some white man. What followed I know not; but the lesson taught by this brief history is not without a useful warning to all who would take the wild natives of any land from their own home. Fortunately for me I had always adopted a different policy, and thus the various adventures I have met with in strange parts of the world have never resulted in loss of life, or even of harm to myself and those with me.

“HIGH PRIVATE.”

CAN I be stem, and another be wheat?
Can I be shell, and another be meat?
Another be head, while I am the feet?
If God will—God wot.

Dross may be up, and gold may be down;
The hero may prosper, or, haply, the clown:
The wise forge ahead, or the dunce take the town
There's no telling what.

One man will rise, while many must fall;
One speeds the birth, while ten bear the pall:
Fame speaks for one, but death takes them all;
The worm careth not.

Let me be stem, then—another be ear;
Another tend birth, while I bear the bier,
Or do the more work, and get the less gear;
I'll stand to my lot.

THE GHOST OF THE "RESCUE."

AT HOME WITH THE ESQUIMAUX.

IN this Magazine for May was given a general resumé of the remarkable expedition to the Arctic regions accomplished by Mr. C. F. Hall. We recur to the subject again mainly for the purpose of presenting some pictures, with pen and pencil, of Life among the Esquimaux, which no previous traveler has described so closely, and with as many facilities for observation. It will be borne in mind that Mr. Hall, while in his Western home, became convinced that there was reason to hope that some members of Sir John Franklin's expedition might be still living; or that, at all events, authentic information as to their fate could be gathered among the natives of the region where they disappeared from all human eyes except those of the Esquimaux. Although the expedition was fruitless as far as the main object was concerned, it has produced rich results in other respects. Foremost among these is the absolute proof which it furnishes that white men can live year after year in the Arctic regions. Mr. Hall passed two successive winters there, and instead of returning, as did the lamented Kane, only to die, he brought back with him the same robust frame with which he set out. This exemption from the fearful agonies endured by Kane and his party was owing to the fact, that, instead of attempting to carry the habits of the temperate zone into Arctic latitudes, he had the good sense to conform to the modes of life adopted by the natives. Still there is enough of peril and privation recorded in his narrative to give it a place among the most interesting books of our day, so rich in records of adventure. Much of the peril, and almost all of the privation, might have been avoided had he gone out with any thing like an adequate outfit. As we write these pages Mr. Hall has set out upon a second expedition, more amply provided, and with undiminished faith in the convictions which first led him from the banks of the Ohio to the shores of Frobisher's Bay. By the time these pages meet the reader's eye, we trust that he will have reached the region which he proposes to explore. We know that the God-speeds of thousands will go with him.

It will be borne in mind that Mr. Hall in his former expedition sailed from New London, Connecticut, on the 29th of May, 1860, on board the whaling bark George Henry; that the bark was accompanied, as tender, by a schooner now called the Amaret, but which had once borne the name of the Rescue. She had been of the "United States Grinnell Expedition," in search of Franklin. Returning from that voyage she had been employed as a whaler, and made seven perilous voyages, this being her last, for she was driven ashore, a total wreck, in a fearful storm, on the 27th of September, 1860. Her carcass lay on the rocks for almost a year; at last it was swept off from its rocky bed, and for days after was seen drifting ghost-like among the ice-floes, borne hither and thither by the changing tides and currents. The sailors on the George Henry had a superstitious dread of her; they fancied that she brought bad luck to every body who had any thing to do with her. The last ever seen of her by mortal eyes was when Mr.

THE "GEORGE HENRY" IN WINTER-QUARTERS.

Hall found her fast aground, with a part of her bows above water. By dint of much labor he succeeded in fishing up from her hold a couple of baskets of coal, which proved a valuable acquisition.

Mr. Hall sailed from New London on the 29th of May, 1860. He returned to the same port on the 13th of September, 1862; this expedition thus occupied in all nearly two and a half years, of which fully two years were spent in the Arctic regions. The crews of the two vessels numbered, officers and men, twenty-nine souls. The exploring expedition, at starting, consisted of Mr. Hall and an Esquimaux, named Kudlago, who had come to the United States on board a whaler, and was now about to return. Mr. Hall hoped to find him of service as an interpreter; but the poor fellow died on the voyage, without coming in sight of his native ice. Thus this Arctic Exploring Expedition consisted only of Mr. Hall himself.

The outfit was hardly on a more imposing scale than the personale. Here is the list: A boat 28 feet long, 7 feet beam, 29½ inches deep, and drawing 8 inches when loaded with a crew of six persons and their stores; 1 sledge; ½ ton of pemmican; 200 pounds Borden's meat biscuit; 20 pounds "Cincinnati cracklings"—pork scraps; 1 pound preserved quince; 1 pound preserved peaches; 250 pounds of powder; a quantity of ball, shot, and percussion caps; 1 rifle; 6 double-barreled guns, covers, and extra fittings; one Colt's revolver complete; glass beads, a quantity of needles, etc., for presents to the natives; 2 dozen pocket knives and choppers; some tin-ware, 1 axe, 2 picks, files, etc.; a good supply of tobacco and pipes; wearing apparel for self, and red shirts for presents; a supply of stationery and journal books, etc.; 1 common watch; 1 opera-glass; 1 spy-glass; 1 common sextant and 1 pocket sextant; 1 artificial horizon, with extra glass and mercury; 1 azimuth compass; 1 common compass; 2 pocket compasses; 3 ordinary thermometers and 2 self-registering ones. Some navigation books and several Arctic works, with a Bible and a few other volumes, formed the library.

The boat was destroyed in the storm which wrecked the Rescue, and for his explorations by water, which embraced a thousand miles of coast line, Mr. Hall had to depend wholly upon a rickety whale-boat, the only one which could be spared to him by his good friend, Captain Budington of the George Henry. Overland excursions were performed by the aid of sledges drawn by dogs.

In due time, toward the end of November, the whaler was fairly "beset" in the ice, and was shortly after laid up in winter-quarters, and Mr. Hall had abundant leisure to cultivate the friendly acquaintance, which had been before commenced, with his Esquimaux neighbors. His visits to them were paid when the thermometer indicated a temperature of which we can hardly conceive. "The month of December," he writes, "came in with a great calm of four days, and though the ice was then very much broken up, making a transit to the shore difficult, I continued to frequently land for exercise and to see more of Innuït life. On the 8th, at noon, the thermometer was at zero, and on the 9th at 15° below zero, 47° below the freezing-point. Yet strangely to me, the cold was not felt so much as I should have supposed. Visits from the Esquimaux were made daily, and often we had several sleeping on the cabin floor and on the sea-chests in impromptu beds made of sails, thick wearing apparel, etc.; and a curious picture it was thus to see them. Frequently, accompanied by some of these visitors, I went to their village, and to the islands around us, always being received by the natives in the most friendly manner."

The acquaintance thus auspiciously begun ripened in more than one case into cordial friendship. For two years Mr. Hall lived more like the Esquimaux than a native of a warmer climate; and during a considerable part of each winter he adopted their habits almost entirely. This came rather hard at first; but in due time he reached the conclusion that in all essential points their mode of life is the true, and in fact the only one, for their climate. In minor details we can teach them something; but the man who expects to live through three Arctic winters must in all essential respects live as the natives do. Whoever does so may fairly hope for as long a life within the polar circle as in a temperate zone.

The Esquimaux—or, as we shall hereafter call them, the Innuits, using the only term by which they designate themselves, equivalent to “Our Folks”—are among the most interesting of the uncivilized races of the globe. It is indeed hardly proper to class them among the uncivilized races. They show such a wonderful power of adapting themselves to the exigencies of their lot; procure so much substantial comfort from what appear to be the scantiest materials; seize so eagerly and apply so dextrously every means of amelioration which fortune throws in their way; and, above all, develop so many of the higher moral traits of humanity, that we may fairly hesitate to rank them with the uncivilized races. But as high authority has affirmed that the civilization of any people is to be measured by the quantity of soap which they consume, and as the Innuits scarcely know the use of this lavatory compound, we are forced, under protest, to class them among the uncivilized races.

"As a general thing," writes Mr. Hall, "the Innuits are strictly honest among themselves; and also, with some modifications, with strangers. No people can excel them in kindness of heart.

TOOKOOLITO, CHARLES F. HALL, AND EBIERING.

Take, for instance, times of great scarcity of food. If one family happens to have any provisions on hand these are shared with all their neighbors. If one man captures a seal, though his family may need it all to save them from the pangs of hunger, yet the whole of the people about, including the poor, the widow, and the fatherless, are invited to a seal-feast. On the whole, their word is entitled to great credit. They despise any one who will shay-la-voo—tell a lie.—In a word, they are, according to Mr. Hall, kind, honest, and truthful.

The two model Innuits, Ebierbing and his wife Tookoolito, will appear to most readers like pure inventions—Arctic “Uncle Toms.” Quite undesignedly, however, Mr. Hall brought with him means of verifying his pictures; he brought the originals. Thousands of Americans have within the last two years seen "Joe" and "Hannah." They have accompanied Mr. Hall on his visits to various parts of the country, and sat at good men's tables. Few who have met them even casually can have failed to observe the quiet self-respecting aspect of the man, and the modest ways, pleasant smile, and marvelously sweet voice of the woman. "Joe" is Ebierbing, and "Hannah" is Tookoolito. They were true friends to Mr. Hall during the two years which he spent with their people; they came with him on his return, remained with him while he has been preparing his narrative; and have now gone back with him to their northern home, and are to accompany him during his proposed three years' explorations. This visit to the United States was not their first experience of civilized life. They had been taken to England seven years before, where they remained two years, were presented to the Queen, and met with great favor in English society. Ebierbing is an excellent pilot, a noted seal-hunter; and a remarkably ingenious mechanic. With no other implements than his sharply-pointed seal-spear and his long snow-knife he will mend a broken sledge or put up a snow hut in half the time that a European would require for considering how it should be done.

He is a sturdy, square built man of some five feet two; his wife is quite as tall and much stouter. To see her in her neatly fitting calico dress, smooth hair as black as coal, one would suppose that she was a German "Bauerin"—a class which for the want of a better we designate as "peasants," but which corresponds in effect to our farmers.

Poor Tookoolito has sad cause to remember her visit to America. A few months after her arrival her child, Tukeliketa, "Butterfly," aged a year and a half, died. "I never saw," says Mr. Hall, "a more animated, sweet-tempered, bright-looking child." For days the mother was unconscious or delirious. Then she longed to die, so that she might be with her lost "Butterfly." The corpse of the little Inuit was placed in the beautiful burial-ground at Groton, Connecticut. Upon the grave were laid, according to the custom of his people, all his childish playthings. They were sacred to the dead. The mother went to the spot a while after, and found that one article—a gayly-painted tin pail—had been taken away. She was almost inconsolable at the discovery. How poor little "Butterfly" would miss his beautiful pail! The love of parents for their children is a notable trait in Inuit character. If we may judge from casual notices scattered through Mr. Hall's narrative, no more tender mothers or loving fathers are to be found in the world than among the Innuits.

Mr. Hall's first interviews with Tookoolito form a pleasant episode, which shall be related in his own words, with slight abridgments:

"November 2, 1860.—While intently occupied in my cabin writing, I heard a soft sweet voice say, 'Good-morning, Sir.' The tone in which it was spoken—musical, lively, and varied—instantly told me that a lady of refinement was there, greeting me. I was astonished. Could I be dreaming? No, I was wide awake, and writing. But had a thunder-clap sounded in my ear, though it was snowing, I could not have been more surprised than I was at the sound of that voice. I raised my head. A lady was indeed before me, extending an ungloved hand. The doorway in which she stood led from the cabin into my private room. Directly over this entrance was the sky-light, admitting a flood of light, and revealing to me crinoline, heavy flounces, an attenuated toga, and an immensely expanded 'kiss-me-quick' bonnet; but the features I could not at first make out. On turning my face, who should it be but a lady Esquimaux! Whence, thought I, came this civilization and refinement? In a moment I was made acquainted with my visitor. She was the Tookoolito I had so much desired to see. She spoke my own language fluently, and I had a long and interesting conversation with her. Ebierbing, her husband, was also introduced to me, and though not speaking English so well as his wife, yet I could talk with him tolerably well. I gleaned many interesting particulars of their visit to England, and learned that they had dined with Prince Albert, who had treated them with much consideration. Ebierbing thought the Queen was 'very pretty,' and that Prince Albert was 'a very kind, good man.' Tookoolito, speaking of the Queen, said: 'I visited her, and liked the appearance of her Majesty and every thing about the palace. Fine place, I assure you, Sir.' As Tookoolito spoke I could not help admiring the exceeding gracefulness and modesty of her demeanor. Simple and gentle in her way, there was a degree of calm intellectual power about her that more and more astonished me. I felt delighted beyond measure because of the opportunity for becoming better acquainted with these people through her means, and I hoped to improve it toward the furtherance of the great object I had in view."

When paying this visit Tookoolito had got herself up in a very tolerable imitation of "civilized" costume. She wore a dress—of what material Mr. Hall omits to tell us—"with heavy flounces; an elegant toga made of young reindeer fur, deeply fringed, and a bonnet of the style invented on the principle of 'cover the head by a rosette on the back.'" Not long after Mr. Hall returned the call. He found the lady at home in her tent, dressed in native costume, which her visitor thought more becoming than the one in which she had called upon him. She was engaged in the domestic occupation of knitting socks for her husband—a most un-Esquimaux accomplishment which she had acquired in England. It may be added, by way of parenthesis, that she has a remarkable facility in mastering the details of feminine domestic occupations. While in America ladies often showed her intricate specimens of the arts of crocheting and netting. She seemed to catch, as if by instinct, the marvelous mystery of the "stitch."

"Before I was aware of it," continues Mr. Hall, "Tookoolito had the tea-kettle over the friendly fire-lamp, and the water boiling. She asked me if I drank tea. Imagine my surprise at this question, coming from an Esquimaux, in an Esquimaux hut. I replied, 'I do; but you have not tea here, have you?' Drawing her hand from a little tin box, she displayed it full of fine-flavored black tea, saying, 'Do you like your tea strong?' Thinking to spare her the use of much of this precious article away up here, far from the land of civilization, I replied, 'I'll take it weak, if you please.' A cup of capital tea was soon before me—capital tea, and capitally made. Taking from my pocket a sea-biscuit which I had brought from the vessel for my dinner, I shared it with my hostess. Seeing she had but one cup, I induced her to share with me its contents. Tookoolito says she and her husband drink tea nearly every night and morning. They acquired a taste for it in England, and have since obtained their annual supply from English and American whalers visiting Northumberland Inlet."

We must not suppose, however, that this is a specimen of Innuït life. The food, clothing, and dwellings of the people are peculiar to themselves, and adapted to the necessities of their condition. Their food is almost entirely animal; the flesh, fat, blood, and viscera all coming into use. Contrary to the received opinion, there is no region which so abounds in animal life as the waters and shores of the Arctic zone. Ookgook, the big seal, and Nutchook, the common seal, are the Innuït staples. To them these are what corn and coal are to the European, or rice to the Asiatic. Ninoo, the bear, Tuktoo, the reindeer, the walrus, and the whale, are important auxiliaries in the way of supplying food and clothing. Kimmick, the dog, their only domesticated animal, is to them what the camel is to the Bedouin, and the horse and the ox to other peoples.

During a part of the year seals and other game are so plentiful that an abundant supply of food can be obtained almost without labor; but during another part of the year the animals are scarce and shy. If the Innuïts would only during their harvest season lay up stores for the winter, they would always be well supplied. Taking the whole year together, a family wastes and consumes twice the necessary amount of food. But they are improvident, rarely laying up supplies in advance; and the consequence is that they are often reduced to the sorest straits of hunger. By way of showing what may be accomplished in sustaining life in the Arctic regions at the proper season we give the results of a single hunting expedition. Mr. Hall started with two Innuits. By way of provision they took five pounds of bread and as many of salt junk. They had a rifle, a gun, a pound of powder, thirty balls, and two seal-spears. They were absent ten days, and killed one bear weighing 1000 pounds; a large seal, 1500 pounds; and nine small seals of 200 pounds each: in all, something more than two tons of fresh meat, besides skins for clothing, and oil for fuel and light. With the exercise of ordinary forethought, there can be no doubt that all the wants of life can be fully met in the Arctic regions.

Nutchook, the seal, and his big cousin, Ook-gook, are among the wariest and most cunning of animals. They may well be so; for they have to be on the constant watch against their great enemy Ninoo, the bear, who has a special weakness for seal-blubber. It is play to stalk a deer or track a chamois compared with catching a seal. Mr. Hall, who is no contemptible sportsman, acknowledges that he was never able to get within rifle-shot of a seal when basking on the ice. Yet the Innuits get within a spear's cast of him. They own that all which they know of seal-hunting has been taught them by the bear. The way Ninoo proceeds is this: he sees far off on the ice a black spot which he knows to be a seal, resting at the edge of his hole, taking a succession of "cat-naps" hardly ten seconds long, lifting up his head between times, and narrowly surveying the whole horizon. Ninoo flings himself on his side, and hitches along when the seal's head is down. The moment the head is raised the bear stops short, and commences "talking" to the seal. The sound which he utters is wholly distinct from his ordinary voice. The seal is charmed, suspects no harm, and down goes his head for another nap; forward hitches Ninoo; and so on for a long time until he gets within leaping distance; then one spring, and it is all over with Nutchook. The Innuits say that if they could only talk to Nutchook as cleverly as Ninoo does they would catch many more seals. Ninoo, it is said, sometimes catches a young seal at the mouth of the hole, and holding him by a flipper, lets him play around in the water, the dam comes up, and the bear slyly draws the young one toward him; the mother follows until she comes within reach of the bear's paw; he gives a grab, and secures a dainty meal. Mr. Hall also tells us that the bear sometimes discovers a walrus basking at the foot of a cliff, and flings down a big rock upon him with wonderful accuracy; then, if the walrus is only stunned, the bear rushes down, seizes the stone, and hammers away at the head of the walrus until the skull is crushed in. Then Ninoo has a feast of fat things; for unless he is very hungry he will touch only the blubber.

In the winter, when the seal lives under the ice, his capture requires great skill and patience. He has a breathing-hole through the ice, to which he must come at intervals for air. This will be hidden by a thick covering of snow. The Innuvit, aided by his seal-dog, discovers the place of this hole, pierces through the snow with his spear, and seats himself by the opening until he hears the animal puff; then darts his spear, and, if he has good luck, secures his prize, which means not merely food, but light and warmth in his lonely snow hut miles away. It is often weary waiting by a seal-hole. Thus Mr. Hall mentions almost incidentally that poor Kudlago contracted the disease of which he ultimately died by watching at a seal-hole continuously for two days and nights in the coldest weather. Again it is noted in his journal: "Ugarng has just returned from sealing, having been out two days and one night over a seal-hole. All the reward he had for his patient exertions was the seal coming up and giving a puff; then away it went. Ugarng bore his disappointment very philosophically. He merely said, 'Away I go to-morrow morning again.'" This expedition was likewise unsuccessful, and Mr. Hall going to his hut found the family without food or light. An infant was wailing with hunger: "Me got no milk," said the mother; "meat all gone—blubber too—nothing to eat—no more light—no heat—must wait till get seal."

Not long after Ebierbing, who had been sent to the ship for supplies, came back, bringing with him a seal. The manner of its capture is worth mention. In going to the ship his dog had scented a seal-hole covered by two feet of snow; he marked the spot by leaving upon it a mouthful of tobacco-juice and hurried on. Coming back he found his mark, and determined to try for the seal. Thrusting his spear through the snow, down to the hole in the ice, he wrapped himself up and took his station by its side. The night was dark; but there he waited patiently until early morning when the welcome puff of the seal was heard, and by one lucky thrust the prize was secured. His nose got touched by frost while watching, but a good smoke cured that; the seal was brought home in triumph. A seal-feast to the whole encampment followed. "I supped," says Mr. Hall, "on seal-soup, with about two yards of frozen seal's entrails (very good eating) as a finish to the affair."

A "seal-feast" is conducted thus, or at least this was the manner of this one: "The first thing done," writes Mr. Hall, "was to consecrate the seal, the ceremony being to sprinkle water over it, when the host and his assistant proceeded to separate the 'blanket' (that is, the blubber with skin) from the solid meat and skeleton of the seal. The body was then opened and the blood scooped out. This blood is considered very precious, and forms an important item of the food largely consumed by the Esquimaux. Next came the liver, which was cut into pieces and distributed all around, myself getting and eating a share. Of course it was eaten raw—for this was a raw-meat feast—its eating being accompanied by taking into the mouth a small portion of delicate white blubber which answered the same purpose as butter with bread. Then followed distributing the ribs of the seal for social picking. I joined in all this, doing as they did, and becoming quite an Innuite save in the quantity eaten. This I might challenge any white man to do. No human stomach but an Innuite's could possibly hold what I saw these men and women devour. Directly the feast was over the company dispersed. Tookoolito then sent round bountiful gifts of seal-blubber for fire-lamps, also some seal-meat and blood. This is the usual custom among the Innuits. They share each other's successes, and bear each other's wants. Generally if it is found that one is short of provisions it may be known that all are. When one has a supply all have. After the feast and the gifts were over we had leisure to attend to ourselves, and in what great good-humor we were soon to be found. Our lamps were all aglow, and our hunger sated."

As a pendant to this description of a seal-feast we give Mr. Hall's account of a reindeer feast. The date is December, the season of scarcity. Four months before Mr. Hall's journal is filled with notices of the abundance and fatness of the game around him. Deer especially were so abundant that they were killed only for the sake of the skins and tallow. The skins at this season are in the condition to be most useful for clothing and bedding. A reindeer skin seems to be the best non-conductor of heat known. The Innuits never use more than one for bedding in the coldest weather—thermometer 70 degrees or more below freezing-point. Mr. Hall says he has slept under a dozen of the best woolen blankets and been almost frozen, while a single reindeer skin kept him abundantly warm. Of the condition of the game this season let the following paragraph speak. The scene is at the head of Frobisher Bay:

"I never saw in the States, unless the exception be of the prairies of the West, more luxuriant grasses on uncultivated lands than are here around me. There is no mistake in this statement that pasture land here for stock can not be excelled, unless it be cultivated or found in the great West. The land animals here are fat—'as fat as butter.' The paunches of the reindeer are filled to the utmost capacity with grasses, mosses, and leaves of the various plants that abound here. The animal just killed was very fat, his rump lined with toodnoo (tallow), which goes much further with me than butter: superior it is, indeed, as sweet golden butter is to lard. The venison is very tender, almost falling to pieces as you attempt to lift a steak by its edge. So it is with all the reindeer that have as yet been killed here. Rabbits also are in fine condition. Not only are they so now, but they must be nearly in as good order here in the winter; for God has given them the means to make their way through the garb of white with which he clothes the earth here for their subsistence."

But in December hard times had come on. One day an Innuite came back to the snow village with a portion of the bodies of two deer frozen as hard as rocks. A general invitation to a tuktoo feast was given out. The guests, thirty in number—the whole population of the village—rushed in. The giver of the feast acted as master of ceremonies: "He first made the ladies on the bed give way so as to clear a space whereon he might do the carving; then he placed on this spot the table-cloth, a huge seal-skin, and upon that put the carcass of a large deer; he then took a boat hatchet and began to carve the deer. Slabs of its side were chopped and peeled off; chips of ice flew here and there into the very faces of the guests at each stroke of the axe. As fast as Sampson rolled off the venison other men took the pieces, and by means of a saw and seal-knives reduced them to a size adapted for handling; then Sampson distributed these bits, one to each, till every mill had grist to grind. Thus for half an hour Sampson carved; then his hatchet handle broke off close up to the head. Another axe was sent for, and meanwhile, with the half of a saw, the two saddles were divided into the proper number of pieces, ready for distribution; the carcass was then once more attacked, and the shell was broken, split, and sawed into pieces. In it was the 'kernel,' to which all looked with anxious eyes; this was at last divided into as many pieces as there were pieces of saddle, and then one of each was given to every guest. I received my share with gratitude, and with a piece in each hand began eating. I bit off a mouthful of the saddle-piece; it was good. I took a morsel of the other; it was delightful; its flavor was a kind of sorrel acid; it had an ambrosial taste! it fairly melted in my mouth! When nearly through, I had the curiosity to crowd my way to a light to see what this delicious frozen food was, for where I sat I was shaded by large forms between me and the fire-light. I looked at it, rolled it over, and looked again. Behold, it was the contents of a reindeer's paunch! On this discovery I stopped feasting for that night."

Had Mr. Hall been accustomed to the precious delicacy of woodcock's "trail" he might have been less squeamish in the matter of reindeer paunch glacée, au naturel. He did indeed get over many of his prejudices in the way of food. Seal's blood "smoking hot" he declares to be "excellent," although drank from a dish which went the round of the whole company, each one in succession taking a long "s-o-o-o-p" at it, and then passing it to the next. The skin of the whale "three-quarters of an inch thick, looking like India rubber, is in its raw state," he says, "good eating even for a white man, as I know from experience; but when boiled and soured in vinegar it is most excellent." The "gum" of the whale, that is the substance in which the so-called "whalebone" is set, is a special Innuït delicacy. It looks like coconut meat, and tastes like unripe chestnuts. Mr. Hall could not fully appreciate this; yet, he says, savingly, "If the struggle was for life, and its preservation depended upon the act, I would undoubtedly eat whale's gum until I got something better to my liking." Once a substance which looked like a choice bit from a turkey's breast was handed to him. He thought he had stumbled upon a delicacy. He vainly tried to masticate it, but after half an hour's vigorous chewing he found it more solid than when he began. The substance was the ligament lying between the vertebrae of the whale, and he had made a mistake in the way of disposing of it. The Innuït mode is to take a huge piece into the mouth, lubricate it thoroughly with the secretions of the salivary glands, and then swallow it whole, as a boa-constrictor swallows a deer. Again, Mr. Hall remarks, "My opinion is, that the Esquimaux practice of eating their food raw is a good one, at least for the better preservation of their health. To one educated as we whites are, their custom of feasting on uncooked meats is highly repulsive; but as the twig is bent the tree's inclined; and this is as applicable to food as to any thing else. When I saw the natives actually feasting on the raw flesh of the whale, I thought to myself, 'Why can not I do the same?' The answer was, 'Because of my education.'" To our apprehension the man who has "swallowed the camel" of raw oysters, need not "strain out the gnat" of an uncooked steak, whether beef, bear, whale, or seal. Mr. Hall, later in his Arctic experiences, speaks more favorably of raw meat; but we believe he never quite comes up to Mansfield Parkyns, of Abyssinian fame, who assures us that no one can have fathomed the gustatory possibilities of a beef-steak, until he has eaten one raw before it has had time to get cold.

So much for Innuit feasting. Of their times of fasting, when any thing that can by any possibility be edible, assumes the place of a delicacy, we have not space to speak. Mr. Hall, during his two Arctic winters, had occasion frequently to mention these hard times.

In the far north clothing and shelter are as indispensable to life as is food. The winter dress of the Innuits, commencing with the feet, is thus composed: Long stockings of reindeer-skin, with the hair next the person; socks of eider-duck skin, with feathers on both sides; socks of seal-skin, with the hair outside; boots, the legs of reindeer-skin, fur outside, the soles of seal-skin. The jacket is of reindeer-skin, fitting to the form, but not tightly; those of the women have long tails, reaching almost to the ground. The ornamentation of the female dress depends on the taste and means of the wearer. One "very pretty style," noted by Mr. Hall, had a fringe of colored beads across the neck; bowls of Britannia-metal tea-spoons down the front flap, and a double row of copper cents, surmounted by a bell from an old-fashioned clock, down the tail, which was bordered by a beading of elongated lead shot. This jacket has no opening before or behind, but is slipped on over the head. These women's jackets are provided with a hood, which serves a variety of purposes, especially that of carrying the children. The breeches reach below the knee, and are fastened by a string drawn tightly around the waist. Mittens are used; the females usually wearing but one, on the right hand, the left being drawn under the sleeve. "The costume of the females is completed," to borrow the phrases of our respected Fashion Editor, "by the addition of finger-rings and head-bands of polished brass." Among their "accomplishments" is playing upon the Keeloun, a kind of tambourine, made by stretching a thin deer skin or the skin of a whale's liver upon a hoop. This is held by a handle, and the player strikes not the skin, but the hoop; and generally accompanies the music by a rude dance.

The Innuits of the present day are a nomadic people. Their wanderings, however, appear to be confined to the region of the coast, never extending far into the interior. Their dwellings are, therefore, for mere temporary occupation. Indications, in the form of trenches and excavations, are not wanting to show that they formerly led a much more settled life. Ever since they have been brought into even casual contact with the whites, their numbers seem to have been gradually diminishing. How this has been brought about is at present a mystery. The Red Men of America have been destroyed by “fire-water” and the occupation of their hunting-grounds. The natives of the South Sea Islands have been eaten up by nameless diseases contracted from their licentious white visitors. We find scarcely a trace of either of these destroyers among the Innuits. Consumption appears to be the destroyer among them; but we can see no reason why this should be more prevalent now than it was generations ago. But be the explanation what it may, the fact is certain, that they are a race fast passing from the earth.

Their summer dwellings, or tupics, are tents covered with skins. Their winter dwellings are igloos or snow huts. These are admirably adapted to the requirements of their situation, and in the construction of these they show great dexterity. They are indeed vastly like the dwellings of the seal, which are called by the same name. It may almost be considered a moot question whether the Innuits taught the seals, or the seals the Innuits. About the middle of November, when the snow has become thick and compact, the Innuits begin the construction of their igloos. The manner in which this is done may be fairly shown by the following abridged description of the building of one by a small party in one of Mr. Hall's journeys:

Sharkey and Koojesse proceeded to build an igloo in the regular manner. They first sounded the snow with their seal spears, to find that which was suitable for the purpose. Then one commenced cutting out snow-blocks, using a hand-saw. When they are not provided with this implement their snow-knives of bone or iron answer the purpose. The blocks were about three feet long, eighteen inches broad, and six inches thick. They look very much like the blocks of white marble with which our New York houses are faced. In building, these blocks are set up edgewise, so that the walls of an igloo are six inches thick. In this case seventeen of these blocks, laid in a circular form, composed the foundation, making the diameter of the structure about seventeen feet. Upon these blocks others were placed, not in tiers, but laid spiraling, and also inclined toward the centre, where they almost met. The key-stone, or rather snow, was then dropped in, and there was a regular dome, about seven feet high at the apex. The two builders were on the inside, those without handing them the blocks. When the whole was done, they were completely walled in. A hole was then cut in the side, through which snow cut fine was passed in. This was built up into a bench or platform running clear around the interior. Over this bench, which answers the purpose of bed, chairs, and table, herbs were spread, and over them were laid the reindeer-skins. A covered passage three feet high and some yards long was then built leading from the door, and the igloo was complete. Three or four Innuits, working moderately, will build such a hut in two hours, or, if need be, will do it in half the time.

Dogs play a very important part in the economy of Inuit life. They not only draw the sledges, but aid their masters in hunting. Without them even the keen-sighted Innuits would find it impossible to discover a seal-hole beneath two feet of snow. A good seal-dog is an acquisition. When a puppy is found to possess more than usual intelligence and sharpness of scent, he is trained as sedulously as we train a likely colt for the race-course. The instinct of an Esquimaux dog for the seal is as keen as that of one of our terriers for a rat. When harnessed to a sledge, if they scent a seal there is no restraining or guiding them. The whole team dashes madly away regardless of ice-chasms or rifts. When the driver wishes to hurry them on he finds that the cry of Ookgook!—"Seal!" is more efficacious than his walrus-skin whip. A single dog will not unfrequently capture a seal of twice his weight. Two or three of them will assault a bear, and worry him into standing until their master comes up and settles the matter with his spear. Mr. Hall had a famous dog named Barbekark, of whose courage and cunning he tells many curious anecdotes. On one occasion he set out hunting on his own account, and actually succeeded in killing a large reindeer, biting his jugular through as cleanly as though it had been cut with a knife, and then guided his master to the spot where his victim lay. Barbekark, after passing two winters with his white master, accompanied him to the States.

A FIGHT FOR A MEAL.

Here he died, and his skin stuffed to the life, after standing for a while on guard by our editorial table, much to the alarm of nervous visitors, has now found a resting-place in the "Arctic Room" of Henry Grinnell, the fast friend and liberal supporter of Mr. Hall in his two expeditions.

A sledge-team of dogs numbers about twenty—and a most troublesome team it is to manage. According to Mr. Hall's observations the Innuits treat their dogs kindly—quite as well as we treat our horses. They have some peculiar notions about feeding them. They are thought to work better if not fed during a journey, even if it lasts several days. Their standing food consists of the tough India-rubber-like skin of the whale and walrus. This instead of being cut up into "chunks" is given them in strips a yard or two long. These are swallowed whole. The dog swallows his whale-skin much as a Neapolitan lazaroni does his long strings of maccaroni. The Innuits say that the food taken in this form "stays in until the goodness is all got out of it." Of course in times of scarcity the dogs suffer with their masters, and when a sledge-load of food comes in there is like to be a pitched battle between bipeds and quadrupeds—the latter, in spite of clubs and spears, generally managing to secure their share. It is a doubtful question whether an Inuit or his dog can, after a long fast, bolt a larger quantity of food in a given time. We think, however, that no biped could equal the following exploit in this way which we find noted in Mr. Hall's Journal: "The dogs are very hungry. Last night they ate up the whip lash, which was thirty feet long. I witnessed a sight some days since of a hungry dog swallowing down a piece of kow (walrus hide and blubber) one inch and a half square and six feet long in seven seconds. The act I timed by the chronometer."

The treatment of the sick and dying, as we have before said, forms a marked exception to the general kindness of the Innuits toward each other. In our previous article was related at some length the case of Nukertou, a woman who was left at the point of death in a solitary igloo. This was by no means a solitary case within Mr. Hall's own observation. One other, to which brief reference was there made, must here be told somewhat more in detail.

Mr. Hall learned that a company of Innuits had been driven by starvation to abandon their camping place, and had left a woman, the wife of one of them, behind in an igloo. She was sick, they said, and unable to help herself. Mr. Hall was at the time "at home" on board the George Henry. He proposed to raise a party at once to go to the rescue of the woman. The mate, Reuben Lamb, and four of the crew, volunteered for this work. They set off through the deep snow, walking in Indian file, each alternately breaking track for the others to follow. No one but Lamb and Hall could hold out for more than five minutes at a time in this fearful labor. One man after another gave up, and returned. Hall and Lamb determined to persevere till the last moment. But it was of no avail. The very dogs, of whom they had four—the noble Barbekark being one—at last could not get on; and, writes Mr. Hall, "I was reluctantly obliged to turn my face toward the ship, having decided that it was my duty to return to save the living rather than to strive to reach one who might be already dead. Never had I experienced harder work than in traveling back. The condition of Lamb was such that I feared for his life if we did not soon get on board. Every few steps the snow had to be broken down to make a passage. It was of God's mercy that I had strength enough to hold up, else both of us must have perished. Occasionally I threw myself down on the ice or snow thoroughly exhausted; then I would start up, arouse Lamb, who seemed to be verging toward that sleep which in cold regions becomes the sleep of death, and once more battle onward. During this hard passage back to the vessel my noble dog Barbekark, was like a cheering friend. As now and then I lay almost exhausted upon the snow for a moment's rest, he danced around me, kissing my face, placing himself by my side, where I could pillow my head upon his warm body. No one who knew his characteristics could fail to perceive that he realized the critical situation of Lamb and myself. He would bound toward me, raise himself on his hinder legs, place his paws upon my breast, and glance from me toward the vessel, from the vessel to Lamb, then leap away, leading the sledge-team on a distance ahead, there to wait till we again came near, the few dogs and the soft state of the snow preventing us from riding. I was indeed a happy man as I walked into the gangway of the George Henry, and learned that all my company were safely back to its shelter."

This attempt failed. Four days after it was renewed by Mr. Hall, accompanied only by Ebierbing and a dog team. The cold had meanwhile grown intense, and thus the traveling was improved. They worked desperately to keep their hands and feet from freezing. The wind was blowing a smart breeze directly ahead, the temperature being 62° below the freezing-point. In a calm air 100° below freezing-point would have been more endurable. At length they reached the site of the deserted village; but not a hut was to be seen. They were all covered by an expanse of smooth snow, without a visible mark. Ebierbing's practiced eye at length fixed upon a spot beneath which he was sure there was an igloo. But the Innuits have a superstitious dread of touching even a hut within which is a corpse. Hall, with his snow-knife, dug down through the snow and the roof, and found the igloo vacant. Another was discovered, opened in like manner, and found empty also. The village had consisted of three huts. One more was to be discovered and opened. There was nothing to show its place. The Innuited pierced through the snow with his spear time after time in vain. At last he struck a roof, and then withdrew to a distance, leaving the work of exploration to Hall. He dug down through the snow, and came to the roof. But the heat of the fire which had once burned within had partly melted the snow-blocks, and the cold had transformed them into masses of solid ice almost as hard as stone. In trying to cut through this the knife was broken. Hall took the spear, and at last succeeded in piercing the roof. He shouted through the opening; but there was no answer. The inmate might be either dead or sleeping. He descended, and found the woman lying on the snow bench. He placed his hand on her forehead. The icy walls of her tomb were not colder. She was dead. There were indications that she had lived for some time after she was abandoned. Reverently closing up the opening which he had made, Hall and his Innuited friend retraced their toilsome way to the ship.

Mr. Hall is confident that he discovered many actual relics of the expedition of Martin Frobisher made almost three centuries ago. We have not space to do more than indicate a few of the leading arguments which led him to this conclusion. He found a tradition current that many years ago white men had visited a place which still bore the name of Kodlunarn, or "White Man's" Island. He traced these traditions diligently, comparing and collating them. One of his principal sources was an old woman named Ookijoxo Ninoo, the grandmother of Ebierbing, noted as the oldest Innuited living. Mr. Hall believes her to be a hundred years old. She had heard the story told by her grandmother. Seated at the entrance of her tupic, Tookoolito acting as interpreter, he questioned and cross-questioned her. Her story was wonderfully like the printed accounts—three hundred years old—of Frobisher's expedition. It was confirmed by a score of others, all of whom professed to have heard it from their forefathers. Mr. Hall at length visited the spot which was designated as the place of the white men's encampment, and found many things which had evidently been left there by white men. Among other things was a heap of coal, amounting to several tons. Every thing was covered over with moss, which showed that they must have been there for ages. The relics are of little importance in themselves; and we believe that there is much question among Arctic authorities whether they belonged to Frobisher's expedition. We think the evidence, so far as it goes, is greatly in favor of Mr. Hall's hypothesis in respect to these relics.

Assuming that Mr. Hall is correct in referring these traditions to that expedition, the bearing upon researches into the fate of Sir John Franklin is evident and important. If the Innuits have preserved from generation to generation, for nearly three centuries, a tolerably accurate account of this expedition, it is almost certain that they have in their possession, and can be induced to communicate, the details of the fate of Franklin's expedition, which occurred within the present generation. If any of these men are still living there must be Innuits who know it, and can tell where they are to be found. If all have perished—since it is almost certain that they were not lost at sea, but met their doom on shore—there must be Innuits who can tell how and when they died. To solve these questions is one of the motives which have led Mr. Hall to undertake his second expedition to the Arctic regions.

TRAVELING IN THE SNOW.

MY LOST SISTER: A CONFES- SION.

MY father was what is called a small planter.

The idea generally prevails among Northern people that planter is a synonym for grandee and satrap; that there are but two classes of whites among the agriculturists of the South—the wealthy lordlings and the poor “white trash.” The fact is, there exists every grade of planter, from the owner of one slave to the master of thousands. The planters of the South present nothing like the equality in wealth and social influence that is to be found among Northern farmers.

My father was a poor planter, as I was made to feel one day at school, when a little girl, the daughter of a neighboring planter, put the question, so common among children at the South, “How many negroes has your father got, Poky?”—My name is Pocahontas.

“He’s got two men and a big boy, five women, and one little baby; that’s nine,” I said, counting them on my fingers.

“Only nine? Why, Poky, I’d be ‘shamed to tell it. Why, my father’s got, oh! so many—I can’t count them.”

I heard of those nine negroes many times after that to my shame and confusion: “Poky’s father hasn’t got but nine negroes.”—“We’ve more than that about the house.”—“Wonder who waits on them.”—“The white people have to work, I reckon.” Such were some of the comments which reached me.

I dreaded after that being questioned concerning the number of my father’s slaves; and when quizzed by those people, to be found every where, who take advantage of a child’s years to make all manner of impertinent inquiries concerning family matters, I was seriously tempted to exaggerate the number. Indeed I did once tell Mrs. Dr. Henling, in answer to her inquiries, that my father had sixteen working hands, but did not inform her that these hands were equally distributed among eight slaves. I was ashamed to have people see them in the field at work, they looked such a little handful, while some neighboring fields were black with the coveted animals. I used to feel my cheek tingle whenever a visitor rode up the lane; I knew he would notice the number of negro cabins—only three: he couldn’t very well help counting them. I importuned my father as often as I dared to move them to a grove back of the house, so that every body who came on the plantation needn’t know how few there were, and to allow each of the women a house to herself, so as to increase the number of cabins.

But though my father was among the least wealthy, there were no very large planters in the neighborhood. True, there was Mr. Lashure, recently from South Carolina, who had rented two farms of a half section each until he could have time for the selection of a plantation to his liking. He owned a fabulous number of slaves of unadulterated African descent—not a mulatto among them. He was master to over a hundred negroes; but then he was father to fourteen children—seven tall, brawny, black-eyed, Indian-haired maiden daughters, with one sallow little hunchback, and six sons, short, heavy, dark, who were so alike that I could never distinguish them. His slaves numbered over a hundred, as I have said; but when they should come to be distributed among the fourteen children, it would have to be by long division, my father used to say. So it was that though the Lashure ladies were the only people in the neighborhood who came to church in their carriage, with their ebony coachman perched on the high seat in front, and their ebony maid-servant seated behind, there were others among us anticipating larger legacies than could fall to them.

Though there were in our neighborhood—which was called Beechwood—no lands of more than average fertility; no commercial advantages; no fine building sites; no picturesqueness of scenery, the country being tame and monotonous; no superior water facilities; nothing to redeem it from the commonplace—yet locations there were much sought; the lands were valued at a higher figure than better soil ten miles removed; and I remember hearing that the Methodist circuit-rider—the only preacher we saw—had made the invidious remark that Beechwood was the Athens of his circuit. The explanation of the pre-eminence with which our community was honored was to be found in the existence of a Young Ladies’ Seminary, and, on the next hill, a white framed Methodist church.

That was an odd kind of a school on Beechwood Hill, whose like, I am sure, I shall never again see. A hewn-log building—a block-house, a Northerner would say—some eighteen feet square, constituted the school-room, while the boarding department was comprised in what was denominated a double log-house. This consisted of two square rooms with an open passage-way between. Above each of these apartments was a garret room, with naught overhead save the roof of rough oaken boards, which presented but a slight barrier to the almost tropical heat of the sun. Add to this house a single shed-room, and you have the entire building where, year after year, with the family of the school-teacher, Mr. Cunningham, were congregated a number of boarders, varying from ten to twenty-five, collected from the most wealthy and influential families for sixty miles around. These, with the daughters of the neighboring planters, constituted the school—that sun whose genial warmth and light permeated and invigorated the whole community. Think of that log-cabin Institution conferring honors, granting gold medals and diplomas, and every year sending forth its alumni! However, none need sneer at this: for though the course of study was not extensive, and the text-books were old-fashioned—Murray’s Grammar, Olney’s Geography, Pike’s Arithmetic, the English Reader, etc.—yet diplomas were never conferred unworthily. There was no shallowness or make-believe about the school, though there was much that was homely and severe.

To this school, two miles distant, for three and a half years I walked along a lonely road, which led through woods and skirted thickets of hazel, into which, during the nutting seasons, I was constantly tempted by the clustering nuts, and from which I was as constantly deterred by fear of runaway negroes.

At the end of that time a desolation came upon the neighborhood, occasioned by the closing of the famous school. The teacher turned his attention to agricultural pursuits, and in the course of time erected a two-story framed dwelling-house in a woodland adjoining his former residence. Then, with the old school buildings as a nucleus, those famous academic grounds were converted into a negro quarter, and those classic shades became peopled by the children of an illiterate race.

On the extinguishment of this literary sun the benighted people began to rub their eyes and to look around for a candle or rush-light, or something to take the place of the great luminary. All, by common consent, seemed to feel that their literary heavens could never again be illumined by such an orb of light and glory. "What shall we do for a school?" "Where shall we find a teacher?" were now the all-absorbing questions. Some public-spirited men, apprehensive with prophetic ken of the catastrophe which had now left us in darkness, had by subscription secured an amount sufficient for a school building, which was soon in process of erection. And then every man in the neighborhood seemed to consider himself a special committee for the procurement of a teacher. After much consultation and disputation—many suggestions, and a vast deal of advice—a teacher was engaged, a young man from the village. He refused to take the school until a given amount was guaranteed. Thus it came that my father was required to subscribe three pupils, though he had but two children—myself and a sister three years younger—who had hitherto been under my mother's tuition.

The teacher boarded with us, and on the evening preceding the opening of the school he and my father talked over the subject of Fanny's studying Latin.

"She has a head for it," said the teacher, running his fingers through her thin white hair, always brushed so carefully. "Are you any thing of a phrenologist, Sir?"

"No, I am not," answered my father, in a loud, emphatic tone. "I don't believe any man can tell what kind of a mind or disposition I've got by feeling of the bumps and knots on my head. No, Sir; I don't believe in bumpology!"

"Well, we won't discuss the matter, though there is no doubt in my mind that this little girl would learn languages with wonderful facility. She has language unusually large. This is indicated by a prominence of the eye and by a depression toward the lower part of the orbit, caused by a development of the cerebrum in the posterior upper part of the orbit of the eye. The possession of this faculty of language will enable the possessor to invent, learn, remember, and apply with facility the arbitrary signs that stand as the representatives of ideas. Suppose we test the theory. I say this little girl has language large. Allow her to study Latin, and let us see if she doesn't acquire it with unusual facility."

"Well, now, Sir, I don't propose to send my child to school, and pay out my money, and to have her waste her time studying some tomfoolery, for the sake of finding out whether some other tomfoolery is right or wrong. No, Sir, I'm not such an ignoramus as you take me for."

"But, Sir, you surely will not call the noble Latin tomfoolery."

"It would be tomfoolery for her. What use will it ever be to her? What good will it do her? It will do for male teachers and preachers to study Latin, but what good will it ever do that girl?"

"It will be of use to her," said my mother, decidedly. "It will give her a better position in society. Any thing is useful which will increase people's respect for you; and you know that the world thinks well of a good scholar. What made our neighborhood the finest in all this portion of the State? and what makes Mr. Cunningham so respected wherever he's known? You may scold as much as you please, but it won't alter the fact that education and learning increase people's respectability. Fanny can study Latin without any additional expense too. You've subscribed three scholars, and you've got to pay for them. Fanny might as well take Latin and save the money."

My father made some farther show of fight, as was his wont, but I knew it was a settled thing that Fanny was to study Latin, for my mother seldom failed to carry her point.

I had never before given a second thought to Fanny's talents or scholarship. She was so much younger, was such a wee thing, we had never been brought into competition. True, my mother had not unfrequently said to me that, considering our ages, she was the better scholar. But on such occasions I eased my heart by the mental reply, "Oh! that's because you're her teacher." Then, too, Fanny often spelled words, in her shy, modest way, on which I had failed; or she occasionally parsed some word which had puzzled me; but this momentary superiority had occasioned me but a momentary uneasiness. What did she know about geography, in which I was so perfectly at home? History—what did she know about that? and hadn't I been half through the "Child's First Book of History?" And wasn't my "ciphering" a profound mystery to her? I knew so much of which she was ignorant that I had never thought of her in the light of a rival. I had never cherished any feeling of envy toward the little thing. But from the time when the decision was made that she was to study Latin I became envious of my sister. That night I was awake a long time for a little girl. Fanny was about to enter a strange, mysterious land, which to me was blockaded. They were going to make a great scholar of my sister; they considered her more capable than I; they thought more of her; or why did they not put me to Latin?—I was the older.

The following morning, as I was turning the grindstone for my father as he held an axe pressed to the wet, revolving stone, I broached the subject prominent in my thoughts.

"Pa, is Fanny going to study Latin?"

"I suppose so," he replied, with a snarl. "Your mother will have it. It 'll be just so much time thrown away, I suppose; but I'll have to pay the money anyhow, and she might as well try and get some good of it."

"I wish I could study it."

"Why?" he asked, with peevish impatience. "What good would it do you if you knew all the Latin in the world?"

"It will do me as much good as it will Fanny, and I am older than her." (A three-years' attendance at Mr. Cunningham's famous school had not insured me against grammatical errors.) "May I study it, father?"

"No. I want you to hurry and get through your schooling. I can't be paying out money always for you. You must get through in two years at the farthest, and then you can teach school yourself, and Fanny can go to school to you, or you can marry a man with a long row of negro cabins."

The suggestion of being a school-teacher wore any thing but a pleasing aspect, for it was a familiar thing to witness among my school-mates the resentment occasioned by the slightest insinuation that they would ever engage in teaching. And "being educated for a teacher" was a stinging taunt, employed when deep mortification was intended.

As we walked to school that morning—my little sister and I—I watched her narrowly to ascertain whether she gave herself airs; but the little thing, in her green gingham sun-bonnet and blue-checked apron, high in the neck and long-sleeved, walked modestly and demurely by my side, turning in her toes—walking pigeon-toed I used to tell her—and now and then stumping them against some grub in the newly-cut road. On such occasions she would look up timidly and apologetically in my face, and then her eyes would seek the ground as though she meant to to look out for the grubs thereafter.

It was with considerable interest that I entered the new school-room. My life had been so narrow—I had never been five miles from my father's plantation—I had seen so little that trifles had their interest, and the commonplace its romance. The new white-framed school-house seemed palatial. It was an oblong building with a door on each side and a chimney at each end, though there was but one fire-place finished, rough planks being placed over the opening in the floor at the other end.

The classes were soon arranged, for the new teacher was a worker, and I was engaged on an example in "Tare and Tret," having for the time forgotten Fanny. But this obliviousness was not to endure. The class in Latin was called. I looked up, and, amidst a number of girls and boys twice her size, I saw my little sister with a timid, half-frightened manner moving to the recitation-bench.

When I think of that nervous, frightened child for the first time in a school-room, with her thin, white, baby-like hair parted and brushed so carefully, and with that pitifully timid look in her large, honest blue eyes, there surges through my heart such a wild regret, such a restless, impatient, unsubmissive grief—such remorse. Oh could I but relieve that period! How would I shelter and cherish and foster that little sensitive plant! It would be my happiness to lay the poor, timid child in my bosom, and soothe her as I would my own baby. But what a different heart I carried then! I was envious of my little sister. I cared nothing that others in the school studied Latin—the advancement, the superiority of no other pupil gave me any concern. My little sister, whose improvement should have been dear as my own, of her I was envious.

All my attention was directed toward that recitation-bench. There she sat, the pale, earnest child of nine years among those great boys and girls, looking straight at the teacher with her large, solemn blue eyes. She was the first called upon to recite. How cruel my envy made me! I more than half wished to have her fail. Every eye was turned upon her—the whole school was breathless, for Latin was a strange, mysterious something to those unscholarly children; it had never before been taught in the neighborhood. Soon her infantile voice, slightly tremulous, broke the silence: "Musa, musæ, musam," etc.

"Very well! very well!" cried the teacher, cordially. "Now decline litera backward, beginning at the ablative plural."

I expected her to fail on this requisition, as I knew she had been studying musa only, and I was not then aware that that word represented a class. To my surprise she went through with it without hesitating. Then the teacher cross-questioned her, passing from the singular to the plural number, skipping cases, back and forth, in quick succession. No balking, no hesitating; she had it all clear as light. Murmurs of admiration ran around the room. I alone was sullenly silent. All generously conceded her triumph except her own sister. Now I tell of her success with pride, I would publish it to the world; then I would have wiped it out forever.

When the recitation was ended she came to her seat beside me, and with a quiet happiness in her eyes said, as she looked up shyly into my face,

"We take the second declension next time, Poky."

"Stop calling me Poky," I cried, snapping out the words, and turning my back upon her.

Oh that I could again hear those words from that little child! What care I should take to assure her of my sympathy, my pleasure, my pride!

I do not know how she received those cruel words. I was ashamed to look in the child's earnest eyes.

About an hour later, with a wearied look in her pale face, my little sister brought her head close up to mine and whispered,

"Poky, I've learned my Latin lesson; will you please lend me your slate and pencil, and," she continued, brightening, "I'll draw your picture, and you shall be a lady with a long dress and a parasol. Will you, Poky?"

"No, I won't; my slate's got my sums on it."

"Is algebra nice, Poky?"

"Mind your business."

There was no relenting in my ill-humor during that morning. In vain the boys threw over their billets-doux in the shape of paper bullets; in vain the girls across the room spelled their fun on their fingers; in vain the teacher commended my aptness in mathematics. All availed me nothing so long as I saw Mordecai sitting in the king's gate.

At noon as Fanny and I was with the dinner-basket between us on the trunk of a fallen tree in the shade of an ancient oak, she, speaking with unusual animation, said,

"Poky, I wish you could study Latin; it's funny, and I like it." My impulse on hearing this speech was to take the little thing by the shoulder and shake her until she was dizzy. "But learning Latin makes any body hungry," she added, with a ludicrously devouring look at the dinner-basket which I was then uncovering.

This last remark was a suggestion. I'd make the little hungry, tired child wait while I took my dinner. I'd punish her for throwing her Latin in my face constantly.

"I am older than you," I said; "so you sit there and wait until I have eaten my dinner, then you can have yours."

Her great, solemn blue eyes grew larger as they were fastened on my face with a half-wondering, half-grieved expression. She had all her life been used to yielding her will to mine; so she uttered no remonstrance, but sat in silence, watching me as with the utmost deliberation I proceeded to take my dinner. I remember now just what was in the basket: two slices of boiled ham; four beaten biscuits baked brown and permeated with butter, to which they had been treated while smoking hot from the oven; two hard-boiled eggs, with a little paper of salt; a small vial of sugar-house molasses, and a bottle of rather blue milk. In making my dinner I chose the best of every thing—not that I was a selfish glutton, but that I meant to punish my sister for studying Latin. I knew, though I did not look at her while taking my dinner, that she kept her large eyes fastened on my face, and I wondered what she was thinking about, and what her thoughts of me were like. Having finished my dinner, I set the basket on the log, and ran off to play, regardless of the look of entreaty from the poor child who had never before been from her mother's side.

At the close of the school session we started on our walk of two miles home. The teacher, after inquiring if we knew the way, walked on and soon left us behind.

"There!" I cried in a harsh, upbraiding tone, when he was out of hearing, "if it wasn't for you I might go along with Mr. Woodbridge. I'm sure I'd rather talk with him than with such a simpleton as you. Do come along! What a great poky you are!"

"You're Poky," she replied, with a little laugh, in allusion to my name.

This clever rejoinder from the little thing I punished by angrily crying out, "None of your impertinence, or I'll go off and leave you!"

This threat silenced her at once, and occasioned her to send nervous, timid glances into the shadowy, darkening woods through which the new road wound, and which she believed to be haunted by fugitive slaves. Then I hurried on as rapidly as I could walk, forcing the child to a run. After a while I remarked the weary thump, thump of her little feet, and her quick, short breathing with, every now and then, a fall as her foot struck a grub or other impediment in the rough road: still there was no complaint, no remonstrance from the patient child.

"Why don't you come along?" I screamed every few minutes. "You needn't think to keep me traveling at this snail's pace much longer. 'It'll be dark before we get home. I don't mean to wait for you any longer,'" I said, at length, and started off at a brisk run.

"Oh, wait for me, Poky!" I heard my little sister cry out in pitiful accents; but my merciless feet only moved the swifter.

However, I dared not go home without her, so at a turn in the road I hid in a clump of undergrowth by the way. Ere long I caught the sound of her frightened sobbing, and soon she came in sight, running, but oh, so heavily, as though each step must be her last! My first thought was to spring from the thicket with some frightful noise, but I allowed her to pass. She kept on running as rapidly as her little tired limbs would permit, while I followed leisurely, enjoying her suffering.

A little child, frightened, foot-sore, and weary, alone on a lonely road with darkening woods around, and sobbing piteously, oh! there is terror and torture in that memory.

After a time, from sheer weariness, she ceased running; then I ran softly until within a few yards, when I uttered an unearthly noise. With a cry of terror she sank to the ground, but not until she had turned her head to ascertain the horror which was upon her. Seeing me, the poor little thing tried to smile. For the remainder of our walk I endeavored to banish unpleasant things from her mind, for I had become apprehensive that she might report my treatment. In such an event I knew that severe punishment awaited me, for my father was a hard man.

"Well, how do you like school, Fanny?" asked our mother, as the child came in her long night-dress to kiss her good-night.

"Some of it I like; I love to study Latin, and I love at noon to see the girls play, and I like the dinner. Mother, it tastes better than warm dinners at home."

My eyes fell, for I expected to hear the whole story of my playing mistress at dinner. But not a word was there concerning my cruel treatment. Emboldened by her generous silence, on the following day I renewed my persecutions. These were followed by a series of petty annoyances, studied slights, and grievous, cruel wrongs through weeks of patient long-suffering. Still the child did not seem to lose her confidence in me. She deferred to my judgment, yielding her will to mine, and when my persecution relented there was something like a return of her former sober, undemonstrative kind of affection. But in general her great thoughtful eyes studied my face with a frightened, inquiring look, as though endeavoring to ascertain what new torture awaited her. In the mean while she went steadily forward in her Latin to the delight of her teacher, and was the wonder and talk of the neighborhood, and the pride of her mother. Had she faltered, had she occasionally failed in a recitation, I might have oftener forgotten to be unkind; but that perpetual perfection—for her recitations were nothing less than perfection—was unpardonable.

It was not long before she came home with a quiet exultation in her eyes.

"Father," she said, as he sat on the rude piazza in his shirt-sleeves, "I must have a Latin Reader. We are going to translating."

"A Latun Reader!" he cried, peevishly. "And what good, I should like to know, is all this Latun to do you? It won't help you to earn your bread; it won't buy you a frock. No man will marry you any sooner for having your head filled with Latun. I don't intend to work myself to death to fill the house with Latun books. Here, I've been picking cotton all day—working just like a negro—and I don't mean to spend all I make buying books that are of no earthly use to any body!"

Fanny looked with a solemn kind of wonderment at her father during this rain of words, while I secretly rejoiced at the mortification which I well knew she must feel. My poor mother—I don't know what we might have suffered, but that she stood between her children and their father's harshness.

"The child can't study Latin without books," she very quietly remarked on this occasion.

"Well, and who cares to have her study Latun? What good will it ever do her?"

"Educated people are more thought of than ignorant people, as you should know." [My mother hadn't learned the arguments in defense of classical education. Her mind saw but one advantage.] "Isn't it any thing to be talked about and praised by the whole neighborhood, as Fanny is? There's Oliver Lashure, he's always talking about her. He remarked, in a company of gentlemen in the village the other day, that she was a prodigy. And just see how every body notices her at church. I care something for what people think of me. I've got some pride! Your father never did have any pride," she continued, turning to me. "The family would have gone to the dogs long before this but for me. I've kept your heads above water."

I longed to side with my father in reference to the Reader; and I could have done so with some propriety, as my toes were out, and my mother had that morning answered my petition for a new pair of shoes by the information, impatiently given, that she had no money to spend for shoes. But there was nothing I so much dreaded as that my envious feeling toward my sister should be suspected. My father yielded, as he generally did after a certain show of combativeness, and the Reader was purchased. On the day that the book was placed in her hands I was almost wild with rage and indignation. There were my toes staring into my face through my yawning shoes, yet there was money for Fanny's Latin book: I could have torn it into inch pieces! I was hungry for my sister's happiness, her comfort, her pleasure. That morning in school I could not study; my mind was seeking some new misery for her. It was not until I saw the girls at noon assembling for play that I made my decision. No one enjoyed the games at noon more than did Fanny in her quiet way. On this particular day, being pleased with her Reader and with the fables she had been translating, she came to her play with the right mind for its full enjoyment. I was the leading spirit on the play-ground, and I determined to exclude my sister from the game. So I stood up there, and called one name after another until every girl in the school was embraced except Fanny. And there the poor child stood slighted, mortified, disappointed, grieved. She stood for a moment, and then turned and walked into the deserted school-room companionless.

But my unkindness could not defraud Fanny of the deep pleasure she found in her Latin Reader. What wonderful stories I used to hear from her about beasts and fishes and birds that talked and quarreled, plotted and waged battles. What a marvel the child seemed; so clearly and accurately and invariably, with mathematical precision, getting the author's meaning! How strange those things sounded conveyed in her babyish voice—so hated then, so sweet to memory now!

In the mean time there was on my part a ceaseless crossing of her wishes, a systematic wounding of her tender nature. I studiously excluded her from my pastimes; but for this she found comfort in her dolls. On Saturdays, and when the weather kept us from school, she would sit playing with these puppets, holding grave, motherly converse with them; assuming the character of teacher, her pupils would recite Latin by the hour. I felt that through these dolls I could give her a blow, and the opportunity was soon offered.

One morning during the summer vacation my old teacher, Mr. Cunningham, called. My mother was very proud of Fanny's scholarship—poor woman! she had little else upon which to pride herself—and on this morning, as was her wont when we had visitors, she summoned my sister to read and translate some Latin. This she did in such a manner as to excite the enthusiastic admiration of Mr. Cunningham. He perched her on his knee, patted her pale cheek, stroked her fair hair, and kissed her noble brow again and again. He took her by the shoulders, and shook her with affectionate playfulness, saying that he meant some night to come and steal her, and have her for his little girl, and asking her if she would marry him if he should put a spider in Mrs. Cunningham's dumpling. He didn't notice me, except to remark that I ran up like a bad weed.

In the afternoon of the same day my mother went to make a call on a neighbor. There was such bitterness in my heart toward my sister that I would not allow her to speak to me. She went to the garret, and brought down all her dolls and dolls' clothes. There were some wonderful specimens of dress-making and millinery among them. She had never had a doll or toy bought for her—our father didn't believe in throwing money away on such fooling—and it had cost her a vast deal of work, and a vast deal of trading and bargaining to get her dolls, and to clothe them. She loved them as her life. There was quite an array of rag-dolls without legs—which deformity was concealed by their long dresses—and without shoulders, being the same size all the way down, which were, however, fortunate in the possession of eyes, nose, and mouth, in the shape of little daubs of ink. These were dear to her, because the work of her own hands; but her heart's idol was a little store-doll, as she called it, which she had named Florine. This young lady had a wonderful quantity of hair, dressed very high, with a tall comb and with great puffs against her small old-womanish face. Her chief charm, however, consisted in the fact that she was jointed, and could be made to sit down and to move her arms. Fanny had purchased it from one of her school-mates at the price of one hundred peaches and eleven bouquets, which patiently, morning after morning, she was for weeks engaged in delivering.

It was a cruelty more cruel than the grave to consign to the flames, as I did that afternoon, those little doll dresses and bonnets which she had been at such pains in making; those precious bits of lace and ribbon and finery, those dear rag-dolls, and, above all, Florine, the beautiful, the beloved. One by one I dropped them on the glowing coals, and saw them as they browned, shriveled, flashed into flame, and then died to ashes. Fanny stood by crying, wringing her hands, and beseeching me to desist. When

I held up Florine, swaying and dancing her over the coals, the child's pleadings were as those of a mother for the life of her babe. When she saw the loved form stretched on the cruel coals, she snatched it half-consumed to her heart, and, with the lamentation of Rachel for her slain children, threw herself on her face. I went out of the room for some moments, and when I returned she had gone up to the garret. That night, for the first time in her life, Fanny entered a complaint against her persecutor. My mother on her return found the child with eyes swollen and head throbbing. After repeated inquiries and much urging her great sorrow burst from her amidst sobs and tears:

"Oh! mother, Poky burned all my dolls and their little dresses, and Florine—she looked so pitiful—oh! oh!"

It may gratify the reader to learn that for the following week I was kept on bread and water. But poor Fanny was inconsolable. She resolutely declined my mother's offer to purchase her a new doll with joints. Florine's place in her heart should never be yielded to another dolly. Such seemed to be her feeling.

Time rolled on, and my sister advanced with a sure, firm tread through Cæsar and Virgil and Cicero, Livy and Sallust and Horace, and all the way with my envious eyes following her, for time did not cure my mind of its shameful disease. I was not proud that all the neighbors remarked the steady, unfaltering pace with which that little girl kept shoulder to shoulder with great boys, with the young Lashures, and the physician's sons, and with my old teacher's boys. My family-pride was not gratified. I did not care to rise on her shoulders. I only felt that I was overshadowed by my younger sister. Had she been my senior I might have taken pride in her success, but to be eclipsed by a child so many years my junior, in that was the humiliation. Even to this day I can never see great superiority in a younger brother or sister without a feeling of regret.

I have said that time failed to cure my heart of its envy. I assumed a superiority which I did not always feel, in all matters where my sister was concerned. She possessed a quiet humor, a dry kind of wit, which I should have enjoyed in another; but in her they failed to call out any appreciative smile or remark. When she was speaking I made it a matter of habit to appear indifferent or absorbed, and as she warmed and glowed I became cold and listless. I never noticed a remark of hers unless it gave me the opportunity to censure or criticise. Now I could almost feel amused at the ridiculously stiffened countenance I would assume whenever my sister spoke. Particularly at her quaint wit and droll humor would my features grow rigid as steel.

Fanny was just turned fourteen when our father died. My mother, with her purse released from his penurious grasp, was led by her pride into extravagances unwarranted by her limited means. Fanny and I were placed in an expensive boarding-school where a large outlay in dressings was demanded. There we were put to the study of music, in accordance with her long-cherished wish. Then a carriage and a span of handsome iron-gray horses were purchased, and, shortly afterward, a piano and new parlor furniture, preparatory to my début as a young lady. Some thirteen months after my father's death the last payment on the plantation, amounting to some four hundred dollars, fell due. My mother, already paying heavy interest on borrowed money, sold one of the slave women to meet the payment. Her husband becoming dissatisfied, with his son, a lad of sixteen years, made good his escape to Canada, from which quarter he sent us a letter of adieus, not, however, until my mother had spent three hundred dollars in efforts to recover the fugitives. Well, all these things together brought a large debt upon the estate, and one day, some three years after my father's death, the farm and negroes were sold at auction. My mother took a small house in the village and advertised a spare room for gentlemen boarders that never came. About this time Fanny, who had always been a tiny, delicate thing, gave indications of having inherited the seeds of consumption from our father's family. She began to decline rapidly, and my mother, with whom she was always the favorite, became absorbed in the care of the sick girl.

"Pocahontas," said my mother, as she perceived that her advertisement for gentlemen boarders remained unanswered, "I suppose you'll have to go to teaching; I don't see any other way. Somebody must do something. Fanny can't, and I don't see what I can do."

Had I been sentenced to the gallows I could scarcely have felt worse than on hearing this from my mother, convinced, as I was, that she spoke the truth. But I passed weeks after this in irresolution and inactivity. I had a feeling that to sit there in that poor house, in my shabby dress, with my sister sick and with want staring us in the face—to sit there doing nothing was less disgraceful than to go to work. Such is the unhealthy sentiment which slavery engenders.

However, after a time, feeling that starvation was at the door, I summoned sufficient courage to answer an advertisement for a visiting governess to take charge of the instruction of a little boy and girl in an adjoining village. In a few days I received a letter from the mother, containing information in reference to the situation, and stating that, provided I could teach Latin, the position was at my acceptance. I wondered what my father would say to this! Here was what promised to be a pleasant situation, with light labors and good pay, from which I was shut off by my ignorance of Latin, which he had always pronounced a useless study for me.

On the day that I received the letter my sister was lying on a lounge, her usually pale face lighted by a beautiful flush. I did not appreciate her condition. I saw her every day up and dressed, uncomplaining and looking well. I had no thought that she was near the Dark River. Her sickness had wrought no material change in my manner. There was no open persecution; but I was cold, and endeavored to make the poor girl feel my indifference to her health and comfort. I have not the memory of a single kind or sisterly act performed for her to comfort me now.

My mother, I suppose, had acquainted Fanny with my disqualification for the governess's place; for in my plans, and arrangements, and confidences I completely ignored her existence.

"Poky," she said, shyly and timidly.

I merely lifted my eyes to her face in token that I heard her; I would not condescend to speak.

"You know, if you could get that place, mother would give up this house and go to N——, so that you could board at home; and I've been thinking that you might study Latin at home. You are very clever; you could learn so much faster than the boy, you know. In two or three weeks you could acquire all that a child of his age could learn in a year. Your perceptions are so quick, you'd not be likely to find any difficulty, and if you should, I— Well, you know I've studied it a great many years, and perhaps I might be able to help you, you know, Poky," she said, deprecatingly, and with a pitiful, beseeching tone.

As I remember it now, I hear in that tone the pleading of a slighted, heart-crushed sister. Then I believe I could have walked up to her and taken her life—the little chit of a girl proposing to teach me Latin!

"Fanny," I said, trembling in every muscle with rage, "if you ever mention your Latin to me again I am afraid I shall kill you. You have been the bane of my existence. You have caused me all the unhappiness I ever knew. I hate you, and I'd see you starve before I'd learn any thing from you."

I was too excited to mark narrowly the effect of my words. I observed, however, that when I had finished speaking she covered her face with her hand, closed her eyes, and lay very quiet, while I swept from the room.

Those cruel words were the last I spoke to my sister. I found in a distant State a situation as resident governess at a poor salary in no very pleasant family. I did not begrudge the remittances which went to the support of my mother and sister. Indeed, I enjoyed the thought that my sister was in a degree dependent upon me. Occasional letters passed between my mother and myself, but they contained no messages for or from Fanny. I don't know whether or not my mother observed this. Perhaps she excused their absence, on the one hand, from the general character which I gave my letters, and on the other from my sister's sickness. As I have before said, I did not appreciate my sister's condition. "Fanny is a little better this morning"—"Your sister does not seem quite so well to-day"—I would read from my mother's letters; but had I believed her to be near eternity I know I should have been afraid to hate her. Indeed, being removed from her, there was considerable abatement in the bitterness of my feeling. I had a position in Southern Illinois, where teachers are honored, and the thought that the great scholar of the family was lying at home a useless burden, dependent upon me, contributed much to the softening of my heart toward her. Besides, I had been diligently engaged since my residence there in the study of Latin, accepting occasional aid from the Episcopal minister of the place. I was apt to learn; my mind was disciplined. I advanced rapidly, and in a few months was reading and translating Virgil with fluency. Then, as my sister's superiority in this direction gradually lessened, my envy diminished. I regretted that I had not at an earlier date undertaken the Latin. Fanny and I might have held pleasant companionship together; we might have loved each other. I felt that it would be pleasant to have the love of a noble nature. Fanny's quaint fun, her droll humor, her originality and freshness of mind, her meekness and long-suffering, began to be remembered. There were some faint yearnings toward my misused sister, some desires for a pleasanter relation with her. "The next time I write to mother I'll send Fanny a message," I said one day. That night I had a telegram requesting me to hasten home, as my sister was dying. The first thought which came to me on reading this almost paralyzed me with horror. My sister will take those cruel words of mine into Eternity with her; she will never know of my penitence; she will never pronounce my forgiveness.

"Hurry! hurry! hurry!" was about all they could draw from me as they made the necessary arrangements for my departure. The boat, almost as soon as we started, entered upon a race with another steamer; and while the other lady passengers cowered and trembled at the fearful speed at which we moved, I exulted. Often, as I stood on the guards watching the mad dash of the turbid waters as we sped down the mighty river, and thinking of my sister as dead, I was tempted to throw myself under the wheel, where death was certain, and in the land of spirits seek her whom I had so injured, and win her forgiveness.

At last I was set down at home. With a fearful dread I remarked that there was not a sound or look of life about the house. The doors and blinds were all closed, though it was a beautiful day in May, and the soft, sweet air would have been grateful to an invalid's cheek. As I turned the door-knob I perceived a knot of crape. Then I crept softly into the little parlor where I knew she must be lying. An open rose-wood coffin rested on the chairs. I opened the shutters, and drew back the curtains; then I stood beside the coffin and looked for the last time upon the face of my little sister. Those solemn, blue eyes with a heartache look in them, were closed forever; the droll, wistful mouth was rigid; over the meek, patient heart the faithful hands were folded. On the brow, which had a look of almost painful intellectuality, rested a wreath of white rose-buds.

This much I remarked, and turned to go, when a blindness, a darkness—the darkness of despair and the horrible pit—enveloped me, and I plunged headlong.

"'Tell Poky that I forgive her.'" This, uttered by my mother in a tone of insistence, was the first thing I remember after my fall by my sister's coffin. The words had just arrested my attention, though my poor mother had been repeating them to me a hundred times a day for more than a week.

"What is that you say?" I cried, starting up in bed. "Who said that?"

"Your sister said it, dear, your sister Fanny; and she left her love, and some messages for you. Would you like to hear them?"

"Yes, tell me," I said, eagerly; "tell me all about it. Make haste!"

"A little while before she went," responded my mother, "Fanny called me to her, and said, 'Mother, I sha'n't last until Poky gets here, and when she finds me dead and gone forever she'll feel very sorry for some things; but tell her, mother, that I forgive her, and that I have loved her all along, for she was my own, own sister. She'll want to do something for me—I know she will—and tell her to plant a rose-bush over my grave; tell her I meant to ask her to do so with my arms around her neck, but they'll be stiff when she comes. So, mother, kneel down here, and kiss me for poor dear Poky.' And that was all she said."

I heard and understood and devoured every word my mother had spoken, and I wept—the despair was gone.

PRESIDENT MONROE AND HIS ADMINISTRATION.

THE period of Mr. Monroe's administration, from the 4th of March, 1817, to the 4th of March, 1825, is justly regarded as the golden age of our political history. It will be well for the present generation to make themselves familiar with its incidents and their lessons. It was the transition-period between the patriotic devotion of the Revolution and the dominant selfishness of the present day. The native sagacity with which our early statesmen baffled the diplomatic skill and intrigue of Europe had ripened by the practical experience of thirty years in the administration of affairs. Private interests had not swelled to such enormous magnitude as to keep the ablest of our men from engaging in the public service. Party-spirit had not eaten out a just concern for the honor of the country. Slavery had not extinguished patriotism in half of the States of the Union. John Adams, Jefferson, Marshall, and others, who had been the pilots of the nation through the stormy sea of the Revolution, and the fathers of the Constitution, were still alive. Madison, Monroe, Rufus King, William Pinckney, and many others, had participated in the organization of the Government, and shared the anxieties of the "Second War of Independence;" by which, whatever else it did or failed to do, the public contempt of Europe, that had been our shield from aggression, was exchanged for the profound conviction that we were best to be "let alone." During this administration occurred that extraordinary lull in party strife among us which is still known as the "era of good feelings." So completely had party-spirit died out that Mr. Monroe was elected to his second term by every vote of the electoral colleges but one solitary dissident. The truth is, that after the experiences of the war of 1812, and the triumphant election of Mr. Monroe in 1816 as the Republican candidate, the leaders of the old Federal party gave up the contest, and desired now to be known as all Jeffersonian Republicans. In the spring of 1817, a few weeks after his inauguration, President Monroe made a journey, partly of business, through all the Northern States, to Portland in the East and Detroit in the Northwest, and was every where greeted with the utmost cordiality by the whole body of the people. He appeared in public clothed in the proper uniform—three-cornered hat and scarlet-bordered blue coat—of a colonel in the army of the Revolution, which was his military rank, received from General Washington after he was wounded at Trenton. His appropriate costume, combined with his simple dignity of manner, and evident sincerity of purpose, served to win the general respect and confidence of the people. Boston well remembers the splendid and costly entertainments and other displays made for the President by Harrison Gray Otis and other wealthy and distinguished Federalists, as a token of their acquiescence in his administration. This had not been purchased by any trimming or truckling on his part; for when General Jackson recommended to him to appoint some Federalists to his Cabinet or other leading stations, he defended his course by saying that "decided friends who stand firm in the day of trial are to be principally relied on;" and he considered it necessary that "the administration should rest strongly with the Republican party." It was the unity, strength, and self-reliance of the dominant party, controlled by liberal patriotism and guided by far-seeing wisdom, that secured public confidence and prepared the way for "the era of good feelings." It is a lesson of wisdom for other Presidents and other generations of statesmen.

Mr. Monroe has not been estimated at his full worth in the public opinion of this generation. He was in truth one of the great men of our history. He left college in his eighteenth year to join the army as a cadet, and rose rapidly to the rank of colonel, and was elected a member of the Old Congress before he was twenty-five years old. There he distinguished himself by the breadth of his views, the soundness of his judgment, the extent of his knowledge, and the sincerity of his patriotism. He was the Chairman of the Committee of Congress on whose recommendation the Convention was called that framed our glorious Constitution. Mr. John Quincy Adams, in the eulogy which he delivered at the request of the city of Boston, August 26, 1831, relates in detail a transaction of the Old Congress which illustrates the great speciality of Mr. Monroe's mind—his clear perception and unyielding maintenance of all that belongs to the honor and independence of the nation in its relation to other powers. In the year 1785 the King of Spain showed the estimation in which he held the infant republic by sending us, not a Minister Plenipotentiary, but an "Encargado de Negocios," a diplomatic agent of the lowest rank, to negotiate in regard to our claims to the free navigation of the Mississippi River. Mr. Adams says that at that time "Spain denied the right of the people of the United States to navigate the Mississippi as pertinaciously, and in as lofty a tone, as Great Britain denies to us, on the same pretense, to this day the right of navigating the St. Lawrence." Mr. Jay, then our Secretary for Foreign Affairs, recommended to Congress to make a compromise, and agree that, in return for certain commercial advantages conceded to us, we would forego the exercise of the right we claimed on the Mississippi for a limited term of twenty-five or thirty years. Mr. Monroe instinctively saw what a fatal concession this would be for an infant republic to make to the dictation and arrogance of a European power, and he opposed the scheme with great earnestness and ability. Mr. Rufus King, then a representative from Massachusetts, supported the proposal with equal vigor, and carried the votes of all the Northern States in its favor, while the whole South was equally united against it. The dispute was very bitter, and was the first purely sectional struggle between the North and the South, in the series of which the great Rebellion is the last. The vote, taken by States, stood seven for to five against the proposal, Delaware not being represented at the time. The figures show the falsity of the pretext alleged so confidently in our day, that the Northern and Southern States were equal in number when the Constitution was adopted. But as nine States were required to make a treaty, the measure was defeated. It was a most fortunate deliverance for us. In seven years from that time the right of navigating the Mississippi to the sea was conceded by Spain in solemn treaty; and in less than twenty years Mr. Monroe had the satisfaction of giving to the United States the undivided dominion of the Mississippi and all its branches from source to mouth. Such are the fruits of intelligent and determined firmness in maintaining the honor of the nation in our intercourse with foreign powers, instead of the bargaining and compromising propensities of the commercial interests. It was by no means the last of the occasions in which the country has been indebted to Southern statesmen for the ready perception and firm support of our true honor and independence. It remains to be seen whether the statesmen of the North can ever free themselves so far from what Napoleon called the genius of the shop as to comprehend and stand by the demands of national honor, although that is always in the long-run the wisest policy for commerce as it is for every other national interest.

Mr. Monroe took an active part in the discussions connected with the adoption of the Constitution, and was very strenuous in urging Virginia to a conditional adoption—an absurdity now sufficiently palpable, but it puzzled many honest minds at that time. Although he finally voted against the adopting act in Virginia, and was always ranked with the anti-Federal party, he was undoubtedly much more national in his feelings than many of the Southern leaders. He was chosen a Senator of the United States in the first session of the new Congress, and lent his aid in the organization of the Government for about four years. President Washington, who knew him thoroughly, not only as a soldier and a statesman but as a near neighbor and friend, selected him in 1794 to represent the United States at the Court of France. It was at the most trying period of Washington's administration, when our country fairly reeled with the excitement growing out of the Proclamation of Neutrality, and France was drunk with the excesses of the Revolution, during the administration of the Committee of Public Safety and the Executive Directory. It was a most distinguished mark of confidence toward Monroe, as it was a most momentous responsibility that he assumed. Looking back at his conduct from this distance of time, although his mission accomplished but little of specific results, it ought to be admitted the appointment was a fortunate one for the country, as it helped to carry us over a most perilous situation. Mr. Monroe's course was not only honorable and faithful, but in several cases singularly sagacious and discreet. Soon after his recall he was chosen Governor of Virginia for three years. In the mean time Bonaparte had been made First Consul, and had conceived a magnificent project for establishing a grand military colony in Louisiana, the territory which he had just extorted from the imbecility of Spain, having first procured the exclusion of our people from the privilege of deposit at New Orleans. His veteran legions, released from active service by the transient peace of Amiens, were to be planted on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico and of the Mississippi, to overawe and curb, and eventually to dominate this republic. It was the precursor of the more gigantic and grasping project of his successor, now in process of execution a little further to the South. These things acted like an electric shock upon the whole country. The West especially clamored for war. Fortunately Mr. Jefferson had conceived the idea of effecting a purchase of New Orleans and the adjacent territory, and Mr. Robert R. Livingston, our Minister at Paris, had already prepared and presented to the French Government a very able memorial in favor of the transfer, showing that it would advance the interests of France no less than those of the United States. At that moment Napoleon was not in a humor to listen to the proposal. President Jefferson then threw upon Mr. Monroe the perilous and almost hopeless responsibility of the case on which the whole future of the country so much depended, by sending him to France as Envoy Extraordinary, to preserve and secure to us the use of the Mississippi River. He reached Havre on the 10th of April, and Paris on the 12th, to find that every thing was most unexpectedly changed. The flames of war had broken out again in Europe, the twenty thousand veterans encamped at Helvoetsluys for the military colony in Louisiana were wanted elsewhere, "France wanted money, and must have it," the First Consul had already, on the 8th, announced to his Council his determination to sell the whole territory to the United States. In fact, Talleyrand had gone so far, on the 10th, as to ask Mr. Livingston how much the United States would give for the whole. Of course nothing remained for Mr. Monroe but to agree in the price, and "the negotiation was concluded in a fortnight."

Thus the whole valley of the Mississippi, the Rocky Mountains, the Great Plains, and the Pacific Coast, down to the forty-second degree of latitude, became the territory of the United States; in fact, doubling the extent of our national domain. His special mission to Spain, to settle the question of boundaries and purchase the territory of Florida, failed at that time. Mr. Adams says of the papers which he prepared and presented in this case, "that among the creditable State papers of this nation they will rank in the highest order; that they deserve the close and scrutinizing attention of every American statesman, and will remain solid, however unornamented, monuments of intellectual power applied to national claims of right." And in 1819, during his first Presidential term, he had the satisfaction of acquiring Florida by peaceful purchase, and thus of rounding out our national boundary in a manner that, to human view, would leave us no more trouble with our "outside row" for a century at least. Mr. Adams exclaims:

"Look at the map of United North America, as it was at the definitive peace of 1783. Compare it with the map of that same Empire as it is now (1826) limited by the Sabine and the Pacific Ocean; and say, the change, more than of any other man, living or dead, was the work of JAMES MONROE.".....He adds, "The acquisition of the Floridas completed that series of negotiations (perhaps it were no exaggeration to say of revolutions) which had commenced under the Confederation with the Encargado de Negocios of Spain. Viewed as a whole, throughout its extent, can there be a doubt in considering it as the most magnificent supplement to our national Independence presented by our history? And can there arise a historian of this Republican Empire, who shall fail to perceive, or hesitate to acknowledge, that throughout the long series of these transactions, which more than doubled the territories of the North American Confederation, the leading mind of that great movement in the annals of the world, and thus far in the march of human improvement upon earth, was the mind of JAMES MONROE?"

Time fails for describing his service, as Minister to England, in the grand struggle between neutral rights and belligerent pretensions. From 1805, as Mr. Adams says, "to the peace of Ghent, the biography of James Monroe is the history of that struggle, and in a great degree the history of this nation." These negotiations, Mr. Adams thinks, would have been successful had Mr. Fox lived, and "might have restored peace and harmony so far as it can subsist between emulous and rival nations." The death of Fox changed it all. In 1811 Mr. Monroe became Secretary of State under President Madison; and in 1814, after the trial and failure of two others in the conduct of the war with England, he was appointed Secretary of War also. There are a few yet living who remember with admiration the success of the third occupant of the War Office in diffusing vigor, confidence, and unity through the military affairs of the country. One difficulty he had to meet, from which the present Government has been wonderfully preserved, by the blessing of Heaven upon the transcendent financier whose genius has saved the nation. At that day, as Mr. Adams says, "so degraded was the credit of the nation, that Mr. Monroe, to raise the funds indispensable for the defense of New Orleans, could obtain them only by pledging his private individual credit as subsidiary to that of the nation. This he did without an instant of hesitation. Nor was he less ready to sacrifice the prospects of laudable ambition to the suffering cause of his country." Finding that the draft was the only means of filling up the army, he boldly recommended it, with all its risks of unpopularity, on the eve of the pending Presidential election, in which he was the leading candidate of his party. If it was necessary to carry his measure, and if the war continued, he resolved to withdraw his name from the canvass. Our history records no instance of equal self-denial among candidates for the Presidency. The news of peace in the beginning of the year 1815 removed all these embarrassments.

With such abilities, after such experiences, and through such public services, on the 4th of March, 1817, he became President of the United States. For his cabinet he chose John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State; William H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury; John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War; and Smith Thompson, Secretary of the Navy. No President has had an abler council. It may be doubted whether the executive administration of the Government has not been weakened rather than strengthened by the usage which now makes the cabinet consist of seven members. Washington had only three. But then he took the Vice-President into his confidence.

Mr. Adams was the greatest master of diplomacy in this nation. With the highest natural gifts appropriate to a negotiator, improved by a most finished education both in this country and in Europe, he had grown up in diplomacy from the eleventh year of his age, when he went with his father on the mission to France in 1778. Washington appointed him Minister to the Hague in 1794, when he was still so young as to be called the "General Washington's Boy Minister," and afterward to Portugal. President John Adams sent him to Prussia, where he negotiated a treaty of commerce. In 1803 he was chosen Senator to Congress, where he served six years. On the nomination of Jefferson he became our first accredited Minister to Russia. There he laid the broad foundation for that good understanding which for half a century has never once been broken, and whose effects in controlling the policy of Europe for our advantage during our present struggle can not be overestimated. It was during a friendly conversation with the Emperor Alexander, as they walked arm in arm in the garden of the palace, that the proposal was originated of Russian mediation in the war with Great Britain which led to the treaty of Ghent, in which Mr. Adams was the leading negotiator by appointment of Madison. He then remained Minister to London until he became Secretary of State under Monroe. He had thus enjoyed the confidence of every President, and gained success in the most important negotiations of his time. With a genius that fitted him for every attainment, with habits of the most absolute self-control and the most untiring industry, with a memory that retained all knowledge, however large or however minute, and held it always ready for use when wanted, with an experience in diplomacy larger and more varied than that of any other American, with an integrity that was never tarnished, and a patriotism that had been burned into his boyhood in '76, he was selected by Mr. Monroe, of Virginia, for the first place in his cabinet. Nor was the choice ever regretted.

William H. Crawford was a native of Virginia, and a citizen of Georgia, a man of commanding appearance and commanding talents, educated at Dr. Waddell's famous academy in Georgia, admitted to the bar at the age of twenty-six, and elected to the Senate of the United States in 1807, in the thirty-fifth year of his age. He took a leading part in Congress during that momentous period, and was chosen President of the Senate on the death of Vice-President George Clinton; thus introducing a usage which was maintained almost unbroken down to Mr. Lincoln's time, of placing a Southern man in the chair of the Senate, to stand second in the succession in case of a vacancy in the Presidency. In 1813 he went as Minister to France. In 1815 he returned, and was appointed by Mr. Madison Secretary of War in place of Mr. Monroe, and in 1816 Secretary of the Treasury in place of A. J. Dallas; which place he filled through the whole of Monroe's administration.

He always adhered strictly to the Jeffersonian ideas and policy; and being a native of the Old Dominion he was nominated for the Presidency by the Republican caucus in 1824, as their proper exponent and the last representative of what was called the Virginia dynasty. The country failed to indorse the nomination, and he obtained but forty-one electoral votes. A paralytic stroke destroyed his further prospects, although the strength of his mind enabled him for seven years to discharge the duties of a judge of the highest court in Georgia until his death in 1834. He was undoubtedly the greatest man and the most accomplished statesman we have ever had south of South Carolina.

John C. Calhoun, when in his nineteenth year, commenced getting an education for the practice of law. He graduated at Yale College in 1804, studied law under Judges Reeve and Gould at Litchfield, and returned to his native State with the advantages of a New England education added to his Carolina fire, his Scotch-Irish grit, and his uncommon natural abilities. In two years he was elected to the Legislature, and in two years more he took his seat in Congress, and became one of the master spirits in the republic. The War Congress—the twelfth—which met on a special call of the President, November 4, 1811, was remarkable for the great number of young men in it, who were determined not to be controlled by the old leaders of the Jeffersonian party, but to push for a more energetic policy. They elected Henry Clay for Speaker, and Mr. Calhoun became the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and in that capacity took the lead in the system of decisive measures which culminated in the Declaration of War on the 18th of June, 1812. During all his six years' service in Congress he was the strenuous and uncompromising supporter of all measures for strengthening the Government, and increasing the resources of the country, and making them available for national purposes. The increase of the navy, the draft for the army, the protective tariff, internal revenue, manufactures, national bank, and internal improvements by the national Government for national objects, were all favorite measures of his. When called to Mr. Monroe's Cabinet, in 1817, he found the Department of War in the greatest confusion, with unsettled accounts to the amount of fifty millions of dollars, and a general want of system and responsibility, growing out of the extraordinary pressure of business and the great number of unaccustomed hands necessarily employed in the service during the war. His success in restoring order, in reorganizing the staff of the army, and in establishing a system of rigid accountability reaching to every individual attached to the service, and his energy in carrying his schemes into actual execution evinced an administrative capacity unequalled in our history. He became the pride of the nation. The breadth of his views, the ardor of his patriotism, the brilliancy of his eloquence, the wisdom of his policy, the vigor of his administration, his chivalric devotion to the advancement and honor of the Union made him, at forty years old, the most popular man of his age in the country. He was the champion of those who wished to break away from what was considered the narrow and anti-commercial policy of the Virginia dynasty, without going back to the lax construction and centralizing tendencies ascribed to the old Federal party. He was the favorite of Pennsylvania as a candidate for the Presidency. A gentleman who was an active advocate of Mr. Calhoun in Connecticut affirms that he was the first choice of an overwhelming majority of the Republican party in that State. It is believed that he would have been easily elected as the continuator of the Monroe administration, of which he was one of the most conspicuous members, had it not been for the general respect among the same classes to the paramount claims of Mr. Adams, whose long and useful services, eminent abilities, and present position as Secretary of State, and so right "in the line of safe precedents," could not easily be set aside. And, above all, Calhoun was young enough to wait for his turn after Adams. The country had never voted for a man of two-and-forty for President. Had he and his friends only yielded gracefully and cordially to these considerations, it is quite possible that he might have taken his place regularly "in the line of safe precedents" by becoming Mr. Adams's secretary and successor. It is idle to speculate on what a change that would have made in the destinies of the country. Other causes came in to divide the canvass; and eventually Mr. Monroe saw three of his four secretaries, his Speaker of the House, and the most popular of his generals, all belonging to the same party, pressed forward as candidates for the immediate succession, and each sustained by influential bodies of friends. It was a struggle perilous to our institutions in the eyes of many patriots, and not creditable to the public spirit of our leading statesmen. That Mr. Calhoun was the only one who consented to the withdrawal of his name from the canvass strengthens the belief, long entertained, that up to this time he had been a sincere patriot, honestly devoted to the Union and the Constitution, and desirous of promoting the interest and honor of his country as one whole.

At the instance of his friends in Pennsylvania he accepted a nomination to the Vice-Presidency, and was chosen by a large majority of the electors, showing the general esteem in which he was held. But the politics of the country had taken a new turn, the Missouri controversy had intervened, and the chair of the Senate was found not to be a stepping-stone to the Presidency. His ambition was his master-passion, and this had been intensified by the excessive admiration of his friends, who always predicted that he was sure to be the foremost man of his generation. When first he took his seat in Congress, and was seen to rise up at once to the place of a leader, while whole ranks of veteran statesmen received the law from his lips, it occasioned no surprise in Yale College, where he had been educated; it was just what the traditions of the College—traditions seven years old—had anticipated. President Dwight himself, impressed by the display of his talents and courage in the seniors' recitation-room, had confidently predicted that Calhoun would one day be President of the United States. And when the coveted prize, after being almost within his reach, was seen to recede into the distance, it is not so strange as it is lamentable that disappointment turned his mind into the channel of sectional ambition; and having once gone astray from patriotism he finally resolved to divide the Union which he could not rule. If we look at the height from which he fell, and then at our present experience of the evils which his master-mind has brought upon his country, we weep as we shudder at the spectacle, and can not but pronounce him the greatest political apostate in the records of history. To confirm the correctness of this general view of Calhoun we quote in evidence a letter written quite recently by the Rev. Aaron Foster, of East Charle-mont, Massachusetts, who was for several years pastor of a Presbyterian Church in South Carolina, in the neighborhood of Mr. Calhoun's residence. He is a man of good principles and sound judgment, and a very profound thinker, with uncommon insight into character; and as such a man he enjoyed an intimacy with Mr. Calhoun during those seasons when he was at home which makes his conclusions highly trustworthy:

"As to J. C. Calhoun, the originator of the State-right doctrine (which has grown into this rebellion, and in the shape of secession was in his mind and heart, and on his tongue the winter before his death)—history will call him the GREAT APOSTATE. No doubt Mr. Calhoun was a true friend of the Union up to the Missouri Compromise. At the nomination and election of Jackson he told me that he was put on that ticket for Vice-President not from choice, but because he could not help it. I think he did not feel the grip upon his ambition till about this time, the autumn of 1828.

"About his open break with Jackson two years after, and his publishing his pamphlet, he told me that his friends advised against it, and said, 'Jackson will crush you.' The month I spent in Washington in 1844 his nearest friends in Congress, some of whom I knew well in South Carolina, said to me that Mr. Calhoun was a disappointed man. And every one knew that his mind was soured.

"I will suggest—and I think my peculiar opportunities for judging must guide me right in the opinion—that the mind of Mr. Calhoun, during these years, between 1824 and 1835, was laboring on the certainty that Freedom must outvote slavery, and that in the progress of the race Freedom must be united against it politically. He either honestly believed in slavery, or saw that his lot and political hopes were cast out of freedom into slavery. For many years he labored with the problem, how minorities could be made to govern majorities. This was the burden of his conversation with me, between 1828 and the end of 1831—including State Rights and Nullification, and the insufficiency of the United States Constitution to protect minorities. My opinion is, that, finding no relief in these theories so long as a majority of the State votes controlled the policy of the nation, he turned with hope for the institution of slavery to secession, thinking to live long enough to work it out and be its head and its glory. Disappointed ambition is the father of Mr. Calhoun's apostasy; for, if he had succeeded Mr. Adams, we should have had none of it."

Calhoun was certainly a crown of glory and a tower of strength to the Union while he was a member of Mr. Monroe's administration, and his greatness was so much added to the galaxy of talent which then controlled our affairs. The only remaining member of the Cabinet, Smith Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, can be disposed of in fewer words, not from his inferiority of character, but because his transparent purity of life and straightforward integrity of administration furnish few materials for history. He was an honored judge of the Supreme Court of New York in the days when our bench was graced with such names as Kent, and Spencer, and Van Ness; and would soon have been promoted to the chief-justiceship, in the order both of merit and of seniority, when he was called to a place in the Cabinet, and before the close of Mr. Monroe's second term was appointed by him to the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Justice Brockholst Livingston. He was profoundly learned in the law, and a sound and discriminating judge. He was also an acute politician and a far-seeing statesman, a wise and faithful administrator and a sincere patriot, a shrewd counselor and a sincere Christian. In a word, he was, without pretension and without guile, worthy to be the equal associate of his colleagues, whoever they might be, and whatever were their responsibilities.

In addition to his Cabinet proper, President Monroe had for his ever-faithful and confidential friend the Vice-President, Daniel D. Tompkins, the true "favorite son of New York," than whom, when the enemy was kept out of his mouth who stole away his brains, our country knew no patriot more disinterested, and no counselor of greater resources or more heroic courage. For his legal adviser he had the clear-minded and sound-hearted William Wirt, Attorney-General. John Marshall, his friend and near neighbor, was Chief-Justice. Henry Clay, Speaker of the House (with an interval growing out of the Missouri controversy), was then the brilliant champion of liberty, whose eloquent pleas for Greek and South American independence electrified not only America but Europe. In the Senate were such men as C. P. Van Ness, Rufus King, Martin Van Buren, William Pinckney, Littleton Waller Tazewell, Nathaniel Macon, Andrew Jackson, Hugh L. White, and others of our most eminent statesmen. Our leading foreign ministers were Albert Gallatin in France, Richard Rush in Great Britain, John Forsyth in Spain, Alexander H. Everett in the Netherlands, etc. In the history of an administration thus constituted and circumstanced, the most marked feature is the general quietness and prosperity which the country enjoyed under it, and the small number of striking events which it offers for record. No new policy was brought forward by the President, whose aim was to make his administration the regular continuation of that which had just closed. Only two remarkable events require our present attention. The first was the rise and settlement of the Missouri controversy, on the question of the extension of slavery in the country. Only a very brief notice of this is admissible here.

In the classification of the States of the Union the original Thirteen were commonly divided into three sections—Northern or Eastern, Middle, and Southern. Of these the South numbered only five States—Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia. Delaware was then always reckoned among the Middle States, with which it had all its connections, social, political, and commercial. Before the Revolution it had commonly been an appendage of Pennsylvania, and was no more distinctively a slave State than New Jersey, which lay alongside of it. The admission of Vermont and Ohio, of Kentucky and Tennessee, made no change in the proportions, the two sections standing seven to ten. The admission of Louisiana as a slaveholding State reduced the difference to two, and then the political perversion of Delaware in 1819 (which was generally believed at the time to have been effected in part by intimidation and bribery), produced the famous equilibrium in the Senate, which was so strenuously maintained for thirty years, and which multitudes were made to believe was one of the original and most sacred “Compromises of the Constitution.” There had been a great and criminal neglect on the part of Congress, that in all the legislation concerning the territory purchased from France, the Ordinance of Freedom, which saved the Northwest, was never extended over Louisiana. Now it was too late.

The petition of Missouri for leave to form a State Constitution was presented on the 16th of March, 1818, in the first session of the Eighteenth Congress; but the bill was not taken up for action until the short session. On the 13th of February, 1819, Mr. Tallmadge, of New York, moved an amendment prohibiting the further introduction of slavery into the new State, which was adopted on the 16th by a vote of 87 to 76, after a fierce debate of three days. On the 27th the Senate struck out the amendment by the overwhelming vote of 22 to 16, Messrs. Otis of Boston, Palmer of Vermont, Lacock of Pennsylvania, Edwards and Thomas of Illinois voting with the majority, in addition to the Delaware Senators, and several Northern members evading the vote. But the House of Representatives voted, on the last day of the session, to adhere to their amendment, and consequently the bill was lost.

Of course the question came up at the next session. It was a new Congress, but whose members, so far at least as the North was concerned, had been chosen before the agitation of the country had become intense. In the meantime the Legislature of Massachusetts had consented to the separation of the province of Maine, hitherto a part of the State, for the purpose of forming a new State, and the people had formed a constitution and applied for admission into the Union. A bill in its favor was introduced into the House on the 30th of December, 1819, debated and passed the next day. In the Senate, on the 3d of January, 1820, by an adroit movement of parliamentary skill, an amendment was tacked to the Maine bill, giving authority to the people of Missouri to form a constitution. The two subjects were totally distinct in their nature, one being the direct admission of Maine with its constitution already formed, the other the preliminary authorization of a territory to form a constitution. But they were held together and debated till the 3d of March when they were separated, Maine was admitted, and Missouri authorized with the restriction left out. This last point was only carried, by a vote of 90 to 87, through the machinery of a Committee of Conference between the two Houses. As a compromise, as it was called, a section was added prohibiting slavery in all territories lying north of the latitude of $36^{\circ} 30'$, and this compromise was invested with an air of sacredness in the eyes of all Northern politicians, which served as a blind to danger until the exigencies of slavery demanded its repeal in order to enable Kansas to become a slave State. Thence the Kansas troubles, followed by the great rebellion.

Still there was one more opportunity. The people of Missouri had their constitution to form, and it was possible for them to terminate the strife by excluding from their territory the great evil of slavery. There were but few slaves then among them, and these in the hands of a small number of families, while the mass of the people had no interest except in doing the best for the future welfare of the State, and there was already abundant evidence in the experience of the different sections to convince every honest man which way the true interest of the State would lead. Indeed, so far as the history of the times can be traced, it was never pretended that the interest of the State of Missouri required that it should be made a slave State; but all the arguments used were either political and sectional, or made up of base insinuations and irritating misstatements. Unhappily for the country as well as for Missouri there were in St. Louis a couple of smart young lawyers, adventurers from the older States, ambitious of winning political distinction, and not over-scrupulous as to the means, and without experience or deep foresight as to the results of measures beyond the present object. These took the lead in electioneering and planning as well as in drafting the constitution, and succeeded in not only sanctioning slavery, but in making it perpetual, as they thought, by forbidding the Legislature from ever taking any measure for its extinction. I do not really suppose those young men acted from any settled philosophical preference for slavery itself, or from any real indifference to the honor of the country and the just wishes of the majority of their fellow-citizens. They wanted to see what they could do, and probably acted with as little thought of consequences as a company of unthinking boys would do in rolling a huge rock down the side of a mountain to see how big a noise they could make. They both shrunk with horror from disunion and civil war, just as the aforesaid boys would be horror-struck if they saw their loosened rock glance and strike a peaceful cottage in the valley, crushing its inmates to death in the ruins. But God holds men responsible for the mischief which they do recklessly. Grievously has the State of Missouri suffered now for having sanctioned a great wrong, in 1820, under the lead of Thomas H. Benton and Edward Bates.

The history of the Missouri Compromise is now about ready to be written. The materials for the closing chapter are passing before our eyes and burning in our hearts. It was a national transaction, and its consequences are national. Nor have the people of any section or of any class just reason to complain of their share in the terrible consequences. There was a show of earnest resistance for the moment. Speeches of orators, essays of writers, sermons of divines, resolutions of legislatures protested against the allowance of slavery in Missouri. But the shrewd politicians dared the deed; and when it was once done the whole country tamely acquiesced, and ever after heaped honors on the heads of the great compromiser and his associates. In less than half the time of a generation the whole body of Northern people, lay and clerical, were ready to be inflamed to madness with indignation against a handful of "fanatics," as they were deemed, who thought it worth while to express their condemnation of slavery as a mighty wrong, and their desire to see our country freed from its guilt and danger. The nation is now learning that the Compromise, from beginning to end, was a great political blunder. Had the people been properly trained and led, and had their representatives been true to their convictions, they would have seen that the first concession to the threat of disunion could not but put a weapon into the hands of Southern politicians which would become more and more formidable with time. Mothers know that when a stubborn child attempts to frighten his mother to give him his will, by holding his breath till he is black in the face, the best way to put it out of his head forever is to settle the question once for all the very first time he tries it. Had the Senate been true at the first, or had the House stood to its original vote of restriction, there could not have been any disunion at that time: the whole nation was too patriotic, the slavery party were in no preparation to rebel, and the mass of Southern people were then loyal to enthusiasm. Missouri would have been now as free and as rich and prosperous as Illinois; and Arkansas would have been the same; and the Indian tribes would have been the same. And the American Board and other great religious bodies would not have been seduced, by the tricks of politicians, under the specious pretext of patriotism, to equivocate as to the wrong of slavery, and at length to elevate the law of slavery to a paramount authority over the "higher law" of God. Pandora's fabled box is but a poor emblem of the mischiefs which were let loose upon this land by the defeat of the Missouri restriction.

Although the Missouri Compromise, which consigned that State to the evils of slavery for forty years, was truly a measure of Mr. Monroe's administration, there is nothing on record that he himself used any unseemly or exorbitant measures to secure its adoption. It was probably approved both by the President and by every member of his Cabinet, as far as is known; and it was virtually acquiesced in by the great body of the people as a political necessity, expedient for the present exigency, with the hope that something would turn up to avert its possible consequences. Nothing turned up, and the nation has been allowed to reap what it had sown.

The second principal feature in the history of Mr. Monroe's administration was the settlement of our national policy in regard to the relations which we should maintain with the other independent nations of the American continent, and the light in which we should regard the course of the great European powers toward these new republics. This system of policy is essentially represented by what has been called the "Monroe Doctrine," which has been the theme of so much discussion here and in Europe. The "Monroe Doctrine," properly considered, is not a mere solitary axiom of diplomacy, of disputable meaning, of uncertain application, or of no valid authority. On the contrary it represents a comprehensive system of policy, both consistent and of profound wisdom, including the whole conduct of our Government toward the new republics of Spanish America, from their first efforts at independence until their full nationality obtained the recognition of Europe. Theoretically it is a great "System of Doctrine," arising out of the nature of our institutions, regulating our relations both with Europe and America, and essential to the permanency of our national character and independence. Of this systematized foreign policy Mr. Monroe was undoubtedly the father. It was settled during his administration, and it is certain that he was the actual President of the United States, and himself administered the executive government, employing his secretaries as responsible advisers and executive agents. The theory had not then been invented which allows each member of the cabinet to govern his own department according to his own ideas, independently of his brother secretaries and almost of the President. Mr. Monroe would naturally keep the control of our foreign intercourse in his own hand, because he understood that subject better than any one else. From the time when, a young man in the old Congress, he had baffled the Spanish Encargado and vindicated the free navigation of the Mississippi, foreign relations had been his specialty, and he had been looked to as a chief counselor and manager in these affairs by Washington, Jefferson, and Madison. The suggestion so often put forth, that Mr. Adams was the author of the Monroe Doctrine, is without the slightest warrant, and is unjust to both Adams and Monroe. Mr. Adams was the more accomplished scholar in diplomacy; but in profoundness of insight and soundness of judgment as to what concerned the national honor and independence, Mr. Monroe was the greater statesman, and impartial history must give him the credit of the masterly policy which steered the Government through the difficulties growing out of the Spanish-American revolution, and made the United States a dictator to Europe in regard to the Western Continent.

The Monroe Doctrine, considered thus as the symbol or exponent of the system of policy adopted by Mr. Monroe in relation to the Spanish-American States, may be characterized as a system of duty, which is morally right, politically wise, and logically consistent. Thus viewed, it may be taken as a testimony—that this nation will do right; that the political system of Europe is incompatible with that of America; that we will do what we can to lead Europe to a better system, and to bring diplomacy under the “Higher Law;” that we consider the whole of this continent appropriated; and that we will hold any attempted intervention of European Powers for the sake of controlling affairs in America an injury to ourselves, which we shall resent or resist as we think proper. This “System of Doctrine” is substantially identical with the immortal policy of Washington, as exhibited in his Proclamation of Neutrality—the sublimest act of his Government—and laid down so explicitly in his Farewell Address, in words of almost superhuman wisdom:

“Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities. Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel. Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?”

It comprises in substance also the principle of Non-intervention, which the Liberals of Continental Europe long for, and which Kossuth argued for so effectively in this country. It is not, however, a namby-pamby sentimentalism of Non-intervention, which idly weeps for the sufferings of the oppressed, but lifts neither hand nor voice for their deliverance. It is not the cold selfishness of Cain, when he whined out—“Am I my brother’s keeper?” It is not the cowardice of imbecility which shrinks from speaking the truth, or doing what is right, through base and servile fear of loss. It is Intervention withstood manfully, and prevented energetically. In proper circumstances it bids the oppressor “Hold!” and if that is ineffectual, boldly takes him by the throat and hurls him back from his victims. It means that we will not submit to wrong toward ourselves, and when duty calls we will censure and even resent a wrong done to others. It includes what Kossuth termed “Intervention for Non-intervention.” The closing Declaration by President Monroe produced an effect upon Europe which it is impossible for the present generation to realize. That whole continent was then firmly united in one political system, devised by the highest human sagacity, fortified by the most solemn compacts, and sustained by veteran armies, and all actuated by a common conviction that the one grand political danger of the civilized world was in the spread of liberal principles, of which the United States were the source and seed-bed. And while they were actually negotiating among themselves for the commencement of operations that it was expected would cripple and ultimately crush us, behold! they are suddenly confronted by the young republic looking all Europe boldly in the face, and crying, Hands off, ruffians! And they very prudently kept “hands off” for forty years. Perhaps by this time some of them wish they had kept “hands off” still longer.

Mr. Monroe’s administration may be deemed to have culminated in the utterance of the Great Declaration. Its boldness fairly stunned the Holy Alliance, and by taking from that huge conspiracy its prestige of irresistibility, took it down from the height of its arrogance, and was the first blow toward its dissolution. The last year of his term was rendered unhappy by personal divisions among the members of his Cabinet, three out of the four being eager candidates for the next succession, in addition to his favorite Speaker of the House, and the most distinguished General whom he had promoted. It was a sad scramble, and sadly has the country suffered in consequence. At the close of his term, March 4, 1825, he retired to his farm in Virginia, but harassed by his insolvent circumstances, which finally swept away all his property and turned him adrift in want. He found a comfortable home in 1830 with his daughter, Mrs. Gouverneur, wife of the postmaster of New York, and on the 4th of July, 1831, he ended a useful and honorable life. Mr. Adams speaks “as a faithful witness” of his character and history, and eulogizes his whole career, as characteristic “of a mind anxious and unwearied in the pursuit of truth and right; patient of inquiry; patient of contradiction; courteous, even in the collision of sentiment; sound in its ultimate judgments, and firm in its final conclusions.” And with regard to his course in the chief magistracy of the Union he gives this summary:

"There behold him for a term of eight years, strengthening his country for defense by a system of combined fortifications, military and naval; sustaining her rights, her dignity, and honor abroad; soothing her dissensions and conciliating her acerbities at home; controlling by a firm though peaceful policy the hostile spirit of the European Alliance against republican Southern America; extorting by the mild compulsion of reason the shores of the Pacific from the stipulated acknowledgment of Spain, and leading back the imperial Autocrat of the North to his lawful boundaries from his hastily asserted dominion over the Southern ocean: thus strengthening and consolidating the federative edifice of his country's Union till he was entitled to say, like Augustus Cæsar of his imperial city, that he had found her built of brick, and left her constructed of marble."

In the great declension of political principle and of the spirit of liberty in the generation which followed the fatal concessions of the Missouri Compromise, amounting almost to an absolute apostasy, it has been nearly impossible to convince the politicians of this age that there is any thing sacred or even important in the Monroe Doctrine as a permanent rule of national policy. It appeared to most of them very much like "the Pope's Bull against the Comet;" a piece of childish display pertaining to a by-gone age, but of not the least consequence at the present time. But that delusion is passing away. The people are opening their eyes to the ulterior aims of the European Alliance, and are looking to the Monroe Doctrine as the pole-star of our future greatness among the nations of the earth.

THE LAST OF SEVEN.

IT was a mild, patient face—a face which told the story of long and weary years. The lines on it were the slow chiseling of time—a monumental inscription of all the woman had done and suffered. And not many sadder epitaphs are ever written than that which was traced on the quiet yet rugged features within the framing of that silver hair.

The woman had been young and hopeful forty years ago; so loving, and, she had thought, so loved. Perhaps she had been loved, then. Sometimes, out of natures as hard and cruel as the granite rock, blossoms a summer longsome little flower—the one sweetness of a hard lifetime. Such, it may be, was Adam Gibson's love in the brief wooing-time before Rachel Gray, with her bright young beauty, her voice clear and merry as a wild bird's note, and her loving, earnest woman's heart, stood beside him at the altar of the little village church, and then went home with him, his wife.

For the blossoming of that flower of love, for the fond caresses and tender words of that wooing, she would forgive him much, and love him long—love him, indeed, until her tried and patient heart should be done with throbbing to earth's pain and passion.

At the first she had such faith in him. When their short honey-moon was over, and his true character began to develop itself—when she was forced to see that to his hard, worldly nature nothing save his own worldly success was truly dear—when fond lover changed to stern taskmaster, and her burden was laid, almost too heavily to be borne, on her slender shoulders, she fought resolutely against the truth; at least she would not believe him harder or sterner than other men. She said to herself that it was his New England rearing which was in fault—it was because he had been educated to suppress emotion, and to believe in work as the sole business of life. She blamed herself for oversensitiveness; and when, a while before her first baby came, she broke down utterly, and had to steal away to her chamber and give up her tasks to the strong hands of a hired substitute, she sat there through the days of waiting, and meekly pitied her husband because he had married a wife so little suited to his needs, so different from the hardy, long-enduring women around her. She did not blame him for leaving her to her solitude—he had, so much to do, she knew, and of course that still room must be wearisome to him. Yet bitter tears fell now and then on the soft muslin fabric of her wedding dress, which she was fashioning into dainty baby robes, her gift to the unborn darling for whose coming she waited in tremulous expectation.

Oh what hopes fluttered at her heart, sweetening the bitterness of her tears! How she forgot all present sorrow in fond dreams of the soft hands that would by-and-by touch her cheek, the little head that would lie on her bosom, the young, innocent lips that should sometime bless her ear with all the words of love for which she hungered!

And when at last the hour came, and through the closed lips fluttered no breath; when she knew that the little dark-lashed eyes could never open, or the little breast stir from its marble slumber, she could not help it if moonless and starless night settled down upon her heart. If Adam Gibson had but loved her and comforted her then—been pitying, and gentle, and tender—he might have won her, body and soul, for his bonds slave forever. But when he stood aloof, looked coldly on her bitter woe, and blamed her excessive indulgence in her sorrow, he roused that meekest of natures to revolt. She could forgive him that he had been too busy with the cares of life to be tender of her, but she could not forgive him that he did not mourn for his dead baby; and so a bitter seed sprang up in her heart. She did not cease to love him—she was too loyal a soul to admit the possibility of that, but she ceased to excuse him or to worship him; before his altar she burnt no more incense.

And yet she did not quite, in that one matter, do him justice. Under the hard crust of his nature there was a fountain of tenderness of whose hidden gleam she never knew. Perhaps there lives no man so hard that the sight of his own dead child would not move him; and even Adam Gibson looked upon his with a throb of unconfessed anguish. But he hid his feelings under an iron mask. It was only when no human eye saw him that he stole, just once, into the darkened parlor where they had laid the dead darling, and touched its tiny morsels of hands, and kissed its little, white, piteous face with a dumb sense of loss keener than any thing he had ever felt before.

But he said no word of sorrow, or sympathy, or consolation to the poor young wife, wrestling alone with the bitterness of her heart-break. He only told her that it was sinful to rebel against God's will; and if she "took on" so when she was sick, she would not be likely to get well very soon. And she thought, with something more like scorn than her gentle nature had ever felt before, that he was in a hurry to have her get well because he was unwilling to pay for hired service any longer. From excusing him for every thing, she had gone to the other extreme, and did him less than justice; for, apart from all economical considerations, he really had a strong desire to see her well; to have her face—that young, pretty face—opposite him again at his meals, and when he sat down at nightfall. Alas! it would never again be the bright face it had been when he brought it there a year ago.

She got well in time—the lonely, disappointed little thing—went again about her household tasks, sadder and less trustful than before, but still gentle. It was then, so long ago, that meek endurance began to write its lines upon her face. She did not grow feeble or helpless, however. Her cares and burdens served to develop in her new powers of endurance. She grew efficient; fell into the ordinary routine of the hard-working New England farmer's wife of forty years ago; less angular, perhaps; less self-asserting than most; less roughened by the rough details of her life; soft-spoken and meek-spirited, as stronger neighbors used to call her.

Other children came to her after that; but for nearly twenty years none of them lived much beyond babyhood. Somehow she never expected they would. That first loss she had accepted as a prophecy of her destiny. If that first child—so loved, so waited for—had not found its love and welcome strong enough to hold it back from the land of the angels, how was any other to be wiled into staying with her? I do not think she ever tasted again quite the bitterness of that first grief, though over five more little graves, side by side with the first one, white snows of winter fell and summer wild-flowers blossomed.

At last, when she was nearly forty years old, and had been more than twenty years a wife, her seventh child came. By some singular presentiment she felt, when she looked at it, that this child would live. She did not read in its eyes the shadow of coming doom, as she had in those of the others. She felt her heart quicken into a sudden tumult of rapture as she held the little one to her bosom, and thanked God for this comfort for her old age!

Superstitious crones talked of the luck of odd numbers, and the peculiar luck attending always a seventh child; and it truly seemed as if all the fairies had brought good gifts to the little one's christening. Her mother named her Winifred, after her own mother, dead and gone. Adam Gibson did not interfere. He had grown used, so it seemed, to births and burials, and he let his timid wife have quite her own way with the blossoms that slept such brief while upon her bosom.

Contrary to his expectations, but in accordance with the belief the mother had all along cherished, the little Winifred grew up toward her girlhood as bright and winsome a child as ever gladdened any household.

There was something in the sight of the wee little figure toddling round, under every body's feet, yet never in the way—something in the sound of the clear-piping little voice calling him father, that stirred Adam Gibson's heart as it had never been stirred before, unless it were in that long-past and half-forgotten summer when his love for the child's mother had blossomed, and spent its lavish sweetness on the summer air, and with the autumn died, as it seemed, like all its summer sisters. Yet, despite his love for his child—a love stronger and more deeply inwoven in his nature than he knew—there was, almost from the first, a sort of antagonism between him and the little one. She was a bright, resolute, willful sprite, with a temper as dominant as his own looking out of her large, wide-opened eyes. To her mother's gentle sway she always yielded instant obedience: indeed, there was something curiously soothing and protecting in her manner toward her almost from babyhood. No one must sit in mother's chair, no one must gather mother's flowers, or interfere with any of mother's comforts; and her very manner of obedience seemed to say:

"Surely I'll do it if you wish. You shall have it all your own way, poor dear. I wouldn't cross you for the world."

But she never seemed to recognize her father's right to command her. He tried to punish her once or twice, but was met, for the first time in his life, by remonstrance from his wife, so passionate that he was startled into abandoning his purpose, and for the most part giving up all efforts to interfere with her gentle government.

The child loved him dearly too, but not at all in the way she loved her mother. She took such liberties with him as no one would have thought he would have endured for a moment, and he found that he rather liked her merry teasing. Still there was an uneasy consciousness in his heart that he was not her master—that her will had never bent itself to his—which deepened as she grew toward womanhood, and kept alive, despite of tender love, that subtle antagonism which would break out by-and-by, perhaps, into tyranny on one side, and revolt on the other.

It was a better sight than most pictures to see Winnie Gibson when she was eighteen. She was taller and more fully developed than her mother had ever been, yet with all her mother's flower-like delicacy. Her large, fearless, innocent eyes had a power in them which never had looked out of Rachel's. It would not be easy to quell that spirit, or break down that resolute will. Her mother had thought often how strong the girl's will was, with restless anxiety, and a secret self-blame, because she had not striven, when she was younger, to break it; as if there had ever been a time since the bairn was old enough to say Mother when she had not been queen and Rachel helplessly subject.

She heard a gush of song outside one summer afternoon, as she sat thinking, as usual, about Winnie, and lamenting her own easy rule. She could not help a smile of pride as she listened to the full, rich voice—a smile which deepened as the girl came in, brightening the room with her glad, young beauty. She walked about for a few moments, putting things to rights a little, with a curious fidgeting air quite unusual to her. Then suddenly she came and knelt down at her mother's side.

"Do you love me much?" she asked, coaxingly.

"You know that as well as I do, darling."

"Will you miss me, then, when I am gone?"

"Gone!" A sudden dismay struck to Rachel Gibson's heart, and made her cheek pale. She remembered six graves: were the angels going to call for this child also?

"Yes, gone, mother darling! I have promised this afternoon to leave you some time—to go away with James Ransom."

"Go away with James Ransom!" the mother repeated after her, slowly, aghast with dismay. "Child, are you mad? Your father will never let you—never. Don't you know that he hates old John Ransom with a life-long hatred? Don't you know that Adam Gibson never changes, never forgives?"

"I don't know that James Ransom is any worse because he is John Ransom's son. As for father, if you think he won't let me marry James, why, I think I won't ask him."

The worst side of the girl's nature was uppermost then. A fierce fire blazed in her eyes, which made you think of some wild creature at bay. Her mother was completely overpowered; her feeble resistance, her weak power of self-assertion, all swept away, as when some impetuous stream overflows its banks and scatters ruin and wreck over peaceful homes. It was just as well, perhaps, that she sat in such dumb silence, for any words would but have kindled Winifred's passion to fiercer heat.

After a while the girl was frightened. She thought her mother seemed as if she were turning to stone. She began to chafe her hands and kiss her, in an agony of remorseful love and sorrow.

"Don't, mother," she cried; "don't look so. Only speak to me. I will not go against my father any more than I can help: only, if there is nothing to be said against James, it would not be right for me to give him up just because my father and his don't like each other."

"You must let me tell him to-night, Winnie, and see what he says. Until after that don't let us talk about it. It frightens me. Sit down here beside me, and let me forget the bad news a while, and think you are my own little Winnie, that used to love me so."

"That does love you so, mother," whispered the girl, with soothing fondness; "that would die before any one should harm one hair of your head."

The next morning Winnie's eyes sought her mother's face anxiously. She could gather from it little hope. Rachel was pale and silent. Adam Gibson, too, ate his breakfast without an unnecessary word; and Winnie did not run after him, as he went out to his farm, with any kisses, or merry, teasing ways, as her wont was. The spell of silence seemed to have fallen on her also. She helped her mother quietly to clear away the breakfast things and do up the morning's work, and not till the two had sat down together in the still house did she ask a question. Then it came, anxiously, pleadingly:

"What did father say? Are you never going to tell me, mother?"

"It is no use, Winnie. You must give it up. He will never consent—never."

"Give it up!" A smile, just touched with scornful pity, flickered across Winnie's lips. "You don't understand what you say. I could no sooner give up James Ransom than you could give me up, mother. I love him."

Blank terror whitened for a moment Rachel's face, and looked out of her sad eyes. Then all grew dark, and her head fell back against the cushions of her chair, in a dead faint. Winnie sprang to her side, and tried half a dozen simple means of restoration, trembling herself with fear for the consequences of what she had done.

The swoon did not last long. Very soon the mother opened her eyes, and said, faintly,

"It was nothing. I shall be better in a moment."

When she was sitting up again, and Winnie was kneeling beside her, begging her forgiveness with the quick, impulsive penitence of her passionate nature, she brushed back the girl's brown hair with a tender touch, as she said,

"I never yet had any thing to forgive in you, Winnie. Ever since I have had you you have been good to me. I do not blame you for this. You could not help loving him, I suppose; and there seems no justice in asking you to give him up because your father and his can't agree. Still, it's a dreadful thing to go right against your father's will. It will separate you from me; for I don't think he would ever let you come into the house again."

"Nothing can truly separate us, mother, for we shall always love each other."

"Ay! but what should I do without you all the long days? For eighteen years you have never been one day away from me. How could I live in this still house and never hear you laugh or speak, or see your face, or have kiss or smile from your lips? Oh, child, child!"

Winnie's dark eyes swam in tears. She drew her mother's head to her bosom with the old air of protection which had been so ludicrous when she was a little toddling thing.

"There! don't grieve," she said, soothingly; "I will stay with you, at least for a while. I am only eighteen now. When I am twenty-one I shall have a legal right to take my own course. Till then I will obey my father. So cheer up, darling! you are sure of me for three years. This afternoon I will see James and tell him so."

"But I shall be keeping you from happiness, and your heart won't be here even if you are."

"Yes, it will, mother; you shall find no change in me. It is best to do it. Since father opposes me, I ought not to resist him till I am older. We are young, James and I, and we can afford a little waiting."

That night, just at twilight, Winifred came in, a strange look upon her face—a light in her eyes proud but sad. She did not speak, for her father sat at the table. She waited until something called her mother into the next room. Then she followed her.

"I have told James, mother, and he is going to enlist for the next three years. So we will be happy together as we used to be, you and I. The poor boy will be out of the way."

"But if you lose him! If he should be killed!"

"He will not be, mother! I am not bad enough to need such discipline. The great Father pities his children, and he will let me have James back again in safety. I shall not allow myself to fear. I am glad he is going. I shall love him better, and be prouder of him all my life, for doing this work for his country."

"Did you tell the girl what I said?" Adam Gibson asked, gruffly, in his own room with his wife that night.

"Not all. I told her that you would never consent, and she has told him. He is going to enlist for three years. He will be out of your way; but I warn you if he dies it will kill Winnie."

"Girls don't die so easy—or didn't when I was young. Don't worry. Before the three years are out we shall have her married off to somebody better worth having."

Rachel did not contradict him, but she wondered that he did not understand better the steadfast, persistent nature inherited from his own. The very same element of character which made it impossible for him to forgive John Ransom would make it impossible for his daughter to cease from loving John Ransom's son.

That was the fall of '61. Men had begun to find the Great Rebellion a very real and earnest thing, and were rising up to crush it; making preparations on a very different scale from what they had at first imagined would be necessary. The regiment which James Ransom joined belonged to the Army of the Potomac, and was destined to see some of the fiercest fighting of the war.

Winnie had promised that her mother should find no change in her. But she could not quite make good her words. There was no diminution of affection, indeed; no lack of the tender thoughtfulness with which—seeming even from childhood to understand all the untold sorrow of her mother's lot—she had always striven to lighten her burdens. But the merry girl, full of song and frolic and the exuberant life of youth, was gone; and, in her stead, an anxious woman moved silently around the house, making no complaints, saying nothing of her hopes and fears, but studying newspapers, shivering at rumors of battles, and gentle with a sad, pitiful gentleness more pathetic than words.

Adam Gibson never once mentioned to his child the name of James Ransom, but he tried hard to be kind to her in his own way. He bought her handsome clothes, which she never wore; gave her money, which went all of it to buy comforts for soldiers far away, or their bereaved wives and children at home; sometimes tried to provoke her to her old manner of teasing playfulness, but never succeeded. She was perfectly respectful to him, more obedient than she had ever been before; but, beyond the formal kiss at night and morning, when her cold lips just touched his cheek, never affectionate. I think that hard, unyielding heart of his grew hungry, sometimes, to see her as she used to be. Perhaps he repented himself of what he had done; but, if so, he made no sign.

So the years went on. James Ransom never came home, and no one ever talked about him in the house of Adam Gibson. Once or twice Rachel had tried to speak some comforting word about him to her child; but the pale pain of Winnie's face, the stillness of her unresponsive lips, had silenced her. Whether the girl ever heard of him no one knew; if she did, she kept her own secrets.

In the early spring of '64 nearly all his regiment re-enlisted, and were home on furlough; but James Ransom was not among them. Rachel guessed by this that he expected to claim his bride in the fall, and was not ready to postpone it any longer. So far Winnie's belief in his safety had been justified. He had had, they heard through village rumor, a few slight wounds, never any thing serious—and he had been in all the battles.

With the commencement of the campaign of '64 would come a new trial, the last and fiercest. Even Winifred, knowing what lay before the gallant army marching on in the way thrice soaked in vain already with the most precious blood of the country, even she lost something of her faith, and grew so weak with fear that the sudden rustle of a paper, or the swift flight of a bird across a window, would unnerve her.

She was standing by the table one day in May, doing some of her customary household tasks, when her father came in. Whether he had taken her silence with regard to James Ransom for the silence of forgetfulness, or whether he was urged on by some fierce impulse to let her know at once that all her hopes were over, I know not. At any rate, addressing his wife, but looking straight at Winifred, he said, "Mother, James Ransom is dead. He was killed in the battle of the 12th of May."

As silently and helplessly as if she had been shot through the heart Winnie fell to the floor. Her mother sprang to her side, but paused an instant, even before she lifted up the dear head, to utter her cry of indignation:

"How dare you, Adam Gibson, to say the Lord's Prayer night and morning, and ask God to forgive you as you forgive those who trespass against you? Do you want to be forgiven as you have forgiven John Ransom? You are a hard man; you have been hard to me for forty years, and I have borne it in silence; but if you have killed my child, may God forgive you, for I can not!"

He was stricken to silence—partly, perhaps, by his own terror at what he had done, and still more by the fierce wrath of the meek-spirited woman, who had been to him for forty years the embodiment of silent submission and long-suffering. He stood by without a word while she loosened the girl's dress, and bathed her forehead, and chafed her hands. Then he lifted her up tenderly as if she had been an infant, and carried her in his arms to her own room.

She was not dead, for her pulses stirred languidly, and her breath feebly came and went; but she took no nourishment, spoke no word, made no answer, even when her mother called her name.

So she lay for three weary days and nights, with her mother's mild, patient face bending, full of anguish, over her pillow. In those days years seemed to have done their work on Adam Gibson. He grew gray and old, and his wiry figure seemed to bend like a tree before some sudden blast.

The fourth day he came in from some errand which had taken him to the village, with a look of strange excitement replacing the blank despair of his face. He beckoned his wife from the room where she kept vigil beside Winifred.

"Mother," he said, hoarsely, "he is not dead after all. That first report was false. He was wounded and taken prisoner, and now he has been exchanged with a number more of the wounded. They say he won't die, and John Ransom is going on to bring him home. They are giving furloughs to those of the wounded who can bear to be moved, because the hospitals are so full that they'll get better care at home. Will his coming save Winnie's life?"

"What is the use of his coming home, or of saving Winnie's life, when you've set your will up that she sha'n't have him? Better let them both die. Maybe they'll come together in heaven; for it's my belief that the Heavenly Father is kinder than earthly ones are."

"But I am not set against them, mother—not now. Your words went home, Rachel—went home. I am a humbled man, and I am willing to give in. I will ask John Ransom to forgive me, and let me go with him to bring his boy back. Only tell me, will it be in time to save our girl's life?"

"God grant it may be! Yes, it will be—it must be!" she answered, growing strangely pitiful toward him, now that she saw what a work his grief was doing in breaking down old prejudices, and softening the heart which so many unforgiving years had hardened. She went in then to Winnie, he following. She scarcely hoped to rouse her, but she would make the effort. She bent over the pillow.

"Winnie, Winnie darling, it was not true. It was a mistake. James is not dead, and father is going for him to bring him home to you."

As if fraught with some strange power of penetrating the dulled senses, the life-giving words went home. A smile, wan and faint, but oh! so full of sweetness, flickered across the pale lips, and then they moved, and formed rather than articulated the word "father."

Adam Gibson bent over her, shaken by such a tempest of emotion as he had never known before—a passion of love, and remorse, and hope. He felt her lips touch his face, the first voluntary caress she had given him since he refused to sanction her love: felt it, and then went away to weep, where no human eyes saw him, such tears as he had never wept before; a rain that would soften his heart and make it meet soil for the seeds of hope, and love, and faith.

When he had regained at last his self-control he went up the road that led to John Ransom's house. He found his old enemy in the yard, making some arrangements for his journey. There, under the May sky, with God's peace in the world around them, he went up to John Ransom and put out his hand.

"Forgive me, neighbor. I have been your enemy more than forty years, and called myself your fellow-Christian all the time. Is it too late now for us to begin to be friends?"

His outstretched hand was grasped, and kindness begat kindness, and penitence was the father of penitence. All past faults on both sides were confessed and forgiven; and then Adam Gibson told the story of his child's love and suffering, and asked the question, to him so momentous:

"May I go with you, neighbor, to bring James back? I think I could help you, and I should feel easier if I was doing something for Winnie to make up for the past."

His offer was not rejected, and that very afternoon the two men started to bring Winifred's hero home.

As for her, hope had seemed to penetrate all her veins like an elixir of life. She grew better rapidly, and before the week of their absence was over some pale roses began to bloom on her thin cheeks.

At last they came. The soldier's wound was less severe than they had feared; but, as he was not fit for duty, they had not found it difficult to get for him leave of absence. He came at once to Adam Gibson's house. Even his father was ready to admit that she who had so nearly died for him had the first claim. Triumphant-ly her father led him in—led him to the easy-chair where Winifred sat, too weak to rise even yet. He put their hands together, and said, fervently:

"I give him to you, and you to him, and I pray God to bless you both."

He heard, as he turned away, her low cry of content—"Oh, James! James!"—and perhaps it was the happiest moment he had ever known.

He went out into the other room. John Ransom had gone away to prepare his wife for their boy's home-coming, and Rachel sat there alone. For a moment he looked at her searchingly. With his sight sharpened by self-knowledge, he could read the sad lines which the years had graven on her face. He remembered the bright fresh beauty he had wooed and won; and the old love—not dead all this time, but sleeping—stirred again to the life of youth in his heart. He went to her side and took her hand, making her look at him as he spoke:

"You said I was a hard man, Rachel; that I had been hard to you for forty years; and you said the truth. But our child will live: I have not killed her, and so I may ask you to forgive me. I have not been worthy of your love; but oh! tell me, if you can, that I have not lost it; for never, not even that summer when I won you, did I love you so well as now, my wife, my Rachel!"

She could not speak, but what need of words? Her worn face blushed and brightened with a beauty tenderer than her youth's; her arms—those tired arms, so long empty—fell round his neck; and the lonely heart hushed the throbs of its life-long aching in the rest, won so late, but won at last.

THE FIRST TIME UNDER FIRE.

WE had lain for ten days within hearing of the bombardment of Fort Jackson, within sight of the bursting shells and of the smoke of that great torment, but still we had not as a regiment been under fire. We were the first troops to reach conquered New Orleans; but we had never yet heard the whistling of balls, excepting in a trifling skirmish on Pearl River, where five of our companies received a harmless volley from forty or fifty invisible guerrillas. About all that we knew of war was the routine of drill and guard duty, and the false night alarms with which our brigadier used to try us and season us. No; I am mistaken: we did know what it was to suffer; to wilt under a Southern sun, and be daubed with Louisiana mud; to be sick by hundreds and die by scores.

But now we were to quit garrison duty behind the great earth-works of Camp Parapet, and go into offensive operations. Lieutenant Godfrey Weitzel of the Engineers, the chief military adviser of General Butler, had lately been created Brigadier-General, and the extenuated forces of the department were exhausted to furnish him with a brigade suitable to the execution of the plans which he proposed.

Weitzel did not want the Twelfth Connecticut. It was generally believed that the regiments which garrisoned Camp Parapet were not only sickly but broken in spirit and undisciplined. Sickly I have admitted that we were; but not broken in spirit, except so far as that life, from constant misery, had come to seem hardly desirable, and death, by constant presence, had lost his terrors; while, as to the third charge, I can neither broadly admit nor squarely deny it.

But the word had gone abroad that we were undisciplined, and so General Weitzel did not want the Twelfth Connecticut. Shortly after we joined his brigade he came upon us in one of our battalion drills, and, taking command, hurried us on the double-quick through movement after movement, with the intention, as I verily believe, of puzzling us, and so finding occasion to report us unfit for immediate field service. It was, "Double column at half distance; battalion, inward face; double-quick, march!" And then—"Form square; right and left into line wheel; double-quick, march!" And then—"Reduce square; double-quick, march!" And then—"Column forward, guide right; double-quick, march!" And then—"Deploy column; right companies, right into line wheel; left companies, on the right into line; battalion, guide right, double-quick, ma-r-ch!" And so on for half an hour, as fast as the men could trot and the officers dress the ranks. But there was not an instant's tangle in reeling and unreeling the difficult skein. If there was any thing that our Lieutenant-Colonel commanding loved, if there was any thing that our old General excelled in, it was tactical evolution. We had been drilled in battalion and drilled in brigade till we went like a watch. Weitzel rode off satisfied with the Twelfth Connecticut; and the regiment was equally pleased with its smart young General.

The brigade consisted of the Seventy-fifth New York, Eighth New Hampshire, First Louisiana, and Twelfth and Thirteenth Connecticut, infantry; the Sixth Massachusetts and First Maine batteries; Perkins's company of Massachusetts cavalry, and Barrett's, Godfrey's, and Williamson's companies of Louisiana cavalry, numbering altogether nearly four thousand effective men.

On the 24th of October, 1862, it embarked on some small river steamers, and, convoyed by three gun-boats, sailed one hundred miles up the Mississippi, landing the following day near the once flourishing little town of Donelsonville. Donelsonville is on the right or western bank, astride of the Bayou Lafourche, which is one of the numerous outlets of the Mississippi, and carries off a considerable body of water through the rich district of Lafourche Interieur. The place was in ruins, shattered by shells and half burned—a punishment which had fallen upon it for firing on Farragut's gun-boats. Our regiment slept on the floor of a church, and I ate my supper off a tombstone in the cemetery. At six in the morning, leaving the First Louisiana to hold Donelsonville, we commenced our march, following the bayou in a westerly and then in a southerly direction, one regiment of infantry and one company of cavalry on the right bank, the remainder of the brigade on the left bank. Communication was secured by two gigantic Mississippi flat-boats, easily convertible into a pontoon-bridge, which were towed down the current by mules and contrabands.

This was the first night that our regiment passed out of doors. I thought I never should get to sleep. I had a bed of cornstalks, but I believed I was roughing it. It was the dreadful exposure to the night air which worried me, and not the proximity of hostile balls and bayonets. And when I was roused at five in the morning to continue the march, I actually felt more fearful of being broken down by want of proper rest than of being shot in the approaching engagement. How mistaken our mothers were when they warned us against exposure to night air, and sleeping in damp clothing, and going with wet feet! Judging from a two-years' experience of almost constant field-service, I aver that these things are wholesome and restorative. It does not require a strong constitution to stand them; it is sleeping inside of walls which ought properly to be called exposure, and which demands a vigorous vitality; and it is the crowning triumph of civilization that it enables humanity to do this without extermination. I have a screed to deliver some day on this subject to a misguided and house-poisoned public.

Meantime our General was unable to sleep, in his anxiety about the struggle which he knew would come on the morrow. It would be his first battle, and not one of his regiments had ever been under fire. About four o'clock in the morning he recollected that he had no corps of engineers to cut down the levee, in case it should be necessary to pass cavalry and artillery across the bayou. He ordered a body of soldiers and contrabands to be detailed for that purpose, and had them furnished with spades, picks, and axes. Was that all? He ran over his preparations, and found them complete; so, lying down in his trooper's over-coat, he slept till the column started.

This day (Monday, October 27, 1862) the Eighth New Hampshire and Perkins's Massachusetts cavalry were on the right bank of the bayou, parallel with the head of the main column. It was prudent to keep our principal force on the left bank, because that afforded the broadest and directest line of retreat in case of a repulse. The troops marched as loosely as usual, in the road, on the levee, and all over the lots, taking advantage of every possible cut-off, and presenting an extraordinary contrast to the rank-and-file regularity of movement which the same regiments were brought to after six or eight months more of field duties. We passed pretty, flourishing plantations, and endless flats of waving green sugar-cane. The roads were vacant of vehicles; not an individual of the dominant white race showed his face; but crowds of negroes rushed out with tumultuous simple acclamations of joy. It was "God bless you, massas!—Oh, de Lord's name be praised!—We knowed you'd come!—I'se a gwine 'long with you." And go with us they did by hundreds, ready to do any thing for us, and submitting uncomplainingly to the trickeries and robberies which were practiced upon them by the jokers and scape-graces of the brigade. Looking ahead down the longer stretches of the winding bayou, we could occasionally see the parti-colored flags of the signal corps waving from some conspicuous angle of the levee, as they sent back in silent messages the discoveries of the advanced scouts. As on the day previous, we came across a freshly-deserted bivouac of the rebels, and we learned from the negroes that they numbered about five hundred, chiefly cavalry or mounted infantry. I, for one, expected no engagement, not knowing that these troopers were hastening to join a force of about two thousand infantry and artillery which General Mouton had collected at Thibodeaux, the capital of the Lafourche district. Moreover our regiment formed the rear of the column, and I, as officer of the day, marched with the rear-guard of the regiment, so that I seemed to be far away from all chances of battle.

Then came a story that the fighting had been going on in front for more than an hour, and that the Thirteenth Connecticut had already lost seventy men; which, by-the-way, was only one of the numerous false rumors that fly broadcast like grape-shot through every combat; the losses being trifling up to this time, and the Thirteenth not having yet been engaged.

I learned afterward that the affair commenced in this manner: A sergeant and four or five men of Perkins's cavalry, scouting ahead of the Eighth New Hampshire, passed an open field a quarter of a mile in length, and came next to a wood filled with underbrush, the road running between this and the levee of the bayou. Here one of the troopers whispered, "Sergeant, there they are—to the right—lying down." The sergeant turned his eyes without turning his head, and saw ranks of men in dirty gray and butter-nut uniforms stretched on their faces in the wood, nearly concealed by the leafy undergrowth. Rising in his stirrups, he looked ostentatiously in every other direction, and called out, "I don't see any thing; let's go back and report." Turning with assumed carelessness, they went away at a walk until they reached a distance of ten or fifteen rods, when they broke at full gallop for the head of the column. One of the rebels, whom we took in the subsequent battle, remarked: "If that sergeant hadn't been so steady he would have caught his death-cold. I had a bead drawn on him; but the officers wouldn't let us fire. They thought the coons didn't see us, and they allowed they was going to bag the whole column."

Perkins immediately deployed his men as skirmishers, and opened fire on the ambush. The rebels returned it vigorously, throwing out a heavy force of sharpshooters, and bringing up four pieces of artillery to the angle of the wood, where they took position behind a cover of greenery. The horses of this artillery were mistaken for cavalry, and the Eighth New Hampshire formed square, after sending out two companies as skirmishers to support Perkins. On the other side of the bayou Weitzel promptly formed the Seventy-fifth New York and Thirteenth Connecticut in columns by battalion, and pushed them forward to find the force which he supposed must be in front of his main body. But this force, the rebel right wing, was not large, and was held back out of action, waiting for eventualities. The Seventy-fifth and Thirteenth wearied themselves in vain with struggling through interminable green cane-fields, which broke up the formations of the columns, and even of the companies, compelling them to halt and reorganize.

"This is a false scent," said Weitzel. "The fighting will be on the other side."

The two regiments received orders to hurry back, the Thirteenth to go to the support of the Eighth, and the Seventy-fifth to hold the approaches to the crossing. The engineer corps organized in the morning was set to work cutting a road through the levee; the unwieldy pontoon-bridge was swung into position, and two 12-pound howitzers placed to command it. At the same time an aid was sent to the Twelfth Connecticut with instructions to throw off knapsacks, leave two companies to protect the baggage train, and hasten up to join in the attack.

Here let me pause to remark that the little battle of Labadieville was the most scientific combat, or at least the very luckiest one in regard to combinations effecting their logical results, that I ever witnessed. It is as an illustration of two great military principles, the value of time and the value of concentration, that it is chiefly interesting. To exhibit this I must state the enemy's position, forces, and intentions. I have already observed that his right wing, posted on the left bank of the bayou, and consisting of a regiment of infantry and a battery of six field-pieces, was held well back, or, in military parlance, refused, being probably meant to merely amuse our main column. His centre, on the right bank, was composed of four field-pieces, a regiment of Lafourche militia, and two regiments of veterans from Bragg's army, lately sent home to recruit. His left wing, five hundred cavalry and two field-pieces, was at this moment making a large circuit by a country road, with the idea of coming upon the rear of the Eighth New Hampshire. The whole force amounted to twenty-three, or possibly twenty-five hundred men, while ours numbered a trifle over three thousand, a part of which was necessarily kept out of action to guard our long train of baggage. Mouton's plan was an excellent one. He did not mean that his weak right wing should fight seriously, unless it should be necessary to keep his centre from being flanked or turned. His veterans were to repulse the Eighth New Hampshire, and his cavalry was to cut off its escape. There was only one flaw; he knew nothing of the pontoon-bridge. The whole question was whether Weitzel could concentrate his main force against Mouton's centre and break it before the cavalry of the latter could get into action on our rear.

And now, while the rebel skirmishers are slowly driving back the skirmishers of the Eighth, I will return to my own regiment. When we received orders to move forward I obtained permission of the colonel to quit the rear-guard and take command of my company. With drums beating, fifes screaming, and banners floating, we hurried on, listening to the slow dropping of artillery two miles distant. I was anxious, but so far only for my men, not knowing how they would behave in this their first battle. I commenced a rough and ready joking with them, not because I was gay, but because I wanted them to be gay. I have forgotten what I said; it was poor, coarse fun enough probably; but it answered the purpose.

Well, the light-hearted, reckless, yet steady countenance of the company, and of the whole regiment, was all that one could desire. We found the pontoon-bridge in position, and the two howitzers which protected it firing slowly, while an unseen rebel battery answered it with equal deliberation. Here we first came under fire, and here I first saw a wounded man. In a country carriage, upheld by two negroes, was some sufferer, his knee crushed by a shot, his torn trowsers soaked with a dirty crimson, his face a ghastly yellow, and his eyes looking the agony of death. I did not want my men to see the dismaying spectacle, and called their attention to something, I have forgotten what, which was passing on the other side of the bayou. As we rushed down the inner slope of the levee an amazingly loud, harsh scream passed over us, followed by a sharp explosion and a splashing in the water. I was not alarmed, but rather relieved and gratified. If they can't aim better than that, I simply thought, they are welcome to fire all day. Then came another shell, striking close to the crowded bridge and splashing the men, but without deterring the thirsty ones from stopping to fill their canteens. It was wonderfully fine practice, considering that they were aiming at us from behind the levee, half a mile down the stream, where the fellows who worked the guns could not see us. I remember that my chief anxiety while crossing was lest I should wet my feet in the sloppy bottom of the flat-boat. The terror of battle is not, I think, an abiding impression, but one that comes and goes like throbs of pain; and this is especially the case with veteran soldiers, who have learned to know when there is danger and when there is not; the moment an instantaneous peril has passed they are as cool as if it had never approached. But on the present occasion, I repeat, I was not oppressed by any feeling which could be called even alarm. I was buoyed up by the physical excitement of rapid movement, by my anxiety that my company should do well, and by my ignorance of the profounder, the really tremendous horrors into which battle may develop. A regiment of well-drilled greenhorns, if neatly brought into action, can charge as brilliantly as veterans.

The moment we were up the opposite bank the battery ceased firing at us, having lost sight of us on account of an intervening wood, although we were now on the same side of the bayou. We saw the Eighth New Hampshire coming toward us, retreating in double column, ready to form square at a moment's warning. As we pushed straight on into the fields, marching by the flank, an aid rode up with orders.

"Colonel, the General says the Eighth will be on your left. Move more to the right, and give it room to deploy. Throw out skirmishers to the front, and follow them through the woods in line of battle. Beyond the wood is an open field. You will cross that and drive the enemy from his position."

Two companies immediately moved out as skirmishers, which, as most people now know, is a scattered formation, the men marching in one rank and five paces apart. The remaining six companies continued their course until nearly a quarter of a mile from the bayou, when they fronted into line of battle. Concealed by the wood the line advanced deliberately, while the two hostile batteries passed the time in pounding away at each other, although neither could see the other's position. Emerging from a field of dry, rustling reeds we came to a strong post-and-rail fence made of cypress, such as one meets all over Southern Louisiana.

"Down with the fence!" shouted our commander. "Throw it over, men!"

Some rushed against it and pushed it flat in places, while others climbed over it. Now came a scattered underbrush of thorn thickets which embarrassed and confused us prodigiously. The best-disciplined troops will not come up to the scratch in good order when it is a case of charging brambles and briars. Great gaps opened and closed again. The Lieutenant-Colonel was continually yelling, "Centre dress! Close up that gap! Centre dress, men!" And the company officers were howling the same orders. In our inexperience we believed that all was lost if the regiment did not march shoulder to shoulder as if it were on review; and from here onward, all the way through the battle, we labored for a straight line with an anxiety of pre-occupation which greatly supported our courage.

"By the right of companies to the front!" the Lieutenant-Colonel presently commanded, and the regiment filed into six little parallel columns, each moving by the flank—a most convenient formation for threading the thorny labyrinth. When we reached clearer ground it was, "Halt; front; right into line wheel; forward, guide centre!" And once more we advanced in line of battle.

Just as we reached the wood which covered our advance the skirmishing companies dropped back upon us and fell into line, the senior officer reporting his discoveries. "Colonel, the enemy are something more than a quarter of a mile ahead of us. They are on the other side of a long open lot, behind a fence which lines a cross-road, and protected by a ditch in which they are lying."

"Oh!" roared an Irish soldier of mine, "they've got all the advantage of us."

"Hold your tongue, you blockhead!" said I, fearing he would discourage his comrades. "Do you want all the advantages yourself?"

"No, Captain, I don't; but I want some kind of fair play; an' I don't see the harrum of sayin' so."

As we approached the edge of the wood nearest the enemy they caught sight of us, and a shell screamed over our heads, passing through the lower branches, and sending down a shower of leaves. Nearly the whole regiment bowed low and gracefully, but without halting or breaking. Stepping to the front, I turned round and laughed at my men, saying, "I beg your pardon for not bowing when you did; the truth is, I did not think of it till it was too late." This was pure bravado, not characteristic of me, I hope, but suggested by the fear that my new soldiers were getting frightened, and intended to restore their spirits. Poor as the joke was it actually made them laugh; so slight was their anxiety, if any.

The shells came fast now, a majority of them screeching over the colors, at which they were evidently aimed. Not only were the four guns directly in front of us booming rapidly, but Sims's battery, half a mile down the bayou, and on the other side, was pitching his iron about us at a venture. Meantime our own two howitzers, the only ones as yet brought into action by Weitzel, had ceased firing, so as not to interfere with our advance. I remember that this damped my spirits at the time, although it was of course absolutely necessary. Each shot came lower than the last, and I thought calmly, They will hit something soon. I did not attempt to dodge. I reflected that a missile would hit me about the same time that I should hear it. I believed that the eyes of all my soldiers were upon me (whereas they were probably looking only for the enemy); and so, for reason's sake and example's sake, I kept my head steadfast. It cost me no great effort. I had no nervous inclination to duck, no involuntary twitching or trembling; I was not aware of any painful quickening of the pulse; in short, I was not frightened. I thought to myself, It is very possible that they will hit me, but I hope not, and I think not. It seemed to me the most natural thing in the world that others should be killed, and that I should not. I have suffered more in every engagement since than I did in this first trial. It is a frequent, it is the usual experience.

And here came a severe test of discipline and courage; another stout post-and-rail fence to overthrow. "Now then, Twelfth," shouted the Lieutenant-Colonel, "I told you to break that last fence down, and you climbed over it. Down with this one! Go at it and flatten it. Forward, battalion, double-quick!"

With a shout and a rush we flung our breasts against the fence, laying it prostrate throughout nearly our whole front—excepting that the extreme right company, floundering ankle-deep in a swamp, was obliged to climb it, while the two left companies were also balked in their charge by a long thicket of thorn-bushes. "By the right flank!" shouted the Captains, and they filed around the obstacle; then, "By company into line!" and they came up into position on the run. But these circumstances caused a disorganizing crush toward the centre; and to the anxious eyes of the Lieutenant-Colonel the regiment looked as if it were going to pieces. "Halt!" he commanded; "guides on the line; centre dress!" The company guides threw themselves forward, faced toward the centre, brought their pieces to a present and aligned themselves, as is usual in correcting the front of a regiment. But time and circumstances pressed, and the next order, "Guides, posts; forward, battalion; guide centre!" came almost immediately, causing us to advance before the line was fairly rectified.

We were just entering a large open field, dotted by a few trees and thorn-bushes, with a swampy forest on the right and the levee of the bayou on the left, when the rebels gave us their musketry. It was not a volley, but a file fire—it was a long rattle like that which a boy makes in running with a stick along a picket-fence, only vastly louder; and at the same time the sharp, quick whit whit of bullets chippered close to our ears. In the field little puffs of dust jumped up here and there; on the other side of it a long, low blue roll of smoke curled upward; to the right of it the gray smoke of the artillery arose in a thin cloud; but no other vestige of an enemy was visible.

About this time the First Lieutenant of Company D was surprised at seeing two of his men fall down and roll over each other. To his mind they seemed to be struggling which should get undermost, and thus find shelter from the bullets. "Get up! get into the ranks!" he commanded, hitting the uppermost with the flat of his sabre. One of them silently pointed to a bloody hole in his trousers and lay quiet; the other rose with a mazed air, looked about for his rifle, picked it up and ran after the company. A bullet had struck this man's piece, dashed it against him with such force as to knock him down, glanced, and passed through the thigh of his comrade.

The First Lieutenant of Company G had his hand on the shoulder of a laggard, pushing him forward into the ranks, when a fragment of a shell struck the man in the breast, passing downward through his body and killing him instantly. Private Judson of Company C flung up both hands with a loud scream and dropped dead with a ball in his heart. A shot through the foot disabled the left corporal of my company. A bullet struck the rifle of the man next me in the rear rank, knocking it off his shoulder, end over end, several feet distant. Picking it up he showed me the now useless lock, and asked me what he should do. "Fetch it along," I said, "you may have a chance to use the bayonet; we shall be up there presently." Bringing it to a right-shoulder-shift he fell into his place and made the charge in that manner. On the right of me a sharp crash, as of dry bones broken by a hatchet, drew my attention, and, looking that way, I saw Edwards, one of the color-bearers, fall slowly backward, raising one hand to his mouth as the blood spirted from it; an "Oh!" of pain or alarm burst from his lips, and in his eyes there was a stare of woeful amazement.

I had expected that such sights as this would be most depressing and terrible. It was not so; it was not even painful; it hardly seemed unnatural; it only produced a feeling of surprise. Kelley of the color guard, one of our Louisiana recruits, seized the Stars and Stripes from the fallen man's hand and bore them onward, calmly chewing his tobacco.

All this time we were subjected to both cannon and musketry without being allowed to respond, which is the severest of all the trials of battle. "Oh dear! when shall we fire?" I heard one of the color corporals exclaim in a voice of real anguish; and there was a general feeling of relief when the Lieutenant-Colonel's clear, metallic voice rang out, "Fire by file! commence firing!" The men could not wait to fire by file, which is a graduated discharge, running from the right to the left of each company; they brought down those four hundred rifles together, and sent one crashing, magnificent volley into the hostile line of smoke which fronted them; for as yet we could see no other sign of an enemy. The next second every one was loading his piece with such a frenzied haste as if his life depended on the rapidity of the operation. Suddenly I was amazed and disgusted at seeing the two centre companies fall on their faces. Drawing my sword and turning upon the man nearest me, I shouted, "You miserable coward, if you don't get up I'll split your head open." "We were ordered to lie down," he answered; and one of my lieutenants corroborated the statement. I looked around in doubt. "It can't be," I said; "the right of the regiment is moving; and there is the Colonel just behind it."

The men fell into line again, and the dropping file fire had commenced in our ranks when I and every one near me heard distinctly a loud order to lie down. Down we went, all the more smartly, I think, because at that instant a shell flew between the colors with a deafening, hoarse screech as if the rebels had fired a brace of mad catamounts at us. I remember that I laughed at the nervous haste of my plunge, and that I saw one of my men laughing also as he went down, probably for similar reason. In my boyhood I have ducked in the same way, and with very much the same laugh, in escaping from a particularly swift snow-ball.

"Forward!" we heard the Colonel shout; and springing up we advanced. It was our last stop. The men were excited, but not frightened. On they went, file-firing, straight toward the enemy, in the teeth of cannon and musketry. There was a heavy pressure from right to left toward the colors; some of my small men were crowded out of their places; we were three ranks deep instead of two. As little Sweeny dodged along the rear, trying to find a crack in the living, advancing wall to poke his gun through, one of my officers twice collared him and dragged him back to his place, saying, "What the — and — are you doing on the right of the company?"

"Lieutenant," was the ready answer, "I am up here pertectin' thim colors."

The swearing mania was irrepressible; nothing but oaths could express our feelings. I was not a profane man; I never swore at one of my company before that day; but at that moment I had a gift. In the rage of the charge, in the red presence of slaughter, it seemed as if every possible extremity of mere language was excusable, provided it would aid in gaining victory. A serious friend has asked me since if I did not think of eternity. Not once. I was anxious for nothing but to keep a steady line and to reach the enemy's position. I did not, as I previously supposed I should, urge my soldiers to fight desperately and fire rapidly. They were fighting well enough and firing fast enough. Nearly all that I said might be summed up as repetitions of the two orders, "Close up" and "Guide right." I even swore at one of the color corporals for being out of line, although the man had simply dropped back a pace in the process of loading.

I acted against the rules when I kept my place in the front rank after the firing had commenced; but I had two lieutenants to keep order in the rear, and I thought it best to let the men see one of their officers. Marching in this position, in the centre of the regiment, I noticed that the line had assumed a convex form, the rapid advance of the colors drawing the middle companies slightly ahead of the flank ones. And here, looking away to the left, I saw the Eight New Hampshire in confusion and dropping behind us like an exploded steamer losing headway. It was partly the enemy's fire which had broken them, they being directly in front of the battery and suffering much more than we;

but, far more than that, it was an unfortunate formation of the regiment "by inversion," the result of which was to spoil the working of the delicate tactical machinery. The Eighth was a noble body of men, and distinguished itself subsequently at Port Hudson in a most heroic manner, losing more than one-half its numbers in a single assault.

Weitzel, who was riding close at our heels, smoking a cigar and surveying every thing with the coolness of an outsider, saw the disaster, and hurried up the Thirteenth Connecticut to relieve the staggering regiment. Meantime we went on alone, keeping up our file-fire and gradually straightening our line. Several times I thought impatiently, Shall we ever get there? shall we ever be among them? I believed that there would, of course, be a bayonet struggle, not knowing then that hand-to-hand combats exist mainly in newspapers.

The field, I have said, was a quarter of a mile long. We had passed over one-half of it before I saw a single man of the hostile force; and their cannon I did not see at all, so well were they masked by shrubbery, although I could perceive the puffs of smoke which they gave out when discharged. Numbers of men in the regiment never laid eyes on a rebel during the whole action. The first troops that we caught sight of were probably the Lafourche militia, Mouton's reserve, which came down the cross-road on a run to reinforce the threatened position. As soon as they got in our front they commenced firing irregularly, without halting or forming, then broke suddenly in a panic, rushing into the thickets in their rear, and disappearing in a most rapid, harmless manner. This I did not see, for it happened opposite our right wing, and my eyes were set straight forward. But when we had got half across the field I became aware that the hostile battery had ceased firing; and immediately thereafter I perceived a crowd of men spring up from behind the fence in front of us, plunge across the road, and sweep into the forest, seeming to be actually jumping over each other in their haste, and looking, in their gray uniforms, like an immense flock of sheep swarming over a fence. At this sight our regiment raised a spontaneous yell of triumph, and quickened, if possible, the fury of its fire.

Just then a tremendous volley, the voice of the Thirteenth Connecticut coming into action, rang out somewhat in rear of our left. It was given contrary to the orders of the Colonel, but the sight of the escaping enemy was too strong a temptation. On we went, smack up to the fence, yelling with excitement and blazing away at the woods, although every living rebel had disappeared. It was all that our Lieutenant-Colonel, aided by his company officers, could do to halt the regiment. I was in a state of amazement at what seemed to me the feeble resistance of the enemy, and was far from supposing that we had broken his main force and won the battle.

"Can't this firing be stopped?" I said, anxiously, to the Lieutenant-Colonel. "Are we not wasting our ammunition on a mere party of skirmishers?"

"Cease firing!" he ordered, riding down the line. And with some difficulty quiet was restored.

"Can't the regiment push into the woods?" I now asked. "I am afraid the enemy may re-form there and drive us back again."

Instead of following this suggestion he did better, ordering out two companies as skirmishers to pursue the victory, and directing the officers of the remaining companies to re-form and count off their men. If I had not been an inexperienced soldier I should not have undertaken to press advice upon my superior officer; it was the natural eagerness and simplicity of a green-horn which led me to rush forward in this officious manner.

We had scarcely straightened our ranks when we heard a cheer from the Thirteenth, now formed on our left, and saw Weitzel in front of them making a speech. What he said to them I could not hear, but his address to us was a very compendium of practical instruction.

"Twelfth Connecticut," he spoke, in answer to our congratulatory hurrah, "you have done well. That is the way to do it. Never stop, and the enemy won't stop."

"That is the best speech I ever heard in my life," one of my men remarked.

"Three cheers for General Weitzel!" yelled an excited corporal, jumping out of the ranks and swinging his cap. "Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah!"

Our Lieut-Colonel now spoke. "Twelfth, you have done well," he began; "but not so well as I hoped."

A VOICE. "What did you expect, Colonel? We made them skedaddle."

COLONEL. "Yes, I know that. That was all right. But I wanted you to do it more coolly. After the drilling that you have had I thought you would go through it like a parade. I tried to halt you in the middle of the field to dress the line. I shouted at you with all my force; but I couldn't get you to stop."

VOICES. "We didn't hear a word of it, Colonel."

COLONEL. "I suppose not. I don't see how you could hear when you were yelling so and keeping up such a fire. I never heard such a racket. And now, color guard, why didn't you shake out those colors? There isn't a bullet-hole in them."

COLOR SERGEANT. "We rolled them up to go through the woods, Sir."

COLONEL. "That's all right. But next time let them fly whenever you come to a clear spot. Never mind battle-rents. They only make the old flag more glorious."

There was some grumbling at the unthankful tone of this speech. We thought that we had done our duty as well as could be expected, considering the difficulties of the ground and the fact that it was our first fight. After an experience of forty-three days under fire I am of opinion that I never saw a more dextrous, rapid, and vigorous advance, although I have certainly seen cooler ones.

About this time, just early enough to be too late, the rebel left wing completed its circuit and appeared in our rear. But when it came in sight of the Eighth New Hampshire, which had been led back to meet it, and guessed thereby how the main conflict had gone, it lost heart, and, after firing a few shots across the bayou at our baggage train, hurried off by a roundabout way to rejoin Mouton at Thibodeaux.

The Thirteenth was now started in pursuit of the beaten centre, following up Perkins's cavalry and a section of artillery, the guns of which we could hear booming, farther and farther away, for half an hour afterward. On the road and in the swampy wood behind the rebel position we took a field-piece and nearly three hundred prisoners. The color sergeant of the Crescent Regiment was caught, up to his waist in mire, but he had hid his colors, probably by burying them in the morass; and so the Twelfth failed to secure a rightful trophy.

During the evening my servant arrived with my over-coat, which enabled me to pass the night in a state of half comfort. Our prisoners, clad generally in the coarse cottonade called negro-cloth, suffered severely with cold, especially those whom we had dragged out of the morass. They appropriated without compunction the blankets of their dead comrades and even of their dead colonel. Our own men were as badly off, except that their clothing, being of woolen, was better suited to the temperature. Their blankets and over-coats were with their knapsacks, three miles away, on the other side of the bayou; and such was the difficulty of getting the train across the bridge that our regimental baggage did not arrive till morning; nor could the poor fellows be allowed to go singly after their property for fear of another fight in case the enemy should be reinforced. But after pickets had been thrown out, the rest of the men were allowed to collect rails and build huge camp fires, around which they stood or sat till morning, chewing their hard biscuit, smoking, and bragging endlessly of their victory.

One of the first men whom I beheld in the morning was Edwards, the color-bearer, whom I had seen fall with what I supposed to be a mortal wound, and who now presented himself to claim his colors, having understood that we were to have a second battle. The ball had actually passed through his head, entering the mouth, and coming out behind the left jaw. He simply complained that his mouth was very sore, and that he could eat nothing but soup. He was ordered back to hospital, being evidently too severely hit to do duty; and in fact he had a long illness, the fever of the hurt terminating in typhus. One of the most noticeable things in war is the heroism of the wounded.

Notwithstanding the great length at which I have described the combat of Labadieville, our regimental loss was but two killed and fourteen wounded. Its smallness was owing in part to the rapidity with which we advanced, and the consequent brevity of our exposure to fire, only an hour and twenty minutes elapsing from the time the first shell passed over us to the moment of reaching the fence. It did not seem, by-the-way, fifteen minutes. The entire loss of the brigade was less than ninety killed and wounded, of which about one-half fell to the share of the Eighth New Hampshire.

Allow me now to recall and insist upon the tactical ideas which appeared earlier in this narrative. Weitzel won his little victory by dint of concentration and of promptness of movement; and the possibility of these flowed from the forethought which provided his rude but serviceable pontoon-bridge. Similar results would have followed the same tactics if one hundred thousand men had been opposed to each other instead of less than six thousand. Of all the combats that I have seen this one was the most scientific, orderly, comprehensible, and artistically satisfactory. I will venture one other military reflection. I think the success of our regiment in charging veterans in a strong position was owing very much to the file-fire which we kept up while advancing. In the first place, it supported the spirits of our men, who believed that they were doing as much damage as they received, and felt that they ought to be able to bear the trial as long as the enemy. In the second place, it killed the musketry of the rebels, who, unfortunately for their morale, I think, had for shelter a deep plantation ditch, which served them the purpose of a rifle-pit. Now a human being who has a cover in battle hates to put his head outside of it. As a proof that we actually did overwhelm and derange the hostile musketry, I may adduce the fact that we had only six men hit by bullets. The rebels lost very few, to be sure; but the fence above their heads was so tattered by our shot as to be a curiosity; and the prisoners said that, what with the whizzing of Miniés and the flying of cypress splinters, the ditch was a most unpleasant position. I believe the manoeuvre of file-firing while advancing in battalion line to be quite a novelty. Notwithstanding frequent inquiries on the subject, I never yet heard of any other regiment having practiced it. An attacking line generally halts from time to time and delivers volleys, or advances at a right-shoulder-shift, taking what the enemy sends without reply until the position to be seized is actually reached. All three of these methods, I admit, are sufficiently difficult of execution; but the one by which we carried our point at Labadieville is certainly the least trying to human nature. The difficulty is that it can not be put in practice except on level ground, where the rear rank can keep well closed up; and even then the leading men are in some danger of having their heads blown off by the muskets of their supporting comrades. For instance, I had my neck scorched at Labadieville by the fire of one of my own soldiers.

And now let us ascend from tactics to strategy. The plan of the campaign was that Weitzel should drive the enemy down the Lafourche to Thibodeaux; that Colonel Thomas, with the Eighth Vermont and a colored regiment, should flank them there by way of the railroad from New Orleans; and that the Twenty-first Indiana with a force of gun-boats should seize Brashear City, and cut off their retreat across the Atchafalaya. To bring all this about, Mouton ought to have fought a second battle with us at Thibodeaux, or at least to have retired with a decent degree of deliberation. But he had been too neatly whipped and too thoroughly frightened to do either. He made a desperate rush for Brashear City, deserted at every step by his Lafourche militiamen, and succeeded in crossing the Atchafalaya almost in sight of the intercepting force, which had been detained two days off the bar by a furious norther. As for us, we followed him in a most leisurely manner, fearing that he would do just what he did. And now for nearly six months—that is, until General Banks arrived to open his Teche campaign—was Weitzel military master of the fertile Lafourche country, and commander of the United States forces in all Louisiana west of the Mississippi.

LIBRARIES.

“THE treasury of remedies for the soul” was inscribed over the entrance of the library of Osymandyas at Thebes, the first library mentioned in history. Three thousand years have wrought no change in the truth of the legend which classes libraries among the prime agencies for promoting the well-being of mankind. It is not the most violent or perceptible causes which produce the most permanent consequences; the slow, gradual upheaval of continents presents grander results than the spasmodic quakings of Vesuvius; the quiet success of Christianity has surpassed the wonders achieved by the sword of Mohammed; the invention of a German mechanic has revolutionized the world, and books, whether in manuscript or printed, have exercised a silent but controlling influence over the destiny of the ages—an influence not the less real because generally unrecognized. When Pisistratus founded the Homeric library at Athens he accomplished what Harmodius and Aristogiton could not undo when they overthrew his power; he established an institution whose effects were felt long after its destruction, shaping the thoughts, tastes, opinions, and actions of the race.

In the dark ages it was in monastic libraries that the relics of Greek and Roman civilization were preserved for the return of more auspicious days. Collections of classic and patristic authors were numerous, relics snatched from the ravages of the Goths and the Vandals, few of these libraries containing over five or six hundred MSS., but in the aggregate forming a vast number. Alcuin, Anselm, Charlemagne, the abbots of Glastonbury and York, and other prominent characters, devoted themselves to the advancement of libraries. The monks, cooped up in their narrow cells, gave expression to their aspirations after a more exalted and intellectual existence than that to which they were doomed by translating the classic authors. "That they slept their lives away is most untrue," says Longfellow; "for in an age when books were few—so few, so precious, that they were chained to their oaken shelves with iron chains like galley-slaves to their benches, these men, with their laborious hands, copied upon parchment all the lore and wisdom of the past, and transmitted it to us. Perhaps it is not too much to say that, but for these monks, not one line of the classics would have reached our day."

The Benedictines of the Middle Ages were not only great book collectors, but, according to the character of their order, they did more than any other class of men of the time toward diffusing the advantages of literature. Their great monastery, Monte Casino, was a sort of treasury or mint where choice MSS. were stored and prepared, and whence knowledge obtained currency at a period of profound degradation. Destroyed by the Lombards, rebuilt only to be shaken by earthquakes and ravaged by the Saracens in their descents on the coasts of Italy, the institution continued steadily to progress in spite of such terrors, and the monks became famous throughout Christendom for their skill and industry as book-hunters and book-manufacturers. Men of literary tastes proceeded thither as to an oasis in the desert; and long after the decay of the convent and the dispersion and destruction of many of its volumes, its name survived, and its antique cloisters continued an object of devout pilgrimage to such men as Boccaccio and Mabillon. Here Tasso, worn out by the terrible anguish of his life, spent some of his last days. The influence exercised by the library of Monte Casino was incalculable.

After the decline of this institution the promotion of libraries is principally due to Richard de Bury, the Anglo-Norman bibliophile and bibliographer of the period of Edward III., and to Petrarch his contemporary. The Philobiblon of the former we commend to every book-lover as a charming little treatise, unsurpassed in merit by any subsequent work of the kind. De Bury would have enjoyed with all his heart turning over the pages of the edition so beautifully printed in 1861 by Munsell, "Aldi Discipulus Albanus." Petrarch, the friend of De Bury, is famous as a poet, but it is not generally known that he was also a book collector and aspired at founding a library, for which object he bequeathed his books to the Venetian republic as a nucleus for a State Library. But the wealthy oligarchs of the city of the sea were too much absorbed in the traffic of gold, silks, and spices of the Orient to attend to literature, and Petrarch's collection lay neglected until some of the precious MSS. became actually petrified in the damp vaults where they were confined. Eventually the books were scattered to the four winds, but by some remarkable chance over seven hundred of these books, over which the great poet and lover once pondered and dreamed, have found an asylum from the storms of ages in the library of Trieste. How inestimable is the worth of those volumes rich with such tender memories!

How much it adds to the interest, the vitality of books if we can associate them with men who have enlisted the attention or sympathy of generations! The Royal Library of Paris seems more attractive to us because the illustrious De Thou—Huguenot, patriot, and historian—ministered to its wants as librarian, and because of the tragic fate of his son and successor, who has been celebrated in De Vigny's Cinq Mars. The Harleian MSS. suggest to us that quaint comic genius, Robert Burton, rummaging, as Dibdin tells us, among the huge black letter folios as in a mine, giving us the results of his labor in that oddest of farragos, "The Anatomie of Melancholy," which has diverted the leisure moments of many a student. With what veneration we contemplate the monastic library of Erfurth, where Luther, while a young man, passed many days that would otherwise have been wearisome. There he found the Bible which first aroused him to a sense of his own necessities, and the wants of his fellow-men. "This book," as D'Aubigné has eloquently observed, "deposited upon the unknown shelves of a gloomy hall, is about to become the book of life to a whole nation. In that book the Reformation lay hid."

No sign of our age is so indicative of present prosperity and intelligence, and of the permanence of the beneficent institutions of the time, as the growing attention paid to the collection and preservation of books. The silent but wonderful power of libraries is more and more acknowledged. The revenues of states, the donations of private munificence, are liberally contributed for the nourishment of libraries. The British Museum, with its vast collection of MSS. and printed volumes, is too well known to require more than a passing notice. The libraries of the old Nitrian monasteries, neglected among the sands of Egypt, have been ransacked for their treasures of Coptic, Arabic, Syriac, and Abyssinian lore, which now adorn the shelves of the Museum; and from all parts of the globe literary representatives may be said to have come and settled in this great metropolis of books. At present the collection numbers 40,000 MSS., 600,000 printed volumes, and 200,000 pamphlets.

The superb Bibliothèque Impériale of Paris, the largest in the world, contained in 1861 1,000,000 printed volumes, and 150,000 MSS., 300,000 maps, 300,000 pamphlets, 130,000 engravings, and 150,000 numismatic specimens. It must be conceded, however, that it contains many duplicates. The Library of St. Genevieve at Paris with 200,000 volumes, the Royal Library of Berlin with its 600,000 volumes, and a magnificent collection of Oriental MSS., the Royal Library of Copenhagen with 450,000 volumes, the Imperial Library of St. Petersburg, which, in little over a century, has accumulated 500,000 volumes, the Royal Library of Munich with 500,000 volumes, the Imperial Library of Vienna containing over 425,000 volumes, the Library of the Vatican possessing on the shelves of its antique alcoves the finest collection of Oriental MSS. in the world—among them many inestimable treasures brought thither from Constantinople when it fell into the hands of the Turks, the Laurentian Library at Florence, so scurvily treated by Savonarola; these, and many others, invite us to linger in their calm retreats and dream over the strange legends which cluster around them like ivy; but, behold, are they not all written in the chronicles of Edward the son of Edwards, who hath “given good heed, and sought out, and set in order many” and divers things worthy to be remembered? wherefore, let him that desireth to be more fully informed as to these things, search diligently in these books and be edified.

But as for us let us turn to the efforts made in our own land to promote the cause of civilization by the foundation of libraries, although very few of our libraries can lay any pretensions to antiquity. While successive ages have contributed to the growth of literature and the perpetuation of libraries in the Old World, ours are mostly the product of the wealth and intelligence of the present century. In 1663, or thereabouts, Pepys, the fussy, consequential courtier and book-collector of the days of Charles II., was jotting down in his diary such items as the following, which show how plentiful books were in England at that time: “To Paul’s church-yard, where I found several books ready bound for me: February 16 (Lord’s Day), all the morning making a catalogue of my books.” He had no idea of wasting his time. “By Mr. Dugdale I hear the great loss of books in St. Paul’s church-yard, and at their hall also, which they value at about £150,000”—a sum equal to £400,000 at present, or $2,000,000. “February 8. To the Strand to my bookseller’s, and there bought an idle, roguish French book, which I have bought in plain binding, avoiding the buying of it better bound, because I resolve, as soon as I have read it, to burn it, that it may not stand in the list of books, nor among them, to disgrace them if it should be found.” Virtuous Pepys! while he was thus luxuriating in the pastures of literature the English colonies were fighting Indians and clearing a howling wilderness. It was scarcely more than twenty years before these extracts were penned that the first printing-press in the United States was started at Cambridge. Donated soon after to Harvard College, it has since become the University press so celebrated for its choice editions. Then came the French and Indian wars and the Revolution, succeeded by all the confusion and bustle attendant on the establishment of an infant people struggling for a place among the nations; and yet one is really astonished at the progress achieved by our literary institutions even amidst all these adverse circumstances.

It is due to the men of the Old World to say that to them is owing much of what was done toward building up the early American libraries. With a prophetic eye they beheld the future glory of the colonies, and sought to influence their destiny and incorporate themselves with their fame by liberal contributions of books and money. The library of Harvard College, the first in the United States, was founded in 1632, and was endowed with gifts from Sir Kenelm Digby, Richard Baxter, Bishop Berkeley, and many others of the mother country. These invaluable tomes were all consumed by fire in 1764. The library, however, was immediately recommenced, and now contains, exclusive of the society libraries and pamphlets, about 85,000 volumes.

The Library of Yale College comes next in order of date, and was actually founded before the college for which it was intended, the clergyman who contributed the books which formed its nucleus, in 1700, saying, “I give these books for the founding of a college in this colony.” What worldly wisdom sometimes inspired the counsels of those quaint New England divines of the olden time! The Library of Columbia College was founded in 1757. The Library Association of Philadelphia was started in 1731, by that universal genius, that representative Yankee, Benjamin Franklin, whose statue surmounts the entrance of the present building, which was erected late in the last century. This was the first of those subscription libraries in America which afterward so rapidly multiplied that Franklin could say before he died: “These libraries have improved the general conversation of the Americans; made the common tradesmen and farmers as intelligent as most gentlemen in other countries; and perhaps have contributed, in some degree, to the stand so generally made throughout the colonies in defense of their privileges.” This library, with the Loganian collection attached to it, has received contributions from many sources, and now contains over 60,000 volumes. The Philosophical Library of Philadelphia was also founded by Franklin.

The Redwood Library, of Newport, was initiated by the celebrated Bishop Berkeley, then resident in this country. The project was nobly seconded by Abraham Redwood, Esq., by a donation of £500, in 1747; and £5000 were subscribed for the erection of a building, a large sum for a colonial library in those days. The plan was drafted by one of the architects of Blenheim House; and the elegant little building still remains, a monument to the traditional wealth and stateliness of Newport in its early years. The collection, although so much older than most of our libraries, contains only 12,000 volumes, but these are all of real merit. Dr. Stiles, of Revolutionary memory, was long the librarian. Take it all in all, we are disposed to regard the choice little Redwood, enshrined in its beautiful antique temple, and redolent with such fragrant associations, as one of the most interesting in the country.

The Library of the American Academy of Natural Sciences at Philadelphia possesses a complete series of works relating to ornithology, besides over 25,000 ornithological specimens—an unsurpassed collection. The New York State Library at Albany, founded as late as 1818, long after many other American libraries, and dependent for its support on the caprice of a motley and constantly-varying Legislature, has still made extraordinary progress. It now contains over 65,000 volumes. Many superb works published by foreign governments enrich its alcoves. It also possesses a complete set of the British Patents, the most stupendous work ever sent to press, and which increases from year to year in new installments, rolling up like compound interest. But four or five other sets of it have reached this side of the Atlantic; and its worth is shown by the fact that few other works are in so constant requisition. The Law Department embraces over 18,000 volumes. But the specialty of the New York State Library is in early historical, local, geographical, and statistical works relating to America, and in this it is surpassed by no library in the United States. It is a curious fact, not generally known, that the original papers taken from André's boots when he was captured are on exhibition in this library.

The Library of the American Antiquarian Society at Worcester, Massachusetts, is also devoted to the preservation of American archives; and is, moreover, interesting as possessing 900 volumes of the private library collected by Increase and Cotton Mather. How often, perhaps, has the sapient author of the Magnalia turned to these tomes to verify some learned quotation which he was about to inscribe in his chronicle for the confusion of "salvages" and heretics, and the edification of the orthodox. The Library of the Massachusetts Historical Society is a small but valuable collection, luxuriously cradled and tenderly nursed by the antiquarians of the "Hub."

Such are some of the oldest and best of our libraries. Few of them are noteworthy on account of size; but what they lack in quantity is compensated by quality. It should be remembered that although many of the Continental libraries boast of their bulk, a great deal of it is adipose matter—mere rubbish—the accumulation of ages, but possessing no value other than that of mouldiness and sheer old age; while the American libraries above alluded to are "of gold compact," containing but a small fraction of useless stuff.

But there is another class of libraries in the United States springing up every where, and rapidly assuming proportions which even an Englishman would not disdain. Our town and public libraries are the noblest evidences of the prosperity attained by our great republic, and among the surest pledges of its permanence and the increasing intelligence of its citizens. The Boston Athenæum and Boston public libraries possess together nearly 250,000 volumes. The Astor with its 130,000 volumes, and scores of others, claim more than a passing notice; and it is better, therefore, to refer the reader to Rhees's exhaustive work on the subject rather than simply to name institutions which deserve more than a passing notice. We would suggest to Mr. Rhees that a new edition of his valuable work, with the "latest improvements," is desirable. Our school and college libraries, although generally small, are so numerous as enormously to swell the amount of portable information accumulated in our youthful country for the benefit of generations yet to come. Are we styled a mercenary people, wholly given up to the accumulation of wealth? Point to the libraries endowed by our countrymen; further refutation of the libel is needless. Private collections have in many cases served to start or swell the size of European libraries, but in almost every case in the form of bequests. In this country it is an everyday affair for town libraries to be founded by donations given during the lifetime of the donors: witness the Boston Athenæum and Boston Public Library; witness the donations made by Mr. Peabody for libraries at Danvers and Baltimore. Last winter, in the New York Senate, Hon. Ezra Cornell, had a bill passed, according to which he donates $100,000 for the purpose of founding a public library at Ithaca, and this in a time of civil war!

It may be stated, as an evidence of the general diffusion of knowledge in the United States, that the number of libraries in Great Britain, in 1856, exceeding 10,000 volumes was 43, in France 28, and in the United States 104. The number of volumes in all the libraries of this country, private libraries excepted, amounted, in 1859, to 12,720,686 volumes. The number of volumes contained in libraries of 10,000 and upward, exclusive of private libraries, is 2,403,477, according to the last issue of Childs's National Almanac, of which only 350,000 are in the Slave States. Virginia, the mother of Presidents, and with a population of 1,596,318 before the war, possesses 50,000 volumes; Massachusetts, settled thirteen years later, and with a population of 1,231,066, possesses 614,415; South Carolina, the abode of the choicest F. F. V.'s, boasts of the enormous sum of 90,000 to a population of 703,708. These figures may be rather dry, but they are worth more than a passing thought, for they present facts of singular significance. If they are true, and we have taken means to verify them, then the South can not too soon be regenerated.

On the breaking out of the war there was a small collection at Beaufort, South Carolina, styled by euphemy a public library. There were the country seats of the crème de la crème of the chivalry; perchance the books in the Beaufort library were sometimes daintily fingered by exquisite aristocrats, who had tears to shed over Byron's heroines but lorded it over the "nigger" with a full appreciation of their high-born extraction. But those palmy days have passed away forever, and with them the Beaufort Public Library has gone: the books were sold at auction in New York, and the hall of the library is now an asylum for freedmen. At the time when this occurred there was some outcry against the Vandalism of the proceeding. In our opinion the Beaufort library was excluded from the protection which is properly claimed for literary institutions. It was doomed per se; without being intrinsically a rare collection, it was still of no ordinary character, and demanded an extraordinary fate. It was gathered by the unpaid wages of slaves. No; a library, an institution intended for the diffusion of civilization, founded by those who are fighting to maintain the institutions of barbarism, is a solecism. Scatter its volumes and sweep it into oblivion, and when South Carolina is again a free State, then introduce the true civilization, plant schools and libraries from Charleston to New Orleans, and the library of Beaufort will be more than restored.

It is pleasant to observe that the spirit we have shown in regard to libraries has proved contagious. Our Canadian neighbors have already started many thriving and valuable collections, and libraries belonging to educational institutions are numerous. The attention given to the foundation of libraries seems to be a characteristic trait of the Anglo-Saxon colonies. It has been seen how early we commenced founding them, and the Canadians are not slow in the good work. It will startle many persons who are unaware of the marvelous progress of civilization in Australia, to learn that in its great cities society has become sufficiently settled to create a demand for public libraries. One was founded at Melbourne in 1855; a beautiful edifice was erected at a cost of £16,000, and in 1860 it already contained nearly 30,000 volumes.

The collection of private libraries for one's personal delectation has been a luxury indulged in by the rich and the intelligent since the days of Lucullus and Pliny, great "book-hunters;" and surely there is no pursuit or hobby which wealth loves to humor that is more productive of good. Our merchant princes and literary men have as yet made no collections so vast and magnificent as a few of the private libraries of Europe, such as those of Magliabechi, the prince of librarians, De Thott, the Dukes of Urbino, and the Harleian; but they have shown a commendable zeal in the cause, and select private libraries are far more frequent now in our country than in England, and often with special attention devoted to certain subjects; as, for example, the Shakspearian Library of Mr. Burton, and the collection of Spanish literature gathered by Mr. Ticknor, unsurpassed out of Spain. The entertaining works of Dr. Wynne and Mr. Farnham on the private libraries of Boston and New York show what had been achieved in this line some years ago.

Of the work connected with the collection and curatorship of libraries but little is known outside of library walls. The popular mind considers a library a sort of Castle of Indolence, where the happy man who is situated there has naught to do but take his ease at his own sweet will; to read, perchance to dream; to draw his salary; to gradually grow old and leathery; and after a life of enviable repose, to pass gently away to a sphere where his condition of quietude will be continued forever. Nothing can be farther from the truth. Small libraries, poorly funded and making few or no additions, do not require much attention, although they should have more care than they generally receive. But a library of any size that gains annual additions involves a great deal of labor, even if the number of readers be small. A book has to go through many different processes—registering, binding, stamping, cataloguing, etc., etc.—before it finally reaches the shelves where room has to be found for it among the companions with whom it is to spend the remainder of its days. The compiling of catalogues is another great task devolving on the librarian, and demanding a vast amount of unappreciated labor. Bibliographies are to be ransacked for the authors of anonymous works; the abbreviations to be made in the titles need experience and judgment, and the whole is to be gotten up with numerous cross-references, and with the nicest care and the observance of a thousand perplexing rules and vexatious exceptions. In 1858 the catalogue of the British Museum amounted to 623 folio volumes as far as the letter I; when completed it can hardly embrace less than 1500 volumes. In many libraries supplementary catalogues are issued at intervals of a few years. The reader can see what it is to catalogue even in small libraries, if it is done with the requisite minuteness and care.

There is much work also bestowed on the assorting of pamphlets for the binder; indexing the hundreds of volumes of pamphlets which may be already bound, and which are found in every large library; arranging books on the shelves; registering those which leave the library; and all sorts of miscellaneous items which are constantly arising. More or less attention must also be given to visitors according to their number, the regulations of the library, and the character of their wants.

It will be seen, therefore, that libraries, although free from the wear and tear of life "on change," are still no bowers of ease. The labor performed is quiet and unostentatious, but its results are felt as vastly contributing to the progress of mankind; silent and unnoticed it goes on as the building up of a library proceeds from year to year, from age to age, gradually and unceasingly, as by minute and unrelenting processes the coral isle of the Pacific grows from its small foundation until it emerges from the depths and gladdens the face of the ocean with its grove of cocoas waving their coronal of verdure in the western wind.

Natural inclination and experience are as necessary for the success of one who adopts the life of a librarian as in the legal or medical professions. A knowledge of libraries and books is now a science by itself, involving a vast amount of bibliographical literature that is to be mastered, and requiring that the would-be librarian should have taste and talents suited to the position he seeks. It is a mistake to place over a library some old fossil, who has exhausted his best energies in other business, and now desires a librarianship as a cozy, comfortable berth after the storms of life, although unfit to attend to any thing else but to see that the books are not stolen. Nor should such a position be given to a young man who might make an excellent bank clerk, but has no turn for books; and yet such cases too often occur. The work demands men of active parts, patient research, and ardent love for books as books without reference to their contents, although, of course, a knowledge of these is absolutely necessary to the accomplished librarian; he must also have some knowledge of the classic and principal modern languages—the more the better. It is obvious that a so-called literary man, who cares little for the dry statistics and history of books, is hardly qualified to fill the position occupied by such men as Panizzi, Cogswell, or Jewett, however learned he may be; nor, if conscientious in the discharge of his duties, can life in a library often prove otherwise to him than drudgery.

To the librarian who is not so much absorbed in bibliographical investigations as to be unconscious of other matters, life in a library affords rare opportunities for the study of human nature. It is amusing to note the different characters who visit it, and the diversity and oddity of their pursuits. The representative of a numerous class is the quaint old man who, year after year, haunts the still alcoves like the ghost of other days, bald, weazen-faced, bent over, threadbare as to his apparel, poring over black letter, and with his scanty rivulet of thought ever dribbling slowly in the same undeviating and narrowing channel. It is a singular fact that a large proportion of readers are addicted to the consultation of genealogies. This vanity, usually considered as belonging to old bachelors and ancient dowagers of the old country, is nevertheless affected by many of our otherwise sensible people, although inconsistent with the democratic nature of our institutions. Sir Symonds D'Ewes was not more enthusiastic in this sort of erudition than some Americans who lavish much precious time in the searching out of family crests, ancestry, and other moonshine equally substantial.

To one who desires to regard his fellow-men with the benevolent eye of an optimist, it is rather mortifying to observe what watchfulness has to be exercised in the preservation of books from careless usage, or even from theft. The passion for acquiring rare works, MSS., or autographs, amounts to a monomania with some persons which seems to produce a moral obliquity in their actions so far as books are concerned. A curious instance illustrative of this occurred in the New York Historical Library. Dr. — happened in the library investigating some documents. The librarian and another gentleman, a man of high respectability and well known as a book-collector, were the only other persons present. The librarian having occasion to leave the room placed it temporarily in the charge of Dr. —. On returning to the library he found the collector had disappeared, and, what was more singular, a very valuable MS. framed and hung on the wall had also vanished. Dr. —, absorbed in his studies, had observed the disappearance of neither one nor the other. As it was evident he knew nothing about it, and the respectability of the supposed purloiner prevented further inquiry, no more was said on the subject. Some years after, when the occurrence was entirely forgotten, the collector died, and at the sale of his books Dr. — and the librarian again met, and mutually enjoyed the surprise and pleasure of seeing the aforesaid MS. brought to light under the hammer of the auctioneer!

We have already alluded to some of the perplexing questions connected with libraries, but there is none demanding for its solution so thorough a knowledge of the wants of libraries, combined with good taste and common sense, as drawing plans for a library. It is for this reason that most libraries are either pleasing to the eye and unsuited to the purpose for which they were erected, or conveniently planned and contrary to the rules of good taste: the former is, however, the most usual error, at least in Europe, where there are many really beautiful library buildings designed by architects of the first order, but at a great waste of space and convenience. There is only one way entirely to obviate the difficulty: the architect should be at once librarian and architect—that is, a librarian by profession, but at the same time conversant with architecture, sufficiently so at least to consult with and direct some architect sensible enough to heed the suggestions of one who knows thoroughly what is required. As this is not a contingency to be hoped for until to their other studies librarians add the noble study of architecture, the next best thing is for the council of sages called the building committee to learn wisdom from those who have spent many years in a library, instead of ignoring their existence and intrusting the matter altogether to some architect whose only object is to erect a beautiful edifice, and who knows as much about the thousand and one requirements of a library as of Chinese. This is not so much a question of genius or taste as a question of experience. Michael Angelo himself could not plan a suitable building for a library without previous experience of the economy of a library, as is proved by one he erected for the Laurentian Library, which is one of the finest things in Florence, but is more fit for a ducal palace than for a library. This is not so trifling a question as some may think, for the public moneys are too often wasted in the construction of a library sufficiently handsome, indeed, but also sufficiently absurd in its internal arrangements.

We may be pardoned, perhaps, for venturing a few suggestions, which may not be altogether novel, but can not too often be repeated. The main portion of a library should be in the form of a rotunda, like the famous reading-room of the British Museum. Thus from a central point can the librarian best oversee the visitors and readers, who should always be under his eye, and the books, on this plan, can be most accessible to the assistants. If the ground-plan is quadrangular there need be no space lost at the angles, as such rooms become necessary as the library expands, and, in any event, they are required for the storage of duplicates, for library offices, etc., as every one conversant with the subject very well knows. Nor is a circular building undesirable in an architectural point of view, the Pantheon at Rome and many Italian basilicas presenting attractive examples of that style. A library should be well-lighted, and from above, whatever its shape; by this means reserving for book-shelves the space in the walls that would be occupied by windows.

Excess of ornament should be avoided. any thing that tends to distract the attention from the main purpose of the building is objectionable. Let the chief architectural features present an effective outline; that is sufficient for a library, in this respect differing from a cathedral or palace, which can hardly be too ornate. It may even be questioned whether pictures do not interfere with the proportions of a library; if donated to such an institution a separate room devoted to them would seem preferable. But there is one ornament which is always in perfect keeping with the severe beauty of a library—statuary. Pure marble busts, carved out of snowy Carrara, add a classic air to the majestic aspect of a library hall such as can be obtained in no other way. But let plaster casts be banished from its portals as inconsistent with the permanent character of the place.

As to the order of architecture that should be selected it is more difficult to decide. While all are beautiful, some are better suited to our purpose than others. The object of a building and its style of architecture should harmonize as the dress of an individual should correspond with his character or profession. Madame de Pompadour in the garb of a Quakeress, or old Dr. Samuel Hopkins, of Newport, in the gay colors of a gallant à la Louis Quatorze, would be no more incongruous than a library building of unsuitable architecture. The later English Gothic or Elizabethan, and the Romanesque, Lombard Gothic, and Venetian schools would seem to be the best adapted for libraries. We are inclined to think that the Royal Library at Munich and the Astor at New York, planned after early Italian models before the Renaissance had corrupted the sources of true architecture, are as consistent in their appearance with what a library should be as any that have come to our knowledge.

The last suggestion that we would make is, that all that savors of sham should be conscientiously excluded from library precincts. We know of a library that cost $80,000. Throughout it is built of brick, stone, and iron. It is probably fire-proof, and presents an air of stability that is truly refreshing. But those graceful columns that sustain the roof on their exquisite capitals are hollow; the slender iron posts within that support the ceiling are hidden by flimsy shells of pine wood that only seem to support what they do not; and the Corinthian capitals are of plaster of Paris, liable to be shattered at a blow. Is not this pitiful!

Vast depositories of learning, libraries have been compared by Swift to cemeteries, while Irving has wittily described them as manufactories for the production of other books. May they not rather be likened to cities and towns where men assemble in communities and continue to influence the world by the force of intellect long after they have ceased to exist as physical beings. "Many a man," says Milton, "lives a burden on the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond a life." As the long procession of mortals sweeps on to the Silent Land, they who have incorporated the better part of themselves in books shall not altogether die; their names would still at least be "perpetuated," as Burton remarks, "in catalogues and bibliographical dictionaries; nay, biographies and encyclopedias would contain their titles and perhaps the day of the author's birth and death." For these reasons let a library be constructed on principles of permanence; let strength and security enter into the plan, and allow no excess of tawdry decoration to lessen the effect of its majesty; let it stand from age to age unscathed by the storms and wrecks of eras, a beacon to guide mankind in the course of duty, a shrine wherein shall be embalmed the glory of its founders, an oracle whither the generations shall come to seek wisdom, a κτῆμα ἐς αἰεί.

IN BONDS.

A YOUNG girl stood by an open window. Not looking at the shifting cloud panorama in the open sky, not marking the silvery pinnacles that girded the horizon—mountain phantasms smitten with golden arrows from the sun and melting away into a glimmering mist. No glory of tinted vapor or cloven ray could hold her glance or heart this morning. Throngs of people were walking about—carriages were hurrying along the Warrenton road, and a band of music began to utter a few preliminary notes. It was, in fact, Tournament-day at Fauquier Springs; and who that had a spark of chivalry in their souls could have eye or ear for common pageants of earth or sky?

Not this young girl, Theodora Thorpe, certainly. She stood there with an eager, expectant glance, and something of childish pleasure in the parted crimson lips and cheeks so softly flushed. She was a Yankee girl, and had breathed New England air nearly all her life. There is a kindling glow in her soft brown hair, strength and purpose about the passionate lips, and the deep gray eyes now wandering to the green sweep of meadow on the west look clear enough to face poetic vision or life's sharpest reality.

Her thoughts were interrupted by a triumphant burst of martial music, and she saw that the knights were entering the lists. Fancifully attired, with various fantastic names taken from old books of chivalry or manufactured at home, these knights met for no personal encounter, no feats of bravery, but merely to display that most common of Southern accomplishments, good riding. The herald announced the names, and then read a speech, of which our heroine could hear little. Sometimes a triumphant burst of music heralded success, then an ignominious silence told of failure. At last her eye kindled a little and she sat down. She could not look at this rider—a young man of lithe and slender figure and blond hair. He was habited in a suit of dark green cloth with golden trimmings, and rode a coal-black horse. She caught her breath with a half gasp as she looked at him.

But Miss Thorpe did not look again. She only listened with quickened breath and flushed cheeks to the thrice-told burst of music that hailed him victor, and a shadow of disappointment clouded her face. She had seen enough of the tournament; some harassing thought chased all the childish pleasure from lip and eye, and she waited wearily to the end with her head leaning on her hand. The pageant ended at last, and before long the young man with the aureole of golden hair, the conquering hero, stood beside her.

"Now, Dora, you must change your mind!" he exclaimed, eagerly.

"Do women ever do that?"

"Yes, it is one of their rights—one I shall never dispute with you. Say you will stay to the ball, and let me crown you queen."

"Be loyal to my high behest, then, and find Clem to drive me home."

The young man bit his lip. His blue eyes glittered—cold blue eyes they were, with no more light from within at this moment than if they had been cut from turquoise stone. Reginald Fairfax was accustomed to have his own way in life; it was a new sensation to be refused. This little Yankee girl was piquant and refreshing certainly, and so beautiful that he had only to look in her face to excuse the rash offer of his hand and heart made only twenty-four hours ago; but then it would never do to allow her to rebel so soon.

"Dora, it is my wish that you should stay."

"But, most solemn autocrat of all the Russias, it is my wish to go. When one has a weighty question to consider, one does not like to flutter away the time in a ball-room."

"Bosh," said the young man, with a sneer. "You are afraid of a ball-room as one of the devices of Satan, you dear little Puritan."

"Well, perhaps I am," she rejoined, with quiet good-nature; "but you know the night brings counsel."

"Did not last night bring it?" he asked, rather impatiently.

"Only conflicting counsels. I can not choose my life's destiny as easily as I would a new bonnet."

With this view of the case Mr. Fairfax changed his tactics. Better to lose one evening's pleasure than to bear a life-long disappointment. Surely this was not the time to assert his will. After all, it was a new fascination to see this young girl hesitate about accepting him—a delicious agony to witness such purity and disinterestedness. Had not manoeuvring mothers quarreled about him as soon as he was out of the nursery, and beauties, white and brown, angled for him with various baits? How charming to see this young girl wondering whether she should really pick up the golden apples flung by Fortune at her feet!

"Ah! well, Dora," he said, "you rule me with a rod of iron. I am only king in name, and might as well abdicate my shadow of a throne. Would you ever give up a whim to please me?"

"I would give up a great deal for you, Rex," answered Dora, thoughtfully—"only not principles."

"Or prejudices," muttered Rex.

Dora glanced at him; but the smooth face and clear blue eyes showed no sign of anger. They looked hard and cold, perhaps, with the only warmth in the gleams that lit up the hair.

She watched him walk away, and her glance grew perplexed. Was he true and noble indeed? Could she trust heart and life to him without a fear? Handsome, rich, and noble, as the young man in Holy Writ, what lacked he yet? Ah! Dora felt in her inmost heart that one thing was needful—the pure and childlike faith which could alone inform the whole with life, and crown each natural grace with the immortal and divine.

Miss Thorpe gathered the folds of her black lace mantilla about her, and sat down patiently to await her lover's return. That is to say, her outward aspect betokened serenity and repose, a fair sweet face, with drooping eyes and tender loving mouth, but beneath that seeming calm surged all the doubts that had haunted her through the day. Does "perfect love cast out fear?" Then surely this was most imperfect love; and yet, might not these fears only be the fruit of her sage New England training? Every thing was so different here; and she had hardly been able to adopt the new faith of her new home with the readiness of her shrewd father. Some of the old horror about buying and selling a fellow-being shook her soul now and then; and she could not make it an article of her creed that slavery was a moral, social, and political blessing. Reginald Fairfax believed so, she knew, and he was the master of hundreds of slaves. Had it been a blessing to him, she wondered vaguely as she thought of his autocratic manner. How would one fare who dared to thwart his will, wife or slave? As if answering her thought, she heard his quick step upon the floor as he hurried toward her. His eyes were aflame now, and a vivid spot burned on either cheek, but his face had the same stony calm more terrible than emotion. Dora knew that something had happened, and she said, in a frightened way,

"What is it, Rex?"

"Nothing; are you ready?"

"Of course; but you must tell me. You look so—so—" She paused, hardly caring to say, angry.

"Well, Clem is gone; he is not to be found."

Dora could not see why this should have shaken him so; but he led her swiftly down the stairs, and placed her in the carriage before he said another word. Even then he was silent for a time.

"You are in the dark I see, Dora, about this dark subject," he said, with a cold laugh, which made the young girl start. "Let us have the beginning of the interesting history. You have seen Clem; he is a superior negro, as you know, brought up under my eye, and learned in all my ways. The fact is, I do believe I had allowed myself to be attached to him."

The young lady was silent, and Mr. Fairfax continued:

"Clem, it appears, placed his affections on other objects than his unworthy master; in short, he wooed and married in an incredibly short time a young 'pussun of color,' belonging to Mrs. Summers on the next plantation. Now, Miss Juliet Summers was married a couple of weeks ago, and followed her liege lord to the eastern shore of Maryland, taking her maid with her without the slightest regard for Clem."

"Poor fellow!" said Dora, with a sigh.

"My darling, do you think they feel as we would?" said Reginald, interrupting his story and looking at her with wondering tenderness.

"I don't know," she answered, mournfully; "but I think the feeling must be the same in kind. If they can love, they can suffer."

"Bah! they don't do either," returned Mr. Fairfax, impatiently; "but Clem has taken upon himself to be very sulky, because I refused to buy his Clara. He has been almost insolent, so that last night I was obliged to thrash him. I did indeed, Dora. You need not look so horrified. I shall not thrash you."

"I don't know about that," said Dora, quickly. "Perhaps, if I offend you."

"I have only been too indulgent to Clem," continued the young gentleman. "I believe he considered a thrashing impossible, he looked so stunned at first. I could have almost smiled if I had not been so angry at the look of insulted dignity which he turned on me when the fine lash of my riding whip curled about him; but at last he grew fierce as a tiger, and muttered something of revenge. Did you notice any thing in his manner when he drove us to the Springs?"

"Oh no; don't tell me any more, Reginald; it is sickening. Can't you feel as I do how wrong it all is?"

"It is disagreeable, I must own. Whippings are most rare on our place. I am sure Stonehenge is a paradise for darkeys; but you must admit, Dora, that discipline is necessary."

"Perhaps so; if I could admit that slavery is necessary I must yield every other point."

Reginald Fairfax was silent for a time. He had no reply for such speeches, and rather wished to ignore his lady-love's abolition proclivities—all the consequence of early education and the growth of New England soil. They would soon disappear in that sunnier clime amidst more liberal views.

"And after all," said Dora, solemnly, after a long silence, "fearful as the system is for the slave, to me it is more terrible for the masters. Think of your people's souls, Rex. What if they should be required at your hands? How awful at that last day to feel the crushing weight of ruined souls added to our own guilt! Do you never hear even now the voice of the Lord God in the stillness inquiring, 'Where is Abel thy brother?' You can not say like Cain, 'Am I my brother's keeper?' for this slave system has made you that in the worst sense."

"Nonsense, Dora; you are a fanatic. As to the question of souls, it is not quite settled that they have souls. Here you are at home; take a new text for your next sermon, do; the present is getting a little threadbare—it is rather ancient."

"As ancient as the laws of God and human rights," said Dora, earnestly, as they drove up the winding path to the modest domicile she called home—a long, low rambling cottage, brown and bare enough in winter; but now kind Nature was doing her best to hide the want of paint, wreathing upon the homely walls such clustering vines, such grace and airiness of outline, such affluence of color, that it looked like a thing of beauty, a sweet home. A huge trumpet creeper framed the door with its wavy bowers, its great, vivid scarlet flowers lighting up the green gloom. How beautiful Dora looked as she stood in this doorway—her eyes lit with a saintly fervor—her cheeks all aflame with her emotion, and the shadows playing on her burnished brown hair! Reginald, as he drove away, muttered with a smile,

"If from her lips some abolition fall,
Look in her face and you'll forget it all."

Dora meanwhile went into the house. The interior was painfully bare, for sweet Nature could not here work her loving charms; only a cluster of creamy-tinted roses against some glossy myrtle leaves in a little Parian vase whispered of her presence. The cool, shaded rooms seemed to strike a chill to her heart, after the sumptuous display without, where warmth and color rioted. It was an effort, after all, to come back from the gay pageant of holiday life to the homely daily duties. As she laid aside her pretty blue silk and lace drapery to assume her work-day dress, she thought of Stonehenge, with its spacious rooms, with carpets soft as woodland mosses starred with velvet petaled flowers—the drifting foam of lace curtains lying like rosy snow over gorgeous crimson silk—the softly tinted walls lit with gems of scenery in frames of misty gold, or faces beautiful as a poet's dream—the ruby tinted Bohemian glass—the carved work from Interlachen—the mosaic tables that told their tales of the world across the ocean which she longed to see—all these awaited her word. She had but to choose; and she could exchange at once the harsh, stern prose of her daily life for that region of soft enchantment. Was it not better to enjoy than to struggle and do? Why should those figments of her early faith trouble her? Why should any myths about man's equality in the great brotherhood of man, learned with the other fairy tales of childhood, rise to-day like grim phantoms between her and that fair future that shone before her? Was he not noble and true—her young Apollo with the gleaming hair? Might not hers be the task to unfold to him the mysteries of a more stainless knighthood. But these harassing thoughts must be put away for the present. Her mother was spreading the cloth for the evening meal. Her father, a shrewd, sallow-faced man, with keen eyes that seemed able to look through all subterfuge, was pacing impatiently up and down the room. He had brought all his plain, homely notions, with his personal effects, from the sterile New Hampshire farm to the worn-out Virginia lands, and calculated that “if he had two niggers to work the farm the women folks could do up the chores.”

So Dora toasted her pretty face and the bread before the fire, and sat down in a partially cooked state to her tea.

Her father eyed her sharply. Somehow the room was no more so bare and homely when this flower bloomed in it. Why, it was better than a Titian—finer than rarest exotic, sweet as young hopes—this bright young girl with the living roses in her cheek, and soft lustrous eyes that shone like stars through misty depths of color. He was glad to look at her, as she crowned the plain little table with a grace that frosted silver service, or flashing glass, or snowy drapery, could never have conferred.

“Well, Dode,” he said, “how did it go?”

“Oh, it was very pleasant; quite a picture, father,” she answered, absently, and Mr. Fairfax was the victorious knight.”

A pleased look came upon both the faces, where Time had written itself in sterner lines. Evidently no cruel parent here waited to cross the path of true love. Not mercenary enough, perhaps, to control their daughter's affections, they would rejoice to see them flow like the Californian rivers over sands of gold. To be sure Theodora was not penniless, having inherited from her Uncle Theodore a thousand dollars and a stony little farm in New Hampshire whose chief production was mullen stalks; also, being heiress prospective to all her shrewd father might make out of his last speculation. Yet, as no ingenious Yankee has yet discovered a method of making cloth from the woolly foliage of the mullen, the farm counted little, and all the rest as a mere shining bubble weighed against Stonehenge, with its fine old mansion, its broad, fertile fields, and likely negroes.

Mr. Thorpe's keen gray eyes twinkled with pleasure as he said, “I guessed as much, for I heard them sayin' at the Warren Green this mornin' that he was the beater for riden.”

Dora was in no mood now to hear of Reginald Fairfax's perfections, and she was glad to hear her mother, who was always on household cares intent, making a moan about the disappearance of a much-prized Shanghai, a speckled creature, who went largely to legs, and had the sparest suit of feathers consistent with decency. He had been accustomed to crow loudly at twelve o'clock every night, wakening Dora from her first balmy slumber, probably because it was then high noon in China, so she had no cause to love him. But she now very amiably offered to go in search of the vagrant, glad to get away into the sweet summer twilight that lay without dewy and fragrant.

The clouds floated away in rifted pearl above her, but in the distance the dim gold and misty rose of an imperial sunset still flushed them; the sky wore that deep, tender blue which seems to bring Heaven so near us, and a soft south wind fluttered over the leaves, shaking the innumerable scarlet trumpets that hung around the doorway. No beds of flowers brightened the green-sward to load the air with balm, only a yellow jasmine to herald spring—a few roses, Dora's pets, were allowed to cumber the ground; for Mr. Thorpe seemed to have an idea that flowers were freaks of nature, floral creations on which sober people should frown as one would over the spreeds of too exuberant youth. But Dora thought with a real thrill of rapture of the conservatories at Stonehenge—the bewildering mazes of bloom and fragrance—how delicious to bring dewy little bouquets into those stately rooms—to riot in flowers—to have them in moss-baskets, in vases, in her hair—to live and move and have her being among them. Oh! if she could only decide the vexing question in her mind. What flaming sword could shut her out from this Eden? And yet, the hot blood flushed into her cheeks as she thought, would it be Eden with that man? True, she loved him. Yet he profaned with light or indifferent words the holiest things. Could she give him up? The very air seemed to swoon around her, and she leaned sick and faint by the gate that opened upon the road—a dull, heavy band of pain weighed down her head, and she remembered with a quick throb of anguish the thorny crown that circled a kingly brow of old. She must fight this battle out, and choose quick.

She looked over in the direction of Stonehenge as she breathed it. The house stood upon a hill, dimly discerned in broken outlines against the fading sky. The last flushes had burned out, leaving only ashes of roses—cool neutral tints—where Tyrian dyes had reigned. But even as she looked, some strange, fierce light made night's sombre glory pallid. First, smouldering in a solid mass of flame, then sending forth lurid tongues of fire, it streamed upward, wave on wave, over one another, breaking into showers of sparks. Fierce and devouring as want, inappeasable as death, it looked as it wrapped the building, barn, or stable, she knew not which, in curling wreaths of fire, glittering as molten gold with burning crimson gleams. Before her terror allowed her to reach the house her father already stood at the door looking at the fire, while Jeff brought out his horse.

"It's not the house, I reckon," he said, seeing his daughter's startled look. "I'm going over to help; it 'ill take more than two hours to get the engine from Warrenton."

Dora watched her father ride off with a sigh over the impotence of women at such times. The light breeze had died away, and in the serene summer night the flames seemed to gain little. She was sure they had not reached the stately pile that might be her future home. Softly fell the dews around her till the grass was wet. The stars came out one by one, golden lamps to illumine the infinite depths of heaven, but they looked pale and wan. The fire seemed subdued at last; no longer careering wildly upward, it crouched submissive before some stronger spirit, and dense masses of black smoke starred with red sparks poured out. Still Dora walked up and down the little garden path too wildly excited to bear to go in and sit down quietly by her mother to hear her mild questions or her lament over the missing Shanghai. At last she heard the tramp of horses' feet, and sprang forward to meet her father. It was Reginald instead. He was riding by, but stopped when he saw her.

"You are anxious, Dora. I am glad to say we are safe now; the fire-fiend has not devoured our home. As for the fiend who lit the torch, I shall settle with him soon."

"What do you mean?" exclaimed the young girl, reading even in the darkening gloom the white determination of her lover's face.

"Why, I mean that the black rascal Clem, that reprobate to whom you were ready to attribute all the virtues of humanity this afternoon, came back while we were at the Springs and took the revenge he has been threatening by setting fire to my new barn."

"Oh! have you proof of that?" cried Dora.

"Proof positive. He was seen hanging about the place by the other servants. He was not seen to go in, but of course he had full opportunity. No one suspected him, a favorite servant, a fellow that I had favored and indulged."

"And thrashed," thought Dora.

"But I am on his track, and can not stop a moment. By the morning dawn I expect he will be lodged in the Warrenton jail, and I shall sell him to the first trader that comes along. Good-by!" and he rode impetuously away, calling out with a laugh—"and after business I must go back to the ball, you know."

When he was out of sight Dora paced the garden-path no more. She went up into her own little room. She sat down by the window, where the trumpet creeper had reached forth an arm holding a handful of the crimson blossoms against the swaying white folds of the curtain. The struggle was over. She let go all the shining store of the future—all its glorious possibilities—she saw with calm eye the golden glow of young love die from off the landscape of her life, and sat down at the foot of the cross, content if not joyous. Content to take up the narrow duties, the petty cares, the pale, sparse joys that made up her existence, her visible life, hoping God would some day send something more blessed than passive resignation into her soul.

How strangely her father's voice sounded as he called to her in a joyful tone late at night, with the assurance of one who brings good news, "The fire's out, Dode, and the rascal's in prison!"

A cloudy morning with glimmering showers followed. A heavy vapor seemed to wipe out the distant landscape as with a wet sponge. The lace veil of mist riven into fragments floating here and there. This pallid day, with no glorious sunshine, pleased Dora better. These pale, wan tints suited the colors of her faded life. The foliage drooped heavy and wet, the flowers hung drenched, the distance had melted away, only the narrow world of home was visible, beneath a dun gray sky. How like her life! But she went down bravely and took up the cares of the present.

She stood skimming the pans of milk when her father came back from Warrenton with his share of the daily mail. He looked at her, discerning some trace of emotion in her face.

"Hain't had a good night, I reckon, Dode," he said. "Take care of yourself; you're better nor two sons to me. Guess what that confounded rascal's done now?"

Dora did not ask. She had found time in her own trial to remember poor Clem; not to excuse his crime of course, but to think with some pitying, extenuating memories of his provocation.

"Why, he heard he was goin' to be sold to Georgy, and ef the pesky warmint hasn't gone and hacked off three fingers of his right hand. Cheatin' his master out of his lawful price."

"But he has been cheated out of his birth-right," said Dora; "he has been cheated out of his life, out of love and home, out of joy and hope."

"Yes," said her father, thoughtfully, "I reckon there is a screw loose somewhere about this peecooliar institooshun; but we can't mend it, so it's no use talkin', as I hope you'll remember when you're with Mr. Fairfax, Dode. One thing I've allers noticed about these Southern shivalry, nothin' riles 'em like touchin' on that pint; it sets their whole natur on edge. I calculate Reginald's wrathful enough now, losin' all his hay and half his nigger, for Clem won't sell for more'n half price."

"Then I'll buy him," said Dora, with an air of quiet determination.

Her father fairly gasped with astonishment. What a wretched investment, a maimed negro! Why he only hired his hands, considering human life the most uncertain of property. He was too politic however to present this aspect of the case to his daughter. He could attack her in a more vulnerable point.

"What, buy a fellow-bein', Dode! Why, I wouldn't do that. My conscience would go agin it."

"I think I am right," said the girl, looking out drearily to the drenched lawn and the vapory clouds, as if with mute appeal to earth and heaven. "What he must have suffered, poor Clem, to be willing to maim himself for life! I can save him from misery."

"He'll be as well off, likely, as the rest on 'em," said Mr. Thorpe; "and you can't buy 'em all, Dode."

"No; but this one I can and will. When I'm of age I'll set him free."

"Well, girl, the money's yer own; but I must protest against sich an investment. And Mr. Fairfax, what'll he say? Reckon he'll think he mought as well keep him as sell him to you; purty nigh the same, I presume," with a shrewd look at his daughter.

"It will not be the same," she answered, quietly. "Tell him I shall take care that Clem never enters even the remotest bound of the Stonehenge estate."

"She'll leave him to me when she marries," thought the old man. After all, the loss or gain of one negro would be nothing to the mistress of Stonehenge. Urged by his daughter, he rode off at once to make an offer for Clem in his own name. Mr. Fairfax opened his cold blue eyes with wonder at the shrewd Yankee's proposition; but he was too glad to wash his hands of the whole disagreeable business to hesitate, though he was sorry the black rebel should get off so easily, and hoped that Mr. Thorpe might prove—as the New Englanders are proverbial for being—a hard master.

In the mean time the subject of this bargain—the chattel bought and sold—"something better than a dog, a little dearer than a horse"—sat sullenly by the little grated window that overlooked the small square yard shut in by the heavy stone-walls of the Warrenton jail. Beyond that stood the Warren Green—a fine hotel of brick, with long white piazzas running round it, and a verdant green stretching out on every side, fresh and bright with the showers, lying in dewy splendor under overarching trees. Within the half light of the cloudy day gloomed the stagnant air. A stout, brawny fellow, quiet—somewhat sullen, you would say—with dull black eyes, vapid expression, thick lips, heavy, brutish jaws: like the rest, a mere animal. Ah! but "this quietness is but the outer shell;" there may be hell beneath, and there is—a seething, restless hell. That dull, tigerish look does not take in the trim hotel, where now and then a pretty girl looks out, or the idle young Virginian lawyer waiting for briefs, or doctor waiting for patients, strolls up and down the piazza smoking a cigar, staring out, but seeing nothing. His nerves grew cold and rigid; something like a chained wild beast snatched wildly at his heart. He hardly felt the stings of pain that shot through his wounded hand, and crept with numbing agony up his arm. He looked with savage longing to the sky, and wondered where it began to arch over the North. The North! that land of promise lying on some distant shore of time, bathed in rosy light. Some hope of reaching it had kept him alive lately; it had kept the dull knife from his throat last night; some maddening hunger for freedom had stung his nerves, had heated his blood to frenzy, ever since Clara's loss. Some wild dream of life with her in that land had glimmered on his dark path. But to-day all was over; the dull gray blank of sky shut him in as with an iron wall; no love or hope lay beyond. The scars of his master's lash burned and throbbed fiercely; but fiercer burned the fire of revenge and hate within. He had been one of the pious slaves—a class leader. He wondered vaguely now where his religion had gone, all fused in the burning current of hate that surged like molten fire through his veins. No word of the old songs of Zion, sung in the old ignorant dreams of content, now rose up to charm away the foul fiend from his heart. His religion fell off like a worn-out garment. What had it done for him? What did it do for others? He had heard that the Bible sanctioned slavery; then he would never learn to read it, he thought, with an unappealing, dogged look at the lowering sky, as if with brutish accusation of the Great Avenger who sat silent behind that wall of thick cloud, hearing unmoved the cries of the oppressed, instead of riding on the whirlwind, a God of vengeance, to unloose the chains and let the captives go free. And will He not? Does He sit unheeding on the great white throne afar off, while the world, like a great machine which He has put in motion but does not control, goes on in its own course? Clem thought that the beautiful girl who now opened the door was one of His messengers; but the next moment he turned away, half in shame, half in sullen despair.

"Oh, poor Clem!" she exclaimed, looking at the maimed hand; "it was a dreadful thing to do—a wicked thing."

"Was it, Miss Dode?" he said, recognizing with quick instinct the compassion under the reproach. "Reckon I'd have done a heap better ef I'd jes' listened to Ole Sam, and cut my trote instead."

"Why, Clem," exclaimed Dora, feeling that her property was indeed uncertain, "are you ready to die?"

"Tort I was pious onst, Miss, for sure," said Clem, musingly. "Sartain I done got religion at dat are camp-meetin' in Randolph's Woods las' year, but I done loss him las' night. 'Pears like Ole Sam was a snatchin' de berry heart out of me wid his red-hot pinchers."

"Well, I have bought you, Clem."

The heavy face lighted up a little, the dull eyes quickened; it was only another servitude after all; but then it was another.

"I se serve you true, Miss Dode, faithful and true," he muttered.

"I do not doubt it, Clem. Some persons might," she said, feeling that the events of the past few days were not exactly calculated to inspire confidence; "but I shall trust you."

He followed her out of the close, small room, with its torpid air, down the dusty stairway and into the street, feeling that she was indeed the messenger of that God whom in his blind fury he had forsaken. Could he find his religion again? Could he ever re-enlist among the soldiers of the cross beneath a banner which bears this motto, "Love your enemies," while such hate to his young master still rankled and festered at his heart's core?

It was still daylight when Dora went out into the garden—a grim, gray daylight, with the sun dimly gleaming through a great pearly cloud, making it look like a huge opal with a flickering heart of flame. She shivered a little, though the air was sultry and the ground was reeking with hot vapor. Reginald was already there, pacing backward and forward, not impetuously, but in calm, assured waiting. In his vocabulary there was no such word as "fail." He stood still and watched the young girl as she came with a slow step toward him. The crimson shawl which she had wrapped around her made her face pallid, perhaps; the dull day had taken the lustre from her hair and the joyous light from her eye, and made her hand that he had seized as cold as a snow-flake.

She drew it away in a moment, sadly, with some weak, self-pitying thought, poor thing! of all she sacrificed; yet she began bravely:

"I have thought, Reginald, and decided. I can not be your wife."

He could not believe it. The gray light could not make his face whiter than it shone now, as he exclaimed, almost fiercely,

"You are wild, Dora; how can you try me so?"

"Because I have tried myself, and it has been a fiery trial, Rex. We could never be one; it would not be a true union, with such different faith and creeds."

"Who talks of such dead things as faith and creed?" he cried, impatiently, all the icy calm of his manner melting before his fervid love. "Our hearts are one. We love each other; that is enough."

"But my faith or creed is not a dead thing to me," said Dora, "but a most living reality. I fear to trust myself with one who mocks at any law of God or any right of man."

He did not speak for a moment. The sun broke through the pearly wall of cloud into rifts of gold; the veil of mist, torn into shreds, drifted away over the illimitable shoreless sea. The golden arrows of light pierced through the wreathing vapors and illumined Dora's face.

Reginald discerned something there which made him cry out, suddenly, "Yet you love me."

"Next to God and the right," answered Dora as solemnly as she had ever uttered a prayer. Surely so might the martyr feel at the stake when he saw the fair earth vanishing behind the devouring flame, and felt the sweetness of earth's hopes and loves die in his heart.

"And I can not control my belief."

"No," she whispered, softly, with a white despair chasing the flush of youth from her face.

"So there is no hope?"

"With God all things are possible."

"With your God, perhaps," he said. "There is a fresh wind springing up—it will chill you. Good-by, Dora. I wish the old house had burned to the ground last night with its master in it."

So he left her. Dora watched him go with quiet eyes, from which all hope and expectation had died. What need of passionate entreaty or heart-warm counsel now? God alone can give the believing heart. Far above the starry spheres, He looked down with infinite compassion, caring ever for His own. And she could still pray.

She took that thought back to her work-day life for comfort. She kept it still, when, more than two years after, she stood in the same place looking over the desolate land, clean swept by the besom of destruction. It was March; but the spring seemed to have lost a little of its olden glory—some shadow of ruin darkened it. The fences were partly destroyed, for the brave boys had needed fires in the raw spring days. Some of the old trees had disappeared also; but that gave a clearer outlook to the road which Dora was eagerly watching. Yes, the spring had come; the trees were draped in tender green; skies flushed and paled, flowers burgeoned and bloomed; nature in her mystic and unseen laboratories worked on as though there was no war to stain her fresh green-sward with brother's blood, to drown the voice of singing birds with booming cannon, to load the sweet-scented air with noisome vapors.

Mr. Thorpe had not fared well since the war. He came out now with a thin and care-worn face. He had tried to be neutral, but found sitting on the fence a most uncomfortable position. He had lost half his crop the last fall. The rebels had camped in one of his fields and used up his corn, helped themselves to his chickens and "fixins" till he was in a desperate condition. Being a Yankee he could not remonstrate. He was in hourly expectation now that a corps of Union soldiers would swoop down on him like birds of prey, and take all the rest.

"More fodder gone this mornin', Dode," he said, mournfully; "reckon old Bess 'll starve. Ashby's cavalry's scootin' reound, and their hosses do eat like all creation. Seems to me them critters in the army never do nothin' but eat; guess they git thin carryin' it."

"I wish we were far enough from here," said Dora, anxiously. "Father, can't you get away? You know you are for the Union in heart, and it's terrible to be living a lie."

"Wa'al, I dun know if I be altogether for the Union. I couldn't go it blind, ye see," said Mr. Thorpe, who never forgot policy even in the bosom of his family. "Remember what that feller's name was in the history ye was readin' the other night? I belong to his party, I reckon—the Trimmers."

"Oh! Lord Halifax," said Dora, smiling faintly.

"Yes, ye see, soon as he got on the Whig side he saw all the faults of that air party so plain he began to feel a leanin' to the Tories, and wicy wercy. That's the case with me. I know there's faults on both sides, and I keep out of extremes."

At this moment Dora discerned Clem drawing near the house. She met him at the gate with the eager question,

"What news?"

Clem's face has cleared a little since we saw him in jail. The vapid sullen look has passed away. "Some vague hope connected with "Lin-kun's army" quickens the sluggish tide in his veins; a sweet, subtle breath of life kindles there, of which he never speaks; he hides it away jealously in some secret corner of his great lumbering carcass, and is "all things to all men" in a sense unimagined by the Apostle Paul. He has been gently taught, however, and thinks he has found his religion again, though the clause "Love your enemies" has never been tried.

"I saw him, Miss Dode," he answered, in a low tone, as if there was one him in the universe. "He was riden long o' Marse Ashby, an' they say he's Captin. Mighty peert he looked too." But even as Clem spoke some of the old hate crept back, and gave a deeper shadow to his dark face.

Dora did not notice that. "Is it true," she asked, eagerly, "that the reb—that—we are retreating—I heard so yesterday; that we had evacuated Manassas, burned the huts where the troops wintered, and left only an empty camp for the enemy?"

Clem's eyes brightened. "Sure enough," he said, "I did yere dat. But some o' dem fellers at de Warren Green says deys fightin now like blazes near Winchester. Ashby's troops gone like mad to see 'bout it, and put deyre hoofs in de pie."

Dora paled a little. Would she never cease to be haunted by the ghosts of a buried past? Yet would she drink the water of Lethe if one held the magic draught to her lips? Ah, no! Better poignant pain than forgetfulness—better the peace that comes through suffering—

"Better to have loved and lost Than never to have loved at all."

Clem looked at her with a discerning eye. He remembered the time when the servants at Stonehenge confidently expected pretty Miss Dode to be their mistress. Even his dull eye could read some tragedy of pain and pathos in that fair face, although immortal peace had crowned it with a halo. Half answering the wistful yearning of that look, he said,

"It's a right smart chance to see a battle, Miss Dode."

"Would you like to go, Clem?"

"Nebber seen no fightin' ob dat kind—none ob de eddicated science fightin', but specs I'd enjoy lookin' on a heap; couldn't do nuffin' but look on," with a bitter glance at his maimed hand, and a thought of rumors he had heard of negro regiments at the North.

"But you might do some good," said Dora, eagerly; "even a cup of cold water at such a time. And, Clem, if you should have a chance to serve any one I know"—with a trembling pause—"you will do it for my sake."

Clem hesitated. How well he knew the unbreathed name hidden under those general words! At last he answered, letting the words drop slowly and without any enthusiasm, "Yes, Miss Dode, for your sake I done gib ole Sam hisself dat air glass ob water to cool his tongue."

"Oh, I shall not ask you to serve him," said Dora, smiling; "I don't count him among my friends. Just wait till I borrow old Bess for you;" and she walked slowly into the house, revolving what argument she could use persuasive enough to win her father. She found little difficulty though. The fact that he had sent his negro over to help would count well with the rebels; and even if the Yankees won, it might be turned the other way with the same facility with which he was in the habit of turning his political coat. Were there not two sides to every question?

So Clem rode away, and Dora watched him for a while with a shuddering thought of that battle-field "where the ranks were rolled in vapor and the winds were laid with sound." Was God met in judgment upon His people? Was He making the passions and even the sins of men to serve Him?

Clem had some such thought as he rode away—a lower, brutish thought, but the same in kind. We have never yet coined a lower vocabulary to interpret a slave's feelings. He felt as if he were just wakening from the torpor of a long sleep; the soft south wind seemed to sting his nerves to life; his sluggish blood heated strangely; the old hunger for life and freedom came back to him. Why, here was his chance. The two camps were near together. What could hinder him from going over to the Yankees? "The day of the Lord was at hand," they said; but could he wait for it? It might come when he was dead. Better go out to meet it. A steady glow burned in his gloomy eyes as he looked toward the North, where the sky shone blandly blue through fleecy golden-bordered clouds. All his dreams of Eden lay beyond those gates of pearl. Not poetic dreams, only a few homely thoughts of a little home and Clara—a free place to work in. You would despise such visions; but they shone like watch-fires for Clem through all the surging tide of memories. He did not forget Miss Dode and her kindness. He thought of her with a regretful tenderness, though he knew nothing of a paper safely laid away in her little desk, to be signed when she was of age. He was grateful, and he would prove it, he thought. He would serve her as he had promised, and then he would be free to take his own course. Even old Bess should be safely sent back to his master—and he patted the beast's neck tenderly, as if taking leave of an old friend, and gave her a drink for a parting libation at the next creek. So Clem did not stop at night, but pressed on. He had some dry pieces of bread and cheese about him, but in the fierce hunger for freedom that gnawed within him he hardly cared to eat. Once he made a prayer. Surely God sat still upon the great white throne, and was mighty to save him. Once he droned dully an old hymn that told of content under suffering. Could he ever be content to go back, even if it was God's will? Struggling with this knotty question he reached the Federal camp—faint, eager, hopeful now to solve the sorrowful problem of his life.

A raw Ohio boatman stopped chewing his tobacco for a moment, and ceased his sentinel march to give him a grunt of welcome. Contraband arrivals were getting rather frequent, and should be discouraged, he thought. Yet he saw the poor fellow needed his breakfast, and he told where he could get something to eat. The camp was nearly deserted; only a few to stand guard, while the main body advanced to the attack.

Clem was too restless to stand about idle. He strayed off into the woods, where a couple of brigades had gone in hopes of turning the enemy's flank. The fight was hot and fierce, he heard. Then this was the time to keep his promise to Miss Dode. How she would be watching for him for the next week! How eager to hear all! Then he would try and do something of which she might hear with joy.

When he reached the scene of conflict, however, the sharp morning air had cooled his enthusiasm; perhaps also the roar of cannon and the brave fellows biting the dust appalled him; he stole stealthily along, keeping at a reverent distance. Fierce thunderous vapor rolled over friend and foe, only lit by the cannons' belching fire. He could not help thinking of the last day, with a half fearful prayer.

Some one helped a wounded officer out of the ranks, and catching a glimpse of the dark shadow stealing near called out,

"Here, Ebony, get some water somewhere, the Captain's fainting," tossing him at the same time a drinking cup.

Clem took it mechanically. How odd that his first service should be a cup of cold water for a sufferer!—for one that it was harder for him to serve than old Sam himself, he thought, for he could not be mistaken in that face, ghastly and cold as it looked. Could he ever forget or mistake his young master, Reginald Fairfax? But what need for him to trouble himself? Let him die; it would be one less for the brave Yankees, his new friends, to fight—one less of the tyrants to trample down his race. Had there not been moments when, stung to madness, he could have taken the knife? Oh! but Christ had said, "If thine enemy thirst, give him drink." He was a heathen in those old fierce struggles, let him show himself a Christian now. So he pressed forward, part of his way exposed a little to the Yankee fire.

Reginald Fairfax had not fainted. He partly raised himself as Clem staggered to his side, spilling all the precious draught he had periled life to obtain. He turned in wonder.

"Why, Clem, old boy, are you wounded?"

"Beliebes I is, Massa," he said, faintly, some fatal numbness beginning to steal over his face.

"And you were getting me that water, poor fellow?"

"Sorry it's done spill," he faltered. "I did it for de good Lord. Ye'll forgive me dat fire biziness, Marse Rex, and de rest."

"Oh, Clem, you must forgive me—I did not know how you suffered!" exclaimed Reginald, in real princely humility. "You have risked your life for me. I will buy you back, and make you free."

"Ah, I'se bought by annodder Marster; ye remember, Marse Rex, 'ye're bought wid a price.' He's gwine to take me home now, I reckon, and He'll make me free. My hebenly Marster knows I'se tried right hard to serve Him."

Reginald Fairfax listened in wonder. Faint and wounded himself—so near, perhaps, to that perilous plunge into dark and infinite space, could he await the chill and deathly angel as calmly? The icy fetters of his cold skepticism melted away before this slave's childlike trust. By the side of a dying negro he learned the secret of faith. Could he so walk the untraveled glooms and avenues of death? Ah! there was no hand to guide him, no voice to break the deathly silence, with the silver sweet accents, "It is I, be not afraid." He could not help saying,

"But, Clem, it's all so dark; can you understand?"

"Don't know nuffin, Marse Rex, but reckon de good Lord knows every ting, an' I jes' feels His han in de dark leading me on." It was dark indeed; the darkness that no earthly sun can illumine, no earthly dawn dispel. Death set his seal upon the rigid brow; the slave's bonds were broken forever; he was free. Then Reginald Fairfax fainted.

Among the June roses, with their hearts of fire and fragrance, walked two lovers: the young man pale and wan as one who had come up out of the valley of the shadow of death, the girl radiant and blushing like the flowers. But Reginald Fairfax had brought some treasures from those shores of gloom; not in vain had the chilly waters touched his feet.

"Yes, he died for me, poor Clem!" he said, softly. "I could never doubt again that negroes have souls, after seeing him wait for death with all the heroism of any white hero."

"Say rather with the peaceful resignation of any Christian child," said Dora.

"Since I've been out of the heat and fury of the war," said Reginald, thoughtfully, "perhaps since I have been trying feebly to serve poor Clem's heavenly Master, I see things in a new light. If we could only change our social relations, or untangle this great political snarl, I feel as if I must turn mad reformer, and shake down the structures built on the old social ties. What can one do?"

"Nothing! We must wait God's time," said Dora, calmly. "'They also serve who only stand and wait.' Some better day will dawn for us all. We can catch its light behind the very thunder-clouds of war; perhaps because those very clouds shall clear our social atmosphere."

"I can wait," said Reginald, "since we may wait together."

PRESENTATION WEEK AT YALE.

THE summer term in Yale College has two high festivals which are worthy of special mention. One of these, Commencement Week, has already been described in a recent volume of this Magazine; the other, Presentation Week, is the task which I assign to myself now. It is a literary festival of less dignity and importance than Commencement, but one in which undergraduates more heartily engage, and which shows to a stranger much of the inner life of an American university. Its leading feature is Class-Day; but around this are grouped many associations peculiar to each class; and the several classes at this time are as jubilant as ever are the alumni at Commencement. But all these in their order.

We must go back a little to catch the breath of college life. During the hot days of May and June, while Nature has put on her most charming dress, and the streets and suburbs of New Haven have invited to cool and shady retreats, the Senior class have been steadily cramming for the final biennial examination, going on stated days to Alumni Hall, where a small round table, with pen, paper, ink, and chair, was provided for each one, and where, under strict tutorial eyes, they were required, in a given time, to write out answers to certain questions on some one department of the studies for the last two years. These examinations are intentionally severe. There are few who can answer all the questions on each paper. There are always one or two who, having slipped along easily so far, are suddenly brought to their senses by the prospect of not being allowed to graduate with their class. With the promised diploma of a B.A.

almost within their grasp, the honors are beyond their reach, and alma mater is forced to leave them "unhonored and unsung." Sometimes a class will intercede for some boon companion; sometimes the Faculty have compassion on defective scholarship; but hardly a class is graduated without losing one or more members at this final test. I shall never forget the look of blank despair on the face of the Falstaff of my own class when it was whispered around that he had been plucked. Nothing could save him. He went away in disgrace to join his fortunes with the Confederates, and long ere this may be sleeping in a soldier's grave.

On the last session of the biennial the President is seen walking nervously up to one of the tutorial thrones. He has come in to announce the successful competitors for the Townsend prize essays. These had been given out at the close of the last term to the whole Senior class. They are among the highest honors of the University. How eagerly are a hundred faces turned to the President as he reads, with a clear, rapid voice, the six names. Pen in hand, there are certain hearts which beat tumultuously; there are faces pale from fear or sudden disappointment; there are six pair of eyes unspeakably bright with joy. Again the heavy task-work is resumed; beads of sweat stand upon many brows; nothing is heard save the scratch of a pen, the slow changing of feet, the frequent passing on tip-toe to the water-jug. And so the work goes on, each day like the first, till the biennial days are everlastingly over. Yet, if one might be allowed to examine carefully the dress of certain Seniors, he would find curious devices for making biennials easy. Upon the wristbands and shirt-bosoms, in the watch-cases and pockets, and even on the finger-nails, he would discover mathematical solutions, obscure dates and names, brief notes of metaphysics and political economy. The masterly efforts to use these materials and yet preserve the air of innocent thoughtfulness are held to be the ne plus ultra of skill by undergraduates.

All this biennial work ends the week before Presentation, and Presentation is always just six weeks before Commencement. It is necessary that each Senior shall creditably pass this examination before he can be presented to the President for the degree of B.A. The class then rest from their labors till the following Wednesday. On that morning, at ten o'clock, they all meet at the President's Lecture-room, from whence they soon go in procession, headed by a Professor or the Senior Tutor, to the College Chapel, where the President is waiting to receive them. Taking their old seats for the last time, the Professor proceeds to state to the highest member of the Faculty that these men—reading their names in order—have been found worthy to receive the diploma, or academical sheepskin. The address is usually in Latin. To this the President replies in an elegant Latin speech, congratulating the class upon having earned so high a dignity, and expressing his best wishes for their future. The old chapel is crowded with admiring friends, to hear the class poem and oration. This is the choice part of Presentation. The best poet in the class has long ago been selected to prepare a poem suitable for the occasion; and the man of commanding intellect who was most popular with his class-mates was chosen to deliver the oration. Both are now to be pronounced. In front of the pulpit a platform has been raised, and upon this directly you see a young man advancing, who wears upon his brow both the dignity and laurels of the class poet. I do not mean that he is always a poet in proprio nomine. A college poet is not, therefore, the people's poet; but the title simply signifies one who can compose agreeable verses. He bows gracefully to the President, then to his class, and then begins the recitation of his poem. It is written in a variety of measures—now grave, now gay—passing easily from blank to lyric verse. Sometimes the poet takes a theme. One of the happiest poems ever delivered was on the Katydids which make the college elms vocal in autumn; but usually he wanders at his own sweet will among the topics suggested by the hour. And so of the orator. His subject finds him. The last day of a college course suggests many thoughts. It is the completing of a term of life. Hence the duties and responsibilities, the hopes and joys of the scholar, make up his theme; and when the class is fortunate enough to secure their representative man the oration is one of rare interest. The farewell addresses to the Faculty and the Class, shorn of their Commencement dignity, are always touching. None appreciate these tributes better than the Faculty themselves; and, to their honor be it said, they are given spontaneously and deservedly.

The oration over, the long, bent figure, crowned with a noble brow, slowly rises from behind the pulpit, and an excited whisper passes through the galleries. Certain names are to be read, and the mere mention of those names in this place, and from those lips, is to confer great honor upon the undergraduate. Whose name shall be called? Many hearts, whose hidden passion now hangs upon the merest utterance of a name, are beating rapidly; many ears are wide open; many a student is ready to hide his head in disappointment, or lift it up with the modest assurance of fame. The names are to be read of those in the Sophomore class who have won prizes in English composition; those in the Freshman class who have gained mathematical prizes; those in the Junior class who have won the prize poem (it is sometimes a divided honor); and the several successful aspirants for the Woolsey, Berkeley, Bristed, and Hurlbut Scholarships. The bare reading of these names is to have a decisive influence, "for better for worse," upon half the undergraduates. The dead silence during the reading, the anxious faces, the suspended breath, show the intense agitation. It is a real relief when the College Glee Club sing the parting

Ode, written by a member of the graduating class, always to the tune of "Auld lang syne," and the pent-up disappointments and rejoicings find unembarrassed expression. And so, too, do the feelings of the class in whose honor the day is celebrated find utterance through their song.

But we pass now to the less intellectual, but perhaps more enjoyable features of Class-Day. And, first, we go with the Faculty to the Presentation dinner. It is served in Alumni Hall. At one o'clock the Corporation of the University, inviting the class and the graduates who may be present to dine with them, assemble in Trumbull Gallery, and forming a procession, go, seniores priores, to the Hall. At the door the dignitaries pass with uncovered heads through lines of Seniors, with heads likewise uncovered, and all entering and seating themselves at the tables where so recently the Senior class have labored, the somewhat peculiar dinner is formally begun. Grace is said; then come a few words of hearty welcome from the President to the graduating class, that they may forget effectually any unpleasant memories of hard work connected with the Hall; and then all press up to the long tables in the centre, where cold meats and bread and salad are in abundance, and where each one is expected to help himself. The only beverage is lemonade, but this is always cool and good. This is the first course, speedily eaten, and, with abundance of good-fellowship, heartily enjoyed. No place excels New Haven in the delicious strawberries which, forty years ago, good Dr. Dwight introduced; and these, with what other delicacies of the season can be procured, form the second course. But it is not the dinner which alma mater provides so much as the genial and informal acquaintance which here begins between professors and students, and which is always a chief attraction to the returning graduate, that makes the special charm of these Presentation dinners. That reverential fear which till now imposed silence and awe in the presence of a college professor here passes away forever. The Senior is to-day a free man. He has a new spirit. He looks out for the first time to the life beyond the University. Henceforth he is excused from attendance at prayers, and from all college duties. He can read at his leisure; he can pack up and go away altogether; he can leisurely write his Commencement oration, to be delivered just six weeks from to-day; he can explore the environs of the city, and lose himself in delightful solitudes; and he has that authority and dignity within college walls which success always gives in the eyes of those who are only aspirants. It is the season of rest and calm outlook which alma mater furnishes to her dutiful children before they are beyond her nursing care.

But I am getting beyond my story. This dinner does not conclude the exercises of the day. The Faculty have done their part, presenting the class for honors and making them their guests at dinner; now the class are to have their own farewell exercises. These take place always on the college green in front of old South Middle, and beneath the shade of the venerable elms. At three o'clock the class gather and form themselves into a circle upon the lawn; within are a plentiful supply of long clay pipes and mild smoking tobacco, a barrel of lemonade, a brass band, and one or two deal tables; without are under-class-men, graduates, young ladies, soldiers, and curious members of the Legislature. Seats are provided as far as possible for those outside, while the class either recline upon the grass or sit upon the pine benches which form the outer rim of the circle. Away yonder the college buildings present a gay appearance; ladies, for the nonce, have taken possession of the windows, and bright colors and beaming eyes are seen where, in sober college days, might be noticed, a torn slipper, a variegated study-gown, an open book, or a sleepy Freshman. Now the pipes are lighted, the Presentation songs are distributed, the band strikes up, Gaudeamus rings out beneath the elms—the exercises of the afternoon have begun in earnest. Stray beams of hot June sunshine slip through the foliage and brighten the group below.

Joy and mirth and melody rule the hour. The classes are separated early in the course into four divisions, for each of which the class appoints a historian, whose business it is to collect all the scraps he can in regard to the doings of those who are prematurely graduated; and these histories are now read, and to the class, crammed as they are with college and personal jokes, they are the jolliest part of the entertainment. Gaudeamus finished, the class historian of the first division mounts a small rostrum and begins his record, but not in peace. His story is too mirthful to restrain involuntary bursts of laughter, and every sharp hit at some unlucky wight is met with roars of applause, and every hero of a short cut through the college is cheered when his story is told. "Hip! hip!" says the historian, and three-times-three give the class in response. How eagerly do the crowd outside listen for the telling points, and smile approvingly at what they can not understand! And how much do the class enjoy their good jokes! These histories are the marrow of college wit and fun. The first one ended, the manly chorus of a hundred voices swells the melody of a Presentation song. Then comes another history; then songs again; then lively airs from the band;—all carried on orderly, yet carelessness and joyousness ruling the hour, the enthusiasm not lessened by frequent potations of lemonade, or the more frequent sallies of wit, or the short speeches of old college friends, or the increasing hoarseness of the class; but each member becoming more visibly affected, more prone to mirth or tears, as the hours speed by. The crowd gaze on, laugh at times, then listen for the good things with eagerness sharpened by catching half a joke; but the class have long ago forgotten the crowd; they are too absorbed in their own deeply interesting present to heed ought else. The thought that this very sun will see their college life broken, their class ties sundered, their genial fellowship forever after a thing of memory, and that never again will they all meet in this world, sobers these youthful hearts. If a multitude to a thoughtful mind is always a sad sight, how much more is a class of young men whose aims, whose joys, whose sorrows, whose lives have been all one for four years, and whose ties of friendship and blendings of lives are now to meet the rude jostlings of far other interests. It is a sad hour!

And now all but the parting and the Joy song are sung; the class stand in a circle; the hearty but solemn farewell begins; they have each determined that nothing unmanly shall escape them here; they will conquer tears; the first few hand-shakings are cordial, but no tears. "Good-by, old fellow!" "God bless you, my dear Harry!" are heard from every side; and there is the silent pressing of the hand which means more than words, and the choked utterance which means more still. Hardly have half the good-bys been said when there is not a dry eye in the circle. Some weep like children, others are pale from emotion; the mirth which an hour ago so completely ruled is all hushed; that eager crowd of ladies and students and strangers is all hushed in sympathy too. It is a most solemn hour in these young lives; and when they begin the parting song how changed is the tone! There are faltering lips and weeping eyes, and the notes are low and broken; and the musicians themselves have moistened eyes. And at such a moment it is not unmanly to weep. It is the same feeling which comes over the brothers and sisters in a family when they send out the loved ones to distant shores, with no hope of meeting again till Charon's boat shall have carried them all beyond.

Instinctively the crowd gives way; instinctively the band takes the lead; instinctively the class forms two by two; and marching through the different halls, they cheer each building in order, and then, turning to the library wall, they plant the class ivy to keep their memory green at alma mater, and sing their Joy song, each one in turn throwing his handful of earth upon the consecrated plant. And then, at the close of day and in the long June twilight, they serenade the homes of the President and each Professor, giving lusty cheers to show their goodwill, and often receiving kind words of sympathy in return. Yet even this does not exhaust the day. The President usually gives a reception to the class in the evening; and at nine o'clock you may find assembled beneath the honored presidential roof as gay and joyous a company as often gathers beneath the classic elms. The Professors have laid aside their dignity, the Seniors their reverential formality, and the cultured and charming ladies of the city, gliding in between the hitherto separated social elements, infuse life and spirit into the whole party, while the now-venerable Dr. Woolsey moves in and out among them as blithe as the youngest. So pass away pleasantly the evening hours, and so ends Presentation Day.

Changes come with this day also in the other classes. To-morrow morning at prayers the Juniors will take the Seniors', the Sophomores the Juniors', the Freshmen the Sophomores' seats; there will be in appearance but three classes in college for the next six weeks, and these changes are usually marked by certain demonstrations in each class. The Juniors last evening held the Wooden Spoon Exhibition; the Sophomores put on their biennial caps; and the Freshmen used to hold their pow-wow on Wednesday evening, during the hours of the President's reception. The red caps of the present year are quite an improvement upon the willow canes of former days; they are a step toward the student badges of the English universities, and are by all means to be commended. But the Freshmen are sadly put to shame now by the vigorous efforts of the Faculty, even to the threat of the expulsion of seventy men from the class, to put down their pow-wow. This is an institution of some fifteen years' antiquity. It is the most characteristic of college gatherings. The following is a description of the pow-wow in 1857. In its main features it is true of every year: "About nine o'clock blasts from sundry tin horns in the Freshmen quarters reminded the weary and sleepy that Presentation Day 'wasn't dead yet.' As it grew later and darker, Freshmen, covered as to their faces with burnt-cork, Freshmen with striped pants, Freshmen with hooped skirts, Freshmen with hoofs and tails, mild Freshmen with coats turned inside out, fierce Freshmen with big beards and bob-tailed trainer-coats, Freshmen with bears' heads, and Freshmen with bare heads—in fine, Freshmen with all sorts of conceivable and practicable disguises, each one armed with a banger as big as he could lift and a tin horn as big as he could blow, issued from their rooms, and marching sternly across the college-yard, assembled at the State House steps for the purpose of celebrating their entrance upon Sophomore year. After orating in spite of the noisy Sophomores, who kept up a continual shouting of 'Hear!' 'Hear!' 'Good!' 'Time for you, Fresh., to be in bed!' and sundry other equally entertaining and witty remarks, they sang a Greek song that looked quite natural, and then formed the procession. The boarding-schools were serenaded as usual, only one, however, acknowledging the compliment. At half past two in the morning squads of muddy Freshmen crossed the college green and disappeared among the brick buildings, there to dream for an hour or two of hobgoblins, Greek songs, mud-puddles, serenades, fair faces, morning flunk, and dunning pow-wow committees." So much in memory of a by-gone festival.

While the Freshmen have thus been praising themselves and abusing Sophomores and tutors, a much more mysterious work, after midnight, has been going on in the two upper classes.

The Seniors, fresh from the President's levée, have been initiating the Juniors into the secrets of the Senior societies; and since the youthful spirits of undergraduates have been deprived of expression in the pow-wow and the burial of Euclid, all these initiations have increased in rigor and deviltry. Yet as they are secret I shall not disclose them. The very names of these societies—Spade and Grave, Skull and Bones, Scroll and Key—have an air of mystery. Let the secrets be found out by the initiated, and by these only. In place of the pow-wow this year the Freshmen, at a certain hour of Presentation Day, marched up and down Chapel Street as a body-guard to Hannibal, who, attired in a scholar's habit, a huge book under his arm, a pair of eye-glasses over his nose, one of the new red biennial caps of the Sophomores upon his head, and a sporting cane in his hand, was personating the high feeling of the new-fledged Juniors as well as any negro could. Thus college fun, denied expression in one way, finds vent in another; and while the keen-eyed tutors are urging the abolition of this or that old custom, they are only feeding the vices of college life with fresh flames. Young men at the university will always be youthful, and the sooner you legitimate, as in the case of the Wooden Spoon, their attempts at amusement, and make them respectable, the more you do toward correcting the abuses and vices into which students are so apt to fall.

This very Wooden Spoon Exhibition was once so frowned upon by the Faculty that its meetings were held in secret at the Temple, and none were admitted save those who could pass the most searching tests of identity; yet many a time, even with these precautions, they were badly interfered with by the sudden presence of a Professor. But finally, in 1852, the Faculty concluded to let them alone; and since then the performances, always of course a burlesque upon the Junior Exhibition which is held a few weeks earlier, have increased each year in respectability and interest, till this year, on the eve of Presentation, the "Spoon" was attended by an audience of over three thousand in the new Music Hall, and in point of brilliancy and elegance is surpassed by no public gathering in the whole University calendar. At first the Spoon, from which the exhibition takes its name, was presented to the greatest glutton in the class—and tradition says that a most worthy D.D., now resident in the Elm City, was the first recipient; next it was given to the man who took the lowest appointment at Junior Exhibition; now it is given to a man who has certainly a low appointment or none at all, and who, in respect of personal popularity and good fellowship, leads his class. An essential requisite, too, in a Spoon man, in these days, is a full purse and a generous heart. So that, it certainly seems, as does Junior Exhibition, its representative man for certain things. The Spoon itself, made of rose-wood and elegantly carved, hardly comes within the dimensions of common use, though it might have done very well for the "sons of Anak," or the giants of those elder days. The leading feature of the evening is the presentation and reception of this Spoon. The cleverest man in the class receives it, and the next cleverest man presents it, and their speeches are always happy and genial. Another feature is the excellent music from one of the best bands in the country. Still another is the scenic representations of college life. And still another is the burlesque philosophical oration and the half Latin, half Saxon Salutatory, in which the fair sex, especially the boarding schools of the city, receive flattering yet amusing compliments. And still another, and perhaps as pleasant as any, is the singing of original songs in honor of the Wooden Spoon and of the starlit nights of June. And yet one more is the sea of upturned, smiling faces which on all sides greet the eye. Happy is the young lady who can get an invitation to this most brilliant and fashionable of exhibitions, and some come hundreds of miles for the purpose! And happier yet is the hero of the Wooden Spoon, holding in his hand not the honors of scholarship, but the one high social honor which the class by one consent confers upon its most genial member. And the Wooden Spoon itself—

"Hail! with joyful songs we meet thee!
Grace and beauty smiling greet thee!
Peerless boon!
Fadeless laurel-wreaths entwine thee,
And a thousand hearts enshrine thee,
Wooden spoon!"

The Promenade Concert, given on Monday evening by the band engaged for the Wooden Spoon and Presentation, has lately become a signal feature of the week; and not less so is the serenade given by the same band on Tuesday evening, after the Wooden Spoon is over. The rich music floating through the foliage of the elms and into the open windows of dreaming students at the solemn hour of one is most enchanting. I know of no words in the language which so fully convey to the memory the impressions of such music as these from the pen of Percival. They are an imitation of Goethe's Night-Song:

"What sound of midnight music
Comes stealing on my ear?
How sweet, and oh! how holy,
The solemn strain I hear!

"How sweet, and oh! how holy,
It echoes far and near,
As if an angel warbled
The solemn strain I hear.

"As if an angel warbled
From out the highest sphere;
Sure mortal could not utter
The solemn strain I hear.

"Sure mortal could not utter
A song so soft and clear;
Oh! might it ever linger,
The solemn strain I hear.

"Oh! might it ever linger,
Thus breathing in my ear,
That sound of midnight music,
The solemn strain I hear."

The remainder of the week is hardly changed from the ordinary routine of university life. The Freshmen and Juniors resume their studies, feeling newly elated by their advance in rank; the Sophomores are busy preparing for their first biennial paper; and the Seniors are resting their jaded spirits, visiting the city with their lady friends, or getting ready for the final exercises of Presentation on Friday afternoon. This is the speaking of the Townsend prize essays for the De Forest gold medal; and this is the highest merely literary honor which alma mater has to offer. The essays are usually well written, and the speaking is much better than is found upon the Commencement stage. The audience is intellectual, attentive, critical. In the view of undergraduates, with whom there is ever a tendency to undervalue the benefits of the drudgery of scholarship, the De Forest medal man is the most promising of his class; and in the race of life it has been proved again and again that he outstrips the hard-working valedictorian. Another feature of Friday (it was so in my time) is the posting of the Commencement appointments, fresh from the Senior Tutor's hands and in the familiar handwriting of the President, upon the side-posts of the old Lyceum. I fancy the prospective valedictorian is up earlier than usual this morning, taking a peep in the early twilight at the paper which decides his own and the rank of his class; nor is he the only one; and many another is late at prayers that morning to see how the class have turned out. If six hearts throb with emotion during the delivery of the Townsends, I know a hundred are quite as agitated while the eyes glance down this irreversible list.

I have not yet quite exhausted the amusements of the week. On Thursday afternoon there is usually a boat-race for the coming university regatta; and since the gymnasium has made such demands upon physical strength, there are often on Friday or Saturday evenings the annual exhibition of gymnastic feats. It is always largely attended, and the performances are often exceedingly difficult and amusing.

Thus ends Presentation Week. It offers a sharp contrast to the more outward festivities of Commencement, is more peculiar, more characteristic, is entered into more heartily by undergraduates, and is rapidly becoming in the eyes of strangers the chief collegiate festival of the year. The two are as different as two literary festivals can be. The alumnus would by no means miss Commencement; nor would the student any the less miss the keen wit and rich amusement, and the turning of college inside out, which Presentation with its associate festivals affords. Each have their place; neither can be spared. Let alma mater cherish each with assiduous care, ever remembering to root out kindly what is only bad, and to foster all that ministers to simple enjoyment and refreshes the spirits of restless youth.

THE WEDDING.

O SUMMER day, shake down your light,
And flood the chancel where they wed!
Come, summer night, with moon and star,
Your softer splendors softlier shed!

O summer surf of summer sea,
Fill all the night with low replies!
Come wandering winds from wandering waves,
And breathe their drowsy melodies!

O summer dawn, all tenderly
With amber fires break up the night!
Come tardily, O summer sun,
And blush to bring thy ruder light!

O summer month, with fiercer heat
Choke down the cannon's warring words!
Come, murmuring maize, and whispering wheat,
And peaceful flutes of summer birds!

O summer seasons long delayed,
Nurse choicer fires in yonder blue!
Come, fruitful years! Hence, grief and tears!
God bless the beautiful and true!

AUNT THORNEYPINE.

I AM sure I often wish that I were not related to or acquainted with Aunt Thorneypine. In my early and virtuous youth I remember being properly shocked at people who were accustomed coolly to state in my presence that they disliked their relations. A little more cognizance of the ways of this extraordinary world has induced me to think that possibly it might not be difficult to say something even in favor of such sinners.

Aunt Thorneypine is not of these. She must love her entire (and very large) family connection with an impartial and intense affection, if we judge from the manner in which she bestows her society upon them. Her youngest niece, who married a clergyman and went to Ohio, receives almost as many visits from her as her two nephews who live respectively in Washington and Philadelphia; and those of her kin who reside in Boston and New York can not complain of being neglected by the old lady. Why do I call her old? If any body ever set Time at defiance it was our stout, healthy, eternally-middle-aged Aunt Thorneypine.

Where was Uncle Thorneypine? He was dead. Two years of marriage had, a great while ago, been the death of him. Where were her two sons? Gone to sea from their earliest youth. Nobody ever heard much about them. Aunt Thorneypine lived on a very handsome annuity, and her means and time were her own. She seemed to have within her the spirit of a female Wandering Jew. Perambulation appeared to be a leading passion in her composition. I never knew her to remain for two consecutive winters in the same boarding-house or hotel (for Aunt Thorneypine abominated housekeeping), or even much in the same city. "Why should

I take a house," our dear aunt would ask, "when there are so many kind friends ever ready to receive me?"

This remark was based on a fallacy. So far from being always ready to receive our aunt, we were sometimes most particularly unready. As she was a person who commonly consulted her own convenience in most matters, the times and seasons of her visitations depended upon things with which we had nothing to do. Aunt Thorneypine was like Encke's or Biela's comet—certain to come again, though the precise period of her arrival was not decided on. One thing was a fixed fact—times of joy and sorrow inevitably brought our aunt to us. She was as punctual at funerals and on sad occasions as she was at christenings and weddings; and it never seemed to occur to her that when a family is plunged into mourning by the loss of one of its members, or when a wedding is to take away another, the presence of a self-invited guest, even a relative, is very often a great nuisance.

Of all her relations Aunt Thorneypine was, with the exception of one or two, the best provided with pecuniary resources. But then she would remark that her means were limited enough for all she had to do. And when you consider the immense distances she traveled, and the number of hobbies on which, one after another, she generally mounted, perhaps this was so. I know that she sometimes gave money to societies and charities, which I thought would have been better bestowed on some of her own kith and kin. As in all large families, there were in ours some unfortunates with whom the world had not gone very well. Aunt Thorneypine often comes to stay with our cousin Lucy Anne, who is a widow with four boys to bring up; and I must say it fills me with indignation to hear our dear aunt holding forth about industrial societies, etc., etc., while those poor little fellows sit there with threadbare jackets, and their mother's features are worn with exertion and anxiety.

Aunt Thorneypine is a most indefatigable beggar for charities and general benevolences. Her pocket is usually well provided with concert tickets, subscription lists, and long appeals from those who want assistance; and she commonly has a set of pets and protégés who are often (I must say) selected with very little judgment. I have once or twice been very thoroughly deceived by people she recommended, and in future shall beware of the same. Aunt Thorneypine's method with a popular or fashionable charity was this: She modestly subscribed a very insignificant sum herself, and then, setting out on a general tour among her friends, she dunned and tormented them until even the hardest-hearted were ashamed, and gave something to be rid of her. On the soft-hearted she had no mercy, but ruthlessly picked their pockets of all they could give. She had a real passion for getting other people to bestow their money and time as it suited her. After Aunt Thorneypine had brought in a large amount it was usually entered in some newspaper or magazine list as "Ladies of — through Mrs. Thorneypine." And she got a good deal of credit in this way.

Last winter Aunt Thorneypine sent me a basket made of shells (hideously ugly), which was the work of one of her protégées, and cost fifty dollars, with a note requesting that I would purchase it from the bearer, who was a most respectable person, and wanted to raise three hundred dollars toward her rent. I sent the woman and the elegant corbeille about their business, and wrote a note to my dear aunt, in which I stated that whatever I had to spare was for poor Lucy Anne and her large family, who had been going through a winter of illness, and that I should be very grateful if Aunt Thorneypine could do something for her niece. I never received any answer to this note; but Aunt Thorneypine always says, when poor Lucy Anne is mentioned, that she was very foolish to marry a struggling physician, and what can she expect?

Poor Lucy Anne! certainly not very much. Little from the world, and nothing from Aunt Thorneypine.

Aunt generally came two or three times a year to visit us, a large family consisting of father, mother, and eight children. As I mentioned, her arrival was frequently both unexpected and inconvenient. My father, an amiable, kind-hearted man, often gently attempted to fix our aunt to particular periods of time. For instance, he would invite her to visit us in the month of February. In return Aunt Thorneypine would write a long letter describing her engagements, and declining his invitation. She would appoint the month of April as the season for making a sojourn with us, and generally she kept her word.

The reason why Aunt Thorneypine demanded and received such homage from her relations was, that when a young girl she had for a year or two had the care of her nine brothers and sisters. A great many people have had the same, and never thought of demanding eternal payment for such a debt; but Aunt Thorneypine seemed to feel that, do what we would, she never could be requited.

The experience of life generally goes against modest merit. He who grasps at more than his share is more likely to find that others make way for him in the end than the over-modest man is to obtain what he actually merits. I don't know that our aunt ever reasoned in this way; but she instinctively acted in such a manner as to prove that my view is correct. Somehow nobody could, would, or might resist Aunt Thorneypine.

Perhaps you might like to know some of those pleasing traits in Aunt Thorneypine's character which so endeared her to her friends. Among other things, she might be said to have what an ignorant phrenologist once called the organ of casualty in a high degree. One of Tieck's German stories is about a lady called Die Federtante—Anglice, "Aunt Feathers"—so named from the plumes she generally wore, whose arrival in a family seemed to produce fits of illness among the children. This was not the case with us. Aunt Thorneypine's magic powers were limited exclusively to her own performances. I never knew her match for setting herself on fire—breaking windows, mirrors, and tumblers—losing her trunk, her watch, or her keys, and upsetting tea, chocolate, coffee, butter, and ink, over the richest carpets. During one of her six weeks' visits she generally managed to leave the mark of her chair by the fire in a worn-out place in the carpet aforesaid; and she was commonly fatal to sofa springs and fancy straw chairs. Wherever she staid the servants soon found that the principal part of their duty was waiting upon Aunt Thorneypine. It made no difference whether it was at Cousin Oliver's in Boston, where they had six servants and a carriage and horses, or at Cousin Mary's in L—, where they kept only two domestics; they all had to wait on her.

As her brothers and sisters died in the regular course of nature Aunt Thorneypine transferred her attentions to their children, and seemed "par droit de conquête ou par droit de naissance," to be as inevitable as death, taxation, or our own national debt. Nor need you suppose that any thing but warm, cheerful rooms, an excellent table, and constant attention can be agreeable to our darling aunt. She is an admirable judge of most things; and if your butcher fails to give you the best of every thing, he will be detected and exposed in the gentlest manner by our aunt. She is by nature a critic, and you had better not attempt to put her off with second-rate articles of any kind.

Our aunt was never behindhand in expressing a proper sense of the attentions which we have all shown her for so many years. She is in the habit of making to all the family presents in turn, chiefly of her own work; and the indisposition which we all had to receive these gifts shows what a high-minded family we universally were. She sent Cousin Mary, on her last birthday, a pink and green knitted worsted nubie, and a large, old-fashioned rotary cooking stove, which she had once taken for a debt. Poor Mary, who lived in a tiny baby-house of a dwelling, was driven nearly to madness by the presence of this huge interloper where he clearly was not needed. And her husband, a waggish clergyman, quoted, with shouts of laughter, "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes," as he told his dismayed and puzzled wife that this was the first time he ever thought her Aunt Thorneypine was a Greek.

I never shall forget an incident of my childhood, which has made an ineffaceable impression. It was the last night of April. My father was to give up his house on the ensuing day; and the family, after looking at denuded rooms, packing-cases full of furniture, and crates full of china, were about to retire at ten o'clock sufficiently fatigued, as may be supposed, when such a ringing was heard at the bell as threatened to demolish that article, and the maid in alarm, flying to the bell, discovered Aunt Thorneypine, upheld in the arms of two stout gentlemen of Irish persuasion. Having set out unexpectedly on a visit to us she had broken her leg en route, and here she was, a spectacle for a good Samaritan. I never shall forget that weariful night; fires were made and beds put up; doctors were run after and dragged from comfortable homes, and it was evident on every side that some great calamity had befallen a generally peaceful and unobtrusive family. Aunt Thorneypine and her broken leg on this occasion only staid with us a week, and at the end of that time we completed our "moving," two of the servants having meanwhile given warning.

If such were my early experiences of my dear aunt, what were my later ones, when, my parents being dead, and the family dispersed, I had the pleasure of receiving her in my own house! By one of those freaks of fortune which sometimes occur, I had married a young man whose mother had been a niece, not of aunt but of uncle Thorneypine. "By this double connection, my dear Grizel," my kind relative would say, "I feel more strongly bound to you both than ever." Indeed the good lady much prefers our house to most others in the family connection. I think that no one of our cousins is more favored than ourselves, except Cousin Oliver, who lives in Boston, and keeps his carriage and horses. His wife, I have often thought, would like to rout Aunt Thorneypine when she comes as the invader of her hearth, but being a timid, delicate little woman, she is afraid of getting the worst of it.

I never can sit in my own parlor when Aunt Thorneypine comes. The servants are exasperated beyond what their always admirable tempers can quite bear by the number of callers. On one occasion the door-bell rang forty times in one day, and in consequence of this overwhelming fact the waitress, a young lady of sensitive feelings, retired into the kitchen and burst into tears. Aunt Thorneypine always has a perfect levée of people that I don't know. Charitable agents, doctors, public lecturers, people that have property to sell, beggars (rich and poor), and "citizens generally," as the newspapers say when describing the rear of a procession. This sort of thing goes on from morning until night, and is, as may be supposed, far from pleasant. I generally run away, nor am I missed by Aunt Thorneypine, who is uncereemonious herself, and don't notice whether other people are so or not. The last time but one that she came to us, we were surprised by breakfast-time coming without our aunt. We rang bells repeatedly, but still she came not. It was Sunday morning, and aunt was generally regular at church; so in considerable alarm Horace and I hastened to her room, and he remarked, chemin faisant, that if any thing had happened to the poor old lady I should regard my many sarcasms with respect to her with much remorse. We knocked at the door on the outside, and Aunt Thorneypine on the inside (showing that at any rate she was not dead), and Horace, having bawled through the keyhole to know what was the matter, our aunt bawled back again (through the same aperture) that she was locked in. And so she was. The lock was hopelessly damaged, and it was not until some hours after that we were able, by breaking open the door, to release our dear relative from her retirement, so well had she taken herself prisoner. Aunt is also perfectly incorrigible as to dinner hours; she somehow never notices how she keeps people waiting. However, she always has so many engagements and appointments with people that I suppose this is the reason that she is hardly ever up to time.

It is quite impossible to narrate all the remarkable adventures our aunt has had while staying with us. Once she came (as usual unexpectedly), and found us quite crowded with company. They happened to be formally invited guests, who could not be put in the garret, though Aunt Thorneypine looked (I thought) as if she would like to send them there. We hurried the three children out of the nursery, and sent them into the attic (where they caught three bad colds), and placed Aunt Thorneypine on a light single bed in their room. Thus having provided for every one's comfort as well as we could, Horace and I withdrew to our own quarters. At the witching hour of night—whatever that is—I heard a very loud sound, followed, after a few instants, by a still deeper but more distant report. Then all was silence. Horace slept. Trembling like a leaf, I partially dressed, and going into the passage, I found several of the family assembled and all in alarm. My husband, by this time aroused, shouted "Fire!" "Thieves!" and "Police!" And at first I really thought robbers were breaking in, when on going down stairs the truth came out. Aunt Thorneypine had broken down her bed and brought down a portion of the parlor ceiling. We had a general laugh, in which Aunt Thorneypine good-humoredly joined, while she told me she was surprised at my putting a woman of her size in so light a bedstead.

I won't mention all the various difficulties into which I had been led, chiefly through the agency of Aunt Thorneypine. How she brought a poor child to the house in order to give her some old clothes, who was just recovering from scarlet-fever, thereby making a present of the disease to my three children; how she once fell through a street grating, sprained her ankle, and was brought home by several policemen, to the great amazement of the neighbors; how she left the house-door open, whereby a silver teapot disappeared from the dining-room "and no questions asked;" how she used to leave the Croton water running, and forgot to turn off the gas; how she borrowed a volume of his splendidly-bound English Poets from Horace, which in our aunt's various wanderings must have found another home, for it never came back to ours; how she was always asking for postage-stamps, which she invariably forgot to return, and likewise omnibus change; how she would sometimes arise at midnight and desire toast and tea to be prepared—these, and many other feats of our dear relative, I have never mentioned until now. What is particularly distressing is the circumstance that Aunt Thorneypine, in consequence of her benevolent enterprises, her cheerful manner, and her discreet conduct in limiting her remarkable performances to that much suffering class, her own relations, is really thought by many persons a most sensible, charitable, and excellent woman. She has dozens of friends where we have one, and is indeed a very popular person.

The amount of the matter is, that the number of people who mean to make the world their oyster is very large. Long habit has accustomed our aunt to the easy method of getting all that she can out of every body, and giving as little as she can in return. Any of us by yielding to our own selfishness might, in the course of years, arrive at almost such a character as Aunt Thorneypine's.

My aunt has never conferred upon me any gift more valuable than a knitted worsted shawl for myself, and a pair of socks for the baby; but I have, after all, derived some benefit from her society. I regard her as a social example to be carefully avoided. But why should I allow myself to be ruffled by reflections on her very unpleasant peculiarities? To-night we are to have a small cheerful dinner-party, consisting of two or three agreeable people whom we like. I enjoy these cozy little unpretentious parties—Stop! what is that banging and pounding in the lower passage? I see a carriage before the door with large trunks, the man has lifted off several—why, reader! would you believe it? She is here again!

It is Aunt Thorneypine!

THE CAFÉ GRECO.

THE Piazza di Spagna at Rome, is, as all tourists know, the centre of the Eternal City; the centre, that is, not topographically, but by custom and common consent. Around it, or near it, stand all the largest hotels, the most fashionable and expensive restaurants and cafés, the best known furnished apartments, the book-stores and reading-rooms for strangers. Toward it flows the annual tide of visitors to Rome. It is near the Corso, the Babuino, the Propaganda College, the stairs that ascend to the Church of Trinita di Monte, and the Pincian, the fashionable afternoon drive and promenade; near the artists' studios and color shops, near the jewelers and cameo-cutters, dealers in bronzes, medallions, and antiquities of every description. Strangers are not obliged, as in Paris and other large European cities, to consume days on foot or in carriage, in seeking out the places where they can best spend their surplus funds; for every thing needed is found almost within a stone's-throw of this sunny old square.

Within a few steps of the Piazza di Spagna stands, in the Via Condotti, the Café Greco, the well-known resort of the artists. Let not any romantic American, misled by the name, picture to himself Grecian columns, marble steps, open, airy vestibules or rooms with mosaic floors, classically painted or sculptured walls, and skylights letting in serene floods of light from the blue Italian heavens. Let him not fill himself full of Childe Harold or Corinne, or he may fall from the seventh heaven of expectation as he enters the actual Café Greco. The simple motto "Lucus a non lucendo" will be enough for him. He must carry Greece with him, and take his own light in his hand (I didn't intend a pun here) as he does up and down the dark Roman stairs, if he wishes to illumine this dirty, dingy, smoky little den. For such is the Café Greco.

The Greco is the artists' Great Bear round which all their stars revolve. It is set apart for the male sex as rigorously as any of the Roman monasteries. No lady, and very seldom a woman, is ever seen there. It is almost exclusively frequented by the Nicotinian Sect, or the fraternity of tobacco-smokers, who here religiously assemble to offer up burnt-offerings of the sacred plant morning, noon, and night. From the long immemorial dedication of the place to these fuliginous rites, it has acquired the hue and somewhat of the fragrance of a meerschaum bien culotté, as the French say—shaded to the rich bituminous brown so beloved by the painters.

The Greco opens at an incredibly early hour in the morning, nobody knows how early. To compare small things with great, a day of the Greco is like a cycle of the world's history. Far back in the obscure dawn—of the Greco—somebody remembers somebody having breakfasted there; some myth of a sleepless artist or hurried traveler, at an hour when the birds have scarcely commenced singing, nor the dust-men sweeping the streets, nor the donkeys a-braying, nor the market-women bawling "Lattuga" under your windows. But who this mythical person was or is, what his name, country, or profession, or what his motives for his untimely gastronomical performances, the wisest oracle of the Greco knoweth not. Later the records become more intelligible. From 4 to 5 in the morning, say, to half past 9 in the evening, there are successive generations that come and go at the Greco. Every hour sees a new set of fellows. You may be accustomed to breakfast at half past 8, and may fancy you know all the habitués of the Café. But if your fleas or your fancies (both of which are apt to be very lively in Rome) should rouse you from your bed and send you to breakfast at 6 you will meet quite a new set of faces. In this way traditions are kept alive. Doolittle the loungeur, who came to Rome on a loaf, which he contrives to cut into daily slices of amusement, without having been very much bored, and who from continual and unavoidable contact with art and antiquity begins to fancy that he knows as much as the artists themselves—Doolittle will tell you, puffing his cigar at half past one, the hour of his déjeuner, that as he came in he spoke with Bankerson, that young American, you know, who is doing up Rome stenographically in two weeks, and must be back in the States in a month; and Bankerson remembers having once seen Monsieur Grondant, an ennuied Frenchman who thinks Rome a tombeau, breakfasting at 11 o'clock. Simpson, one of Grondant's compagnons de voyage, if questioned about his predecessors, tells you he saw the flying coat-tails of Schwindflugel, about 10, as he was hurrying off to his studio, rather late for his model. Schwindflugel had found his friends Daubinsky and Dustikuff, the Polish and Russian painters, sitting smoking as he went in. These in turn have heard of a batch of French artists half an hour before, some one of whom have seen another batch of English and American artists, about 7 o'clock, and the first of these who went away carried in his hair the Druidic altar fumes and cigar-smoke of the early Germans.

And so the generations come and go, and the Greco is an epitome of the world's history.

But it is after dinner that the fuliginous star of the Greco is in the ascendant. The evening is the time for reunion of the artist brethren of all nations. Then it becomes a Babel of languages. Then rise the fumes of the Mocha, the clouds of tobacco-smoke, and the clack of tongues. Then come in the beggars, the peddlers, and the musicians. A close, dirty, dingy little place, it somehow enlarges in imagination through the influence of the social atmosphere. We are packed and squeezed together closer than in any New York street rail-car, but somehow we are all accommodated and made at ease.

It is chiefly those who have no homes, in the best sense of the word home, that resort to the Greco. Bachelors nearly all are these Grecians; or else lonely wanderers, who have left firesides and sweets of domestic life behind them in other lands. The Café is, after all, a dernier resort. And it is hard to sympathize with those few who leave their wives and cozy firesides near by for such a crowded and smoky den. Well enough to drop in, if after a moderate coffee-cup and a cigar you drop out again and go home like a rational being.

After all, to the plain matter-of-fact tourist, the Greco is usually but a miserable sort of den. It is only the associations one has with it, and the souvenirs that cluster about it, which transform it into a sort of Roman temple; call it if you like the temple of Pan, for the artist is a worshiper of the universe from its grandest objects and conceptions down to its lowest and most earthy details. For myself, I can never think of that dingy old place without seeing it illuminated by a light not borrowed from sun, moon, or lamp-oil, but from the memory of the social hours I have enjoyed there with cherished friends.

A few winters since I visited Rome after an absence of eleven years. One of the first shrines where I repaired to offer up a bajocco-and-a-half cigar, and sip a cup of the delicious café nero, was the Greco. Again my pilgrim staff rested against its blackened walls. Again the narcotic incense rose to the skylight overhead, through which, as of old, on rainy nights, the water dribbled, and dry seats, when any seats were to be had in the crowd, were at a premium. All remained unchanged as of old. There was the same suit of dark little narrow rooms, opening one into another; the same specimens of weary waiters; the same unceasing calls "Bottega!"* and "Vengo subito;"† the same coffee and excellent maritozzi (a kind of bun), and mild mezzocaldo punch; the same types of Bohemian artist faces of all nations grouped around the little marble tables, their slouched hats and picturesque beards making Rembrandtish pictures through the fog of tobacco-smoke; the same beggars and musicians intruding; the same fellows offering for sale porcelain, and plaster casts, and knives, and ornaments of porphyry, and alabaster, and gorgeous bouquets of flowers, eager as vultures for fresh comers ready to be cheated out of a few extra bajocchi; the same buzz and laughter and crowding for seats; the same rattle of spoons and glasses; the same Babel of tongues; and the same old cloud of smoke which had not cleared away since I sat there last.

Memories of the days when this place and I were well acquainted years ago came with a strange sadness over me. I seemed to see shadows of old familiar faces sitting where strangers sat now. Scarcely could the rattle and noise banish the old remembrances.

In this very seat sat Eugenio—then a youth—who came abroad to see Europe—with his fine thoughtful brow overarching the sweet, playful, pleasure-loving mouth. A true Grecian he, who took as naturally to Italy as a babe to its mother's breast—who afterward drew as natural and wholesome nutriment from all Europe, and from the Orient lands. He was then a receptive youth: he is now a mature, active, creative man. Eugenio is long since married, and has risen to be one of the stars in American politics and literature.

Does he recall as I do now those old Roman days? Does he remember our first sight of Saint Peter's across the stretch of the Campagna—how we both leaped from the vettura to get a better view of it, and fretted when the valley we descended and the windings of the road concealed it from our straining gaze?

Does he remember that moonlight evening when we first saw the Coliseum together? How we stood at the entrance of one of the crumbling arches and hardly dared to enter and break the spell imagination wove around us, while the huge masses of black Cyclopean shadow and the broad expanse of golden moonlight broke upon us from the central arena?

Does he remember how we stood in silence over the grave of Keats, and shared between us the petals of the single rose that shed its faint perfume on that hallowed spot?

Does he remember those sunny days in the Borghese Villa, the long walks over the Campagna, and repose under the shadow of the skeleton arches of the aqueduct? And St. Peter's, and the Vatican, and the mad, merry carnival; but where shall I stop in my reminiscences? For there are few places in Rome that are not associated with Eugenio.

The Greco is one of them. The dim, dingy trattoria of the Gabbione, near the Fountain of Trevi, is another. Does he remember a party of Americans dining there one day when he called for "un mezzo-porzione di Sbrinzo,"* thinking it was some recherché dish, and, after twenty minutes' impatient waiting, the wild-eyed Cameriere† Alessio brought him a bit of dry cheese about the size of his thumb, whereat "the whole quire held their hips and loffed," he laughing louder than any of us? I could hear that whole-souled laugh still as I sat in the old places of the Greco.

Here too sat Stanislaus, who never took cigars or café nero. His eyes were weak and unable to bear the dense clouds of tobacco-smoke—few but born Bohemians could. But he seldom came and retired early. He is now a citizen of England, and a clergyman of the English church.

And here, like the portrait of Vandyke, lounged Benedict, slouch-hatted and mustached—how unlike the carefully-dressed married man of after-days! Hard worker he was at his studio, and simple in diet because slender of purse. But the Greco was not itself without his presence—eccentric and original—social and chatty—saying and painting excellent things—a good companion and friend.

And then the kind-hearted, amiable, and clever tree-painter, his chum Hans. Benedict and he are both far away. One never hears from these fellows, only of them. They have achieved names in their own country, and are doing well. They were not always floating in such smooth waters in those old Greco days. I can remember the evening when Hans sat waiting at the Café and Benedict sallied out to borrow money for them both, and returned successful, with an order to boot. And how bright was the Roman sunshine those days, few and far between, when a poor artist could say, "I have an order," or "I have sold a picture!"

Young Silas Smart, too, over whose grave cousin Stephen kept such watchful eyes—where is he now? A ready wit had Smart. He was always saying sharp, bright things. One evening, at a card-party at Benedict's room, about half past twelve, Smart was enjoying himself regardless of bedtime and the superintending cousin; cigars and spiced wine perfumed the chamber; all was as merry as a marriage bell, when lo! a tap at the door, and there stood the elder Smart, a bit of lighted cerina in his hand (one always carries one's own candle on these dark Roman staircases)—there stood the grave, regular-habited cousin, solemn as the marble man in Don Giovanni. "Is Silas here?" he asked. "Why, Silas," he said, in deep, reproachful, trembling tones, "I have been very uneasy about you. Do you know that it is half past twelve? I have been anxiously waiting for you at home these two hours!" But the young Bohemian stirred not, and said little. The upshot of the matter, however, was that Silas concluded to take his own time about going home, and ended the discussion by saying, "Well, Stephen, I think we had better arrange it in future that all baggage shall be at the risk of its owner." And the unsuccessful Stephen departed unaccompanied and sorrowful.

Silas had evidently chipped his shell, and was not frightened, like a milk-livered ghost, when the old cock crew in the small hours.

And then there was Shadberry, who went about with guide-book in hand, hanging to the skirts of the artists among the Ruins and on the Campagna, quoting Childe Harold in the wrong place, and getting up forced sentimental fits, which contrasted queerly with his ordinarily prosaic nature. What has become of Shadberry? Does the dome of Saint Peter's rise up in the distance to him only as a huge mile-stone, from which he has traveled far away on life's dusty turnpike?

There were not a few after-dinner loungers at the Greco, who, do what they might, could never get properly grafted on Italian growth. There were, for instance, those rough English fellows, who, though mostly artists, never seemed to take in the poetic and aromal dreams of Italy, but only its grosser and more sensual delights. Bearded, rough, loud-voiced men; Satyrs, with a streak of the wood-god in their composition; lovers of coarse pleasure, yet hard workers, many of them. What midnight orgies were those when they met together in one of their large studios! What shameless stories were sometimes told! What abominable songs were sung, as they passed round the cigars and poured out the hot spiced wine from the big pitcher smoking on the hearth! A dare-devil set of rollickers, full of violent animal spirits, contrasting strangely with their phlegmatic looks and deportment in broad daylight. The more innocent and moderate American, who chanced in among them at those festivals, was overpowered and swept away by their fierce, rough-grained jollity. Every man of the company must tell a story or sing a song—a sort of rule which seemed de rigueur with these Britons. Among a party of Americans there would have been a more genial abandon—more volunteering of wit or music: one would naturally inspire the others. But with these English it was a forcing-pump applied all round. Every one must, somehow or other, pay for his drink, and no postponement of the debt was ever tolerated.

Yet I remember one among them, of a more refined and delicate nature, who sang sweet sentimental ballads to the guitar, amidst loud and hearty applause. After all, these roisterers only needed some refining influence to lead them into a purer atmosphere. There were rough diamonds among them, but they needed polishing and setting terribly.

I dare say most of these roaring bachelor blades are long since quiet, respectable, and very moral husbands and fathers of families. For the whirligig of Time brings its reforms as well as its revenges. There were one or two only of the old constellation left at the Greco when I made my second visit to Rome; and they seemed to have lost all their fire and sparkle. Another set of English revolved around the Greco's fuliginous star. It was somewhat sad to miss the old phlegmatic and "Britannic stare."

Among these English still sticking to the old places I recognized Mulberry, with whom, twelve years before, I had passed some weeks at the quaint old village of Civitella, in the Roman Apennines. Mulberry was of English descent, but born in one of the Danish islands of the West Indies. He was a gentleman of polished manners, but he had strong sympathies for the Bohemians. I remember he had with him at Civitella—at that old *osteria perched on the top of the rocks—his servant, his dog, his gun, his guitar, and his pallet and easel. He was a man of leisure and an amateur. He never took out his canvas and attacked Nature seriously. He frittered away his time at the alphabet of the art; was anxious about processes, and colors, and tints; and muddled up his canvas, and scraped out; and then flung it aside for a week, and took up his guitar or strolled off with his gun and dog.

One day, there being a luck of dessert at table, he went into the kitchen and showed the cook how to fry peaches. Miserable hard things they were in their uncooked state, but his talent transformed them into a delicious delicacy.

I remember well his guitar, and what fun we had one moonlight night, he accompanying my flute in a serenade through the narrow, dark streets of Olevano; what unusual echoes we awoke, and how the night-capped heads of the peasants, who had retired at nine o'clock, popped out of their windows in amazement at a couple of signori treating them to English and Scotch airs at midnight, preceded by a servant bearing one of those tall brass picturesque lamps you see every where in Italy. I remember our return to our inn, and can see Mulberry now sitting on a table in the salle-à-manger thrumming the saltarello, while three or four of the contadini, who resisted the lateness of the hour, yielded to the contagious melody, and danced a merry measure. I think Mulberry that night got unusually excited, for he was not seen the next day; and it was said he had started off on a walk to Rome, some forty miles, followed by his man Antonio, very much to the disgust of the latter victimized individual.

Well, this Mulberry I discovered, on my return to Rome, sitting at a trattoria dinner. I knew him, but he did not recognize me till I introduced myself. He had grown older, and I saw at once that the youthful spirits had left him. He was staid and reserved and gentlemanly, but didn't seem to care about reviving old scenes. I visited him at his studio. He had made some progress in painting, but he was still the amateur. He had tried this and that master, and had produced pretty things, but nothing fresh or original. We met only two or three times during my winter in Rome. Those old times in the mountains were never recalled again.

I missed from the Greco the tall form and broad white hat of Umberton, the American landscape painter, with whom I had spent many a day painting at Tivoli and Palestrina, in the Roman Apennines. I missed, too, his friend Marks, the Englishman with the pale face, light-blue eyes, and sandy hair, who had that remarkable adventure at Rojate. Shall I tell you that adventure?

We were all staying among the mountains at Olevano. Olevano is one of those odd old Italian towns built on the steep slope of a rocky hill, the old gray red-tiled houses huddled close together in disorderly fashion, and looking round, over each other's shoulders, all the way up to the top, on which rise the ruins of one of the old Colonna castles, formerly the sentinel and guardian of the town and surrounding country. A rough, mountainous, and wonderfully picturesque region it is, splintered all over with wild limestone formations, and much frequented by painters in the summer. There are many such old towns and villages in the Roman Apennines. Above Olevano, with a valley between, stands Civitella, the little brigandish village where I first met Mulberry. A strange, wild panorama of bare, rocky mountains and wooded valleys is that seen from Civitella. Beyond is another quaint old place, called Rojate; and beyond that the large town of Subiaco, also a gathering-place for painters. One day Umberton and Marks walked over to Subiaco, which, if I remember, is nine or ten miles from Olevano. Toward evening they started to return. It was a fine moonlight night. They got as far as Rojate, and there the adventure befell them I am going to relate. These small mountain villages are inhabited mostly by peasants. About that time there were idle rumors floating about among these simple and ignorant people of foreign spies—Austrian and others. And the appearance of these two strangers, blue-eyed and light-haired, inquiring their way and speaking Italian with a foreign accent, somehow aroused the suspicions of these excitable rustics. Scarcely had our pedestrians left behind the last house of the village when a group of peasants, armed with guns, hailed them from behind and ordered them to stop. Umberton, the wiser and cooler of the two, was for obeying orders and surrendering; but Marks became nervous, and preferred running and eluding their pursuit.

"Don't run, for Heaven's sake!" said Umberton. "You can't escape them. Don't you see they are armed with guns? Besides, we don't know the road very clearly."

But Marks had already taken to his heels, and some of the contadini were pursuing him. But the race was a short one. One of the peasants was close behind him. Marks turned and broke his cane over the fellow's head, and continued to run. But in the uncertain moonlight he mistook the road, and rushed upon the brink of a steep precipice. He succeeded in catching hold of some tufts of grass on the edge; but while he was holding on to save himself from falling one of his pursuers pelted him with clods of earth till he was obliged to relax his grasp, and fell sheer down fifty feet. (We afterward measured the precipice with a string.) The contadini rushed below, expecting to find him dashed to pieces. But he had fortunately fallen in a soft bank of mud, and, though frightfully jarred and bruised, escaped, wonderful to say, without having one bone broken or dislocated!

In the mean time Umberton was conducted before the mayor of the village, and closely scrutinized and guarded. His camp-stool, which he carried under his arm, was minutely examined, as if it were some infernal machine. As it did not explode, and seemed, on the whole, harmless, though somewhat mysterious, it was returned to him. His sketch-book was looked through, and this also passed the ordeal and was given back to him. The mayor was for dismissing him and letting him go on his way rejoicing. "But no," said Umberton. "I have been arrested unjustly, and I demand that these fellows, who have interrupted a peaceable artist in his journey homeward and subjected him to such treatment, be called to account for their conduct."

Any further prosecution of this demand, however, was cut short by the arrival of a crowd of men and boys, in the midst of whom was a group bearing along poor Marks, bruised to a mummy by his fall, and groaning with pain. Things now looked serious, and these peasants who, half an hour since, were so hostile, vied with one another in their attentions to the Inglese they had taken for a Tedesco, and whom their foolish mistake had driven to such a terrible accident. Poor Marks was taken to the only house in the village where travelers could be lodged. A rough place it was; but he was put into the best room that could be afforded. There he had tolerable medical attendance, and his friend Umberton, of course, remained at his bedside, and did every thing for him that a friend could. Early the next day a note from Umberton was put into my hands at Olevano, saying that Marks was taken sick at Rojate, and requesting me to accompany his wife thither immediately. The distance was about four miles, and the road so rocky and steep that only foot-passengers, and mules, and donkeys could pass over it. One of the latter animals was got ready for Mrs. Marks, and she set off under my protection and guidance, and reached Rojate about noon. I shall never forget her painful anxiety during that ride, or rather climb, over the mountains; for none of us knew what had occurred. Poor Marks was in a bad enough condition. His wife staid and nursed him for weeks. Sometimes others of our party went over and relieved her. After a long time he slowly recovered. Meantime the mayor and dignitaries of the village waited upon him in due form, and presented a formal apology in behalf of the deluded Contadini. But I never heard of any pecuniary reparation being made.

If there was a time during the year when the Café Greco seemed particularly black and dingy, and in fact quite unendurable, it was during the bright season of the carnival—that season of the early spring (for in Rome spring begins in February) when the gray old city flushed for a few days like a cactus plant into unwonted bloom and splendor—when the streets were gay with flowers; when the old Corso was misty from one end to the other with a rain of bouquets and a snow of confetti, and gay maskers shouting, whirled by in carriages, or threaded the crowd in front, when all the bright eyes of Rome, grand ladies, and brown Contadine grouped in human bouquets of surpassing color and bloom, in balconies and stalls, and all was mad frolic and revelry. Ah! then the poor Greco was scorned, and lay beneath our feet like an old smoked-out pipe. The goddess Flora was in the ascendant. Her worshipers were not those ignoble Grecians who lingered in the old den over their coffee and their tobacco. They were out in the open air, in their blouses and masks, their pockets rammed with confetti, their hands full of nose-gays of the early spring.

Not till the joyous flame of those nine days is spent, and the grim Lent throws its gray veil of ashes over Rome, making all grayer than ever, are you content to enter the Greco again. Perhaps you go back with a hearty good-will, thinking you have had too much of a good thing. The sameness of splendor has wearied you, and you put your head into the old dingy tabernacle as a converted voluptuary does into a monastery and a monk's cowl.

Well, we have traveled back to the Greco, as old smokers go back to their black meerschaums. But after the brilliant flowery carnival and its whirl of pleasures, how can we enter the old den again, except by a series of chromatic modulations? We will not. Dingy, dark, smoky, old coffee-house, now more forlorn than ever, now after the gay Saturnalia of Flora, and the Queen of Candy; now since so many of the old familiar faces have gone, and when even Rome, with all its cherished antiquities and histories, with all its poetic and artistic dreams, no longer seems quite what it was, when you and I, O friends of other days! were then together.

So at the door of the Greco we say farewell. Farewell to Rome and the carnival; to St. Peter's and the Vatican; to the beautiful desolation of the Campagna! Farewell to the light of other days! Farewell to poor Pio Nono and his detested Government; for whose overthrow we join in the great, unceasing prayer of this hopeful, young Italian nation!

A LANCASHIRE DOXOLOGY.

"Some cotton has lately been imported into Farringdon, where the mills have been closed for a considerable time. The people, who were previously in the deepest distress, went out to meet the cotton: the women wept over the bales and kissed them, and finally sang the Doxology over them."—Spectator of May 14.

"PRAISE God from whom all blessings flow,
Praise Him who sendeth joy and woe.
The Lord who takes—the Lord who gives,
O praise Him, all that dies, and lives.

He opens and He shuts his hand,
But why, we can not understand:
Pours and dries up his mercies' flood,
And yet is still All-perfect Good.

We fathom not the mighty plan,
The mystery of God and man;

We women, when afflictions come,
We only suffer and are dumb.

And when, the tempest passing by,
He gleams out, sun-like, through our sky,
We look up, and through black clouds riven,
We recognize the smile of Heaven.

Ours is no wisdom of the wise,
We have no deep philosophies:
Childlike we take both kiss and rod,
For he who loveth knoweth God.

DINAH MARIA MULLOCK.

OUR BET.

“BOAT, gentlemen? It will do you a deal of good, Mr. Fred; and you too, Mr. Wood,” said old Dan, coming across the beach to where we were lying.

“I can’t go to-day,” answered Wood. “I have a confounded engagement. Shall you go, Astley?”

“Yes, I think so,” I said, looking at the sea, which, just stirred by a slight breeze, rippled and danced in the sunlight.

“All right, then. I shall have to bolt in a minute. What an awful row there is this morning!”

“The beach is very full, Sir,” said Dan; “and see, you are in the middle of the crowd.”

We were not far from the bathing machines; and on every side of us were groups of people, laughing, talking, flirting—all supremely merry, and not over-careful about modulating the tones of their voices. The man with the guitar appeared to be the only person on the whole beach who was not making a noise. He, poor fellow, had broken one of the strings of his instrument, and was sitting by himself, disconsolately, trying to mend it. A family of foreign minstrels had settled themselves in front of the lapidary's shop, and the eldest boy was singing an Italian song, doing his utmost to make himself heard. He was, I own, singing under difficulties. The laughter of the bathers and the buzz of the talkers hardly conduced to render his voice the more audible; while the old bells of St. Augustine's church on the cliff above were ringing a loud wedding peal.

"In the middle of the infernal regions, I should say. I never heard such a horrid Babel in my life," muttered Wood, as he stalked off, and I went to the boat.

"I expected that you would come, Mr. Fred," said old Dan. He always called me Mr. Fred. We had been great friends ever since he gave me my first lesson in rowing, when I was a very little fellow. I believe I took to him then wonderfully; and since that time he had never seemed to me to have changed nor to have grown older. He always was, as far back as I could remember, the same sturdy, broad-shouldered man, with the same bronzed face, and the same clear, keen, gray eye. He had been for several years on board a man-of-war, but he was not a great talker on any subject, and never, I believe, spoke of his younger days. A superannuated, half-witted veteran, who lived in the town, declared that he was with Dan Baker on board the Etna. But the veteran knew nothing about Dan's history, and Dan himself never told it to any one. There was something in it he evidently wished to conceal, and the odd name of his boat, The Faithless Maid, was the only ground on which curious people could build. He was, in spite of his taciturnity, a great favorite with us young fellows. We had christened him Cato; he seemed to have such a kindred spirit to the great Roman censor. He was so unyielding and exact; so frugal in his diet, never drinking any thing but water, eating very little, and never smoking. He always gave one the impression, when he spoke, that he had a vast amount of knowledge in him, but which he was unwilling to impart to others. He talked very slowly, bringing out each word with the greatest deliberation, as though he chewed and digested it well mentally before uttering it. But he was a good boatman, and was much sought after by the people who were accustomed to make use of the pleasure-boats at Cliffgate.

"Strange scenes in these boats sometimes, Mr. Fred," the old fellow said, suddenly, after he had pulled for some minutes without speaking.

"Ah, I suppose so," I answered, carelessly, and without thinking what I said. My thoughts were just then turned upon a bet I had made, and which had happened rather oddly. It was between six of us: Ned Darwell, Wood, Lucas and one of his cousins, Andrews, and myself. And he who shook hands first with a certain young lady was to win the stakes. Ned called my attention to her as we were walking in the Rose Gardens, listening to the band.

"By Jove!" he said, nipping my arm, "there's a jolly girl."

She had very dark hair and eyes, which were rendered the more attractive by a bewitching little mauve hat, with a white veil tied behind in a bow. She was rather tall and slight, but very graceful; and her little feet as they peeped out every now and then from under her muslin dress—for the grass was rather damp, and the dress had to be held up—seemed perfection. She was accompanied by an old, soldierly-looking gentleman, and a young fellow, of about twenty-two or twenty-three years of age, was walking by her other side.

"Who is she?" I asked.

"I don't know," answered Ned. "Some new importation. Hullo! here's Lucas; he is sure to know. I say, Lucas, my boy, who is that dark girl with the hat?"

"Oh, hang the girl with the rum-shaped hat! She's Letitia Turner. Every body knows her ugly phiz."

"No; the one with the mauve hat and white veil. There! man alive! can't you see? There! just turning round at the end of the walk."

"Don't know her at all," said the other. "Do you, John?" he asked, turning to his cousin.

"Never saw her before," said the cousin. "But she's awfully swell."

Then Wood and Andrews strolled up. They asked us the very question we were going to ask them; so we discovered that the young lady was a perfect stranger to us all. Whereupon Lucas undertook to rout her out, as he called it, and tell us.

"I say, Lucas," said Ned, who was rather jealous of the ascendancy Lucas had gained over us in the honor of finding out and becoming acquainted with different young ladies, "I'll bet you any thing you like that I'll shake hands with her before you will. There, Lucas, my boy, there's a fair bet for you."

"Done!" cried Lucas.

Then Wood chimed in. "So will I, that I'll shake hands before either of you."

And then the rest came forward, each willing to make the same offer.

So the bet was made; and it was about it that I was thinking when Dan spoke to me.

"Very strange scenes," he said again, nodding at me over his oars. I suppose the expression had been well digested and proved wholesome, so he repeated it. "They say a cabman could tell a good deal," he continued, still nodding. "But bless you, Sir, what can they see or hear? There they sit, flogging their poor horses, while the people are behind them, shut up in a rattling, rickety thing. They can't hear, Sir. How can they? Now we, you see, Mr. Fred, when we come forward like this, we could almost kiss the people, much more hear what they say." To prove his assertion, old Dan suited his action to his words, and bent over his oars, leaning forward as far as he could. Having finished his long speech, he nodded again mysteriously, as if to say, "There, I have enlightened you quite enough for one day," and then pulled on again.

As he seemed inclined to be silent, and did not speak, my thoughts gradually reverted to our bet. Lucas had told us that the young lady was Miss Leith, that the old gentleman was Major Leith, and that they and Mr. Henry Leith were living at 6 Marine Gardens. But that was not an introduction, and "I see no chance of getting one," he said to me, ruefully. All his numerous cousins had proved perfectly useless on this occasion. Among us Ned had been the most lucky. Miss Leith had bowed and thanked him when he picked up a book which she dropped upon the Parade. I came second. In passing once I was honored with a second look. The rest were nowhere; and just a week had elapsed since we made the bet. Up to the present time Miss Leith had been invincible, though we had all done our utmost to obtain an introduction. Not that any of us cared for the stakes; they were trifling enough; but there was a spirit of emulation at work within us for the honor of the first shake of the hand of the young lady. The more difficult it became the more eager we all were to win it. We had found out that nobody in the town knew her, so we were thrown upon our own resources.

She went down to the beach every morning when it was fine, and walked upon the Parade in the afternoon; but was always accompanied by either her father or Mr. Henry Leith. Whether Mr. Henry Leith was her brother or her cousin, and in the latter case her lover, we could not find out. But we put him down for a brother.

We had told Dan about our bet, and he had promised to help us if he could. That, perhaps, was the chief reason why I seized the opportunity of having him to myself for an hour.

"Seen Miss Leith, Dan?"

The old fellow shook his head. "Heard she was fond of pulling, though," he said, after a short time.

"Oh, indeed!" I answered, as a thought struck me. "I say, Dan, I shall want your boat for two or three hours a day for the next week or so."

Now Dan had been in the habit of lending me his boat, because he knew that I could pull and manage it properly. I did not anticipate any trouble in getting it, so I was surprised when he appeared to hesitate.

"What are you going to do with it, Sir, may I ask?"

"Never you mind, Dan. You lend me the boat. What I do with it is nothing to you; that is, as long as I don't damage it."

"You are right, Sir. You shall have it."

He smiled as he spoke, and I could easily see that he guessed for what purpose I wanted the boat. However, he said nothing till the hour was up. Then, as I was getting out, he called me by my name, and said in a low tone:

"I have known you now for a long time, Mr. Fred. Do mind what you are about, Sir. Young women are changeable creatures. I should not like you to be taken in."

His voice was so sad, and his old bronzed face looked so troubled, that I knew he was speaking from experience—perhaps from some bitter lesson he had learned in his youth, and which in some way accounted for the odd name of his boat.

"Come, old Cato," I said, "it is only to win the bet; I am not in love with the young lady. See you to-morrow. Ta-ta."

The next morning, according to our agreement, Dan brought the boat round to the part of the beach nearest to my house. I did not live in the town, but some ten minutes' walk from it, along the cliff; and there was a path from the house down to the beach. He found me there, dressed in an old boating-suit, with my face hid as much as possible by a large slouching hat. I was then twenty-four, but looked a little older, and I meant in this disguise to lay siege to Miss Leith.

"Be careful, Mr. Fred," were the only words he said as we exchanged places; and then I pulled leisurely to where the visitors generally resorted. How all this would help me to obtain an introduction I was not quite clear; but I was, to tell the truth, jealous of her having spoken to Ned, and I thought that, at any rate, I should be able, in my capacity of boatman, to get a word from her. I had also a hazy idea that I might possibly give her hand a little shake as I helped her out of the boat, if ever I were fortunate enough to persuade her to come in. I thought that it would be extremely agreeable to sit opposite to her for an hour, hearing her talk, and almost near enough to kiss her, as Dan said, whenever I leaned forward.

"Boat this morning, Sir?" I said, as I pulled past the place where Miss Leith and her brother were sitting.

"Not this morning, thank you," he answered.

Lucas had heard me, and looked up, but did not seem to recognize either me or my voice, and that emboldened me. Then the Major came down with his paper, and Mr. Leith left them for his morning bath. I saw him plunge in and swim out to sea; and as I wanted to follow his example I determined to pull home and change my clothes.

"Well, I will have one more try," I thought, "as I have to pass the Major. Perhaps he may like to go."

When I came up to him he had put down the paper, and was watching his son through a field-glass. Miss Leith was sitting at his feet, sketching and talking to him.

"I am afraid Harry is going out too far, Helen," I heard him say.

"But he is such a capital swimmer, papa. Where is he now?" She then closed her sketch-book and stood by his side, looking across the sunny water for her brother.

"There! That little black speck is his head. He is coming back now."

"Oh, what a way he is out! Oh, papa! what is the matter?" she said, as a strong cry from Mr. Leith reached her ears.

"Nothing, nothing. Keep still, girl," he said, beckoning to me. In a minute he had scrambled into the boat, and we had left the beach.

"Pull, man! He has got the cramp! A hundred pounds if you reach him before he sinks! Harry! Harry!" he bawled out, "keep up. Oh, my boy! for God's sake keep up! Pull with your left. Now you are straight. Pull both. Hard!"

I have often rowed in a race, but I never pulled with such a will as I did on that day. The boat was the best in Cliffgate; and it seemed to fly over the water as I put all my strength and weight into each stroke. I have just a dim recollection of seeing crowds upon the beach running about, while the Major stood in the stern, without moving or speaking, watching his sinking son.

"Oh, my God, he is down!" burst from the old gentleman as he sank backward upon the seat and covered his face with his hands.

I can remember dropping the oars and tearing off my hat and boots. As I turned round I saw, scarce six yards from the head of the boat, a hand rise, then a head—it was his last struggle—and then both went down together. A moment afterward I was in the water, catching hold of something large and white, and rising with it to the surface. How I found it I don't know; but I knew that it was the young man. I felt his arms cling to my neck and his weight pull me down. I could swim well; and as my head rose above the water, and I saw the glorious bright sun, my love of earth seemed so strong, and the thought of death so terrible, that I struggled hard to keep afloat. But my clothes were thick and impeded my limbs. His arms were tightly clasped round my neck, and his dead weight was pulling, for ever pulling me down.

Then something dark came between me and the light; and the old boat, with the Major in it, glided past almost at arm's-length. I made a clutch—a rope was trailing in the water—and as I caught it and pulled myself with my burden to the side I heard the shout from the beach, and felt the Major's hand unclasping his son's arms from my neck.

"I'll hold him; you get in at the other side. Come, that's well done," he said, as we lifted Mr. Leith into the boat. "Now you row in, and I'll soon bring him to."

It was not the first time, as I afterward learned, that the Major had helped to resuscitate a half-drowned person. He knew exactly what to do; and under his skillful treatment his son opened his eyes before we reached the shore.

"I must dress him before I can convey him home," said the Major.

So I took them to the young fellow's machine, and then pulled away, partly to change my clothes and partly to avoid being known. I succeeded in the latter, even better than I had hoped; for when I met the Major and his daughter on the Parade in the afternoon they did not recognize me. I had left my slouching hat at home, and my hair and whiskers were not then plastered to my face with water. I also found out that nobody had noticed me in the morning. So I determined to play on my new character of boatman. Whereupon, the next day assuming the old disguise, I went forth again in search of fresh adventures.

"Oh! there he is, papa," Miss Leith said, as I passed.

"Ah! so he is. Here, my man, we will go for a pull to-day. How are you this morning? Caught no cold yesterday, I hope?"

"By Jove! I don't know how to thank you," said Mr. Henry, shaking my hand as soon as he was in the boat. "But I want to have a jaw with you some time."

Then the Major, muttering some thanks, held out his hand; and Miss Leith gave me her brightest smile, which I prized more than all.

"How strange, papa!" she said, reading the name of the boat. "You know Miss Hemery told us to have this one before we came."

"Bless me, yes! I have heard a good deal about you, Mr. Baker. I heard that you were very sober, and very respectable, and all that sort of thing. It seems to me, too, that you were not always a boatman," he said, glancing at my hands, which were rather whiter than the flippers of the sons of Neptune usually are. "So, if you like to give up this sort of life, why, I'll take care that you always have a snug roof over your head."

I thanked him very much; but I told him that I liked my life very well. In fact I was fairly stumped as to what to say. I felt half inclined to laugh at being taken for old Dan; and yet I felt that the Major ought not to be allowed to continue in his mistake.

"You seem very young to be such a hermit. Come, you must marry. I will find you a wife, and keep her well too."

"Yes, you must forget the Faithless Maid now," said Miss Leith, smiling again. I suppose she had heard some of the conjectures about Dan's life.

"I do not mean to be inquisitive," the Major said, "but I can not bear to see a young man like you, and one, too, who is so superior to this sort of work, settling down to such a life. Remember what we owe to you. Will you not tell me your trouble? I may be able to help you; and I swear I won't spare money or trouble to make you happy."

Although, of course, I did not want any pecuniary help, his kind way in offering it, and the fatherly manner in which he put his hand upon my shoulder as I bent forward, made me ashamed of the trick I had played upon him. He must sooner or later find it out; and I wondered within myself, as I leaned over the oars, looking down, with his hand upon my shoulder, whether he would then be so kind as now.

"I should like to see you privately to-morrow, Sir," I said, putting off the time as long as I could.

"Very well, then. Come in the morning at eleven—6 Marine Gardens. Ask for Major Leith."

I promised to do so, and nothing more was said about it during our pull.

"Good-by!" said Mr. Henry, when he was on the beach. "The governor has had all the talk to-day; but I shall see you again soon."

"Good-by!" said Miss Leith, with a nod, as her brother helped her out. "Good-by!"

"I wonder if she will nod and smile," I thought, "when she finds out who I am. I shall be certain to see her again this afternoon at the band; but she won't know me without this hat. I'll risk it at any rate. What a jolly smile she has!"

Though I did not expect to be recognized, I had, while dressing, sundry qualms about going; and when the time came for me to start I was sitting in the window, still hesitating. I had just decided that I would not go, when Ned walked up the garden and stepped into the room.

"Well, old fellow, you'll be late," he said, tapping my knees with his stick. "Don't be so idle. Come along."

"I am not going, Ned."

"Not going! Why not? Miss Leith is sure to be there. Ah! I see. You find it's no good struggling against me. I respect your sense of discrimination; but I can't walk there without somebody. Just come to keep me company."

So I took his arm, and we strolled together into the Rose Gardens.

"There's that swell girl I met last night," he said. "Lucas will be at her side in a minute if I don't look out. Ta-ta."

Dropping my arm, he raised his hat to the young lady, and then walked off by her side just as Lucas came up.

"I don't think Miss Leith is here," said Lucas to me; "but there is Letitia Turner at the other end, looking such an awful fright."

Letitia, who was the wrong side of thirty, honored me, when we met, with a most gracious bow. She certainly did look, as Lucas said, "an awful fright;" and while I was admiring the gorgeousness of her "get-up," I awkwardly trod upon the dress of a lady who was sitting down.

"I beg your pardon," I said, turning round and raising my hat.

It was Miss Leith; and I saw in a moment, from the blush that colored her cheeks, that I was recognized. It was my voice, I knew, that had betrayed me; but I walked on till I came to the railings that bounded the gardens. There was no gate at the side where I was, or I should have gone out; and the nearest one was exactly opposite the seat which the Leiths occupied. I waited for some minutes, looking over the railings, and then turned round. Standing directly in front of me was the Major, entirely cutting off all means of retreat.

"How do you, Mr. Baker?" he said, with a grin, while I felt rather uncomfortable.

Then I stammered out something, apologizing for the deceit I had practiced upon him. "I was going to tell you to-morrow," I said; "but I hope, Sir, that you will not think the worse of me for it."

"By my faith, Sir, that I won't. I thought this morning that you looked a devilish gentleman-like boatman, and said so to my daughter. It is I who have to apologize for calling to you yesterday as I did; but I had not time to look at you. I only saw a man in boatman's clothes, and, of course, took you for one. Give me your hand," he said, stretching out his own, and then adding, with a laugh, "though I suppose now you will not want me to put a roof over your head; yet I shall always be heartily glad to see you under mine. By-the-by, as you are no longer Baker, what name do you mean to assume now?"

"Astley."

"Well, then, Mr. Astley, I hope this will be the beginning of a long friendship."

"I am sure, Sir, nothing will give me greater pleasure."

"It was Baker's boat, though, you were in?" he said.

"Yes—The Faithless Maid."

"Then, as I live, Baker shall have the wife and the cottage."

"I won't answer for the wife," I said.

"Then he shall have the cottage without her. He shall have something. I will go and find him now. You come with me and I'll introduce you."

"My daughter, Mr.—I beg your pardon, I have a shocking memory for names."

"Astley," I suggested.

"Mr. Astley," he said, "the amateur boatman."

At this we all laughed, and Miss Leith blushed. Then the Major, with a good hearty farewell, left us, and went on his errand.

"I caught him," he said, when he returned.

"He has consented, after a slight skirmish, to live with me, and have a place to harbor his old hulk in. We must go now, Helen. Private to-morrow at eleven, eh, Mr. Astley? Well, I hope I shall see you soon."

"Thank you, Major. Good-by, Miss Leith."

"Good-by, Mr. Astley," she said, putting out her hand.

Lucas and Ned, who were wandering about, passed at that moment. They both looked—the envious wretches—and actually scowled at me as I took the little hand and shook it.

So I won our bet.

And besides the bet I won also that which had caused it. For soon afterward Miss Leith gave me her hand "to shake," as she herself said, "as often as ever I liked."

CHAPTER XI.

PODSNAPPERY.

MR. PODSNAP was well to do, and stood very high in Mr. Podsnap's opinion. Beginning with a good inheritance, he had married a good inheritance, and had thriven exceedingly in the Marine Insurance way, and was quite satisfied. He never could make out why every body was not quite satisfied, and he felt conscious that he set a brilliant social example in being particularly well satisfied with most things, and, above all other things, with himself.

Thus happily acquainted with his own merit and importance, Mr. Podsnap settled that whatever he put behind him he put out of existence. There was a dignified conclusiveness—not to add a grand convenience—in this way of getting rid of disagreeables which had done much toward establishing Mr. Podsnap in his lofty place in Mr. Podsnap's satisfaction. "I don't want to know about it; I don't choose to discuss it; I don't admit it!" Mr. Podsnap had even acquired a peculiar flourish of his right arm in often clearing the world of its most difficult problems, by sweeping them behind him (and consequently sheer away) with those words and a flushed face. For they affronted him.

Mr. Podsnap's world was not a very large world, morally; no, nor even geographically: seeing that although his business was sustained upon commerce with other countries, he considered other countries, with that important reservation, a mistake, and of their manners and customs would conclusively observe, "Not English!" when, PRESTO! with a flourish of the arm, and a flush of the face, they were swept away. Elsewise, the world got up at eight, shaved close at a quarter past, breakfasted at nine, went to the City at ten, came home at half past five, and dined at seven. Mr. Podsnap's notions of the Arts in their integrity might have been stated thus: Literature; large print, respectfully descriptive of getting up at eight, shaving close at a quarter past, breakfasting at nine, going to the City at ten, coming home at half past five, and dining at seven. Painting and Sculpture; models and portraits representing Professors of getting up at eight, shaving close at a quarter past, breakfasting at nine, going to the City at ten, coming home at half past five, and dining at seven. Music; a respectable performance (without variations) on stringed and wind instruments, sedately expressive of getting up at eight, shaving close at a quarter past, breakfasting at nine, going to the City at ten, coming home at half past five, and dining at seven. Nothing else to be permitted to those same vagrants the Arts, on pain of excommunication. Nothing else To Be—any where!

As a so eminently respectable man, Mr. Podsnap was sensible of its being required of him to take Providence under his protection. Consequently he always knew exactly what Providence meant. Inferior and less respectable men might fall short of that mark, but Mr. Podsnap was always up to it. And it was very remarkable (and must have been very comfortable) that what Providence meant was invariably what Mr. Podsnap meant.

These may be said to have been the articles of a faith and school which the present chapter takes the liberty of calling, after its representative man, Podsnappery. They were confined within close bounds, as Mr. Podsnap's own head was confined by his shirt-collar; and they were enunciated with a sounding pomp that smacked of the creaking of Mr. Podsnap's own boots.

There was a Miss Podsnap. And this young rocking-horse was being trained in her mother's art of prancing in a stately manner without ever getting on. But the high parental action was not yet imparted to her, and in truth she was but an undersized damsel, with high shoulders, low spirits, chilled elbows, and a rasped surface of nose, who seemed to take occasional frosty peeps out of childhood into womanhood, and to shrink back again, overcome by her mother's head-dress and her father from head to foot—crushed by the mere dead-weight of Podsnappery.

A certain institution in Mr. Podsnap's mind which he called "the young person" may be considered to have been embodied in Miss Podsnap, his daughter. It was an inconvenient and exacting institution, as requiring every thing in the universe to be filed down and fitted to it. The question about every thing was, would it bring a blush into the cheek of the young person? And the inconvenience of the young person was, that, according to Mr. Podsnap, she seemed always liable to burst into blushes when there was no need at all. There appeared to be no line of demarkation between the young person's excessive innocence and another person's guiltiest knowledge. Take Mr. Podsnap's word for it, and the soberest tints of drab, white, lilac, and gray, were all flaming red to this troublesome Bull of a young person.

The Podsnaps lived in a shady angle adjoining Portman Square. They were a kind of people certain to dwell in the shade, wherever they dwelt. Miss Podsnap's life had been, from her first appearance on this planet, altogether of a shady order; for Mr. Podsnap's young person was likely to get little good out of association with other young persons, and had therefore been restricted to companionship with not very congenial older persons, and with massive furniture. Miss Podsnap's early views of life being principally derived from the reflections of it in her father's boots, and in the walnut and rose-wood tables of the dim drawing-rooms, and in their swarthy giants of looking-glasses, were of a sombre cast; and it was not wonderful that now, when she was on most days solemnly tooled through the Park by the side of her mother in a great tall custard-colored phaeton, she showed above the apron of that vehicle like a dejected young person sitting up in bed to take a startled look at things in general, and very strongly desiring to get her head under the counterpane again.

Said Mr. Podsnap to Mrs. Podsnap, "Georgiana is almost eighteen."

Said Mrs. Podsnap to Mr. Podsnap, assenting, "Almost eighteen."

Said Mr. Podsnap then to Mrs. Podsnap, "Really I think we should have some people on Georgiana's birthday."

Said Mrs. Podsnap then to Mr. Podsnap, "Which will enable us to clear off all those people who are due."

So it came to pass that Mr. and Mrs. Podsnap requested the honor of the company of seventeen friends of their souls at dinner; and that they substituted other friends of their souls for such of the seventeen original friends of their souls as deeply regretted that a prior engagement prevented their having the honor of dining with Mr. and Mrs. Podsnap, in pursuance of their kind invitation; and that Mrs. Podsnap said of all these inconsolable personages, as she checked them off with a pencil in her list, "Asked, at any rate, and got rid of;" and that they successfully disposed of a good many friends of their souls in this way, and felt their consciences much lightened.

There were still other friends of their souls who were not entitled to be asked to dinner, but had a claim to be invited to come and take a haunch of mutton vapor-bath at half past nine. For the clearing off of these worthies, Mrs. Podsnap added a small and early evening to the dinner, and looked in at the music-shop to bespeak a well-conducted automaton to come and play quadrilles for a carpet dance.

Mr. and Mrs. Veneering, and Mr. and Mrs. Veneering's bran-new bride and bridegroom, were of the dinner company; but the Podsnap establishment had nothing else in common with the Veneerings. Mr. Podsnap could tolerate taste in a mushroom man who stood in need of that sort of thing, but was far above it himself. Hideous solidity was the characteristic of the Podsnap plate. Every thing was made to look as heavy as it could, and to take up as much room as possible. Every thing said boastfully, "Here you have as much of me in my ugliness as if I were only lead; but I am so many ounces of precious metal worth so much an ounce;—wouldn't you like to melt me down?" A corpulent straddling epergne, blotched all over as if it had broken out in an eruption rather than been ornamented, delivered this address from an unsightly silver platform in the centre of the table. Four silver wine-coolers, each furnished with four staring heads, each head obtrusively carrying a big silver ring in each of its ears, conveyed the sentiment up and down the table, and handed it on to the pot-bellied silver salt-cellars. All the big silver spoons and forks widened the mouths of the company expressly for the purpose of thrusting the sentiment down their throats with every morsel they ate.

The majority of the guests were like the plate, and included several heavy articles weighing ever so much. But there was a foreign gentleman among them: whom Mr. Podsnap had invited after much debate with himself—believing the whole European continent to be in mortal alliance against the young person—and there was a droll disposition, not only on the part of Mr. Podsnap but of every body else, to treat him as if he were a child who was hard of hearing.

As a delicate concession to this unfortunately-born foreigner, Mr. Podsnap, in receiving him, had presented his wife as "Madame Podsnap;" also his daughter as "Mademoiselle Podsnap," with some inclination to add "ma fille," in which bold venture, however, he checked himself. The Veneerings being at that time the only other arrivals, he had added (in a condescendingly explanatory manner), "Monsieur Vey-nair-reeng," and had then subsided into English.

"How Do You Like London?" Mr. Podsnap now inquired from his station of host, as if he were administering something in the nature of a powder or potion to the deaf child; "London, Londres, London?"

The foreign gentleman admired it.

"You find it Very Large?" said Mr. Podsnap, spasmodically.

The foreign gentleman found it very large.

"And Very Rich?"

The foreign gentleman found it, without doubt, énormément riche.

"Enormously Rich, We say," returned Mr. Podsnap, in a condescending manner. "Our English adverbs do Not terminate in Mong, and We Pronounce the 'ch' as if there were a 't' before it. We Say Ritch."

"Reetch," remarked the foreign gentleman.

"And Do You Find, Sir," pursued Mr. Podsnap, with dignity, "Many Evidences that Strike You, of our British Constitution in the Streets Of The World's Metropolis, London, Londres, London?"

The foreign gentleman begged to be pardoned, but did not altogether understand.

"The Constitution Britannique," Mr. Pod-snap explained, as if he were teaching in an infant school. "We Say British, But You Say Britannique, You Know" (forgivingly, as if that were not his fault). "The Constitution, Sir."

The foreign gentleman said, "Mais, ye'es: I know eem."

A youngish sallowish gentleman in spectacles, with a lumpy forehead, seated in a supplementary chair at a corner of the table, here caused a profound sensation by saying, in a raised voice, "ESKER," and then stopping dead.

"Mais oui," said the foreign gentleman, turning toward him. "Est-ce-que? Quoi donc?"

But the gentleman with the lumpy forehead having for the time delivered himself of all that he found behind his lumps, spake for the time no more.

"I Was Inquiring," said Mr. Podsnap, resuming the thread of his discourse, "Whether You Have Observed in our Streets as We should say, Upon our Pavvy as You would say, any Tokens—"

The foreign gentleman, with patient courtesy entreated pardon: "But what was tokenz?"

"Marks," said Mr. Podsnap; "Signs, you know, Appearances—Traces."

"Ah! Of a Orse?" inquired the foreign gentleman.

"We call it Horse," said Mr. Podsnap, with forbearance. "In England, Angleterre, England, We Aspirate the 'H,' and We Say 'Horse.' Only our Lower Classes Say 'Orse!'"

"Pardon," said the foreign gentleman; "I am alwiz wrong!"

"Our Language," said Mr. Podsnap, with a gracious consciousness of being always right, "is Difficult. Ours is a Copious Language, and Trying to Strangers. I will not Pursue my Question."

But the lumpy gentleman, unwilling to give it up, again madly said, "ESKER," and again spake no more.

"It merely referred," Mr. Podsnap explained, with a sense of meritorious proprietorship, "to Our Constitution, Sir. We Englishmen are Very Proud of our Constitution, Sir. It Was Bestowed Upon Us By Providence. No Other Country is so Favored as This Country."

"And ozer countries?"—the foreign gentleman was beginning, when Mr. Podsnap put him right again.

"We do not say Ozer; we say Other: the letters are 'T' and 'H;' You say Tay and Aish, You Know; (still with clemency). The sound is 'th'—'th!'"

"And other countries," said the foreign gentleman. "They do how?"

"They do, Sir," returned Mr. Podsnap, gravely shaking his head; "they do—I am sorry to be obliged to say it—as they do."

"It was a little particular of Providence," said the foreign gentleman, laughing; "for the frontier is not large."

"Undoubtedly," assented Mr. Podsnap;

"But So it is. It was the Charter of the Land. This Island was Blest, Sir, to the Direct Exclusion of such Other Countries as—as there may happen to be. And if we were all Englishmen present, I would say," added Mr. Podsnap, looking round upon his compatriots, and sounding solemnly with his theme, "that there is in the Englishman a combination of qualities, a modesty, an independence, a responsibility, a repose, combined with an absence of every thing calculated to call a blush into the cheek of a young person, which one would seek in vain among the Nations of the Earth."

Having delivered this little summary, Mr. Podsnap's face flushed as he thought of the remote possibility of its being at all qualified by any prejudiced citizen of any other country; and, with his favorite right-arm flourish, he put the rest of Europe and the whole of Asia, Africa, and America nowhere.

The audience were much edified by this passage of words; and Mr. Podsnap, feeling that he was in rather remarkable force to-day, became smiling and conversational.

"Has any thing more been heard, Veneering," he inquired, "of the lucky legatee?"

"Nothing more," returned Veneering, "than that he has come into possession of the property. I am told people now call him The Golden Dustman. I mentioned to you some time ago, I think, that the young lady whose intended husband was murdered is daughter to a clerk of mine?"

"Yes, you told me that," said Podsnap; "and by-the-by, I wish you would tell it again here, for it's a curious coincidence—curious that the first news of the discovery should have been brought straight to your table (when I was there), and curious that one of your people should have been so nearly interested in it. Just relate that, will you?"

Veneering was more than ready to do it, for he had prospered exceedingly upon the Harmon Murder, and had turned the social distinction it conferred upon him to the account of making several dozen of bran-new bosom-friends. Indeed, such another lucky hit would almost have set him up in that way to his satisfaction. So, addressing himself to the most desirable of his neighbors, while Mrs. Veneering secured the next most desirable, he plunged into the case, and emerged from it twenty minutes afterward with a Bank Director in his arms. In the mean time, Mrs. Veneering had dived into the same waters for a wealthy Ship-Broker, and had brought him up, safe and sound, by the hair. Then Mrs. Veneering had to relate, to a larger circle, how she had been to see the girl, and how she was really pretty, and (considering her station) presentable. And this she did with such a successful display of her eight aquiline fingers, and their encircling jewels, that she happily laid hold of a drifting General Officer, his wife and daughter, and not only restored their animation which had become suspended, but made them lively friends within an hour.

Although Mr. Podsnap would in a general way have highly disapproved of Bodies in rivers as ineligible topics with reference to the cheek of the young person, he had, as one may say, a share in this affair which made him a part proprietor. As its returns were immediate, too, in the way of restraining the company from speechless contemplation of the wine-coolers, it paid, and he was satisfied.

And now the haunch of mutton vapor-bath having received a gamey infusion, and a few last touches of sweets and coffee, was quite ready, and the bathers came; but not before the discreet automaton had got behind the bars of the piano music-desk, and there presented the appearance of a captive languishing in a rosewood jail. And who now so pleasant or so well assorted as Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lammle, he all sparkle, she all gracious contentment, both at occasional intervals exchanging looks like partners at cards who played a game against All England.

There was not much youth among the bathers, but there was no youth (the young person always excepted) in the articles of Podsnappery. Bald bathers folded their arms and talked to Mr. Podsnap on the hearth-rug; sleek-whiskered bathers, with hats in their hands, lunged at Mrs. Podsnap and retreated; prowling bathers went about looking into ornamental boxes and bowls as if they had suspicions of larceny on the part of the Podsnaps, and expected to find something they had lost at the bottom; bathers of the gentler sex sat silently comparing ivory shoulders. All this time and always, poor little Miss Podsnap, whose tiny efforts (if she had made any) were swallowed up in the magnificence of her mother's rocking, kept herself as much out of sight and mind as she could, and appeared to be counting on many dismal returns of the day. It was somehow understood, as a secret article in the state properties of Podsnappery, that nothing must be said about the day. Consequently this young damsel's nativity was hushed up and looked over, as if it were agreed on all hands that it would have been better that she had never been born.

The Lammles were so fond of the dear Veneerings that they could not for some time detach themselves from those excellent friends; but at length, either a very open smile on Mr. Lammle's part, or a very secret elevation of one of his gingerous eyebrows—certainly the one or the other—seemed to say to Mrs. Lammle, "Why don't you play?" And so, looking about her, she saw Miss Podsnap, and seeming to say responsively, "That card?" and to be answered, "Yes," went and sat beside Miss Podsnap.

Mrs. Lammle was overjoyed to escape into a corner for a little quiet talk.

It promised to be a very quiet talk, for Miss Podsnap replied in a flutter, "Oh! Indeed, it's very kind of you, but I am afraid I don't talk."

PODSNAPPERY.

"Let us make a beginning," said the insinuating Mrs. Lammle, with her best smile.

"Oh! I am afraid you'll find me very dull. But Ma talks!"

That was plainly to be seen, for Ma was talking then at her usual canter, with arched head and mane, opened eyes and nostrils.

"Fond of reading perhaps?"

"Yes. At least I—don't mind that so much," returned Miss Podsnap.

"M—m—m—m—music."

So insinuating was Mrs. Lammle that she got half a dozen ms into the word before she got it out.

"I haven't nerve to play even if I could. Ma plays."

(At exactly the same canter, and with a certain flourishing appearance of doing something, Ma did, in fact, occasionally take a rock upon the instrument.)

"Of course you like dancing?"

"Oh no, I don't," said Miss Podsnap.

"No? With your youth and attractions? Truly, my dear, you surprise me!"

"I can't say," observed Miss Podsnap, after hesitating considerably, and stealing several timid looks at Mrs. Lammle's carefully arranged face, "how I might have liked it if I had been a—you won't mention it, will you?"

"My dear! Never!"

"No, I am sure you won't. I can't say then how I should have liked it, if I had been a chimney-sweep on May-day."

"Gracious!" was the exclamation which amazement elicited from Mrs. Lammle.

"There! I knew you'd wonder. But you won't mention it, will you?"

"Upon my word, my love," said Mrs. Lammle, "you make me ten times more desirous, now I talk to you, to know you well than I was when I sat over yonder looking at you. How I wish we could be real friends! Try me as a real friend. Come! Don't fancy me a frumpy old married woman, my dear; I was married but the other day, you know; I am dressed as a bride now, you see. About the chimney-sweeps?"

"Hush! Ma'll hear."

"She can't hear from where she sits."

"Don't you be too sure of that," said Miss Podsnap, in a lower voice. "Well, what I mean is, that they seem to enjoy it."

"And that perhaps you would have enjoyed it, if you had been one of them?"

Miss Podsnap nodded significantly.

"Then you don't enjoy it now?"

"How is it possible?" said Miss Podsnap. "Oh it is such a dreadful thing! If I was wicked enough—and strong enough—to kill any body, it should be my partner."

This was such an entirely new view of the Terpsichorean art as socially practiced, that Mrs. Lammle looked at her young friend in some astonishment. Her young friend sat nervously twiddling her fingers in a pinioned attitude, as if she were trying to hide her elbows. But this latter Utopian object (in short sleeves) always appeared to be the great inoffensive aim of her existence.

"It sounds horrid, don't it?" said Miss Podsnap, with a penitential face.

Mrs. Lammle, not very well knowing what to answer, resolved herself into a look of smiling encouragement.

"But it is, and it always has been," pursued Miss Podsnap, "such a trial to me! I so dread being awful. And it is so awful! No one knows what I suffered at Madame Sauteuse's, where I learned to dance and make presentation-courtesies, and other dreadful things—or at least where they tried to teach me. Ma can do it."

"At any rate, my love," said Mrs. Lammle, soothingly, "that's over."

"Yes, it's over," returned Miss Podsnap, "but there's nothing gained by that. It's worse here than at Madame Sauteuse's. Ma was there, and Ma's here; but Pa wasn't there, and company wasn't there, and there were not real partners there. Oh there's Ma speaking to the man at the piano! Oh there's Ma going up to somebody! Oh I know she's going to bring him to me! Oh please don't, please don't, please don't! Oh keep away, keep away, keep away!" These pious ejaculations Miss Podsnap uttered with her eyes closed, and her head leaning back against the wall.

But the Ogre advanced under the pilotage of Ma, and Ma said, "Georgiana, Mr. Grompus," and the Ogre clutched his victim and bore her off to his castle in the top couple. Then the discreet automaton who had surveyed his ground, played a blossomless tuneless "set," and sixteen disciples of Podsnappery went through the figures of—1, Getting up at eight and shaving close at a quarter past—2, Breakfasting at nine—3, Going to the City at ten—4, Coming home at half past five—5, Dining at seven, and the grand chain.

While these solemnities were in progress, Mr. Alfred Lammle (most loving of husbands) approached the chair of Mrs. Alfred Lammle (most loving of wives), and bending over the back of it, trifled for some few seconds with Mrs. Lammle's bracelet. Slightly in contrast with this brief airy toying, one might have noticed a certain dark attention in Mrs. Lammle's face as she said some words with her eyes on Mr. Lammle's waistcoat, and seemed in return to receive some lesson. But it was all done as a breath passes from a mirror.

And now, the grand chain riveted to the last link, the discreet automaton ceased, and the sixteen, two and two, took a walk among the furniture. And herein the unconsciousness of the Ogre Grompus was pleasantly conspicuous; for that complacent monster, believing that he was giving Miss Podsnap a treat, prolonged to the utmost stretch of possibility a peripatetic account of an archery meeting; while his victim, heading the procession of sixteen as it slowly circled about, like a revolving funeral, never raised her eyes except once to steal a glance at Mrs. Lammle, expressive of intense despair.

At length the procession was dissolved by the violent arrival of a nutmeg, before which the drawing-room door bounced open as if it were a cannon-ball; and while that fragrant article, dispersed through several glasses of colored warm water, was going the round of society, Miss Podsnap returned to her seat by her new friend.

"Oh my goodness," said Miss Podsnap. "That's over! I hope you didn't look at me."

"My dear, why not?"

"Oh I know all about myself," said Miss Podsnap.

"I'll tell you something I know about you, my dear," returned Mrs. Lammle, in her winning way, "and that is, you are most unnecessarily shy."

"Ma ain't," said Miss Podsnap. "—I detest you! Go along!" This shot was leveled under her breath at the gallant Grompus for bestowing an insinuating smile upon her in passing.

"Pardon me if I scarcely see, my dear Miss Podsnap," Mrs. Lammle was beginning when the young lady interposed.

"If we are going to be real friends (and I suppose we are, for you are the only person who ever proposed it) don't let us be awful. It's awful enough to be Miss Podsnap without being called so. Call me Georgiana."

"Dearest Georgiana," Mrs. Lammle began again.

"Thank you," said Miss Podsnap.

"Dearest Georgiana, pardon me if I scarcely see, my love, why your mamma's not being shy is a reason why you should be."

"Don't you really see that?" asked Miss Podsnap, plucking at her fingers in a troubled manner, and furtively casting her eyes now on Mrs. Lammle, now on the ground. "Then perhaps it isn't?"

"My dearest Georgiana, you defer much too readily to my poor opinion. Indeed it is not even an opinion, darling, for it is only a confession of my dullness."

"Oh you are not dull," returned Miss Podsnap. "I am dull, but you couldn't have made me talk if you were."

Some little touch of conscience answering this perception of her having gained a purpose, called bloom enough into Mrs. Lammle's face to make it look brighter as she sat smiling her best smile on her dear Georgiana, and shaking her head with an affectionate playfulness. Not that it meant any thing, but that Georgiana seemed to like it.

"What I mean is," pursued Georgiana, "that Ma being so endowed with awfulness, and Pa being so endowed with awfulness, and there being so much awfulness every where—I mean, at least, every where where I am—perhaps it makes me who am so deficient in awfulness, and frightened at it—I say it very badly—I don't know whether you can understand what I mean?"

"Perfectly, dearest Georgiana!" Mrs. Lammle was proceeding with every reassuring wile, when the head of that young lady suddenly went back against the wall again and her eyes closed.

"Oh there's Ma being awful with somebody with a glass in his eye! Oh I know she's going to bring him here! Oh don't bring him, don't bring him! Oh he'll be my partner with his glass in his eye! Oh what shall I do!" This time Georgiana accompanied her ejaculations with taps of her feet upon the floor, and was altogether in quite a desperate condition. But there was no escape from the majestic Mrs. Podsnap's production of an ambling stranger, with one eye screwed up into extinction and the other framed and glazed, who, having looked down out of that organ, as if he desecrated Miss Podsnap at the bottom of some perpendicular shaft, brought her to the surface, and ambled off with her. And then the captive at the piano played another "set," expressive of his mournful aspirations after freedom, and other sixteen went through the former melancholy motions, and the ambler took Miss Podsnap for a furniture walk, as if he had struck out an entirely original conception.

In the mean time a stray personage of a meek demeanor, who had wandered to the hearth-rug and got among the heads of tribes assembled there in conference with Mr. Podsnap, eliminated Mr. Podsnap's flush and flourish by a highly unpolite remark; no less than a reference to the circumstance that some half-dozen people had lately died in the streets, of starvation. It was clearly ill-timed after dinner. It was not adapted to the cheek of the young person. It was not in good taste.

"I don't believe it," said Mr. Podsnap, putting it behind him.

The meek man was afraid we must take it as proved, because there were the Inquests and the Registrar's returns.

"Then it was their own fault," said Mr. Podsnap.

Veneering and other elders of tribes commended this way out of it. At once a short cut and a broad road.

The man of meek demeanor intimated that truly it would seem from the facts, as if starvation had been forced upon the culprits in question—as if, in their wretched manner, they had made their weak protests against it—as if they would have taken the liberty of staving it off if they could—as if they would rather not have been starved upon the whole, if perfectly agreeable to all parties.

"There is not," said Mr. Podsnap, flushing angrily, "there is not a country in the world, Sir, where so noble a provision is made for the poor as in this country."

The meek man was quite willing to concede that, but perhaps it rendered the matter even worse, as showing that there must be something appallingly wrong somewhere.

"Where?" said Mr. Podsnap.

The meek man hinted Wouldn't it be well to try, very seriously, to find out where?

"Ah!" said Mr. Podsnap. "Easy to say somewhere; not so easy to say where! But I see what you are driving at. I knew it from the first. Centralization. No. Never with my consent. Not English."

An approving murmur arose from the heads of tribes; as saying, "There you have him! Hold him!"

He was not aware (the meek man submitted of himself) that he was driving at any ization. He had no favorite ization that he knew of. But he certainly was more staggered by these terrible occurrences than he was by names, of howsoever so many syllables. Might he ask, was dying of destitution and neglect necessarily English?"

"You know what the population of London is, I suppose," said Mr. Podsnap.

The meek man supposed he did, but supposed that had absolutely nothing to do with it, if its laws were well administered.

"And you know; at least I hope you know;" said Mr. Podsnap, with severity, "that Providence has declared that you shall have the poor always with you?"

The meek man also hoped he knew that.

"I am glad to hear it," said Mr. Podsnap with a portentous air. "I am glad to hear it. It will render you cautious how you fly in the face of Providence."

In reference to that absurd and irreverent conventional phrase, the meek man said, for which Mr. Podsnap was not responsible, he the meek man had no fear of doing any thing so impossible; but—

But Mr. Podsnap felt that the time had come for flushing and flourishing this meek man down for good. So he said:

"I must decline to pursue this painful discussion. It is not pleasant to my feelings; it is repugnant to my feelings. I have said that I do not admit these things. I have also said that if they do occur (not that I admit it), the fault lies with the sufferers themselves. It is not for me—Mr. Podsnap pointed "me" forcibly, as adding by implication though it may be all very well for you—"it is not for me to impugn the workings of Providence. I know better than that, I trust, and I have mentioned what the intentions of Providence are. Besides," said Mr. Podsnap, flushing high up among his hair-brushes, with a strong consciousness of personal affront, "the subject is a very disagreeable one. I will go so far as to say it is an odious one. It is not one to be introduced among our wives and young persons, and I—" He finished with that flourish of his arm which added more expressively than any words, And I remove it from the face of the earth.

Simultaneously with this quenching of the meek man's ineffectual fire, Georgiana having left the ambler up a lane of sofa, in a No Thoroughfare of back drawing-room, to find his own way out, came back to Mrs. Lammle. And who should be with Mrs. Lammle but Mr. Lammle. So fond of her!

"Alfred, my love, here is my friend. Georgiana, dearest girl, you must like my husband next to me."

Mr. Lammle was proud to be so soon distinguished by this special commendation to Miss Podsnap's favor. But if Mr. Lammle were prone to be jealous of his dear Sophronia's friendships, he would be jealous of her feeling toward Miss Podsnap.

"Say Georgiana, darling," interposed his wife.

"Toward—shall I?—Georgiana." Mr. Lammle uttered the name, with a delicate curve of his right hand, from his lips outward. "For never have I known Sophronia (who is not apt to take sudden likings) so attracted and so captivated as she is by—shall I once more?—Georgiana."

The object of this homage sat uneasily enough in receipt of it, and then said, turning to Mrs. Lammle, much embarrassed:

"I wonder what you like me for! I am sure I can't think."

"Dearest Georgiana, for yourself. For your difference from all around you."

"Well! That may be. For I think I like you for your difference from all around me," said Georgiana with a smile of relief.

"We must be going with the rest," observed Mrs. Lammle, rising with a show of unwillingness, amidst a general dispersal. "We are real friends, Georgiana dear?"

"Real."

"Good-night, dear girl!"

She had established an attraction over the shrinking nature upon which her smiling eyes were fixed, for Georgiana held her hand while she answered in a secret and half-frightened tone:

"Don't forget me when you are gone away. And come again soon. Good-night!"

Charming to see Mr. and Mrs. Lammle taking leave so gracefully, and going down the stairs so lovingly and sweetly. Not quite so charming to see their smiling faces fall and brood as they dropped moodily into separate corners of their little carriage. But to be sure that was a sight behind the scenes, which nobody saw, and which nobody was meant to see.

Certain big, heavy vehicles, built on the model of the Podsnap plate, took away the heavy articles of guests weighing ever so much; and the less valuable articles got away after their various manners; and the Podsnap plate was put to bed. As Mr. Podsnap stood with his back to the drawing-room fire, pulling up his shirt-collar, like a veritable cock of the walk literally pluming himself in the midst of his possessions, nothing would have astonished him more than an intimation that Miss Podsnap, or any other young person properly born and bred, could not be exactly put away like the plate, brought out like the plate, polished like the plate, counted, weighed, and valued like the plate. That such a young person could possibly have a morbid vacancy in the heart for any thing younger than the plate, or less monotonous than the plate; or that such a young person's thoughts could try to scale the region bounded on the north, south, east, and west, by the plate; was a monstrous imagination which he would on the spot have flourished into space. This perhaps in some sort arose from Mr. Podsnap's blushing young person being, so to speak, all cheek: whereas there is a possibility that there may be young persons of a rather more complex organization.

If Mr. Podsnap, pulling up his shirt-collar, could only have heard himself called "that fellow" in a certain short dialogue, which passed between Mr. and Mrs. Lammle in their opposite corners of their little carriage, rolling home!

"Sophronia, are you awake?"

"Am I likely to be asleep, Sir?"

"Very likely, I should think, after that fellow's company. Attend to what I am going to say."

"I have attended to what you have already said, have I not? What else have I been doing all to-night?"

"Attend, I tell you" (in a raised voice), "to what I am going to say. Keep close to that idiot girl. Keep her under your thumb. You have her fast, and you are not to let her go. Do you hear?"

"I hear you."

"I foresee there is money to be made out of this, besides taking that fellow down a peg. We owe each other money, you know."

Mrs. Lammle winced a little at the reminder, but only enough to shake her scents and essences anew into the atmosphere of the little carriage, as she settled herself afresh in her own dark corner.

CHAPTER XII.

THE SWEAT OF AN HONEST MAN'S BROW.

MR. MORTIMER LIGHTWOOD and Mr. Eugene Wrayburn took a coffee-house dinner together in Mr. Lightwood's office. They had newly agreed to set up a joint establishment together. They had taken a bachelor cottage near Hampton, on the brink of the Thames, with a lawn, and a boat-house, and all things fitting, and were to float with the stream through the summer and the Long Vacation.

It was not summer yet, but spring; and it was not gentle spring ethereally mild, as in Thomson's Seasons, but nipping spring with an easterly wind, as in Johnson's, Jackson's, Dickson's, Smith's, and Jones's Seasons. The grating wind sawed rather than blew; and as it sawed, the saw-dust whirled about the saw-pit. Every street was a saw-pit, and there were no top-sawyers; every passenger was an under-sawyer, with the saw-dust blinding him and choking him.

That mysterious paper currency which circulates in London when the wind blows, gyrated here and there and every where. Whence can it come, whither can it go? It hangs on every bush, flutters in every tree, is caught flying by the electric wires, haunts every inclosure, drinks at every pump, cowers at every grating, shudders upon every plot of grass, seeks rest in vain behind the legions of iron rails. In Paris, where nothing is wasted, costly and luxurious city though it be, but where wonderful human ants creep out of holes and pick up every scrap, there is no such thing. There, it blows nothing but dust. There, sharp eyes and sharp stomachs reap even the east wind, and get something out of it.

The wind sawed, and the saw-dust whirled. The shrubs wrung their many hands, bemoaning that they had been over-persuaded by the sun to bud; the young leaves pined; the sparrows repented of their early marriages, like men and women; the colors of the rainbow were discernible, not in floral spring, but in the faces of the people whom it nibbled and pinched.

And ever the wind sawed, and the saw-dust whirled.

When the spring evenings are too long and light to shut out, and such weather is rife, the city which Mr. Podsnap so explanatorily called London, Londres, London, is at its worst. Such a black shrill city, combining the qualities of a smoky house and a scolding wife; such a gritty city; such a hopeless city, with no rent in the leaden canopy of its sky; such a beleaguered city, invested by the great Marsh Forces of Essex and Kent. So the two old school-fellows felt it to be, as, their dinner done, they turned toward the fire to smoke. Young Blight was gone, the coffee-house waiter was gone, the plates and dishes were gone, the wine was going—but not in the same direction.

"The wind sounds up here," quoth Eugene, stirring the fire, "as if we were keeping a light-house. I wish we were."

"Don't you think it would bore us?" Lightwood asked.

"Not more than any other place. And there would be no Circuit to go. But that's a selfish consideration, personal to me."

"And no clients to come," added Lightwood. "Not that that's a selfish consideration at all personal to me,"

"If we were on an isolated rock in a stormy sea," said Eugene, smoking with his eyes on the fire, "Lady Tippins couldn't put off to visit us, or, better still, might put off and get swamped. People couldn't ask one to wedding breakfasts. There would be no Precedents to hammer at, except the plain-sailing Precedent of keeping the light up. It would be exciting to look out for wrecks."

"But otherwise," suggested Lightwood, "there might be a degree of sameness in the life."

"I have thought of that also," said Eugene, as if he really had been considering the subject in its various bearings with an eye to the business; "but it would be a defined and limited monotony. It would not extend beyond two people. Now, it's a question with me, Mortimer, whether a monotony defined with that precision and limited to that extent might not be more endurable than the unlimited monotony of one's fellow-creatures."

As Lightwood laughed and passed the wine he remarked, "We shall have an opportunity, in our boating summer, of trying the question."

"An imperfect one," Eugene acquiesced, with a sigh, "but so we shall. I hope we may not prove too much for one another."

"Now, regarding your respected father," said Lightwood, bringing him to a subject they had expressly appointed to discuss: always the most slippery eel of eels of subjects to lay hold of.

"Yes, regarding my respected father," assented Eugene, settling himself in his arm-chair. "I would rather have approached my respected father by candle-light, as a theme requiring a little artificial brilliancy; but we will take him by twilight, enlivened with a glow of Wallsend."

He stirred the fire again as he spoke, and having made it blaze, resumed :

"My respected father has found, down in the parental neighborhood, a wife for his not-generally-respected son."

"With some money, of course?"

"With some money, of course, or he would not have found her. My respected father—let me shorten the dutiful tautology by substituting in future M. R. F., which sounds military, and rather like the Duke of Wellington."

"What an absurd fellow you are, Eugene!"

"Not at all, I assure you. M. R. F. having always in the clearest manner provided (as he calls it) for his children by prearranging from the hour of the birth of each, and sometimes from an earlier period, what the devoted little victim's calling and course in life should be, M. R. F. prearranged for myself that I was to be the barrister I am (with the slight addition of an enormous practice, which has not accrued), and also the married man I am not."

"The first you have often told me."

"The first I have often told you. Considering myself sufficiently incongruous on my legal eminence, I have until now suppressed my domestic destiny. You know M. R. F., but not as well as I do. If you knew him as well as I do he would amuse you."

"Filially spoken, Eugene!"

"Perfectly so, believe me; and with every sentiment of affectionate deference toward M. R. F. But if he amuses me, I can't help it. When my eldest brother was born, of course the rest of us knew (I mean the rest of us would have known, if we had been in existence) that he was heir to the Family Embarrassments—we call it before company the Family Estate. But when my second brother was going to be born by-and-by, 'this,' says M. R. F., 'is a little pillar of the church.' Was born, and became a pillar of the church; a very shaky one. My third brother appeared, considerably in advance of his engagement to my mother; but M. R. F., not at all put out by surprise, instantly declared him a Circumnavigator. Was pitchforked into the Navy, but has not circumnavigated. I announced myself, and was disposed of with the highly satisfactory results embodied before you. When my younger brother was half an hour old, it was settled by M. R. F. that he should have a mechanical genius. And so on. Therefore I say that M. R. F. amuses me."

"Touching the lady, Eugene."

"There M. R. F. ceases to be amusing, because my intentions are opposed to touching the lady."

"Do you know her?"

"Not in the least."

"Haden't you better see her?"

"My dear Mortimer, you have studied my character. Could I possibly go down there, labeled 'ELIGIBLE. ON VIEW,' and meet the lady, similarly labeled? Any thing to carry out M. R. F.'s arrangements, I am sure, with the greatest pleasure—except matrimony. Could I possibly support it? I, so soon bored, so constantly, so fatally?"

"But you are not a consistent fellow, Eugene."

"In susceptibility to boredom," returned that worthy, "I assure you I am the most consistent of mankind."

"Why, it was but now that you were dwelling on the advantages of a monotony of two."

"In a light-house. Do me the justice to remember the condition. In a light-house."

Mortimer laughed again, and Eugene, having laughed too for the first time, as if he found himself on reflection rather entertaining, relapsed into his usual gloom, and drowsily said, as he enjoyed his cigar, "No, there is no help for it; one of the prophetic deliveries of M. R. F. must forever remain unfulfilled. With every disposition to oblige him, he must submit to a failure."

It had grown darker as they talked, and the wind was sawing and the saw-dust was whirling outside paler windows. The underlying churchyard was already settling into deep dim shade, and the shade was creeping up to the house-tops among which they sat. "As if," said Eugene, "as if the church-yard ghosts were rising."

He had walked to the window with his cigar in his mouth, to exalt its flavor by comparing the fireside with the outside, when he stopped midway on his return to his arm-chair, and said:

"Apparently one of the ghosts has lost its way, and dropped in to be directed. Look at this phantom!"

Lightwood, whose back was toward the door, turned his head, and there, in the darkness of the entry, stood a something in the likeness of a man: to whom he addressed the not irrelevant inquiry, "Who the devil are you?"

"I ask your pardons, Governors," replied the ghost, in a hoarse double-barreled whisper, "but might either on you be Lawyer Lightwood?"

"What do you mean by not knocking at the door?" demanded Mortimer.

"I ask your pardons, Governors," replied the ghost, as before, "but probable you was not aware your door stood open."

"What do you want?"

Hereunto the ghost again hoarsely replied, in its double-barreled manner, "I ask your pardons, Governors, but might one on you be Lawyer Lightwood?"

"One of us is," said the owner of that name.

"All right, Governors Both," returned the ghost, carefully closing the room door; "'tickler business."

Mortimer lighted the candles. They showed the visitor to be an ill-looking visitor with a squinting leer, who, as he spoke, fumbled at an old sodden fur cap, formless and mangy, that looked like a furry animal, dog or cat, puppy or kitten, drowned and decaying.

"Now," said Mortimer, "what is it?"

"Governors Both," returned the man, in what he meant to be a wheedling tone, "which on you might be Lawyer Lightwood?"

"I am."

"Lawyer Lightwood," ducking at him with a servile air, "I am a man as gets my living, and as seeks to get my living, by the sweat of my brow. Not to risk being done out of the sweat of my brow, by any chances, I should wish afore going further to be sworn in."

"I am not a swearer in of people, man."

The visitor, clearly any thing but reliant on this assurance, doggedly muttered "Alfred David."

"Is that your name?" asked Lightwood.

"My name?" returned the man. "No; I want to take a Alfred David."

(Which Eugene, smoking and contemplating him, interpreted as meaning Affidavit.)

"I tell you, my good fellow," said Lightwood, with his indolent laugh, "that I have nothing to do with swearing."

"He can swear at you," Eugene explained; "and so can I. But we can't do more for you."

Much discomfited by this information, the visitor turned the drowned dog or cat, puppy or kitten, about and about, and looked from one of the Governors Both to the other of the Governors Both, while he deeply considered within himself. At length he decided:

"Then I must be took down."

"Where?" asked Lightwood.

"Here," said the man. "In pen and ink."

"First, let us know what your business is about."

"It's about," said the man, taking a step forward, dropping his hoarse voice, and shading it with his hand, "it's about from five to ten thousand pound reward. That's what it's about. It's about Murder. That's what it's about."

"Come nearer the table. Sit down. Will you have a glass of wine?"

"Yes, I will," said the man; "and I don't deceive you, Governors."

It was given him. Making a stiff arm to the elbow, he poured the wine into his mouth, tilted it into his right cheek, as saying, "What do you think of it?" tilted it into his left cheek, as saying, "What do you think of it?" jerked it into his stomach, as saying, "What do you think of it?" To conclude, smacked his lips, as if all three replied, "We think well of it."

"Will you have another?"

"Yes, I will," he repeated, "and I don't deceive you, Governors." And also repeated the other proceedings.

"Now," began Lightwood, "what's your name?"

"Why, there you're rather fast, Lawyer Lightwood," he replied, in a remonstrant manner. Don't you see, Lawyer Lightwood? There you're a little bit fast. I'm going to earn from five to ten thousand pound by the sweat of my brow; and as a poor man doing justice to the sweat of my brow, is it likely I can afford to part with so much as my name without its being took down?"

Deferring to the man's sense of the binding powers of pen and ink and paper, Lightwood nodded acceptance of Eugene's nodded proposal to take those spells in hand. Eugene, bringing them to the table, sat down as clerk or notary.

"Now," said Lightwood, "what's your name?"

But further precaution was still due to the sweat of this honest fellow's brow.

"I should wish, Lawyer Lightwood," he stipulated, "to have that T'other Governor as my witness that what I said I said. Consequent, will the T'other Governor be so good as chuck me his name and where he lives?"

Eugene, cigar in mouth and pen in hand, tossed him his card. After spelling it out slowly, the man made it into a little roll, and tied it up in an end of his neckerchief still more slowly.

"Now," said Lightwood, for the third time, "if you have quite completed your various preparations, my friend, and have fully ascertained that your spirits are cool and not in any way hurried, what's your name?"

"Roger Riderhood."

"Dwelling-place?"

"Lime'us Hole."

"Calling or occupation?"

Not quite so glib with this answer as with the previous two, Mr. Riderhood gave in the definition, "Waterside character."

"Any thing against you?" Eugene quietly put in, as he wrote.

Rather balked, Mr. Riderhood evasively remarked, with an innocent air, that he believed the T'other Governor had asked him summa't.

"Ever in trouble?" said Eugene.

"Once." (Might happen to any man, Mr. Riderhood added incidentally.)

"On suspicion of—?"

"Of seaman's pocket," said Mr. Riderhood. "Whereby I was in reality the man's best friend, and tried to take care of him."

"With the sweat of your brow?" asked Eugene.

"Till it poured down like rain," said Roger Riderhood.

Eugene leaned back in his chair, and smoked with his eyes negligently turned on the informer, and his pen ready to reduce him to more writing. Lightwood also smoked, with his eyes negligently turned on the informer.

"Now let me be took down again," said Riderhood, when he had turned the drowned cap over and under, and had brushed it the wrong way (if it had a right way) with his sleeve. "I give information that the man that done the Harmon Murder is Gaffer Hexam, the man that found the body. The hand of Jesse Hexam, commonly called Gaffer on the river and along shore, is the hand that done that deed. His hand and no other."

The two friends glanced at one another with more serious faces than they had shown yet.

"Tell us on what grounds you make this accusation," said Mortimer Lightwood.

"On the grounds," answered Riderhood, wiping his face with his sleeve, "that I was Gaffer's pardner, and suspected of him many a long day and many a dark night. On the grounds that I knowed his ways. On the grounds that I broke the pardnership because I see the danger; which I warn you his daughter may tell you another story about that, for any think I can say, but you know what it'll be worth, for she'd tell you lies, the world round and the heavens broad, to save her father. On the grounds that it's well understood along the caus'ays and the stairs that he done it. On the grounds that he's fell off from, because he done it. On the grounds that I will swear he done it. On the grounds that you may take me where you will, and get me sworn to it. I don't want to back out of the consequences. I have made up my mind. Take me any wheres."

"All this is nothing," said Lightwood.

"Nothing?" repeated Riderhood, indignant-ly and amazedly.

"Merely nothing. It goes to no more than that you suspect this man of the crime. You may do so with some reason, or you may do so with no reason, but he can not be convicted on your suspicion."

"Haven't I said—I appeal to the T'other Governor as my witness—haven't I said from the first minute that I opened my mouth in this here world-without-end-everlasting chair" (he evidently used that form of words as next in force to an affidavit), "that I was willing to swear that he done it? Haven't I said, Take me and get me sworn to it? Don't I say so now? You won't deny it, Lawyer Lightwood?"

"Surely not; but you only offer to swear to your suspicion, and I tell you it is not enough to swear to your suspicion."

"Not enough, ain't it, Lawyer Lightwood?" he cautiously demanded.

"Positively not."

"And did I say it was enough? Now, I appeal to the T'other Governor. Now, fair! Did I say so?"

"He certainly has not said that he had no more to tell," Eugene observed in a low voice without looking at him, "whatever he seemed to imply."

"Hah!" cried the informer, triumphantly perceiving that the remark was generally in his favor, though apparently not closely understanding it. "Fort'nate for me I had a witness!"

"Go on then," said Lightwood. "Say out what you have to say. No after-thought."

"Let me be took down then!" cried the informer, eagerly and anxiously. "Let me be took down, for by George and the Draggin I'm a coming to it now! Don't do nothing to keep back from a honest man the fruits of the sweat of his brow! I give information, then, that he told me that he done it. Is that enough?"

"Take care what you say, my friend," returned Mortimer.

"Lawyer Lightwood, take care, you, what I say; for I judge you'll be answerable for follering it up!" Then, slowly and emphatically beating it all out with his open right hand on the palm of his left; "I Roger Riderhood, Lime-us Hole, Waterside character, tell you, Lawyer Lightwood, that the man Jesse Hexam, commonly called upon the river, and along-shore Gaffer, told me that he done the deed. What's more, he told me with his own lips that he done the deed. What's more, he said that he done the deed. And I'll swear it!"

"Where did he tell you so?"

"Outside," replied Riderhood, always beating it out, with his head determinedly set askew, and his eyes watchfully dividing their attention between his two auditors, "outside the door of the Six Jolly Fellowships, towards a quarter arter twelve at midnight—but I will not in my conscience undertake to swear to so fine a matter as five minutes—on the night when he picked up the body. The Six Jolly Fellowships stands on the spot still. The Six Jolly Fellowships won't run away. If it turns out that he warn't at the Six Jolly Fellowships that night at midnight, I'm a liar."

"What did he say?"

"I'll tell you (take me down, T'other Governor, I ask no better). He come out first; I come out last. I might be a minute arter him; I might be half a minute, I might be a quarter of a minute; I can not swear to that, and therefore I won't. That's knowing the obligations of a Alfred David, ain't it?"

"Go on."

"I found him a waiting to speak to me. He says to me, 'Rogue Riderhood'—for that's the name I'm mostly called by—not for any meaning in it, for meaning it has none, but because of its being similar to Roger."

"Never mind that."

"Scuse me, Lawyer Lightwood, it's a part of the truth, and as such I do mind it, and I must mind it and I will mind it. 'Rogue Riderhood,' he says, 'words passed betwixt us on the river to-night.' Which they had; ask his daughter! 'I threatened you,' he say, 'to chop you over the fingers with my boat's stretcher, or take a aim at your brains with my boat-hook. I did so on accounts of your looking too hard at what I had in tow, as if you was suspicious, and on accounts of your holding on to the gun-wale of my boat.' I says to him, 'Gaffer, I know it.' He says to me, 'Rogue Riderhood, you are a man in a dozen'—I think he said in a score, but of that I am not positive, so take the lowest figure, for precious be the obligations of a Alfred David. 'And,' he says, 'when your fellow-men is up, be it their lives or be it their watches, sharp is ever the word with you. Had you suspicions?' I says, 'Gaffer, I had; and what's more, I have.' He falls a shaking, and he says 'Of what?' I says, 'Of foul play.' He falls a shaking worse, and he says, 'There was foul play then. I done it for his money. Don't betray me!' Those were the words as ever he used."

There was a silence broken only by the fall of the ashes in the grate. An opportunity which the informer improved by smearing himself all over the head and neck and face with his drowned cap, and not at all improving his own appearance.

"What more?" asked Lightwood.

"Of him, d'ye mean, Lawyer Lightwood?"

"Of any thing to the purpose."

"Now, I'm blest if I understand you, Governors Both," said the informer, in a creeping manner: propitiating both, though only one had spoken. "What? Ain't that enough?"

"Did you ask him how he did it, where he did it, when he did it?"

"Far be it from me, Lawyer Lightwood! I was so troubled in mind, that I wouldn't have knowed more, no, not for the sum as I expect to earn from you by the sweat of my brow, twice told! I had put an end to the pardnership. I had cut the connection. I couldn't undo what was done; and when he begs and prays, 'Old pardner, on my knees, don't split upon me!' I only makes answer, 'Never speak another word to Roger Riderhood, nor look him in the face!' and I shuns that man."

Having given these words a swing to make them mount the higher and go the further, Rogue Riderhood poured himself out another glass of wine unbidden, and seemed to chew it, as, with the half-emptied glass in his hand, he stared at the candles.

Mortimer glanced at Eugene, but Eugene sat glowering at his paper, and would give him no responsive glance. Mortimer again turned to the informer, to whom he said:

"You have been troubled in your mind a long time, man?"

Giving his wine a final chew, and swallowing it, the informer answered in a single word:

"Hages!"

"When all that stir was made, when the Government reward was offered, when the police were on the alert, when the whole country rang with the crime!" said Mortimer, impatiently.

"Hah!" Mr. Riderhood very slowly and hoarsely chimed in, with several retrospective nods of his head. "Warn't I troubled in my mind then!"

"When conjecture ran wild, when the most extravagant suspicions were afloat, when half a dozen innocent people might have been laid by the heels any hour in the day!" said Mortimer, almost warming.

"Hah!" Mr. Riderhood chimed in, as before. "Warn't I troubled in my mind through it all!"

"But he hadn't," said Eugene, drawing a lady's head upon his writing-paper, and touching it at intervals, "the opportunity then of earning so much money, you see."

"The T'other Governor hits the nail, Lawyer Lightwood! It was that as turned me. I had many times and again struggled to relieve myself of the trouble on my mind, but I couldn't get it off. I had once very nigh got it off to Miss Abbey Potterson which keeps the Six Jolly Fellowships—there is the 'ouse, it won't run away—there lives the lady, she ain't likely to be struck dead afore you get there—ask her!—but I couldn't do it. At last, out comes the new bill with your own lawful name, Lawyer Lightwood, printed to it, and then I asks the question of my own intellects, Am I to have this trouble on my mind forever? Am I never to throw it off? Am I always to think more of Gaffer than of my own self? If he's got a daughter, ain't I got a daughter?"

"And echo answered—" Eugene suggested.

"You have," said Mr. Riderhood, in a firm tone.

"Incidentally mentioning, at the same time, her age?" inquired Eugene.

"Yes, governor. Two-and-twenty last October. And then I put it to myself, 'Regarding the money. It is a pot of money.' For it is a pot," said Mr. Riderhood, with candor, "and why deny it?"

"Hear!" from Eugene, as he touched his drawing.

"'It is a pot of money; but is it a sin for a laboring man that moistens every crust of bread he earns with his tears—or if not with them, with the colds he catches in his head—is it a sin for that man to earn it? Say there is any thing again earning it.' This I put to myself strong, as in duty bound; 'how can it be said without blaming Lawyer Lightwood for offering it to be earned?' And was it for me to blame Lawyer Lightwood? No."

"No," said Eugene.

"Certainly not, Governor," Mr. Riderhood acquiesced. "So I made up my mind to get my trouble off my mind, and to earn by the sweat of my brow what was held out to me. And what's more," he added, suddenly turning blood-thirsty, "I mean to have it! And now I tell you, once and away, Lawyer Lightwood, that Jesse Hexam, commonly called Gaffer, his hand and no other, done the deed, on his own confession to me. And I give him up to you, and I want him took. This night!"

After another silence, broken only by the fall of the ashes in the grate, which attracted the informer's attention as if it were the chinking of money, Mortimer Lightwood leaned over his friend, and said in a whisper:

"I suppose I must go with this fellow to our imperturbable friend at the police-station."

"I suppose," said Eugene; "there is no help for it."

"Do you believe him?"

"I believe him to be a thorough rascal. But he may tell the truth, for his own purpose, and for this occasion only."

"It doesn't look like it."

"He doesn't," said Eugene. "But neither is his late partner, whom he denounces, a prepossessing person. The firm are cut-throat Shepherds both, in appearance. I should like to ask him one thing."

The subject of this conference sat leering at the ashes, trying with all his might to overhear what was said, but feigning abstraction as the "Governors Both" glanced at him.

"You mentioned (twice, I think) a daughter of this Hexam's," said Eugene, aloud. "You don't mean to imply that she had any guilty knowledge of the crime?"

The honest man, after considering—perhaps considering how his answer might affect the fruits of the sweat of his brow—replied, unreservedly, "No, I don't."

"And you implicate no other person?"

"It ain't what I implicate, it's what Gaffer implicated," was the dogged and determined answer. "I don't pretend to know more than that his words to me was, 'I done it.' Those was his words."

"I must see this out, Mortimer," whispered Eugene, rising. "How shall we go?"

"Let us walk," whispered Lightwood, "and give this fellow time to think of it."

Having exchanged the question and answer, they prepared themselves for going out, and Mr. Riderhood rose. While extinguishing the candles, Lightwood, quite as a matter of course, took up the glass from which that honest gentleman had drunk, and coolly tossed it under the grate, where it fell shivering into fragments.

"Now, if you will take the lead," said Lightwood, "Mr. Wrayburn and I will follow. You know where to go, I suppose?"

"I suppose I do, Lawyer Lightwood."

"Take the lead, then."

The water-side character pulled his drowned cap over his ears with both hands, and making himself more round-shouldered than nature had made him, by the sullen and persistent slouch with which he went, went down the stairs, round by the Temple Church, across the Temple into Whitefriars, and so on by the water-side streets.

"Look at his hang-dog air," said Lightwood, following.

"It strikes me rather as a hang-man air," returned Eugene. "He has undeniable intentions that way."

They said little else as they followed. He went on before them as an ugly Fate might have done, and they kept him in view, and would have been glad enough to lose sight of him. But on he went before them, always at the same distance, and the same rate. Aslant against the hard implacable weather and the rough wind, he was no more to be driven back than hurried forward, but held on like an advancing Destiny. There came, when they were about midway on their journey, a heavy rush of hail, which in a few minutes pelted the streets clear, and whitened them. It made no difference to him. A man's life being to be taken and the price of it got, the hailstones to arrest the purpose must lie larger and deeper than those. He crushed through them, leaving marks in the fast-melting slush that were mere shapeless holes; one might have fancied, following, that the very fashion of humanity had departed from his feet.

The blast went by, and the moon contended with the fast-flying clouds, and the wild disorder reigning up there made the pitiful tumults in the streets of no account. It was not that the wind swept all the brawlers into places of shelter, as it had swept the hail still lingering in heaps wherever there was refuge for it; but that it seemed as if the streets were absorbed by the sky, and the night were all in the air.

"If he has had time to think of it," said Eugene, "he has not had time to think better of it—or differently of it, if that's better. There is no sign of drawing back in him; and as I recollect this place, we must be close upon the corner where we alighted that night."

In fact, a few abrupt turns brought them to the river-side, where they had slipped about among the stones, and where they now slipped more; the wind coming against them in slants and flaws, across the tide and the windings of the river, in a furious way. With that habit of getting under the lee of any shelter which water-side characters acquire, the water-side character at present in question led the way to the lee side of the Six Jolly Fellowship Porters before he spoke.

"Look round here, Lawyer Lightwood, at them red curtains. It's the Fellowships, the 'ouse as I told you wouldn't run away. And has it run away?"

Not showing himself much impressed by this remarkable confirmation of the informer's evidence, Lightwood inquired what other business they had there?

"I wished you to see the Fellowships for yourself, Lawyer Lightwood, that you might judge whether I'm a liar; and now I'll see Gaffer's window for myself, that we may know whether he's at home."

With that he crept away.

"He'll come back, I suppose?" murmured Lightwood.

"Ay! and go through with it," murmured Eugene.

He came back after a very short interval indeed.

"Gaffer's out, and his boat's out. His daughter's at home, sitting a-looking at the fire. But there's some supper getting ready, so Gaffer's expected. I can find what move he's upon, easy enough, presently."

Then he beckoned and led the way again, and they came to the police-station, still as clean and cool and steady as before, saving that the flame of its lamp—being but a lamp-flame, and only attached to the Force as an outsider—flickered in the wind.

Also, within doors, Mr. Inspector was at his studies as of yore. He recognized the friends the instant they reappeared, but their reappearance had no effect on his composure. Not even the circumstance that Riderhood was their conductor moved him, otherwise than that as he took a dip of ink he seemed, by a settlement of his chin in his stock, to propound to that personage, without looking at him, the question, "What have you been up to, last?"

Mortimer Lightwood asked him, would he be so good as look at those notes? Handing him Eugene's.

Having read the first few lines, Mr. Inspector mounted to that (for him) extraordinary pitch of emotion that he said, "Does either of you two gentlemen happen to have a pinch of snuff about him?" Finding that neither had, he did quite as well without it, and read on.

"Have you heard these read?" he then demanded of the honest man.

"No," said Riderhood.

"Then you had better hear them." And so read them aloud, in an official manner.

"Are these notes correct, now, as to the information you bring here and the evidence you mean to give?" he asked, when he had finished reading.

"They are. They are as correct," returned Mr. Riderhood, "as I am. I can't say more than that for 'em."

"I'll take this man myself, Sir," said Mr. Inspector to Lightwood. Then to Riderhood, "Is he at home? Where is he? What's he doing? You have made it your business to know all about him, no doubt."

Riderhood said what he did know, and promised to find out in a few minutes what he didn't know.

"Stop," said Mr. Inspector; "not till I tell you. We mustn't look like business. Would you two gentlemen object to making a pretense of taking a glass of something in my company at the Fellowships? Well-conducted house, and highly respectable landlady."

They replied that they would be happy to substitute a reality for the pretense, which, in the main, appeared to be as one with Mr. Inspector's meaning.

"Very good," said he, taking his hat from its peg, and putting a pair of handcuffs in his pocket as if they were his gloves. "Reserve!" Reserve saluted. "You know where to find me?" Reserve again saluted. "Riderhood, when you have found out concerning his coming home, come round to the window of Cosy, tap twice at it, and wait for me. Now, gentlemen."

As the three went out together, and Riderhood slouched off from under the trembling lamp his separate way, Lightwood asked the officer what he thought of this?

Mr. Inspector replied, with due generality and reticence, that it was always more likely that a man had done a bad thing than that he hadn't. That he himself had several times "reckoned up" Gaffer, but had never been able to bring him to a satisfactory criminal total. That if this story was true, it was only in part true. That the two men, very shy characters, would have been jointly and pretty equally "in it;" but that this man had "spotted" the other, to save himself and get the money.

"And I think," added Mr. Inspector, in conclusion, "that if all goes well with him, he's in a tolerable way of getting it. But as this is the Fellowships, gentlemen, where the lights are, I recommend dropping the subject. You can't do better than be interested in some lime works any where down about Northfleet, and doubtful whether some of your lime don't get into bad company as it comes up in barges."

"You hear, Eugene?" said Lightwood, over his shoulder. "You are deeply interested in lime."

"Without lime," returned that unmoved barrister-at-law, "my existence would be unilluminated by a ray of hope."

CHAPTER XIII.

TRACKING THE BIRD OF PREY.

THE two lime merchants, with their escort, entered the dominions of Miss Abbey Potterson, to whom their escort (presenting them and their pretended business over the half-door of the bar, in a confidential way) preferred his figurative request that "a mouthful of fire" might be lighted in Cosy. Always well disposed to assist the constituted authorities, Miss Abbey bade Bob Gliddery attend the gentlemen to that retreat, and promptly enliven it with fire and gaslight. Of this commission the bare-armed Bob, leading the way with a flaming wisp of paper, so speedily acquitted himself, that Cosy seemed to leap out of a dark sleep and embrace them warmly the moment they passed the lintels of its hospitable door.

"They burn sherry very well here," said Mr. Inspector, as a piece of local intelligence. "Perhaps you gentlemen might like a bottle?"

The answer being By all means, Bob Gliddery received his instructions from Mr. Inspector, and departed in a becoming state of alacrity engendered by reverence for the majesty of the law.

"It's a certain fact," said Mr. Inspector, "that this man we have received our information from," indicating Riderhood with his thumb over his shoulder, "has for some time past given the other man a bad name arising out of your lime barges, and that the other man has been avoided in consequence. I don't say what it means or proves, but it's a certain fact. I had it first from one of the opposite sex of my acquaintance," vaguely indicating Miss Abbey with his thumb over his shoulder, "down away at a distance, over yonder."

Then probably Mr. Inspector was not quite unprepared for their visit that evening? Lightwood hinted.

"Well you see," said Mr. Inspector, "it was a question of making a move. It's of no use moving if you don't know what your move is. You had better by far keep still. In the matter of this lime, I certainly had an idea that it might lie between the two men; I always had that idea. Still I was forced to wait for a start, and I wasn't so lucky as to get a start. This man that we have received our information from has got a start, and if he don't meet with a check he may make the running and come in first. There may turn out to be something considerable for him that comes in second, and I don't mention who may or who may not try for that place. There's duty to do, and I shall do it, under any circumstances, to the best of my judgment and ability."

"Speaking as a shipper of lime—" began Eugene.

"Which no man has a better right to do than yourself, you know," said Mr. Inspector.

"I hope not," said Eugene; "my father having been a shipper of lime before me, and my grandfather before him—in fact we having been a family immersed to the crowns of our heads in lime during several generations—I beg to observe that if this missing lime could be got hold of without any young female relative of any distinguished gentleman engaged in the lime trade (which I cherish next to my life) being present, I think it might be a more agreeable proceeding to the assisting by-standers, that is to say, lime-burners."

"I also," said Lightwood, pushing his friend aside with a laugh, "should much prefer that."

"It shall be done, gentlemen, if it can be done conveniently," said Mr. Inspector, with coolness. "There is no wish on my part to cause any distress in that quarter. Indeed, I am sorry for that quarter."

"There was a boy in that quarter," remarked Eugene. "He is still there?"

"No," said Mr. Inspector. "He has quitted those works. He is otherwise disposed of."

"Will she be left alone then?" asked Eugene.

"She will be left," said Mr. Inspector, "alone."

Bob's reappearance with a steaming jug broke off the conversation. But although the jug steamed forth a delicious perfume, its contents had not received that last happy touch which the surpassing finish of the Six Jolly Fellowship Porters imparted on such momentous occasions. Bob carried in his left hand one of those iron models of sugar-loaf hats, before-mentioned, into which he emptied the jug, and the pointed end of which he thrust deep down into the fire, so leaving it for a few moments while he disappeared and reappeared with three bright drinking-glasses. Placing these on the table and bending over the fire, meritoriously sensible of the trying nature of his duty, he watched the wreaths of steam, until at the special instant of projection he caught up the iron vessel and gave it one delicate swirl, causing it to send forth one gentle hiss. Then he restored the contents to the jug; held over the steam of the jug each of the three bright glasses in succession; finally filled them all, and with a clear conscience awaited the applause of his fellow-creatures.

It was bestowed (Mr. Inspector having proposed as an appropriate settlement "The lime trade!"), and Bob withdrew to report the commendations of the guests to Miss Abbey in the bar. It may be here in confidence admitted that, the room being close shut in his absence, there had not appeared to be the slightest reason for the elaborate maintenance of this same lime fiction. Only it had been regarded by Mr. Inspector as so uncommonly satisfactory, and so fraught with mysterious virtues, that neither of his clients had presumed to question it.

Two taps were now heard on the outside of the window. Mr. Inspector, hastily fortifying himself with another glass, strolled out with a noiseless foot and an unoccupied countenance. As one might go to survey the weather and the general aspect of the heavenly bodies.

"This is becoming grim, Mortimer," said Eugene, in a low voice. "I don't like this."

"Nor I," said Lightwood. "Shall we go?"

"Being here, let us stay. You ought to see it out, and I won't leave you. Besides, that lonely girl with the dark hair runs in my head. It was little more than a glimpse we had of her that last time, and yet I almost see her waiting by the fire to-night. Do you feel like a dark combination of traitor and pickpocket when you think of that girl?"

"Rather," returned Lightwood. "Do you?"

"Very much so."

Their escort strolled back again, and reported. Divested of its various lime-lights and shadows, his report went to the effect that Gaffer was away in his boat, supposed to be on his old look-out; that he had been expected last high-water; that having missed it for some reason or other, he was not, according to his usual habits at night, to be counted on before next high-water, or it might be an hour or so later; that his daughter, surveyed through the window, would seem to be so expecting him, for the supper was not cooking, but set out ready to be cooked; that it would be high-water at about one, and that it was now barely ten; that there was nothing to be done but watch and wait; that the informer was keeping watch at the instant of that present reporting, but that two heads were better than one (especially when the second was Mr. Inspector's); and that the reporter meant to share the watch. And forasmuch as crouching under the lee of a hauled-up boat on a night when it blew cold and strong, and when the weather was varied with blasts of hail at times, might be wearisome to amateurs, the reporter closed with the recommendation that the two gentlemen should remain for a while, at any rate, in their present quarters, which were weather-tight and warm.

They were not inclined to dispute this recommendation, but they wanted to know where they could join the watchers when so disposed.

WAITING FOR FATHER.

Rather than trust to a verbal description of the place, which might mislead, Eugene (with a less weighty sense of personal trouble on him than he usually had) would go out with Mr. Inspector, note the spot, and come back.

On the shelving bank of the river, among the slimy stones of a causeway—not the special causeway of the Six Jolly Fellowships, which had a landing-place of its own, but another, a little removed, and very near to the old wind-mill which was the denounced man's dwelling-place—were a few boats; some, moored and already beginning to float; others, hauled up above the reach of the tide. Under one of these latter Eugene's companion disappeared. And when Eugene had observed its position with reference to the other boats, and had made sure that he could not miss it, he turned his eyes upon the building where, as he had been told, the lonely girl with the dark hair sat by the fire.

He could see the light of the fire shining through the window. Perhaps it drew him on to look in. Perhaps he had come out with the express intention. That part of the bank having rank grass growing on it there was no difficulty in getting close, without any noise of footsteps: it was but to scramble up a ragged face of pretty hard mud some three or four feet high and come upon the grass and to the window. He came to the window by that means.

She had no other light than the light of the fire. The unkindled lamp stood on the table. She sat on the ground, looking at the brazier, with her face leaning on her hand. There was a kind of film or flicker on her face, which at first he took to be the fitful fire-light; but, on a second look, he saw that she was weeping. A sad and solitary spectacle, as shown him by the rising and the falling of the fire.

It was a little window of but four pieces of glass, and was not curtained: he chose it because the larger window near it was. It showed him the room, and the bills upon the wall respecting the drowned people starting out and receding by turns. But he glanced slightly at them, though he looked long and steadily at her. A deep rich piece of color, with the brown flush of her cheek and the shining lustre of her hair, though sad and solitary, weeping by the rising and the falling of the fire.

She started up. He had been so very still that he felt sure it was not he who had disturbed her, so merely withdrew from the window and stood near it in the shadow of the wall. She opened the door, and said, in an alarmed tone, "Father, was that you calling me?" And again, "Father!" And once again, after listening, "Father! I thought I heard you call me twice before!"

No response. As she re-entered at the door he dropped over the bank and made his way back, among the ooze and near the hiding-place, to Mortimer Lightwood: to whom he told what he had seen of the girl, and how this was becoming very grim indeed.

"If the real man feels as guilty as I do," said Eugene, "he is remarkably uncomfortable."

"Influence of secrecy," suggested Lightwood.

"I am not at all obliged to it for making me Guy Fawkes in the vault and a Sneak in the area both at once," said Eugene. "Give me some more of that stuff."

Lightwood helped him to some more of that stuff, but it had been cooling, and didn't answer now.

"Pooh," said Eugene, spitting it out among the ashes. "Tastes like the wash of the river."

"Are you so familiar with the flavor of the wash of the river?"

"I seem to be to-night. I feel as if I had been half drowned, and swallowing a gallon of it."

"Influence of locality," suggested Lightwood.

"You are mighty learned to-night, you and your influences," returned Eugene. "How long do we stay here?"

"How long do you think?"

"If I could choose, I should say a minute," replied Eugene, "for the Jolly Fellowship Porters are not the jolliest dogs I have known. But I suppose we are best here until they turn us out with the other suspicious characters, at mid-night."

Thereupon he stirred the fire, and sat down on one side of it. It struck eleven, and he made believe to compose himself patiently. But gradually he took the fidgets in one leg, and then in the other leg, and then in one arm, and then in the other arm, and then in his chin, and then in his back, and then in his forehead, and then in his hair, and then in his nose; and then he stretched himself recumbent on two chairs, and groaned; and then he started up.

"Invisible insects of diabolical activity swarm in this place. I am tickled and twitched all over. Mentally, I have now committed a burglary under the meanest circumstances, and the myrmidons of justice are at my heels."

"I am quite as bad," said Lightwood, sitting up facing him, with a tumbled head, after going through some wonderful evolutions, in which his head had been the lowest part of him. "This restlessness began, with me, long ago. All the time you were out I felt like Gulliver with the Liliputians firing upon him."

"It won't do, Mortimer. We must get into the air; we must join our dear friend and brother, Riderhood. And let us tranquilize ourselves by making a compact. Next time (with a view to our peace of mind) we'll commit the crime, instead of taking the criminal. You swear it?"

"Certainly."

"Sworn! Let Tippins look to it. Her life's in danger."

Mortimer rang the bell to pay the score, and Bob appeared to transact that business with him: whom Eugene, in his careless extravagance, asked if he would like a situation in the lime-trade?

"Thankee Sir, no Sir," said Bob. "I've a good sitiuation here, Sir."

"If you change your mind at any time," returned Eugene, "come to me at my works, and you'll always find an opening in the lime-kiln."

"Thankee Sir," said Bob.

"This is my partner," said Eugene, "who keeps the books and attends to the wages. A fair day's wages for a fair day's work is ever my partner's motto."

"And a very good 'un it is, gentlemen," said Bob, receiving his fee, and drawing a bow out of his head with his right hand, very much as he would have drawn a pint of beer out of the beer engine.

"Eugene," Mortimer apostrophized him, laughing quite heartily when they were alone again, "how can you be so ridiculous?"

"I am in a ridiculous humor," quoth Eugene; "I am a ridiculous fellow. Every thing is ridiculous. Come along!"

It passed into Mortimer Lightwood's mind that a change of some sort, best expressed perhaps as an intensification of all that was wildest and most negligent and reckless in his friend, had come upon him in the last half hour or so. Thoroughly used to him as he was, he found something new and strained in him that was for the moment perplexing. This passed into his mind, and passed out again; but he remembered it afterward.

"There's where she sits, you see," said Eugene, when they were standing under the bank, roared and riven at by the wind. "There's the light of her fire."

"I'll take a peep through the window," said Mortimer.

"No, don't!" Eugene caught him by the arm. "Best not make a show of her. Come to our honest friend."

He led him to the post of watch, and they both dropped down and crept under the lee of the boat; a better shelter than it had seemed, before being directly contrasted with the blowing wind and the bare night.

"Mr. Inspector at home?" whispered Eugene.

"Here I am, Sir."

"And our friend of the perspiring brow is at the far corner there? Good. Any thing happened?"

"His daughter has been out, thinking she heard him calling, unless it was a sign to him to keep out of the way. It might have been."

"It might have been Rule Britannia," muttered Eugene, "but it wasn't. Mortimer!"

"Here!" (On the other side of Mr. Inspector.)

"Two burglaries now, and a forgery!"

With this indication of his depressed state of mind Eugene fell silent.

They were all silent for a long while. As it got to be flood-tide, and the water came nearer to them, noises on the river became more frequent, and they listened more. To the turning of steam-paddles, to the clinking of iron chain, to the creaking of blocks, to the measured working of oars, to the occasional violent barking of some passing dog on shipboard, who seemed to scent them lying in their hiding-place. The night was not so dark but that, besides the lights at bows and mast-heads gliding to and fro, they could discern some shadowy bulk attached; and now and then a ghostly lighter with a large dark sail, like a warning arm, would start up very near them, pass on, and vanish. At this time of their watch, the water close to them would be often agitated by some impulsion given it from a distance. Often they believed this beat and splash to be the boat they lay in wait for, running in ashore; and again and again they would have started up, but for the immobility with which the informer, well used to the river, kept quiet in his place.

The wind carried away the striking of the great multitude of city church clocks, for those lay to leeward of them; but there were bells to windward that told them of its being One—Two—Three. Without that aid they would have known how the night wore by the falling of the tide, recorded in the appearance of an ever-widening black wet strip of shore, and the emergence of the paved causeway from the river, foot by foot.

As the time so passed, this slinking business became a more and more precarious one. It would seem as if the man had had some intimation of what was in hand against him, or had taken fright? His movements might have been planned to gain for him, in getting beyond their reach, twelve hours' advantage? The honest man who had expended the sweat of his brow became uneasy, and began to complain with bitterness of the proneness of mankind to cheat him—him invested with the dignity of Labor!

Their retreat was so chosen that while they could watch the river they could watch the house. No one had passed in or out since the daughter thought she heard the father calling. No one could pass in or out without being seen.

"But it will be light at five," said Mr. Inspector, "and then we shall be seen."

"Look here," said Riderhood, "what do you say to this? He may have been lurking in and out, and just holding his own between two or three bridges for hours back."

"What do you make of that?" said Mr. Inspector; stoical, but contradictory.

"He may be doing so at this present time."

"What do you make of that?" said Mr. Inspector.

"My boat's among them boats here at the cause'ay."

"And what do you make of your boat?" said Mr. Inspector.

"What if I put off in her and take a look round? I know his ways, and the likely nooks he favors. I know where he'd be at such a time of the tide, and where he'd be at such another time. Ain't I been his pardner? None of you need show. None of you need stir. I can shove her off without help; and as to me being seen, I'm about at all times."

"You might have given a worse opinion," said Mr. Inspector, after brief consideration. "Try it."

"Stop a bit. Let's work it out. If I want you, I'll drop round under the Fellowships and tip you a whistle."

"If I might so far presume as to offer a suggestion to my honorable and gallant friend, whose knowledge of naval matters far be it from me to impeach," Eugene struck in with great deliberation, "it would be, that to tip a whistle is to advertise mystery and invite speculation. My honorable and gallant friend will, I trust, excuse me, as an independent member, for throwing out a remark which I feel to be due to this house and the country."

"Was that the T'other Governor, or Lawyer Lightwood?" asked Riderhood; for they spoke, as they crouched or lay, without seeing one another's faces.

"In reply to the question put by my honorable and gallant friend," said Eugene, who was lying on his back with his hat on his face, as an attitude highly expressive of watchfulness, "I can have no hesitation in replying (it not being inconsistent with the public service) that those accents were the accents of the T'other Governor."

"You've tolerable good eyes, ain't you, Gov-error? You've all tolerable good eyes, ain't you?" demanded the informer.

All.

"Then if I row up under the Fellowships and lay there, no need to whistle. You'll make out that there's a speck of something or another there, and you'll know it's me, and you'll come down that cause'ay to me. Understood all?"

Understood all.

"Off she goes then!"

In a moment, with the wind cutting keenly at him sideways, he was staggering down to his boat; in a few moments he was clear, and creeping up the river under their own shore.

Eugene had raised himself on his elbow to look into the darkness after him. "I wish the boat of my honorable and gallant friend," he murmured, lying down again and speaking into his hat, "may be endowed with philanthropy enough to turn bottom upward and extinguish him!—Mortimer."

"My honorable friend."

"Three burglaries, two forgeries, and a midnight assassination."

Yet, in spite of having those weights on his conscience, Eugene was somewhat enlivened by the late slight change in the circumstances of affairs. So were his two companions. Its being a change was every thing. The suspense seemed to have taken a new lease, and to have begun afresh from a recent date. There was something additional to look for. They were all three more sharply on the alert, and less deadened by the miserable influences of the place and time.

More than an hour had passed, and they were even dozing, when one of the three—each said it was he, and he had not dozed—made out Riderhood in his boat at the spot agreed on. They sprang up, came out from their shelter, and went down to him. When he saw them coming he dropped alongside the causeway; so that they, standing on the causeway, could speak with him in whispers, under the shadowy mass of the Six Jolly Fellowship Porters fast asleep.

"Blest if I can make it out!" said he, staring at them.

"Make what out? Have you seen him?"

"No."

"What have you seen?" asked Lightwood; for he was staring at them in the strangest way.

"I've seen his boat."

"Not empty?"

"Yes, empty. And what's more,—adrift. And what's more,—with one scull gone. And what's more,—with t'other scull jammed in the thowels and broke short off. And what's more,—the boat's drove tight by the tide 'atwixt two tiers of barges. And what's more,—he's in luck again, by George if he ain't!"

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 28th of July. The session of Congress closed on the 4th of July. Our previous Numbers have given a view of the general line of debate and the course of thought during this important session. We have not thought it expedient to continue the record of this from month to month. Several laws of the highest importance have been enacted; but most of these underwent great changes during their progress through the two Houses. The official copy of the acts of the session has not yet been issued, and we must here content ourselves with producing a resumé of a few of the laws of immediate interest, reserving for a future Number a more complete abstract.

The Tariff Act increases largely the duties on imports. We give a few of the leading items. Teas pay 25 cents a pound. Sugar, from 3 to 5 cents, according to grade. Molasses, 8 cents a gallon; sirups and melado, 2½ cents a pound. Brandy, $2½; and other spirits, $2 a gallon. Wines valued at not over 50 cents a gallon, 25 cents; from 50 cents to $1, 50 cents; over $1, 100 cents, with 25 per cent. ad valorem in all cases; Champagnes not to pay less than $6 a dozen for quarts. Spirituous liquors not enumerated, 100 per cent. upon the value. Ales, porter, and beer in bottles, 35 cents; not bottled, 20 cents a gallon. Cigars, from 75 cents to $3 a pound, besides from 20 to 60 per cent. ad valorem. Tobacco, 35 to 50 cents a pound. Iron, various rates, but none less than 33 per cent. on the value. Coal, from 40 to 125 cents a ton. Lead, on an average, 2 cents a pound. Gems unset, 10 per cent. Wools, from 3 to 10 cents a pound, according to grade, with 10 per cent. additional ad valorem. Woolen goods, various specified rates, none less than 50 per cent. on the value, and many more than this. Cotton, 2 cents a pound. Cotton manufactures, from 5 to 7½ cents per square yard, besides from 10 to 35 per cent. ad valorem—the finer the goods the higher the rate. Linens, 35 to 40 per cent. Silk, 25 to 40 per cent. Silk goods generally, 60 per cent. China and earthen-ware, 40 to 45. Books, 25. Fancy soaps, 10 cents a pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem; plain soaps, 1 cent a pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem. As far as possible specific duties are levied on every article, the general principle being that the highest duties are levied upon articles of luxury. An additional discriminating duty of 10 per cent. is imposed upon goods imported in foreign bottoms, except in cases where the contrary is specially provided for by law or treaty. This act went into effect on the 4th of July.

The Internal Revenue Law imposes licenses upon every trade and profession, varying with the presumed amount of business, discrimination being made against liquor-dealers, shows, lotteries, gift enterprises, and the like. Almost every profession is enumerated by name; of those not specially mentioned, every person whose profession brings an income of $1000 pays $10 for license. Every possible legal document, to be valid, must be stamped, the sums for each being set down, varying, as far as possible, with the amount denoted by the document. All patent medicines and similar preparations are subject to excise, the general principle being to impose 1 cent for every 25 cents of the price of the article. Almost every article of manufacture is noted with a special tax, amounting, as nearly as possible, to 5 per cent. upon the value. Railroads, Express Companies, and similar branches of business, pay from 2 to 5 per cent. of their gross receipts. A special tax is also imposed upon many articles of show and luxury. Gold watches, pianos, and carriages kept for use pay $1, if valued at less than $100, with a general increase of a dollar for each additional hundred of value. Gold plate pays 50 cents an ounce; silver plate, 5 cents; but any family may have 40 ounces of silver free of tax. Incomes are taxed as follows: below $600, untaxed; from $600 to $5000, 5 per cent. on excess above $600; from $5000 to $10,000, 7½ per cent.; on excess over $10,000, 10 per cent. Legacies and successions to real estate pay from $1 to $6 on the hundred, according to the degree of consanguinity between the parties. The foregoing gives merely a general view of the scope of this long and elaborate law.

The Enrollment Law practically renders every able-bodied citizen of military age liable to service in the army, either personally or by a substitute otherwise exempt. It authorizes the President at discretion to call for any number of volunteers for one, two, or three years; and in case the required number of volunteers do not come forward to order a draft. Volunteers will receive a bounty of $100 for each year, one-third to be paid when mustered into service, one-third when half the term has expired, the other third at the expiration of the term of service. If the quota of any district is not filled by volunteers within fifty days from the date of the call a draft is to be ordered to supply the deficiency, in which case no payment of money shall be accepted as commutation for relieving any drafted man from personal military service. The Executive of any State may send recruiting agents into any of the revolted States except Arkansas, Tennessee, and Louisiana to raise volunteers, who shall be credited to the States and districts procuring them. This Act was approved by the President on the 4th of July, and in accordance with it he issued, on the 18th, a proclamation calling for 500,000 volunteers for one, two, or three years as they might elect. And in case this number of volunteers should not come forward, a draft was ordered to be made immediately after the 5th of September, being fifty days from the date of the call, for men sufficient to supply the deficiency in every district, these men to serve for one year.

By the Act to increase the pay of soldiers, the pay of non-commissioned officers and privates in the army has been augmented by about one quarter, commencing from May 1. In the engineer and ordnance service privates of the first class receive $18 a month; those of the second class, and all privates in the cavalry, artillery, and infantry receive $16 per month, with rations mainly as before. The former pay of private soldiers was $13 a month. A corresponding increase is made to the pay of non-commissioned officers in the army.

The Act for regulating commercial intercourse between the loyal and disaffected States enacts that in these latter all property is to be considered as abandoned when the lawful owner is voluntarily absent therefrom and engaged in aiding or encouraging the rebellion. Abandoned or captured property is to be taken charge of and sold; houses and lands may be leased for a year, with provisions for the employment and welfare of former slaves. Whenever any part of a loyal State is under the control of the insurgents the President may forbid or regulate intercourse with it. The President may authorize agents to purchase for the United States any products of the insurrectionary States, paying in money not more than three-quarters of the market value of the articles at New York. No goods shall be taken into these States except to the amount and in the manner prescribed by the commanding general of the department and by an officer appointed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury. All officers and men of the army and navy are forbidden to engage in traffic in these districts.

An Act was passed by Congress guaranteeing to certain States whose governments had been overthrown or usurped a republican form of government. Its main provisions were: That the President might appoint a provisional governor for such States, to administer the government until a regular State Government should be established. When in any State military resistance against the United States has ceased the Provisional Governor shall enroll all the white male citizens, and request them to take the oath of allegiance; if a majority comply he shall issue a proclamation authorizing them to elect delegates to a Convention to form a State government; the delegates to be chosen by the votes of the loyal white citizens, those at home to vote where resident, those in military service at the head-quarters of their commands; no person who has held high civil or military office under the rebel usurpation, or voluntarily borne arms against the United States, to be eligible as a delegate. This Convention having declared the submission of the people to the Constitution and laws of the United States; and adopted provisions disqualifying for the office of governor or member of the Legislature all persons who shall have held any important civil or military office under the Confederacy; and prohibiting involuntary servitude; and disavowing all State or Confederate debts contracted by the usurping power, may proceed to the formation of a republican Constitution to be submitted to the people. If the Convention refuse to do this it is to be dissolved by the Provisional Governor, who may at his discretion order another. Until such a government is formed and recognized, the Provisional Governor is to enforce the laws of the United States, including this Act, which provides especially that slavery is abolished, and all slaves and their posterity enfranchised; that if any one attempts to hold in slavery any one declared free by this Act, he shall be punished by fine of not less than 1500 dollars and imprisonment for not less than five or more than twenty years; and that every person who has held or shall hold high civil office, or military office not below the grade of Colonel in the rebel service, is declared not to be a citizen of the United States. The above are the essential points of this Act, which embodies minute directions for carrying them into execution.—This Act was presented to the President too late for him to take it into consideration, and so failed to receive his signature. But on the 8th of July he issued a proclamation, stating that while he was not prepared by signing it to commit himself to any single plan of restoration, or to set aside the Free State Constitutions already adopted in Arkansas and Louisiana, still he was satisfied with this plan as a very proper one for the adoption of the people of any State who might choose to embrace it: and he would give to such people all aid and assistance; and that when in any State armed resistance had ceased, and the people had sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and the laws of the United States, Military Governors would be appointed with directions to proceed according to the bill.

The siege of Petersburg and the invasion of Maryland are the topics about which the interest in the eastern campaign has mainly centred.

Smith's corps was the first of Grant's army that arrived south of the James; it was marched directly to Petersburg. This important military position had been attempted June 10, nearly a week before, by a joint infantry and cavalry expedition under Kautz and Gillmore. Kautz gained the first line of defenses, but not receiving adequate support from Gillmore, who was shortly afterward relieved of his command, the attempt failed. During the few days between this attack and Smith's approach the defensive works about the city were greatly strengthened. Smith's transports were yet coming up when at 2 A.M., June 15, he started from Bermuda Hundred, north of the Appomattox River. This river separating City Point from Bermuda Hundred, at its mouth, skirts the northern front of Petersburg about twelve miles above.

The approach was to be made from the east; therefore the Appomattox had to be crossed. This was effected by a bridge of boats. After crossing, four roads were taken by separate columns; the river road on the right by Martindale; farther to the left, the City Point road by Brooks; the Jordan Point road by Hinks with his colored division; Kautz with his cavalry making a detour away to the left on the Prince George road. At noon, two miles from the city, Smith halted waiting for Kautz until evening. But Kautz not arriving, the batteries north east of Petersburg were carried, a regiment of Wise's brigade being captured. This success gave us about sixteen pieces of artillery, and a good position. Hancock's corps came up that night, just too late to render the success a decisive one; Hancock himself suffering rather seriously from his old wounds and not able to keep the saddle. This corps was placed to the left and southward of Smith. June 16 other positions were carried, and in the afternoon Burnside's corps came up, taking a position on Hancock's left.

But this day also the enemy was reinforced by Beauregard, who left his line at Bermuda Hundred in so great hurry, not waiting for Lee's columns to come up, that Butler had a good opportunity, which he improved, of breaking in upon the railroad between Petersburg and Richmond. Lee came upon him, his work pretty nearly done, and forced him back to his intrenchments. On the eve of the 16th, at 6 o'clock, an assault was made by the three corps, carrying a line of rifle-pits, followed by another the next morning, in which two redoubts were taken with 450 prisoners. During the 17th Warren's corps came up, taking the extreme left; and Wright's taking the place of the Eighteenth, the latter returned to Butler. By Saturday night, the 18th, the Confederate line was pushed back to its ultimate position, on a series of elevations, with its flanks resting on the river. The line had the form of a crescent, to which the Federal line conformed.

Petersburg communicates with the South by means of three railroads—the Petersburg and Suffolk, the Petersburg and Weldon, and the Petersburg and Lynchburg. The line which Grant's army held on Tuesday, the 21st, stretched across the Appomattox; Butler's two corps north of that river, facing Petersburg on the east, and the four corps of the Army of the Potomac on the south, fronting Petersburg in that direction. But this line crossed only one of the three railroads above-mentioned, viz.: the Petersburg and Suffolk. In order more closely to invest Petersburg, Grant, on the 22d, moved his Second and Sixth corps, supporting each other at a rather spacious interval, close up to the Weldon road; the Eighteenth Corps taking the place of these two on the right. Not only was this movement anticipated by Lee, who forthwith dispatched Hill to the threatened point, but due notice was taken of the gap between the Second and Sixth, and Hill promptly seizing his advantage pierced the weak centre and appeared on Barlow's flank. Barlow fell back, leaving Birney exposed, and the rifle-pits of the latter were taken by the enemy, together with M'Knight's battery of four guns. The confusion was but temporary; the Second Corps was re-formed and joined by the Sixth, when Hill was repulsed.

On the same day Wilson and Kautz made an attack on the Weldon road further south, about 11 miles from the Federal left. Crossing the road at Reams Station, the track was torn up for several miles and valuable property was destroyed. The next day the two commands reached the junction of the Danville and Lynchburg roads at Burkesville and destroyed the railroad for several miles. They pushed on to Roanoke Station on the Staunton River to burn the bridge at that point, but finding it strongly guarded turned back to Roanoke. June 28 they reached a point near Reams Station, where they were surrounded by rebel cavalry, under Hampton and Lee. A battle followed, which resulted in the retreat of the Federals. Information of this action and its result led Grant to dispatch the Second and Sixth corps to Reams Station, to create a diversion in Wilson's favor. Kautz from his knowledge of the country was able to reach Grant's lines on the 30th; Wilson, taking a more circuitous route, came in the next day. Sixty miles of railroads were thoroughly destroyed. The Danville Road, General Wilson reports, could not be repaired in less than forty days. His loss was from 750 to 1000 men, including those lost from Kautz's division.

Hunter's expedition against Lynchburg resulted in failure. The details are the following: June 10 Crook and Sullivan, under Hunter, march from Staunton on Lexington; defeat M'Causland's brigade; on the 14th are joined by Averill at Buchanan; on the 16th strike the Virginia and Tennessee railroad at Liberty, twenty miles west of Lynchburg, having moved through a gap in the Blue Ridge at the Peaks of Otter. Here the railroad was destroyed for several miles, including a bridge 700 feet long. Hunter then proceeded to invest Lynchburg, but before he had completed his preparations Early came up, and he was compelled to retire.

Hunter, in retreating, followed the line of the railroad westward to Salem, and then across the mountains to Gauley, in Western Virginia. Early, thus left with no strong force between him and the Potomac, marched rapidly up the Shenandoah with a force of 22,000 men, including Breckinridge's and Rhodes's Corps; 5500 of this force was cavalry. Leaving about four thousand men to protect Lynchburg, Gordonsville, and the gaps of the Blue Ridge, he crossed the Potomac, striking the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad at a point just above Harper's Ferry, threatening Martinsburg. July 3, Sigel, in command at Martinsburg, fell back on Sharpsburg, leaving valuable commissary and ordnance stores to be plundered by the enemy. The next day all the country between Winchester and Williamsport was in the hands of the rebels; at nine o'clock P.M. Sigel held Maryland Heights, Harper's Ferry having been evacuated. The Chesapeake and Ohio canal, running along the Potomac from Alexandria to Cumberland, was very seriously damaged by the Confederates, who took possession of Hagerstown, and were looking forward to Frederick, from which a large amount of Government stores were being moved to the North. This was on the 5th.

On the 9th was fought the Battle of Monocacy, between General Lewis Wallace and the enemy. Frederick was evacuated the previous night, and in the morning was in the hands of the foe. Early had gathered in all his forces from scattered points, concentrating them against Wallace. Ricketts's Division of the Sixth Corps had arrived from Washington and was on the field, holding the left of our line. The enemy forced the passage of the stream, and by their superiority of numbers pressed back Ricketts and got in the rear of our right, where the hundred days men were, capturing General Tyler, who afterward escaped. Wallace then fell back, Early pursuing on the Baltimore pike toward Ellicott's Mills. Sunday was a day of intense excitement at Baltimore. The enemy was now chiefly occupied in plunder, which they carried on on a most extensive scale. Bridges were burned on the Northern Central road; two trains were captured on the Philadelphia road, in one of which was Major-General Franklin, who was taken prisoner, but who afterward succeeded in effecting his escape; and railroad communication was suspended between Washington and the North. Monday evening, July 11, the main body of the rebels were on the Seventh Street road, six or eight miles from Washington, threatening Fort Stevens; but General Augur, in command of the defenses of the Capital, sent out a brigade of veteran troops which soon succeeded in driving the enemy. Early's rear now began to be threatened by forces under General Couch and by the return of Hunter, who held Martinsburg.* On Wednesday the invaders recrossed the Potomac southward, taking their plunder with them.

General Foster, having fitted out an expedition for the seizure of James Island and other approaches to Charleston was partially successful, having captured the lower end of the island. Subsequently an expedition, under Colonel Gurney of the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh New York, fitted out for the purpose of capturing Fort Johnson by a night attack, signally failed; a portion of the force, about 132, were landed, but not being supported in time were captured by the rebels.

In our last Record we left Sherman in possession of Alatoona Pass, the gate eastward into the open country from the Alleghanies. Sherman's advance on Atlanta from Chattanooga had been along the line of the Western and Atlantic Railroad, upon which it was necessary that he should keep fast hold at every step forward. June 6 he reached Ackworth, a few miles south of the Pass; on the 11th he made a dépôt of Big Shanty Station. Johnston confronted him, holding Kenesaw Mountain on the railroad, with strong outposts on Pilot Knob and Pine and Lost Mountains. Severe skirmishing on the 15th gave us Pine Mountain; on the crest of the mountain Polk was killed. At night the Confederate line reached from Kenesaw on the right, six miles, to Lost Mountain.

The Kenesaw, two miles and a half northwest of Marietta, is a double hill, the higher peak rising to the height of 1828 feet above the level of the sea. Lost Mountain is directly east from Kenesaw, north of the railroad between Marietta and Dallas. Five days more of hard pushing forced in Johnston's left from Lost Mountain. The Confederate commander now began to mass on the right, contracting his lines. M'Pherson operating on the enemy's right also gained some advantages.

These partial successes led Sherman to adopt with some degree of confidence the plan of direct assault against the Kenesaw, which was set down for the 27th of June. The Confederate army on the 22d stood in the shelter of the Kenesaw, with its centre strongly posted on that mountain, Noses Creek covering its left. This creek was crossed by Sherman's right, his centre meanwhile pressing up to the base of the Kenesaw, having carried some commanding positions west of the mountain from which the enemy's position became exposed to an enfilading fire. In the assault on the 27th M'Pherson's corps—the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth, commanded respectively by Logan, Dodge, and Blair—moved against the main position on the Kenesaw, Blair against the eastern, Dodge against the northern, and Logan against the western slope. Palmer at the same time assailed the enemy's centre, supported on the right by Hooker, while Schofield swung around to the extreme right. The assault failed, resulting in a Federal loss of between two and three thousand men. Schofield's movement on the enemy's left was then strengthened and pushed forward, resulting in the evacuation of Kenesaw, July 3, on the anniversary of the capture of Vicksburg. July 5, Johnston took up a position two miles north of the Chattahoochee and commenced crossing; by the 9th his whole army was across, having lost a large number of prisoners (rumor says 4000) on its way from Kenesaw.

Sherman crossed at various points north of the railroad bridge—his main column, after the north bank was clear of the enemy, M'Pherson's three corps somewhat earlier; his whole army being south of the Chattahoochee at 9 P. M. on Sunday, July 17. The line extended from near the mouth of Peachtree Creek, on the right, to Decatur, a distance of fourteen miles, as follows: Palmer, Hooker, Howard, Schofield, the three corps of M'Pherson. That Sunday was the beginning of a momentous week. Sherman's army held, as we have seen, a long line, resting in the form of an arch on the northeast and within five miles of Atlanta.

In the mean time Bragg, the military supervisor of the Confederacy, had visited Atlanta, and on the 18th Johnston was removed from command, which was assumed by General Hood, and a new policy was adopted. His plan was well conceived. He knew that a line fourteen miles long must be weak somewhere; he would strike the right centre, fold Sherman's right wing back on the Chattahoochee and then turn upon and annihilate the left. On Wednesday, therefore, July 20, he came out and hurled his columns against Hooker's corps, which was after all not the weak point, making three assaults which were "bloodily repulsed."

Not satisfied, Hood assaulted again on Friday and with even poorer success than before, leaving, so says report, 7000 killed and wounded on the field, and inflicting on the Federal army a loss of 2500. It was on this day that M'Pherson was killed.

Sherman in the mean time advanced his lines, directing particular attention to the destruction of the Confederate lines of retreat. On Thursday he had gained a position commanding a portion of Atlanta; M'Pherson moved up to within two miles and a half of the city on the south and east, his left under Blair holding a position near the Macon road. There are four great lines of railroad which centre in Atlanta. Northerly runs the Western and Atlantic road, along which Sherman had been pushing Johnston across the mountains for three months. On the east is the road to Augusta, branching off to Charleston and Savannah: the trunk of this road was held by M'Pherson at Decatur. On the south runs the Macon road, also connecting with Savannah; a short distance south of Atlanta it branches off into the West Point and Montgomery road.

This latter road had been very lately the object of a raiding expedition under the command of General Rousseau, who started from Nashville, July 8, with 2700 cavalry, consisting of four regiments which concentrated at Decatur, in Northern Alabama. Proceeding from Decatur, July 10, and crossing the Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers, Rousseau struck for that portion of the West Point road between Montgomery and Opelika. During this reach of eight miles there are eight railroad bridges, all of which were destroyed, also bridges between Opelika and West Point. He reached Sherman's lines at Marietta on the 23d.

General Forrest was severely punished about the middle of July by Generals Smith, Mower, and Grierson. Several engagements occurred on different days, in all of which Forrest, with Lee and Walker, were defeated. Grierson estimates the Confederate loss as not less than 4000. Smith was compelled to return for want of supplies. The battles with Forrest took place between Corinth and Okolona in Mississippi, on the Mobile railroad.

Smith's and Rousseau's expeditions started out nearly at the same time. About the same time also Slocum fitted out two expeditions from Vicksburg into the interior of Mississippi. These were probably only a diversion in favor of Smith and Rousseau; if they meant any thing more than this they certainly failed.

The Confederate cruiser Alabama, which has so long been the scourge of our commerce, was destroyed on the 19th of June off the port of Cherbourg, France, by the United States steamer Kearsarge, Captain Winslow. The Alabama, Captain

Semmes, arrived at Cherbourg on the 14th, from a cruise in the Indian Ocean. In accordance with the French law of neutrality she was warned to leave that port. On the morning of the 19th she steamed out of the harbor, which was watched by the Kearsarge. The French iron-clad La Couronne followed her until she was beyond French waters. The Kearsarge stood off, followed by the Alabama, for about three leagues, so as to be sure that the action should take place clear of French maritime jurisdiction; she then turned to meet the enemy. The force of the two vessels was as nearly as possible equal; the crew of the Kearsarge was a little more numerous, the armament of the Alabama somewhat heavier. The Alabama opened fire at 11 o'clock at long range, the Kearsarge reserving her fire for a little until they came closer. During the action both vessels moved in a series of circles, gradually diminishing, and having a common centre, so that each kept her starboard battery bearing upon her opponent. The fire of the Alabama was more rapid, that of the Kearsarge more accurate. The commander of the Kearsarge had taken the precaution to protect, in a measure, some vital points of his vessel, by suspending the iron anchor-chains over the side; this is a novelty in naval war, having been previously only used by one of our vessels in the capture of New Orleans. In a quarter of an hour after the action began the Alabama began to suffer severely. At every moment she suffered more and more, while the Kearsarge was scarcely harmed. In less than an hour the Alabama was in an almost sinking state, and her commander attempted to run toward the shore in order to reach French water; the Kearsarge crowded all steam to shut her off, and coming within 400 yards, delivered a broadside which reduced the enemy to a hopeless condition. Captain Semmes, finding his vessel going down, struck her flag, ordered his crew to jump overboard, and sent a boat with an officer to surrender his vessel and ask assistance to save his crew. All the serviceable boats of the Kearsarge were got out for that purpose. Meanwhile an English yacht, the Deerhound, owned by a Mr. Lancaster, whose family were on board, had come out of Cherbourg to see the fight. He was hailed from the Kearsarge and requested to aid in saving the crew of the Alabama. His boats picked up about forty, including Semmes and most of his officers; the boats of the Kearsarge saved sixty; and nine more were rescued by a French pilot-boat. The Alabama lost 7 killed on board, 17 drowned, and 12 wounded. The loss of the Kearsarge was three wounded, only one mortally. The vessel was scarcely harmed, and at the close of the action was in a condition to engage again. Meanwhile the commander of the Deerhound put off for the English coast, with the men whom he had picked up, Captain Winslow never imagining that one who bore the flag of the Royal Yacht Club would be guilty of thus dishonorably rescuing his prisoners. Semmes was landed in England, and received with much warmth, and he declared that he would soon be afloat in another Alabama. This, if more than bravado, was supposed to refer to the Rappahannock, formerly the English steamer Victor, which had been bought by the Confederates, taken without armament to Calais, in France, where she was then lying; others supposed it to refer to the Yeddo, a steamer built in a French port, ostensibly for the China trade, but presumed to be designed for the Confederates; this vessel soon after put to sea, and it was announced that she had been sold to the Prussian Government. Others still suppose that it referred to another vessel building in England. Captain Winslow meanwhile took his prisoners into Cherbourg, and as French law does not permit the detention of foreign prisoners of war, and as he had no room for them on his own vessel, he released them on parole.

Soon after two other United States steamers, the Sacramento and the Niagara, arrived in these waters; and the arrival of two Confederate steamers is announced. One of these was supposed to be the General Lee, and the other the Florida; this last is thought improbable, as that vessel was only a few days before known to be off the American coast. It is generally thought to be a Confederate corvette, name unknown, which had been reported in the neighborhood of Gibraltar. At the date of July 13 there was a report of a naval action having been fought between two of these vessels, but the news brought two days later failed to confirm the rumor.

Mr. Chase resigned his post as Secretary of the Treasury on the 30th of June. The place was offered to Mr. Tod, ex-Governor of Ohio, who declined to accept it on account of his health. It was then offered to and accepted by Hon. William Pitt Fessenden, Senator from Maine, and Chairman of the Finance Committee in the Senate. The financial policy of the new Secretary, as far as developed, seems to be to diminish rather than increase the amount of currency, which is thought to be greater than is required by the wants of the country, and thus to have in part caused the present increase of prices; to rely upon taxes for funds to meet the current expenses of Government, including interest on the public debt, and to procure what other amount may be required for the prosecution of the war by loans from the people. Under authority of an Act passed in June he proposes to issue \$200,000,000 in Treasury notes, payable in three years, to bear interest at the rate of $7\frac{3}{10}$ per cent. These notes to be of \$50, \$100, \$500, \$1000, and \$5000, to have coupons attached for the payment of interest semi-annually in lawful money; these notes at maturity to be convertible, at the option of the holder, into bonds at 6 per cent., redeemable in gold after 1872, and payable in 1887. This proposition was accompanied by a cogent appeal to the people of the United States, urging them, on the grounds of interest and patriotism, to take part in this National loan.

The Opposition Members of Congress put forth, on the 2d of July, an "Address to the People of the United States, and particularly to the people of the States which adhere to the Federal Government," arguing that there is good reason for changing the administration and policy of the General Government, through the instrumentality of suffrage, in the elections of the present year. The address asserts that it is useless to speak to the President or the majority in Congress. It charges the President with the engrossment of power; with military interference in elections; with the creation of bogus States; with illegally raising troops; with unnecessary and hateful conscription; with the payment of exorbitant bounties; with employing colored troops on an equality with white soldiers; with setting up a false and ruinous financial system; with placing us in peril of foreign interference; with endeavoring to corrupt the race by amalgamation with negroes. It then proposes to organize an Opposition, upon the general basis that all laws shall be executed; that the alleged wrong measures of Government shall be abandoned; that all troops shall be raised through and officered by State authority; that in reconstructing the Union the States shall stand as before the war, except as to changes which may be agreed upon between or among them; that the Constitution should be so amended as to provide against the uncontrolled domination of sectional parties North or South; and that there should be a general amnesty proclaimed except for particular offenses. This address, of which the above are the leading points, is signed by nine members from Pennsylvania, thirteen from Ohio, five from Indiana, eight from Illinois, one from Wisconsin, two from Kentucky, one from Virginia, two from Delaware, one from New Jersey, and one from New Hampshire—43 in all, of whom 7 are Members of the Senate, and 36 of the House of Representatives.

A singular but abortive effort has been made to open negotiations for peace between the Union and the Confederacy. After some preliminary negotiations, which appear to have been conducted by Mr. William C. Jewett, George N. Sanders, once Navy Agent at New York, and recently an active agent for the Confederates abroad, wrote to Mr. Horace Greeley, editor of the New York Tribune, that Clement C. Clay of Alabama, and James P. Holcombe of Virginia, and himself, with one other, whose name was not given, were in Canada, and were ready to go to Washington if a safe-conduct were given them. Mr. Greeley, who had gone to Niagara Falls authorized to act in the matter, replied that, understanding them to be bearers of a proposition for peace, he was authorized to promise the safe-conduct; the blank left for the name was filled by him with that of Jacob Thompson, formerly Secretary of the Interior under Mr. Buchanan. Clay and Holcombe replied, intimating that Mr. Thompson was not the person intended; that they were not accredited agents of the Confederate Government to submit propositions for peace, but they were in its confidential employment, were familiar with its wishes, and would be furnished with authority to act. They asked for a safe-conduct to Washington, and thence to Richmond. Mr. Greeley replied that under this changed aspect of the case he must await instructions from the President. These came in the shape of the following dispatch from the President, addressed "To Whom it may concern:"

"Any proposition which embraces the restoration of peace, the integrity of the whole Union, and the abandonment of slavery, and which comes by and with authority that can control the armies now at war against the United States, will be received and considered by the Executive Government of the United States, and will be met by liberal terms on substantial and collateral points, and the bearer or bearers thereof shall have safe-conduct both ways."

Upon the reception of this reply, the Confederate agents at once broke off all further correspondence, affirming that the document precluded negotiation, and prescribed in advance the terms and conditions of peace, returning to the original policy of "no bargaining, no negotiations, no truces with the rebels except to bury their dead, until every man shall have laid down his arms, submitted to the Government, and sued for mercy."

EUROPE.

The latest intelligence from England shows no increase of friendly feeling toward the United States. The warm reception given to Captain Semmes indicates the current of sentiment in leading circles. With cotton quoted at 31 pence a pound, instead of a little less than 8 pence, which was the ruling price just before the war—a fourfold increase attributed to our blockade—the feeling among financial and commercial circles could not well be other than hostile to us; for the life of England depends upon buying raw cotton cheaply and selling it when manufactured dearly. Moreover, the high rates of wages attainable in the United States are drawing away the best part of the laboring class. This is especially the case in Ireland, whence the emigration is fast approaching the highest numbers reached ten years ago. Most of the emigrants now leaving take with them not only their persons and their capacity for labor, but no inconsiderable amount of capital. A few years ago the policy of the British Government was to encourage emigration; now it is to discourage it. Moreover the Opposition, who hope to replace the present Ministry, are committed to action against the friendly or at least neutral course which the Government has endeavored to maintain. A strong pressure is thus steadily brought to bear on the Government to induce a change of policy, and it has not been without its effect. Thus in Parliament Mr. Lindsay has just given notice of a motion in favor of the interference of Great Britain, and this was postponed at the special request of the cabinet. A deputation from a body calling itself a society for obtaining a cessation of hostilities had an audience with Lord Palmerston, and it is now said that Mr. Mason, the Confederate Commissioner, has had an interview with the Premier, which was quite satisfactory to him.

The Danish question, meanwhile, for the moment absorbs European interest. The Peace Conference held its final session on the 25th of June, having, as had for some time been foreseen, accomplished no practical result. The neutral powers agreed to a partition of the Duchies, and proposed the line of the Schlei. Denmark would consent to this, but the Germans claimed more. So fighting was renewed, the Danes, overmatched, getting the worst of it, and the Prussians capturing the island of Alsens. The latest report is that the King of Denmark, apparently despairing of any substantial aid from England, has resolved upon a new policy; has dismissed his former ministers, and asks peace with Prussia, and proposes that Denmark shall be admitted as a member of the German Confederation, placing her navy under the control of the Diet. If this is accomplished the German Confederation will soon be able to take rank among the great maritime powers, the point at which Prussia and the minor German states have really all along been aiming. Such a result can not be pleasing to England and France, who now hold between them the control of the ocean. Moreover, no little uneasiness has been felt on account of a meeting lately held by the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, which was reported to have in effect resulted in a league between these powers against England and France. There is, however, no sure evidence of the accomplishment of any such league. Meanwhile the personal relations of the English court with the belligerents have no small part in complicating British action. The eldest daughter of the Queen is married to the Prince of Prussia, presumptive heir to the crown; while the wife of the Prince of Wales, who may at any time become Queen of Great Britain, and who is said to have gained complete control over her feeble husband, is daughter of the King of Denmark. The Queen herself apparently leans to the German side; but the future Queen, of course, is in favor of the Danes.

Editor's Easy Chair.

MR. JARVES, a gentleman who has devoted a large part of his life to the study of pictures, and of whose interesting collection of old works we believe that we spoke with sincere praise some years ago, has recently published a book called "The Art-Idea," which we have not yet had the good fortune to see. But we learn from a review of it that the remarks upon pictures, in which the Easy Chair has sometimes indulged, are mentioned by Mr. Jarves in the terms which, the impartial reviewer assures us, their shallowness properly merits. Now the Easy Chair acknowledges a pleasant perplexity. It does not know whether to be more indignant that any body should call any of its remarks shallow, or gratified that its harmless chat should be honored by the notice of an actual, printed, and bound book: printed and bound, too, if the author's previous works establish any precedent, in the most attractive and becoming manner. Sitting quietly by the way weaving leaves and transient little blossoms into the prettiest chaplet it can contrive, and hanging it every month upon the fence in the modest hope that some passer-by may have a momentary pleasure, here comes a nobleman whirling along in his glittering chariot, and disdainfully exclaims, "Trash! rubbish! that is not a diamond crown." True, O King! it is but a poor little nose-gay. Have the grace to consider it.

The criticism, by which imposing name our chat about pictures is called, is only an expression of opinion or of impressions. The Easy Chair reads a book, or hears an opera, or sees a picture, and tells its cronies what it thinks of them. The opinions are very likely poor enough, and the impressions shallow; but shall all conversation stop because it is not profound or wise? Our friend in the chariot, as we learn from the reviewer, calls Leutze the Forrest of American painters. What opinion does he suppose Mr. Leutze and his friends entertain of that opinion? We are all the Archbishop and Gil Blas. "I most humbly beg that you will not be offended with my freedom," quoth Gil Blas. "God forbid (cried the Archbishop with precipitation), God forbid that I should find fault with it. In so doing I should be very unjust. I don't at all take it ill that you speak your sentiment: it is your sentiment only that I find bad. I have been most egregiously deceived in your narrow understanding."

It was only yesterday that the Easy Chair met Silex in Broadway, and talked for an hour under an awning by the Astor House. It was Silex that Elia had in mind when he wrote of imperfect sympathies. "You may have an opinion of a contemporary picture," said he, "but you have no right to express it, for it is the painter's bread and butter. You pierce innocent hearts with your steel pen-point—and none the less surely if the pen be gold. You say a fine sharp thing, and it costs a toiling artist his Sunday's beef or his month by the sea or among the hills. It pleases your vanity to be smart in print, and some poor fellow's boy must go without a quarter's schooling in consequence. No truly humane man will express an opinion which makes a patient, industrious, worthy fellow-creature suffer."

This is a philosophy which puts the Easy Chair and the author who finds his opinions of pictures shallow into the same category. For it declares that no unfavorable opinion, however shallow, however sincere and profound, must be expressed if it endangers any body's revenue innocently derived. But the Easy Chair does not surrender. If Martin Farquhar Tupper issues a volume of sonnets—what are depreciatory adjectives made for if not to be applied to the case at sight? If people believe brass to be gold, they will pay accordingly; but it is no reason for any body who knows to keep silence because the merchant himself believes it to be gold.

"Yes," says Silex, "but you do not know about pictures."

"Yes," cry the painters, "let only those who know criticise."

Very well, does the critic who, with justice that we do not question, knows the Easy Chair's opinion of pictures to be worthless, also know that Leutze is the Forrest of American artists?

Certainly not. That is, after all, his opinion only. The whole thing is a matter of opinion, because art, viewed æsthetically, is not an exact science. A spectator is surely not shallow because he finds pleasing points in Guido, nor profound because he delights in the sculptures of the Medici chapel. All that Silex, or the author of the Art-Idea, or the National Academy of Design, can demand of any man who talks about pictures is that he shall say what he honestly thinks. A picture is indeed, under some circumstances, an article of merchandise like a keg of red herring, just as a man has two legs like a dodo; but the likeness ends there. A man has undoubtedly a right to print in the Evening Post his opinion that the red herring of Aker and Co. are better than those of Baker and Co., or that he prefers Muir's Scotch pale ale to the Philadelphia brew. It may be a very small-beer business. But why should Baker and Co. and Philadelphia complain? It is a matter of taste.

Any competent person can prove to all of us that we ought to believe every proposition in Euclid. He may show to us conclusively that each is so and can not be otherwise. But neither Ruskin, nor Haydon, nor Sir Joshua Reynolds, nor Goethe, nor Jarves, can prove to any one of us that we ought to admire Michael Angelo more than Raphael, or Raphael more than Titian. Most men would enjoy Macaulay more than Milton. Nay, the one hundred and seventh edition of Tupper's Proverbial Philosophy, which we recently saw announced, shows how much milk is found in that cocoa-nut. Is the expression of the pleasure improper? It may show shallowness, but if only profundity is to be allowed in print, who shall be censor? Let only those criticise pictures who know! exclaim the painters. But that does not help us. We still stick fast at the old question, Who knows?

At this point, Rossiter, the artist, who, although he has left the city and lives in the lovely hollow of the Hudson highlands, is devoted as ever to his easel, puts in his friendly word. Busied with a grave and important work, the Life of Christ, illustrated in a series of large pictures, he is not in the least removed from the most active sympathy with all the interests of the art world, and watched from his eyrie the contest that shook it during the spring. He says:

"It should obtain as a canon in criticism that the critic shall be a professor of the art, science, occupation, or craft which he criticises. Then, so far as he can show through his works his perceptive power, so far may he be recognized as critical authority and no further.

"Let me illustrate and define the position, by a parallelism in another calling. Were you and I to have had the unfortunate opportunity of witnessing one of the many battles in Virginia, from a stand-point where we could command the field as much as possible, we would use our individual perceptive faculties to the making up an opinion of what was going on within the scope of our vision, and, having tolerably good eyes, we should be able to narrate all that we saw. Since our earliest school-days we have read of battles, from those of the Amorites and Ilittites, to that of yesterday. These we would apply to assist in making intelligent all that we saw. We might recall the struggles of Thermopylæ and Marathon, of Blenheim and Waterloo, of Quebec and Trenton—the discipline of the Greek, the system of the Roman phalanx and legion, the tactics of Cæsar, the strategy of Napoleon. Having dipped somewhat into military engineering we are familiar with its principles, from the practice of the Phenicians to Vauban, and thence to our day. We can talk glibly of projectiles, can quote the exact projection and range of an Armstrong or a Parrot-rifled bore, reeling off any amount of statistics to prove our erudition. We know an officer or two, with whom we have bandied opinions, and gathered professional authority. But alas! as we stand on the summit, so well out of reach of a stray shot as to secure a cool judgment, we see here and there the marshaling of battalions, the sectional movements of a great army. We begin to form our theory of what is to be done; are immensely wise as to the method and its result. Yonder is a small wreath of smoke, there larger wreaths, anon a great deal of noise, obscuring clouds, blinding dust, a helter-skelter, hither and thither, apparently nothing but chaos. We hail an officer speeding past. 'Ho, friend! does not yonder battle betoken defeat to the enemy?' When you hear his reply of disdain: 'That which you see is only a skirmish, the battle is being fought miles away.'

"Scarcely a person can be brought to the humiliating avowal that he does not perceive all that another does in an object, scene, or incident. But until he has gone into an artistic analysis of what his eyes behold he little dreams how near the mole's are his optical penetration.

"The art of drawing is neither more nor less than the faculty of describing by lines what one sees; and just so far as a person sees comprehensively, so far can that person define the contour of an object, or the space it occupies relatively to other objects, by boundary lines. And so of the perception of local light and dark, light and shade, color and texture, which make the qualities of all visible things which can be rendered by painting, and through the subtle knowledge of which, in proper combination, the artist is enabled, by means of a few pigments, brushes, and a flat surface, to convey an impression or representation of them to the mind of a beholder.

"It is true that looking at Nature attentively educates the eye and perceptive faculties to determining approximate qualities in a picture, and the study of good pictures enables the student of them to better comprehend the mysteries of nature. But he can only arrive at the power of close discrimination and scrutiny through the process pursued by artists in their education.

"Nothing is so illusive as this matter of vision, and hence young students, with their eyes just opening, their ideality active, and their feelings keen, think they can scan the whole arena of art's domain, and sit in arrogant judgment on the works of all ages and classes of minds.

"A few years, and their assumption becomes tempered to a healthier, wiser, and more judicious recognition of their own range of observation. And late in life they find the telescopes they clutched as boys are only tin horns—things to blast through, and not the tubes through which to read the stars.

"If the neophytes in art, then, are deluded in their estimate of how much they see and gauge, how much more so are the critics who have not even entered at the door through which only positive knowledge in sight can be obtained?

"On the walls of an Exhibition gallery are hung a promiscuous array of pictures, the products of different minds, possessing some qualities in common, but each with its individual excellence arising from the individuality of the artist. Comparisons in works of art, therefore, are inconsistent and unphilosophical. With as much reason one can assert that an oak is better than a hickory, a willow than a cedar, a stramonium than a rose-bush. Each have their application in the divine economy. One for ships, another for wheel-barrow; one for charcoal, another for decorative uses; one for medicine, another for fragrance and beauty. Nor must we confound things, and say which is best, until we have scanned all its uses, and even then with broadest latitude and amplest qualification. True, the spectator may say that Mr. Church excels Mr. Kensett, or Mr. Kensett excels Mr. Church; that Mr. Leutze is superior to Mr. Johnson, or Mr. Johnson is the abler artist. But the united testimony of fifty men does not any the more make one superior to the other, or define the standard of excellence.

"And here we arrive at the next canon in art-criticism. None should attempt to define standards of excellence, methods, direction, or planes of difference, except those who are conceded as masters of a calling.

"Now, inasmuch as no one mind has all the qualities requisite for a perfect artist, so no artist can be considered oracular except in the qualities which constitute his particular excellence; while in the elements of which he is deficient he is more or less fallible.

"In proof of this, every true artist who has labored long at his profession learns his own weaknesses and shortcomings, and turns for direction and illumination instinctively to certain minds who have explored or probed beyond him, conscious that those only who are superior to him can healthily criticise his works, and the more effectively in the direction they are strongest. Thus, for force of dramatic character, for composition, for consistency in grouping, the rationale of chiar-oscuro, he would consult with one like Leutze, who is eminent in these qualities, and solicit his critical opinion before another's; for the evanescent expression of aerial gradation, the tenderness of hue and fullness of texture every where manifest in nature, he would seek advice from a Kensett; for the rendering of a pastoral theme, Durand; for tranquillity, Casilear; for the analysis of skies and thoroughness of detail, he would go to Church; for breadth and luminosity, to Gifford or Haseltine; for color, to Coleman; for large catholic sentiment and poetry, to Cole; for finesse and delicacy, to Shattuck or Hill; for fresh, hearty translation of quiet nooks, to Hart; and so, ad infinitum. Each and all have their dissimilar qualities of varied excellence. So have they each their parish of admirers; and all attempts at comparison are senseless, conducive to cabals and cliques, with their attendant bickerings, and to ignoble contests among followers or admirers.

"By the analysis of one picture the rules which should obtain in criticism may be explained, and we will take Mr. Leutze's Crossing the Delaware as a conspicuous illustration of our meaning. It is amenable to criticism from different stand-points. First, every student in history may comment from his knowledge of the historic data. Is the scene rendered according to all the facts and traditions? Are the costumes exact? The nationalities of the group consistently given? Do Washington's face and attitude convey his character? Is he too tall or too short, too young or too old, for the period of life? Is Greene's portrait from the best authorities? Is the hour of dawn right? etc., etc. Second, the material critic. The tailor, the shoemaker may scrutinize the facts of their crafts; the boat-builder may ask and question of the boat. These are the critical provinces of the general beholders. Then comes the technical province, or field of art, with its analysis. Are the positions and groupings consistent and skillfully disposed? Are the chiar-oscuro, light and shade, tone, color, textures, and qualities all satisfactorily expressed?

"Each artist and his satellites immediately begin with their objections. One will think the general color too cold, another too warm for the hour. One will exact more generality of treatment, another require more detail. The marine-painter may cavil at the water. The landscapist who has studied winter effects may object to the color and consistency of the ice.

"Many may find great incompleteness in the fragments; but it will be only as the whole theme and its treatment can be grasped, analyzed, gauged, and weighed, that a really philosophical and intelligent criticism can be written.

"To accomplish this the critic must have all the knowledge of the various artistic minds, gathered from a long practice of the profession, and a technical knowledge of every object introduced into the work. He must be familiar with the scientific facts on which the rendering rests. He must be a dramatist to analyze the situations, and a thorough scholar to pronounce on the historic version. Does any critic of our newspapers combine all these elements? Otherwise he is but a quack mentor, and his syllables should be regarded as the noisy babblings of one, who, having the public ear, utters fallacies to the detriment of those who are doing their best to work out their inner promptings.

"Exactng such qualifications in the critic, you say, virtually does away with criticism. This is just the point at which we would arrive, namely: As no one within or without the profession has all the qualities necessary for a thorough and oracular art-critic, so a little less arrogance, a little less dogmatic ex cathedra assertion, a little less positiveness in promulgating shallow opinions, and a little more charity, for the constitutional blindness of the artists, would be in better taste.

"Let the public be encouraged to go to exhibitions, even upon the condition of making them free. Then let the people be educated by the various examples which various hands produce. One with ideality large will feast on a mystical conglomeration of tints such as Turner sent from his easel. Another will be stirred to heroism by the deeds of Washington or Luther happily depicted. A third, by the touching portrayal of the Sister of Charity's self-sacrifice, may be prompted to merciful acts and seek to do likewise. A fourth will find delight in the conscientious translation of a tin pot, or derive satisfaction in counting the leaves of a daisy wrought with a most marvelous patience.

"Another point to which I would allude is the quality of the works artists often exhibit. With painters, as with other men, the necessity of providing sustenance for themselves and families often compels them to paint sketchy things merely for bread, or to meet some pressing pecuniary want.

"In art, more than any other profession, this condition exists; and when an artist has done better things, a generous writer would never sneer at the slight works, however much he might deplore them, but rather put down to adverse circumstance, trouble, and necessity, the escape of these callow broods into the market's glare and invidious gaze.

"Then again, there are waif thoughts which an artist dashes off, and is willing to scatter among those who will entertain them for what they are worth.

"Many can afford to give a trifle for a thought sketchily expressed where one can pay for amplifying the thought through months of labor. Such works are not subjects for criticism, nor have they a definite value. One may be willing to give as many dollars as another would pence for the same thing. And so of the sale value of an artist's elaborate works. As there are no defined laws of criticism so there is no standard of pecuniary value. A picture to-day may bring a fabulous price. Next year none so poor to do it money reverence. One class of artists are popular this month, another will be next. Many of the most enduring fame scarcely realized enough in their lifetime to keep them from the fangs of penury. Others rioting in favors while living, being dead, have their works deemed valueless. So in this aspect of the question it behooves critics to look to their conceits and sounding paragraphs, for in all times have the false prophets abounded, and it is not a pleasant reputation to possess.

"There is a great wrong inflicted, in nearly every instance unwittingly doubtless, by the conductors of journals in permitting one who is expert with pen to write platitudes or dogmatic opinion behind the anonymous shield. The nameless sheltered individual, with a little more knowledge than the generality of his readers, is enabled by the use of a few technical phrases and sounding sentences to impose his opinion on the unlearned. This is a source fertile in mischief to the cause of a diversified, healthy, catholic art. And each profession should enter its protest against all such specious, deluding, and seemingly authoritative opinion, more especially when prompted by the animus which is so evident in some of the recent art notices.

"We are living in an age when the iconoclast rather should be immolated, that each may be permitted to worship the images which symbolize to him or her the most attractive, the gentlest, the purest, or the loftiest ideas."

The proper limits of the discussion here for this month are reached; and the Easy Chair will not take up the gage so pleasantly thrown down. But ~~he~~ must protest against interposing bread and butter as a bar to æsthetic criticism, for in that case there would be no mention of any works of any kind whatever except praise. What are called art-criticisms, whether in Mr. Jarves's book, in the columns of a newspaper, or in this mild domain of the Easy Chair, are merely the opinions and impressions of the amiable writers, modified and enlightened by more or less study and thought. To claim that each one shall be a complete master of the subject in every aspect and detail is wild, because his opinion, if unfavorable, or his criticism, is that the artist or author himself is not a master. Of course every man who writes for the public is morally bound to write sincerely and not malevolently, and if he have no knowledge of pictures, for instance, or no musical ear, he should be dissuaded from undertaking to discourse of paintings and music. But as for prohibiting all art-criticism not licensed by the National Academy, or granting that nobody knows any thing about pictures except the painters, these are follies against which the Easy Chair will continue to pour the shallow rill of his protest. Since people with tongues and pens will write and talk about pictures, let us hope that their observations may be intelligent and profound; but let us demand that they shall be sincere.

THERE was never a lovelier day for the Fourth of July than we had this year, and there was never probably a sincerer observance of it. Events have taught us the worth of what seemed somewhat cheap from familiarity and the solemnity of what had become almost a mere holiday. Indeed, the orator of the Fourth could not desire a more imposing emphasis than the times give to his theme; and if he were wise he could not fail to show exactly the character of our revolution as distinguished from all others and from mere rebellion. Washington, indeed, took up arms against his government, and was a rebel. But it does not follow, because the Jacobite gentry in Great Britain did the same thing thirty years before, that they were as honorable as Washington, although they were equally rebels. As the Rev. Dr. Thompson so well states the truth: "We can not say 'a rebellion is a rebellion,' or 'our fathers rebelled, therefore may we;' for, the conditions failing, that which was made to them a right may be in us a crime."*

There was one pleasant incident of the Fourth this year which was the diversion of money from mere selfish enjoyment to the refreshment of the soldiers. A generous and timely suggestion was made that fresh vegetables should be sent to the army, and two or three gentlemen taking the matter earnestly in hand, subscriptions poured in, a vessel was freighted, and on the happy day onions, beets, cabbages, and other grateful food were served to great numbers of the soldiers at the very front near Petersburg.

* "Revolution against Free Government not a Right, but a Crime." An Address by Joseph P. Thompson, D.D.

The city was comparatively quiet, and the accidents were very few. There was but one thing to be regretted, which was, that the news of the sinking of the Alabama was not received until the morning of the fifth. Yet it was not far from the Fourth when it came; and it renewed, during the season of the anniversary, that national pride in the navy which was last year gratified for the army by the victory at Gettysburg.

The old "Fourth of Julys" we shall not see any more. The days in which war was only a name of past and incredible suffering have gone forever. The soldier is no longer a queer and ludicrous figure, whom, in our pride of peace, we sincerely pitied. The militia musters, and sham-fights, and Cornwallises, that were such parodies upon the tragedy of war, will never again seem to us so absurd and contemptible. The soldier is now the most serious figure in the population, and war is the most familiar and terrible fact of the times.

We shall learn, and the lesson will point many a Fourth of July, oration yet undelivered, that nations are not altogether the worse for war, and that there are many greater calamities. In the homes, indeed, where the individual blow falls, shattering many more lives than the one gloriously lost, no sorrow seems so cruel. But in all the homes of the land, in the country itself, in the national heart, war may be a process of purification and elevation. This, indeed, can not be in any war of conquest or aggrandizement. It can only be where war is the alternative of dishonor, and when it is waged for no private or selfish advantage, but for the welfare of all.

THE refractory lawn of last summer upon which the Sassafras Club meets is once more smooth green turf, and a special meeting was called on the afternoon of the hottest day of the year for the solemn admission of the new member. The wind blew pleasantly, but ineffectively, from the west, when the neophyte was seated in the cane chair in the sassafras shadow, and was admitted ad eundem. Friendly, genial, accomplished, with an interesting, various, and unique experience of life; sensitive to every mood and word of his companions, as a ripe field of rye to the wind and sun, and sympathetic in all good and lofty impulses; a democrat of the true school, humane in feeling as John Howard, and fastidious in taste as the Count d'Artois; a mellow cynic with Jaques, and a gentleman with Mercutio, our new Knight of the Sassafras smiles in humorous contemplative incredulity through the smoke of his cigar, forever ready to despair, but always gay.

The meeting naturally suggested especial remembrance of the absent brethren. One, for instance, in London; one in Bombay; one among Berkshire hills, and one by the sea; the member for Woods and Pastures haply musing in some quiet nook upon the words of an "English female preacher" of the Friends, thoughtfully wondering whether among the sick and wounded in camp or hospital some duty might not be done by him. In the modulations of the west wind we heard their voices, and the new member declared that he saw them in the smoke, and had never seen them out of it.

But the most interesting report was from Bombay, from which the wind seemed especially to blow, and it was of the last act of our honored coadjutor Mancherjee Hormusjee Cama, that excellent Parsee who was always unable to see that an apple is changed because you call it a peach, or that a good man is not the same as a Christian. No one who saw him will ever forget his sweet Asian tranquillity, or believe that Zoroaster had only the lees of wisdom. Some months ago he sent, in memory of his kind reception in America and interest in its cause, a sum of money to be used as the wisdom of his friends here should decide. And there is now finished and published a translation which he had caused to be made of the Zend-Avesta, or Persian bible. It had been edited in the original by German scholars, but Dr. Bleek has now for the first time rendered it into English. One hundred copies have been left in England for sale among English scholars. The rest of the edition Cama takes with him to India for the use of his brethren, who are the merchants there, and more familiar with the English tongue often than the original language of their scriptures.

It is a generous and worthy charity of the representative of the old race and religion to the new. He turns from the glaring modern land of England back into the majestic dusk of Asia, and says to his English brethren: "Fellow-creatures and Christians, it is not your fault that your civilization is so recent and crude. Farewell; and receive the blessing of one who holds to a faith, which, as you see by this Book, taught the immortality of the soul, and a future state of rewards and punishments, for centuries before those doctrines were current among the Jews."

Difference of language is the most fatal impediment to a true cosmopolitanism. If, when we climbed the great wall of China, we could converse familiarly with the tawny native whose eyes, held so wide open by his cue, stare at us amazed from the other side, how wonderfully the work of civilization would be simplified! Now a little Pigeon-talk with the poorest part of the civilization, which our Sassafras member for Hong-Kong and Koo-Too so well reproduces, and a vague trading chat with a few great merchants, is nearly the sum of our intercourse with that huge and mysterious people. In view of the necessity of counteracting the consequences of Babel the Sassafras Club are considering the propriety of issuing proposals for a universal language, accompanied, upon the part of the inventor, with a guarantee of universal acceptance.

WE trust that a large portion of our readers have pondered the Appeal of Mr. Fessenden, our new Secretary of the Treasury. The purport of it is that the People of the United States, acting as a body through their agent the Government, wish individuals to lend them two hundred millions of dollars for three years, at seven and three-tenths per cent. annual interest, payable every six months. For this they offer Treasury Notes—that is, in reality, notes drawn and indorsed by every man in the country. The loan is wanted for a great national purpose, to effect which every man, unless he be a traitor at heart if not in act, is solemnly pledged.

The Appeal is addressed not merely to a few great capitalists, but also to the many-whose aggregate means constitute the mass of the wealth of the land. The notes upon which this loan is asked are from $50 upward. Every man who has fifty dollars can take part in this loan. Apart from patriotism and the duty which all owe to their country, no investment is so desirable as this.

It is secure. Every dollar of every man's property is pledged for the punctual payment of the interest, and of the debt when due. The security is increasing in value. For some years before the war we were earning 1000 millions a year more than we spent. During the three years of the war, owing to the high prices and constant demand for labor, we have earned more than ever before. No man who could or would work has been idle; and, except for the war, we have spent less than before. In three years of the war we of the United States have certainly earned 3000 millions more than we have spent apart from the war. The cost of the war may be set down at 2000 millions. Deducting this from our net earnings, the People who are security for this loan are 1000 millions richer to-day than they were when the war broke out.

No other investment can be so easily convertible. The man who has a Treasury note for $50, or $100, or $1000 can turn it into money more readily, and upon better terms, than if it were invested upon bond and mortgage, or in railroad stocks.

The interest offered is higher than can be realized from any other safe and convertible investment. It amounts to just two cents a day for each hundred dollars. It is, moreover, readily collectable when due. To each note are affixed five "coupons," or interest tickets, due at the expiration of each successive half-year. The holder of a note has simply to cut off one of these coupons, present it at the nearest Government Agency, and receive his interest; the note itself need not be presented at all. Or a coupon thus payable will every where be equivalent, when due, to money.

Thus, while this loan presents great advantages to large capitalists, it offers special inducements to those who wish to make a safe and profitable investment of small savings. It is in every way the best Savings' Bank; for every institution of this kind must somehow invest its deposits profitably in order to pay interest and expenses. They will invest largely in this loan, as the best investment. But from the gross interest which they receive they must deduct largely for the expenses of the Bank. Their usual rate of interest allowed to depositors is 5 per cent. upon sums over $500. The person who invests directly with Government will receive almost 50 per cent. more. Thus the man who deposits $1000 in a private Savings' Bank receives 50 dollars a year interest; if he deposits the same sum in this National Savings' Bank he receives 73 dollars. Large capitalists, who can watch the Exchange from day to day, and are willing to run the risk of losing a fortune for the chance of making another, may afford to take part in the fight of Bulls and Bears; but for those who wish to find a safe, convenient, and profitable means of investing the surplus earnings which they have reserved for their old age or for the benefit of their children, there is nothing which presents so many advantages as this National Loan.

Editor's Drawer.

A CORRESPONDENT "down East" sends the three following:

Old Major T—m, who died at Wiscasset, in Maine, many years since, was for a long time crier of the courts for Lincoln County. He was a man of ready wit and infinite humor. It is inscribed on his tomb-stone that "A man of social wit lies buried here."

He was of genial temper, and had a great fund of anecdotes and stories, which he rehearsed to the constant amusement of the Court and bar, who congregated at stated periods at the gay and hospitable town of his residence. He was for many years previous to his death afflicted with the shaking palsy, which caused a constant vibration of his head from side to side in a violent manner. In his day the practice of taking a social glass at 11 A.M. and 4 P.M. was the rule of social life. Among the boon companions of the Major was one Oakey, a fat and good-natured shoemaker, who was afflicted with a perpetual and rapid winking of the eyes. One day, about 11 A.M., the Major was seen walking down on one side of the business street of the village, while Oakey was coming up on the opposite side. "Oakey!" called out the Major, "did you wink for me to come over and take something to drink?" "Yes," replied Oakey, "but you shook your head, saying no; and I never urge a man by asking him a second time!"

J—L— lived in the same State. He was a man of pompous manners and pretentious learning, and always affected the most perfect knowledge of every matter or subject which was presented before him. Years ago, when the first giraffe was imported into the country and advertised for exhibition, he read the advertisement to those present, and exclaimed, "Giraf-fee! Giraf-fee! I suppose she is the best singer who has ever visited this country!"

A POLICE OFFICER in the capital of this same State once arrested certain parties for offenses against the city ordinances, and upon their arraignment was the principal witness for the Government. Describing the time when the offense was committed, he said it was "between sunset and dark." "You mean to say," said the Court, "that it was twilight?" "I don't know any thing about Latin," responded the witness, "but I know it was between sunset and dark."

OUR little Alexander—surnamed Alex for short—a bright boy of four years, with a full knowledge that the dainties and good things were kept under lock and key in a corner pantry, had been teasing his sick mother, who, after having repeatedly told him to keep quiet, made the remark that with all his noise she would grow crazy, probably die, and have to be put in the cold ground. His face assumed a very anxious look as he broke out with, "Ma, don't forget to leave the key of the pantry!"

HERE is the first letter the Drawer has had from the Libey Prison:

I am an officer in the army. I was captured at Gettysburg, and have recently returned to my regiment, after seven months' confinement in that Confederate hell, Libey Prison, whence I escaped on the morning of February 10, viâ the hole. Stray copies of your valuable journal occasionally found their way within our prison walls, and many an hour I have beguiled in reading the side-splitting jokes with which the Drawer is always replete. I have never read in it any contributions from Libey, and I send you the following, which you may publish if you choose; and you may hear from me again.

Among the officers there was the well-known Brigadier-General —, who frequently entertained us with lectures on temperance and other topics, and by his gentlemanly manners, affability, and kindness of heart, gained the friendship of all. One of our greatest torments was the disgusting abundance of vermin, and frequent skirmishing was necessary to prevent ourselves from being devoured by these unwelcome intruders upon our comfort. One morning two officers were promenading our room when they found themselves vis-à-vis with the General, who was seated at a window, with his red shirt (a donation from the Sanitary Commission) upon his knees, and busily engaged in the performance of his daily task. After watching him a moment, one of them quizzingly inquired, "General, are you lousy?" The General, looking up from his work a moment, and gazing at the inquirer with a comical expression, replied, "No, I am not, but my shirt is!"

CAPTAIN BUCKNER was stopping for wood on his way down the Mississippi. He thought the pile was too green, and he said to the owner, "How long has your wood been cut?"

"About four feet," gravely replied the man of wood, and the Captain owed him one.

FREDDY had him "there," as this story will show:

Freddy is a "little one" of seven years' growth, the son of a minister, who, with his wife, had just arrived at a new field of labor. Hearing his mother say to his father that she had been deceived by his saying that the "parsonage" was a three-story building, when in fact it was only two, he said, "Ma." "Well, Freddy." "Pa is right." "How so, Freddy?" "The kitchen is one." "Yes." "This floor is two." "Yes." "And the story that pa told is three."

FROM Minnesota a learned lawyer writes to the Drawer:

In 1858 there were held in the Fourth Judicial District in Minnesota the first courts under our State organization, and of course there was great ignorance upon the part of clerks and sheriffs as to their duties, and the proper manner in which they should be performed. In one county in the District the sheriff was absent at the first sitting of the Court, and his deputy presented himself in the person of a tall and unsophisticated German, who spoke English tolerably well, and appeared somewhat elated with his position. The Judge, peculiarly sensitive that "all things should be done decently and in order," took the precaution, before the opening of court, to question this official as to his knowledge of the proper proclamation, and finding him (as he anticipated) totally ignorant of his duty in this respect, yet able to read writing, he wrote out for the deputy-sheriff the proclamation in full, commencing, "Hear ye! hear ye!" and ending, as customary, "Come forward and give your attendance, and you shall be heard;" and directed the officer to read the same when commanded "to make proclamation for the opening of court." At the appointed hour the Judge was on the bench, the sheriff in his place, and the usual concourse of people assembled. The sheriff was directed to open the court, when he rose with the paper aforesaid in his hands, and roared out, "Here we are! here we are!" and running through the middle of the proclamation before the horror-stricken Judge could recover from his astonishment, he "brought down the house" with the conclusion—"Come forward and give your attendance, and you will be sure and be here!" He evidently regarded the burst of applause which followed as simply a just tribute to the commendable manner in which he had discharged his duty.

A FRIEND in the Navy writes to the Drawer:

In one of our squadrons which shall be nameless one of the officers, wanting to get leave of absence, went up to the Commandant's office, and no one was in but the clerk. The Commandant very soon came in, and anticipating at a glance the errand, and pretending not to see the officer, at once cried out to the clerk, "If any officer comes to-day for leave of absence, order him at once on board the Starling," which was about to go on active service. Then turning to the startled officer, he added, "Ah! what can I do for you to-day?" "Nothing at all, thank you," he replied, and made a masterly retreat.

AN incident of "the war" is sent to the Drawer by a friend in St. Louis:

During the month of September, 1863, the —th Regiment of — Cavalry, after a very hard campaign, chasing rebels and guerrillas through sections of southeastern Missouri and northeastern Arkansas, returned to the post of P— for the purpose of recruiting their ranks and recuperating their horses. A few days after their return a number of men were detailed from the regiment for the purpose of guarding a lot of rebel prisoners, guerrillas, and sympathizers, confined in the guard-house. The guard was mounted at 9 A.M. Next morning, about sunrise, a prisoner asked permission of the sergeant then commanding the guard to leave the guard-house. Among the men on guard as supernumeraries there was one who was an excellent shot with the revolver, and at the time was the only one in the guard-room. He was selected to take charge of the prisoner. Upon being ordered by the sergeant to do so, he remarked, in the presence of the prisoner, that he supposed there was no necessity for taking his carbine, as the prisoner would not run. Getting up leisurely he carelessly threw his blouse over his shoulder, and in doing so concealed his revolver. The man had not gone a hundred yards from the guard-house when he started for the brush, a short distance off. The guard sung out "Halt!" but the prisoner paid no attention to the summons. The guard leisurely unbuttoned his holster, drew his revolver, took deliberate aim, fired, and brought the prisoner down; then replacing his revolver he returned to the guard-room, and by the time the commanding-officer of the post reached the place, was taking charge of another prisoner who wished to leave the guard-house. On examination of the corpse of the prisoner who had been shot, it was found the ball had struck in the centre of the back of his head, killing him instantly. The event had a marked effect on the prisoners confined at the post, and while the regiment was stationed there not another attempted to escape.

A DRAWER reader at Johnson's Island writes:

When the United States Government called upon the United States National Guard to rally round the flag for the period of one hundred days, many of the commissioned officers therein, while being intelligent in some things, were decidedly green in the mysteries of the military. The Forty-ninth Ohio National Guard, commanded by Colonel De Wolf, were ordered to report at Johnson's Island. One of the companies, upon disembarking, was ordered to fall in and march off by their captain, who did not know a single command, in this wise: "Choose partners, gentlemen, get in two rows, and march endways, as you did yesterday."

A CORRESPONDENT sends an advertisement of a new patent medicine, called Psychagoga, which he cuts from a newspaper. He says the term is derived from two Greek words—the "soul," and to "drive;" and he has no doubt it is a good name, and will drive the soul out of any body that takes it.

A SAN FRANCISCO correspondent says that the following incident took place not long since on Montgomery Street:

A freshly-imported Mick had been suffering with a very severe toothache; wished very much to have it extracted; but was too mean to pay the dentist's fee. He happened to be strolling along the street the other day, when he espied in a window the words, "Teeth Extracted without Pain;" and ejaculated, "Teeth 'stracted without payin', is it? Och! I'm in here, sure!" So he seats himself in the dentist's chair, who "distracts" it for him double-quick, much to Mickie's gratification. He took the molar between his thumb and finger, and after cursing it loud and long for all the botheration it had given him, he took his hat and was on the point of leaving, when the dentist politely checked him and demanded his fee. "Och! fee is it? Bedad to yez, ye big land shark, and isn't yerself as advertises in the window to 'distract' teeth without payin'?"

THERE was a bill introduced into the Georgia Legislature to lay a tax of ten dollars a year on all jackasses. Some appreciative member proposed to amend it so as to include lawyers and doctors. The amendment was accepted; and, amidst much jocularity, the bill passed. Several efforts have since been made to repeal it, but in vain; and to this day all jackasses, lawyers, and doctors are obliged to pay a yearly tax of ten dollars.

I HAVE read many instances in the Drawer demonstrating "the ruling passion strong in death," but none, I think, more clearly than an incident which came under my own observation. A Dutchman named Moale worked as journeyman at the Nautical Instrument-making business for a firm in this city (Baltimore). As a particular friend of the son of the head of the firm I was very often at the store, and formed Moale's acquaintance. One evening in the summer, after the store was closed, the foreman, Dutchman, my friend, and myself went to the river to bathe. The Dutchman, who could not swim, was sitting on the side of the boat, with his feet in the water, enjoying himself to his heart's content, when by some accident he fell in, and immediately gravitated toward bottom. After considerable effort we succeeded in getting him into the boat, insensible, and as we thought dead. After a while, however, he opened his eyes, and in a weak, supplicating voice, addressed the foreman, "Charley, if I comes down a little late in the morning, you marks me seven o'clock!"

THESE come from New Hampshire:

Our near neighbor is old General G——, a kind friend, and who probably obtained his honorable title in the old days of militia training when he was young, some half century ago. When we first made the General's acquaintance he warned us that he should "pour in on us" rather frequently; and as wife and I are sitting together evenings he makes good his threat; for, to use his own word, he finds us "rather more come-at-able than some of the neighbors." The General has a genial soul, and, after a little good-natured gossip, usually winds up with some story or other which leaves us shaking our sides as his venerable white head disappears through the door. Not long ago we were talking of birth-places, homesteads, etc., and the General says: “I must tell you about the Boston darkey. Before the days of railroads, a long time ago, a farmer away up in Vermont started for Boston, with his drove of cattle for the city market. He took Sam with him, his colored man, to help keep the beeves in the road. They reached Boston in due time, and the oxen and steers being transferred to the farmer’s pocket in the shape of a roll of bank-notes, the boss told Sam he might look about town an hour or two, and they’d start for home. Pretty soon Sam met a city darkey, and they fell a chatting. Says the city-bred: ‘Whar was you born, an’ whar did you come from?’ The Vermont nigger promptly acknowledged his Green Mountain birth-place and home; and after satisfying the other in all his queries about ‘how things looked up dar,’ thought he would quiz a little. ‘An’ whar was you born?’ said the Vermonter to the black sage of Athens. The city Cuff lifted up his head, and putting on all the mock dignity of his African nature, pompously replied, ‘Whar was I born? Why I was born in Bosting, Newburyport, Marblehead, Salem, and all along shore!’ The Vermonter showed the whites of his eyes for about a minute, haw-haw-ed, and strode off for his master, declaring, ‘Dem city darkeys debblish funny anyhow!’”

A CLERICAL brother of ours has a sharp little Sis, and who, of course, is made to say the Commandments on Sundays, and other good things which children ought to know. She is very fond of milk, but her papa can not conveniently keep a cow. So one day she was looking out of the window very wishfully at neighbor Jones’s barnyard, where lay a nice milker chewing her cud, the very picture of comfort. “I wish Mr. Jones’s cow was papa’s, mamma.” “No, my daughter,” said her mother; “that is breaking the tenth commandment, you know.” Sis was wonderfully still for a moment; but at last she had her logic ready: “Well, mamma, ’twouldn’t be very naughty, for ’tisn’t an ox nor an ass; ’tis only a cow!” Sis was a little worldly-wise, like some that are older.

In one of the large towns on the West Branch of the Susquehanna the ladies of the Episcopal Church had a soirée for its benefit. It was intended to be very nice, and proved so in the end. Among the temporary residents of the place is Harry Wing, an ex-member of the Legislature, and at present in the Government employ. Although a married man, and his head slightly sprinkled with gray, he is very much interested in the young folks—particularly young ladies. A few days before the evening for the soirée he met a party of young people on the street, and advised them all to secure tickets, as it was to be “a grand affair: the éclat of the town will be there!”

I do not think you have published any “four-year-old” stories that can excel the following: Willie H— and Willie S— were playing in the yard, when they found a land-turtle, which they captured and buried in the garden. Some days after they made diligent search for it, but without success. After getting themselves pretty well covered with ground, Willie H—, placing his arms akimbo, said, “Well, now, I just tell you what it is, Will S—, there’s no use looking for the thing, ’cause it’s gone through to the other side.”

THE EVENING TOILET is of white tarletan, with sleeves of illusion net. The fringe is of the kind denominated llama.

The CHILD'S DRESS is of worsted, ornamented with embroidery and braid. The form of the girdle, bodice, and shoulder-straps is shown in the illustration.

The MORNING DRESS is of taffeta or poplin of any choice color, with a trimming of black silk, which is repeated upon the Swiss ceinture.

A PARDESSUS, mantle-shaped, with crochet-headed fringe, is likely to be the favorite style for the promenade. Silk, or, later in the season, velvet will be the material.

A TOUR THROUGH ARIZONA.

[First Paper.]

I HAVE almost forgotten through what uncomfortable part of the world the obliging reader and myself performed our last exploit in the way of a pleasure trip. A foggy remembrance comes over me that it must have been on the barren fjelds of Norway, or through the treacherous bogs of Iceland. At all events, assuming that we parted on friendly terms, and that we still entertain a kindly recollection of each other, I have now to offer a new programme of exploration and adventure, very different indeed from our last, but possessing peculiar charms in the absence of every species of accommodation for travelers, and extraordinary advantages in the way of burning deserts, dried rivers, rattlesnakes, scorpions, Greasers, and Apaches; besides unlimited fascinations in the line of robbery, starvation, and the chances of sudden death by accident. From the borders of the Arctic circle to Arizona the transition will at least afford us a new sensation of some sort; and if we fail to make the trip remunerative either in novelty of scenery or incident it will be our own fault.

Years ago—I forget how many—the romance of Spanish history was the great passion of my life. Those grand old viceroys of Mexico, from the days of Cortéz downward, were such a splendid set of mauraders—so fired with chivalry, lust, and fanaticism; so wildly visionary to conceive, and so daring to execute—that, upon a general review of their exploits, which so long furnished food for my imagination, it is a matter of the most profound astonishment to myself that I have never turned my attention to piracy or highway robbery. No stronger proof of innate rectitude could possibly exist. At the least calculation I should have arisen to the dignity of an original explorer, instead of rambling over the trodden paths of the New World as I now do, a mere everyday tourist, in the footsteps of those giant old freebooters whose histories have shed such a glorious lustre upon the country that gave them birth. Especially do I remember the peculiar fascination that hung around that wild region far away to the north of Mexico, wherein it was said great cities of marvelous wealth existed and wonderful rivers were found, “the banks of which were three or four leagues in the air.”* The very name of “Arizuma”† was fraught with the rarest charms of romance. Here it was that gold and silver existed in virgin masses; here were races of highly-civilized Indians and beautiful women, fair as alabaster, living an Acadian life; here were the magnificent cities of Civola and Chichitcala, and the great river called the Tezon. It was through the wild and mystic region to the north of the Gila that Marco de Niça made his famous expedition under direction of the Viceroy, Mendoza, in 1535; and here, over thousands of miles of desert and mountain, roamed those daring adventurers Coronado, and Pedro de Tohar, and Lopez de Cardenas and Cabeza de Vaca—he of the cow-head but lion-heart—and the famous guide Estevan, the blackamoor, who was put to death by the Moquis for making love to their women—a natural though unpardonable offense in that region even unto the present day.

Of a later date were the explorations and adventures of the brave old Jesuit Missionary Padre Eusebius Francis Kino, to whom all honor is rendered by Vanega, the early historian of California. Father Kino, inspired by religious motives, left his mission of Dolores in 1698, and journeyed north as far as the Gila River, battling with the perils of the wilderness and Christianizing the Indians. During the years 1699 and 1704 he made numerous journeys equally long, difficult, and dangerous, solving many interesting problems in regard to the newly discovered countries, erecting missions, and collecting vast treasures of information about the wonderful people whom he encountered in his travels. The peaceful conquests of Father Kino and his followers over the barbarous races of Sonora and Arizuma are among the most curious records of history; and to this day may be seen, in the ruined missions and vestiges of Christian faith among the Yaqui, Opoto, and Papago Indians, the noblest monuments of their works. From the discontinuance of the Jesuit Missions the progress of discovery was chiefly toward the development of the vast silver deposits known to exist in Northern Sonora, which at that time comprised an indefinite extent of territory north of the Gila. Nothing in the pages of romance can equal the marvelous stories that were told of the mineral wealth of Arizuma. Borne out by facts sufficiently wonderful to dazzle the imagination, it is not surprising that the credulity of men was stretched to its utmost limit. Even at that early date there were speculators in “wild cat,” and foolish people to listen to them, and mankind was bought and sold just as it is at the present day.

But who could resist such proofs as were presented in the form of solid masses of virgin silver actually dug out of the earth? Neither you nor I, reader, nor Baron Humboldt who tells us about them, nor Mr. Ward, the British Ambassador, who furnishes corroborative testimony; nor the laborious Mr. Wilson, who writes a history of Mexico to disperse the mists of fancy cast over that country by the magic pen of Prescott; nor any body else with an eye for the needful, to say nothing of the picturesque or the beautiful. Only conceive the sensations of a poor wretch who stumbles over such a lump of silver as that upon which Don Diego Asmendi paid duties to the Spanish Government! The official report made by the Custom-house officer—and we don't know what per-centage of treasure went into his pocket—states that Don Diego paid duties on a virgin lump weighing 275 pounds. The aggregate weight of several other pieces upon which the king's attorney brought suit for duties was 4033 pounds; and the same officer also sued for the possession of a piece of pure silver weighing 2700 pounds, on the ground that it was a curiosity, and therefore rightfully belonged to his majesty the king, which every body must admit was good logic if not very good law. Should our own Government conclude to take the mines, it might be well to seize upon all the heavy masses of silver as curiosities properly belonging to our excellent President, Mr. Lincoln. I have no doubt the smallest of them would be a curiosity to his rebellious neighbor, Jeff Davis. There are attorneys here who would sue the Prince of Darkness himself, if they thought they could extract virgin silver out of him; and I have known Custom-house officers whose reports of duties were absolutely astounding.

Nearly three thousand pounds of virgin silver, the heaviest mass ever found in the world! Oh, lovely virgin! effulgent, fascinating, glittering virgin! Who would not worship such a lump of a virgin as that? Who would not join me in a visit to the joyous land of Arizuma where such precious virgins exist?

But why is it, you cunningly ask, if the silver mines of Arizona are as rich as they are represented to be, that they are now deserted? Why have they failed to attract a mining population?

† The old Spanish name of Arizona.

MISSION OF SAN JOSE DE TUNACACONT.

Arizona has never yet had an American population of over three thousand, and not a very good one at that.

The Territory of Arizona was acquired by purchase from Mexico, under the Gadsden treaty made in September, 1853, and confirmed by Congress during the session of 1853-4. Prior to its purchase it formed a part of the Mexican State of Sonora. The cession was contained within certain parallels and boundaries, embracing some forty thousand square miles of land, with a length of four hundred and sixty miles and an extreme width of a hundred and thirty. In negotiating for the purchase of this territory Mr. Gadsden made strenuous efforts to secure a strip of country as far south as Guyamas, but he was not sustained by Congress, and thus the most important feature in the treaty was omitted—a port on the Gulf of California. The United States found itself in possession of a country which it was impracticable to reach except across extensive and inhospitable deserts, and over vast ranges of mountains, many of them covered with perpetual snow, or by means of a balloon. Why has Arizona made no progress within the past ten years, while Washoe and Idaho have made such rapid strides within three or four years?

Be patient, if you please, and let me answer this torrent of inquiries by a brief reference to the past and present condition of Arizona. It is true that the silver mines of Washoe attracted a population of ten thousand during the first year of their discovery; also true that Idaho now boasts a population of thirty thousand; while the melancholy fact can not be denied that

It is possible some vague notion prevailed in the halls of Congress that the difficulty might be remedied by a port at Fort Yuma or the Pimo villages. There being, during seasons of drought, from six to ten inches of water in the Colorado, and from four to six in the Gila, except at the two points above-named, where the navigation is further impeded by fluctuating sand-bars, it must be conceded that there is some ground for the idea. A port at either of these places would be of great benefit to the country if it had a bottom to it that would hold water, or a top that would prevent evaporation.

At the period of its purchase Arizona was practically a terra incognita. Hunters and trappers had explored it to some extent; but their accounts of its resources and peculiarities were of a vague and marvelous character somewhat unreliable, yet not inconsistent with their wild habits of life. Few people in the United States knew any thing about it, save the curious book-worms who had penetrated into the old Spanish records. An impression prevailed that it was a worthless desert, without sufficient wood or water to sustain a population of civilized beings, and for the most part destitute of any compensating advantages. Mr. Gadsden was ridiculed for his purchase, and it was very generally believed that Congress, in expending ten millions of dollars for such an arid waste, had in view some ulterior project of extension, based upon the balance of power between the Northern and Southern States. It was even hinted that this was to be a grand reservoir for disappointed office-seekers, who could be effectually disposed of by means of Territorial appointments. It was inhabited almost exclusively by savage tribes of Indians, from whose ravages the Texans and Mexicans had long suffered; and now, if our surplus of adventurous politicians could only be sent there, the more valuable of our possessions would no longer be subject to their injurious machinations. With this view Mr. Jefferson Davis did one of the few good things he ever did in his life. He organized various expeditions, and caused the newly-acquired territory to be explored. It is possible he contemplated living in it himself upon his retirement from the Presidency of the slave Republic which even then he must have had in his eye. The reports of Lieutenants Whipple and Ives are among the most valuable of the contributions made to our knowledge of this interesting region. In 1853-4, Lieutenant Williamson made a survey of the country north of the Gila, in view of a route for a railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific States. Lieutenant A. B. Gray, in 1854, made a survey from Marshall, Texas, to El Paso, and thence across the country to Tubac, from which point he made branch surveys—one to Port Lobos, on the Gulf of California, and the other to Fort Yuma and San merous surveys and explorations through Northern Arizona, the reports of which have been published from time to time by Congress. They are valuable for the information they contain in reference to the availability of the different routes proposed, as well as for the important discoveries made by Mr. Beale himself. In 1854 Mr. Charles D. Poston, a private citizen, landed at Navachista, on the Gulf of California, and explored the country as far as Western Sonoita, and thence through the Papagoria to the Big Bend of the Gila, Fort Yuma, and San Diego. In 1855 the Boundary Survey was completed by Major Emory and Lieutenant Michler. In August, 1856, an exploring party outfitted at San Antonio, Texas, and after a perilous journey through the Apache Pass arrived at Tubac, and proceeded, under the direction of Mr. Poston, to examine the silver mines reported to exist in the Santa Rita, Cerro Colorado, and Arivaca Mountains; and in 1857 companies were formed for the purchase and development of these mines. In August and September, 1857, the San Antonio and San Diego semi-monthly stage-line, under the direction of I. C. Woods, was established, James Burch acting as contractor. This continued till the Butterfield semi-weekly line was put upon the route, in August, 1858, under a contract of six years with the Postmaster-General, at $600,000 a year. An enterprise of greater importance than this had never been undertaken by any private citizen. It was one of the grand achievements of the age to span the continent by a semi-weekly line of stages, under Diego. Mr. Bartlett, of the Boundary Commission, also made some very important surveys, and added materially to our knowledge of the topographical peculiarities of the country, its climate and productions. His report is replete with interesting details of life, scenery, and adventure in Arizona. Few persons, save those who are familiar with the country, will complain of the minutiae of his camp experiences. Lieutenant Parke, in 1854-5, made a survey of a route from San Diego to Fort Yuma, the Pimo villages, Tucson, El Paso, and into Northern Texas. Lieutenant Edmund F. Beale made nu-bonds to perform, by the sole power of horse-flesh, a trip of nearly two thousand five hundred miles within the schedule time of twenty-five days. Few believed it could be done; and when the vast deserts through which the route lay, and the hostile tribes of Indians that inhabit them, are taken into account, it is a marvel that it was not only a success but a triumph. There was no failure from the beginning to the end—from St. Louis to San Francisco. The usual time was from twenty to twenty-two days; and on the occasion of the transmission of a Presidential Message, the entire trip was actually made within sixteen days! All praise to Butterfield! and all praise to that enterprising Postmaster-General who put him through!

From 1857 to 1860 a large amount of capital was expended in transporting and erecting machinery and developing the silver mines south of Tucson; but in consequence of the inaccessible nature of the country, and the high rates of duties levied upon all importations through Sonora, these enterprises were carried on at great expense and under extraordinary difficulties. Boilers weighing six thousand pounds and heavy engines had to be transported in wagons from Lavaca in Texas to the Rio Grande, and thence across the continent to the silver regions—a distance of twelve hundred miles. The roads were almost as nature had made them—rough and rocky, abounding in ruts and pitfalls and heavy sands, and every mile of the way from the Rio Grande was beset with dangers. Fierce and barbarous Indians lurked behind the rocks and in the deep arroyos, ever on the alert to plunder and murder the little bands of white men who toiled wearily through the inhospitable deserts. The sufferings of these hardy adventurers were almost without a parallel in the history of human enterprise. Hunger and thirst and burning suns and chilling nights were among the least of the trials to which they were subject; sudden death from hidden foes, or cruel and prolonged torture, stared them in the face at every step. The wayside was lined with the bleached bones of unfortunate men who had preceded them, straggling parties who had fallen victims to the various perils of the journey. When, after weary months of toil and suffering, the jaded teamsters arrived in Arizona with their precious freight—now literally worth its weight in silver—they found no established homes, no prosperous communities of families to greet them, but a country as wild as that through which they had passed, almost desolated by the ravages of Apaches. For three centuries these Bedouins of the desert had continued their depredations upon stock, robbing the ranches, killing the rancheros, and harassing emigrant parties. No industry could prosper under their malign influence. The whole State of Sonora was devastated, and the inhabitants in a starving condition. Arizona possessed at least the pretense of military protection. It soon became infested with the refuse population of Sonora—the most faithless and abandoned race, perhaps, on the face of the earth. What the Apaches left undone in the way of murder and robbery thieves, cut-throats, and gamblers formed the mass of the population. Every man went armed to the teeth, and scenes of bloodshed were of everyday occurrence in the public streets. There was neither government, law, nor military protection. The garrison at Tucson confined itself to its legitimate business of getting drunk or doing nothing. Arizona was perhaps the only part of the world under the protecting ægis of a civilized government in which every man administered justice to suit himself, and where all assumed the right to gratify the basest passions of their nature without restraint. It was literally a paradise of devils. Under such circumstances it is not a matter of surprise that the progress of the country was slow. It was not a place for honest working-men or for families. Good people feared to go there. The newspapers were filled with accounts of bloody affrays, robberies, and Apache raids. Yet, despite all these drawbacks, men of enterprise began to learn the great natural resources of the Territory; the silver they seldom failed to complete, and indeed were regarded with more distrust by respectable citizens than even the barbarous Indians.

Nor was this all. The most desperate class of renegades from Texas and California found Arizona a safe asylum from arrest under the laws. The Vigilance Committee of San Francisco did more to populate the new Territory than the silver mines. Tucson became the headquarters of vice, dissipation, and crime. It was probably the nearest approach to Pandemonium on the North American Continent. Murderers, mines of Santa Rita and Cerro Colorado attracted attention as they became developed; and in 1860 Arizona seemed in a fair way of receiving a rapid increase of population, and obtaining through Congress what it had long needed—a Territorial form of government. Efforts had been made to effect this object as early as 1857, when Mr. Gwin, of California (now supposed to be a Duke under the Maximilian dynasty in Mexico), introduced a bill in the Senate to organize the Territory of Arizona; but there were jealousies on the railroad question which resulted in the defeat of the bill. Mr. Green, of Missouri, in 1860, introduced a bill to provide a "temporary government for the Territory of Arizona," which also failed. Various other attempts were made, none of which were successful. Disaffection between the advocates of the different railroad routes, agitations on the slave question, and jealousies among the adventurers who sought political preferment, prevented the recognition of a great principle which should always govern a civilized nation in its councils—never to acquire territory until it can extend over it the protection of law. While these questions so vital to the interests of Arizona were pending, public attention was suddenly attracted in another direction. The rich mineral discoveries in Washoe created a sensation throughout the length and breadth of the land. The rush from California to that region was unparalleled in the history of mining excitements. Of that memorable exodus, some few readers of this Magazine may remember the description given in a series of articles under the title of "A Peep at Washoe." Gold discoveries in California had become an old story. The placers were beginning to fail; surface digging no longer paid extraordinary profits; the honest miners had passed through so many excitements that the ordinary pursuits of industry no longer possessed a charm for them; and they, in common with the mass of the citizens, were well prepared for the new field of enterprise and speculation. The results of investments in silver stock were immediate, if the silver itself was tardy of appearance. A few fortunes, rapidly made by adroit purchases and speedy sales, inspired thousands of enterprising speculators with the most extravagant hopes of success. Even sober business-men lost their balance, and suffered themselves to be drawn into the whirl of excitement. Silver mining was a novelty. The surplus energy of the American people had never found a vent in that direction. It was an untried experiment, and promised to realize the fabulous stories of Spanish discovery in Mexico. There was no difficulty in reaching the newly-discovered region of boundless wealth. It lay on the public highway to California, on the borders of the State. From Missouri, from Kansas and Nebraska, from Pike's Peak and Salt Lake, the tide of emigration poured in. Transportation from San Francisco was easy. I made the trip myself on foot almost in the dead of winter, when the mountains were covered with snow. Stages laden with passengers inside and out crossed the Sierra Nevadas in twenty-eight hours from Sacramento to Virginia City. A telegraph line speedily followed, and speculation in stocks could be carried on between San Francisco and the Comstock metropolis by the shock of a battery. In the full tide of the excitement Arizona, neglected, suffering, and almost forgotten, received the heaviest blow of all. The rebellion broke out in April, 1861. The Butterfield overland mail-line was stopped at the same time, in view of the dangers that threatened it; and an act of Congress was passed changing the route. During the month of July the only Federal troops in the Territory shamefully and without cause abandoned it, and marched from Forts Breckinridge and Buchanan to Cook's Springs, where they heard the Texan rebels were coming. Without waiting to ascertain the number or prepare for any defense, they burned all their wagons, spiked their cannon, and packed their provisions on mules over the mountains to Fort Craig. There were four companies, numbering altogether four hundred and fifty men. They had heard of the surrender of Fort Fillmore toward which they were marching, and this caused them to take a different route. At Fort Fillmore five hundred Federal troops of the regular army surrendered to about two hundred and fifty renegade Texans, ragged, undisciplined, poorly armed, and badly equipped. A scattered company of these roving bandits, under the command of the guerrilla chief, Captain Hunter, numbering about one hundred, reached Tucson on the 27th of February, 1862, and took possession of the place. Most of the inhabitants had fled to Sonora for safety, or stood ready to join the rebels. It was a secession strong-hold, composed almost entirely of Southern outlaws, whose sympathies were naturally opposed to the existing Government. Hunter and his party held possession of the Territory, advancing as far as the Pimo villages and even threatening Fort Yuma, till the advance of the California column in May, when they retreated to the Rio Grande. The few citizens and traders who remained loyal to the Government, and the managers and workmen employed at the mines being thus left at the mercy of lawless desperadoes, roving bands of Apaches and Sonorians, fled from the country as fast as they could procure the means of escape. Many of them were imprisoned, and some were murdered. The hostile Indians, ignorant of our domestic disturbances, believed they had at length stampeded the entire white population. On the public highways they fell upon small parties and slaughtered them. It was their boast, and is still their belief, that they had conquered the American nation. The Sonorians, greedy for plunder, rushed in from the borders by hundreds, and commenced ransacking the mines, stealing the machinery, and murdering the few employes that remained. At Tubac, the head-quarters of the Arizona Mining Company, the Apaches besieged the town on one side, while the Sonorians lurked in the bushes on the other. Twenty men held it for three days, and finally escaped under cover of night. There was nothing left. The troops had burned all the stores, provisions, and groceries, public and private, that they could lay hands upon; tore down the mill at Tucson; burnt the Canoas; and destroyed government stores at Breckinridge and Buchanan worth probably half a million of dollars. Treason, cowardice, or incompetency must have been the cause of these disgraceful proceedings. There was no satisfactory reason, that can now be seen, why they should have so precipitately evacuated the Territory, and yielded peaceful possession to the enemies of the Federal Government.

From that date until the last session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, Arizona remained without a Territorial organization. Few people were left in the country, and there was no protection to the mines. They were all abandoned to the plundering Sonoranians, who stole the ore and destroyed the machinery. The ranches were in ruin; south and east of Tucson there was not a single inhabited spot within the boundary lines.

I have thus at some length attempted to account for the tardy growth of this interesting Territory. It will be admitted that there is good reason why Arizona has failed to attract a population. With wonderful resources and a climate equal to that of Italy, it has suffered a series of misfortunes unparalleled in the history of our territorial possessions. Two great obstacles to the prosperity of the country still exist: difficulty of access, which can only be remedied by a port on the Gulf of California; and the hostility of the Apache Indians, for which there is no remedy short of extermination.

But let us not anticipate the course of our travels. You shall see for yourself the deserts and the mines and the wondrous things of that wondrous land, my gentle friend, if you will patiently follow me. Only don't expect me to be lively in such a wild region. It is not a jolly country. The graves of murdered men, and boundless sand deserts, and parched mountains, and dried-up rivers, and scenes of ruin and desolation are profoundly interesting; but they are not subjects for the indulgence of rollicking humor. It is only serious and reflecting men, like you and myself, who can appreciate them.

We have thus followed up our intended beat from the time of the early Spaniards to the passage of the act of Congress, of the 20th of February, 1863, establishing the Territorial government. And here, by way of making certain that there is no deception in the matter, let us take a look at the official seal of the Territory, designed by Mr. Secretary M'Cormick: An honest miner stands with his left hand in his pocket feeling for the profits of his day's labor. The expression of his countenance is indicative of a serious frame of mind. He gazes into the future, and sees gold and silver a long way off. His spade stands ready to dig it, and his wheel-barrow to wheel it. As yet he has struck nothing very rich—but it will come by-and-by. In the background you see the two prominent peaks of Bill Williams's Mountain, where he contemplates prospecting next year; or possibly these may be the dirt-piles which he has already thrown up and not yet washed for lack of water. The motto is appropriate, "Ditat Deus." "What's the odds so long as we're happy?"

Although it was my intention to visit Arizona some time or other, as it is to visit every part of the habitable globe, I had no more idea, on Saturday morning, December 5, 1863, of starting on such an important expedition at 4 p.m.

of the same day, than I had of going on a prospecting tour through the Mountains of the Moon. Yet who can say what an hour may bring forth? A man's fate, as the Arabs say, is written upon his skull, and I suppose it was mine to leave on that day for Arizona. At all events it so chanced in my peregrinations about San Francisco that I fell in with my old friend, Mr. Charles D. Poston, the Arizona Pioneer, who had just arrived from the East by the overland route through Salt Lake. He was now Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the new Territory; held various commissions, as director of mining companies; was full of the romance and fascinations of Arizona. The best years of his life had been spent there. He knew every foot of the country; talked Spanish like a native; believed in the people; believed in the climate; had full faith in the silver; implicitly relied upon the gold; never doubted that Arizona was the grand diamond in the rough of all our Territories. He looked and talked and acted like a man perfectly sane; and when he confidently assured me that if "feet" chimed with my aspirations, I could have as many as I pleased by accepting a seat in his ambulance from Los Angeles to the Promised Land. Cooks and teamsters and vaqueros were all projected, and for military escorts he held the documents in his hand. We would have a grand time; we would feast and hunt and hold pow-wows with the Indians, and do up the whole country even to the Moqui villages, which he informed me, on the authority of an English missionary, were inhabited by a race of Welshmen who made a voyage to the Continent of North America in ancient times. Could flesh and blood stand such a proposition as that? Here was a chance for locomotion on a grand scale; and fortune smiled in the distance.

"Poston," said I, solemnly, "consider me in. At 4 p.m. this memorable day I'm on hand. Should the Apaches get my scalp, you, my venerable friend, and you alone, are responsible to my family and to mankind!"

Over to Oakland—a hurried explanation—a parting glance at the pleasant homestead, the garden, the wife and the little ones—ah me! how often the same insatiable spirit of adventure has driven me blindly and recklessly through the same trying ordeal! Is there no help for it in this world? Must a man when he has traveled for thirty years never more taste the sweets of content, but keep drifting uneasily along till he drifts into the final haven of rest?

There was no trouble about getting ready. A knapsack, as usual, was my only baggage. The contents were soon packed; a few coarse shirts, a box of pencils and paints, a meerscham and a plug of tobacco, these were the indispensable parts of my outfit. At 4 p.m. I stood upon the deck of the good steamer Senator, fully equipped and prepared for the important enterprise on hand. Poston was true to time. We were favored with the company of Mr. Ammi White, an Indian Agent and trader, on his return to the Pimo villages, and two of his wards, Antonio Azul, chief of the Pimos, and Francisco the interpreter. I was glad to make the acquaintance of Ammi White. He had seen all the ups and downs of Arizona life; had been a prisoner among the Texans, and knew as much of the country as any man in or out of it. Besides, he was a quaint, original man, a native of Maine; long, lank, and leathery; brimful of wild reminiscences, and of that genial turn which promised much in the way of future enjoyment. All hail to our good friend and traveling companion, Ammi White! Slow of speech he may be, and prejudiced against the luxuries of civilization, but a jewel of a White is he in his native element of grease and Indians, pork and beans, adobe hovels and pinole. Antonio Azul, chief of the Pimos, and son of the illustrious Cool Azul, was in the full tide of a triumphant return to his native village. He had paraded the streets of San Francisco with his illustrious friend Iretaba, chief of the Mojaves, who has since created such a sensation in New York and Washington; had seen the great elephant of civilization; had heard the negro minstrels, and visited the Mint and Custom-house; and now he was about to return laden with treasures of knowledge to the bosom of his virtuous wife and family, and spend the remainder of his days, sitting bare-legged in front of his wigwam, telling his people of the wondrous sights he had seen. Especially was he prepared to give them a lucid account of the fiery horses that pulled the public with lightning speed along iron roads, and the big canoe that paddled over the briny deep by means of a great kettle of hot water that was always kept boiling down in the hold. Francisco, his official interpreter, was resplendent with badges of distinction given him by the ladies; which he wore on his head, and on his breast, and on his back, and on every available spot of his body from top to bottom; being, as I should have said, a handsome youth, much given to destruction of the female sex. Never for a moment from the time he stepped on board till we got well out of the harbor did the joyous grin of gratified ambition leave his countenance, save when we crossed the bar, and then he went precipitately below, and turned in on a pile of freight. When he came up next morning his face was painted a grim yellow, to disguise the effects of those internal emotions which are apt to disturb the digestion of the bravest warriors; for Francisco was a warrior, too, and scorned weakness of digestion as a disgrace to manhood. He looked as grim as the Sphinx, and frowned from time to time as if nothing on earth, or on the waters of the earth, or on the steamships that plow the waters, could disturb his stolidity; and then, upon the occasion of a sudden lurch or two, rushed to windward with both hands firmly pressed over his mouth, doubling himself up and vainly endeavoring to conceal the most horrible contortions of countenance. But it was no use. Old Neptune got the best of him at last. I was only surprised that he did not follow the example of some of our army officers who become sick of the war—throw up his commission.

Of the voyage I have only to say that it was smooth and pleasant—a mere Lake Como trip, with the addition of a finer climate, a greater extent of scenery, and a much more commodious boat than any to be found on the waters of Como. The change from the chilling fogs of San Francisco to the balmy atmosphere of the South is one of the luxuries of a winter's trip. Few of those unfortunate beings who dwell upon the shores of the Atlantic have any conception of the delightful climate with which we are blessed on the Pacific coast. Bright sunshine sparkles over the sea and nestles among the declivities of the mountains; the earth rejoices in the generous flood of light poured down upon it from morning till night; the birds of the air and the beasts of the field revel in the groves and pastures that stretch back from the rock-bound shores; nothing in life or in nature seems wanting in the measure of a joyous future; all is rich and glowing and full of beauty and promise. A voyage along the shores of California is a feast of soul for all the years to come. The mountains, barren as they appear at the first sight, are strangely fantastic in form and wonderfully rich in coloring. The full swell of the ocean, unobstructed for thousands of miles, falls like the majestic peal of a mighty organ upon the embattlements of solid rock that line the main. Beyond the Point of Conception the beautiful islands of Santa Barbara loom up over the bright sparkling sea, barren of foliage yet wonderfully picturesque in the glowing tints of the southern horizon. What a luxury of lights and shades; what a balmy, ecstatic atmosphere; what broad blue fields of water and infinite distances of landscape! Could it be that a grand mistake was made in Mohammedan history—that Paradise is nothing more than a faint attempt to delineate the beauties of California?

The old town of San Pedro has not improved since my last visit in 1860. It then consisted of an ancient adobe building, in which Mr. Banning carried on his staging and teaming operations, and a few warehouses and miscellaneous shanties under the bank. It now consists of the same, in other hands, and somewhat dilapidated by the lapse of time. The principal inhabitants are wild geese, sea-gulls, and dead cattle. The steamer lies out by Deadman's Rock—a little island supposed to be the burial-place of an unfortunate mariner who came to an untimely end in that vicinity. A cross marks his grave, and sea-gulls and wild seawaves sing his lullaby.

Banning—the active, energetic, irrepressible Phineas Banning—has built a town on the plain about six miles distant, at the head of the slough. He calls it Wilmington, in honor of his birth-place. In order to bring Wilmington and the steamer as close together as circumstances will permit, he has built a small boat propelled by steam, for the purpose of carrying passengers from the steamer to Wilmington, and from Wilmington to the steamer. Another small boat of a similar kind burst its boiler a couple of years ago, and killed and scalded a number of people, including Captain Seely, the popular and ever-to-be-lamented commander of the Senator. The boiler of the present boat is considered a model of safety. Passengers may lean against it with perfect security. It is modeled after the pattern of a tea-kettle, so that when the pressure is unusually great the cover will rise and let off the superabundant steam, and thus allow the crowd a chance to swim ashore.

Wilmington is an extensive city, located at the head of a slough, in a pleasant neighborhood of sand-banks and marshes. There are not a great many houses in it as yet, but there is a great deal of room for houses when the population gets ready to build them. The streets are broad and beautifully paved with small sloughs, ditches, bridges, lumber, dry-goods boxes, and the carcasses of dead cattle. Ox-bones and the skulls of defunct cows, the legs and jawbones of horses, dogs, sheep, swine, and coyotes, are the chief ornaments of a public character; and what the city lacks in the elevation of its site it makes up in the elevation of its water-lines, many of them being higher than the surrounding objects. The city fathers are all centred in Banning, who is mayor, councilman, constable, and watchman, all in one. He is the great progenitor of Wilmington. Touch Wilmington, and you touch Banning. It is his specialty—the offspring of his genius. And a glorious genius has Phineas B. in his way! Who, among the many thousands who have sought health and recreation at Los Angeles within the past ten years, has not been a recipient of Banning's bounty in the way of accommodation? His stages are ever ready—his horses ever the fastest—his jovial face ever the most welcome on the beach! Big of heart, big of body, big of enterprise, is Phineas—the life and soul of Los Angeles county. The people know it—the public acknowledge it; for he is now a delegate to the National Convention, and will, I venture to assert, make an honorable mark in that body. Long life to Banning! May his shadow grow larger and larger every day! At all events, I trust it may never grow less. I retract all I said about Wilmington—or most of it. I admit that it is a flourishing place compared with San Pedro. I am willing to concede that the climate is salubrious at certain seasons of the year, when the wind does not blow up the sand, and at certain other seasons when the rain does not cover the country with water; and then again at other seasons, when the earth is not parched by drought and scorching suns.

Within a mile of this charming city stands a quadrangular series of houses, well built and commodious, with a large square in the middle, called Camp Drum. It is now occupied by the California Volunteers, under Colonel Curtis. Here, in virtue of certain documents from headquarters, we were provided with an escort of five soldiers and a sergeant, to secure us against the attacks of Greasers, savages, and other disreputable natives, on the road to the Colorado River. We were also furnished with mules for our ambulance and rations for our military forces. The officers of the camp were exceedingly kind and polite, and made our sojourn there an agreeable episode in our journey.

At Camp Drum we heard a good deal about the lively condition of society in and around Los Angeles. It was not considered safe for a man to travel about, even within a few miles of camp, without a double-barreled shot-gun, a revolver, a bowie-knife, and two Derringer pistols. Of course in these war-times, when thousands of lives are lost every day, the mere killing of a few citizens now and then must seem ridiculously tame to people on the Atlantic side; and I only speak of it as a common characteristic of the country through which I was traveling. At any point on the road between Los Angeles and Camp Drum bullets in the back of the head were to be expected. The recent acts of the Vigilance Committee in breaking into the jail and hanging Boss Danewood and four of his fellow-prisoners—three of whom were Spaniards—had aroused the resentment of every American outlaw and native Greaser in the country, and assassinations were of frequent occurrence. In passing through the narrow lanes and between the willow hedges, where the vineyards are located, it was deemed a necessary precaution to travel with a knife ready drawn, so as to cut the lassoes that were likely to be thrown around one's neck. A gentleman of my acquaintance, connected with the military department, seemed to relish this state of affairs exceedingly, as it afforded him an opportunity of indulging his propensity for hunting. Ducks and geese had long since ceased to afford him any diversion. He now amused himself by jumping into his buggy, and starting off with his double-barreled shot-gun after Greasers, murderers, and the like, of whom he generally bagged, or otherwise disposed of, two or three every week. In fact, he rather prided himself upon his skill in man-hunting. I was a little shocked at first when I heard of man-hunting as a recreation, but after a few days' sojourn in Los Angeles found that it was quite a common amusement. Running down, catching, shooting, and hanging suspicious characters was esteemed the very best kind of sport, being dangerous as well as exciting. During our stay a party of the Vigilants went down from Los Angeles to Wilmington, got on board Banning's little steamboat, and while it was en route for the Senator, took a prisoner bound for San Quentin out of the hands of the sheriff and hanged him by the neck till he was dead. The unfortunate man was a native of California, and was believed to be the murderer of John Raines, an American ranchero. Since that exploit, performed in full view of Camp Drum, they pursued and captured the murderer of Mr. Sandford, another victim of the barbarous condition of society, and strung him up in the same summary manner. Whether the country will be permanently benefited by these acts remains to be seen. I hope it will, for it certainly needs reformation of some sort. Putting this and that together, and throwing in Idaho and Nevada by way of good measure, it seems to me that Italy can no longer claim distinction for her banditti. We can do as much murdering, robbing, and stabbing as any other people, and a great deal more catching and hanging than ever was done in Europe.

Several days were required to complete our outfit at Los Angeles. My friend Poston, as already stated, had traveled through Arizona before, and his notions of the physical necessities of man in that region were somewhat extravagant. Not that he was unreasonably addicted to comfort, but he delighted in a species of practical satire which usually cost him a considerable sum of money, not to say an endless amount of trouble. Arizona, he said, was an extensive country, prolific in reptiles and the precious metals, but painfully destitute of every thing for the convenience of civilized man. His favorite advice to all who contemplated visiting the Territory was to take with them plenty of mules and horses; fire-arms, ammunition, clothing, tobacco, cigars, pipes, pen-knives, pencils, medicines, and whisky; not to forget an abundant supply of coffee, sugar, flour, and beans; to be sure and start with a full outfit of acids, blow-pipes, and green spectacles; and by no means to omit boots, shoes, handkerchiefs, combs, and percussion caps—especially the latter—and such other articles as might be purchased in bulk at the selling out of any extensive variety store. It was not that the traveler himself would need all these items of luxury, but there were others in the country who would—fellow-travelers gathered upon the public highways by the cohesive attraction of whisky and provisions; the people throughout the territory generally, and such casual parties and lonely pilgrims as might be encountered on the way to and from the mines.

A few extra mules and jacks to lend to intimate friends going on prospecting tours, some spare saddles and apparejos, and, if possible, a few thousand dollars in gold or silver coin of various denominations to accompany the prospecting parties, but never to be seen again in any shape whatever, would also be advisable. The articles to be given away, consumed, devoured, and wasted, continued my friend, with a grim ferocity, must be of the very best quality, or woe betide the unhappy donor. Be he Superintendent of Indians, or Special Agent, or what not, his doom, morally and politically, will at once be sealed. Never on earth can he be elected Delegate to Congress from the Territory of Arizona! I rather suspected Poston of a leaning that way, and was surprised at the rashness of his remarks.

In due time the outfit was completed. We had every thing above specified, and a great many things more, including a guard of five soldiers and a sergeant to fight for us, if necessary, on the way over to Fort Yuma. Our baggage-wagon was filled to the utmost limit of its capacity, and even then our little ambulance and four mules groaned under their precious loads. On the day of starting the expedition stood as follows: Poston, commander-in-chief; myself, principal hunter and scribe; a supernumerary friend as general assistant; Jim Berry, cook; and "George," the driver; with the addition of Ammi White and his Pimo Indians, and one Major Stick, a Southern gentleman, recently from Alcatraz Island, where he had been spending a portion of the summer. This was our corps de reserve. Jim Berry was a dandy contraband from Maryland, of whose many virtues and peculiar traits of character I shall have occasion to speak hereafter. "George"—I don't know his other name; in fact, don't think he had any, for I never heard him called any thing but "George"—was a stout, good-natured young fellow from Pike County, Missouri, or thereabouts, or, at all events, from some county in which people grow up to a succulent maturity. If "George" was a little verdant and rude of speech, he had good material in him, and was by no means destitute of a dry, Pike-ish sort of wit that occasionally and at very remote intervals burst upon us like a bombshell. I was sorry to discover, before he had been three days with us, that he labored under a dreadful and overwhelming affliction, which seemed to rack him to the very core. It might have been remorse for a murder recently committed, or grief for the loss of all his family connections by a stroke of lightning, or the throes of a benighted mind laboring under conviction; whatever it was, it caused him to indulge in some startling exhibitions of emotion. Often, as we rattled along the road, "George," after belaboring the mules till he was tired, and telling them to "git" till he was hoarse, would lean back in his seat and think. He thought fearfully. I never saw thinking go so hard with a poor fellow in my life. In the midst of it all he would start up with a sudden yell of anguish, whirl his black-snake and let fly at the mules, misery, passion, ferocity depicted in every feature. "Now git, dodrot ye!" was the climax of these uncontrollable bursts of wretchedness, followed by groans so deep and pathetic that they fairly went to my heart. At night, when we spread our blankets around the camp and lay down to pleasant dreams, our unhappy driver discharged his accumulated miseries in a series of groans and sighs that manifested a speedy dissolution. All night long, at intervals of two or three hours, he gave vent to these heart-rending expressions of woe. Poston offered him pills, but he said he wasn't sick. On the occasion of one of his paroxysms I went over to where he lay and asked him, kindly, what was the matter. "Nothin'," said he; "why?" "You groan so, I thought something troubled you." "Reckon I was dreamin'," muttered George; and with that he turned over to groan again. Thus it continued night after night, until the dreadful secret was revealed by a singular circumstance. The truth is, I could not sleep. George's groans disturbed me. Loss of rest was preying upon my system. I was getting thin. As a desperate remedy I secretly gathered around me, one night, before turning in, all the clods, chips, sticks, and pebbles I could find, and having taken the bearings of George's head, lay down as usual. On this occasion his groans were especially varied and pathetic. He sometimes groaned like a horse, and sometimes like a sheep or a goat, and then varied the note by groaning hysterically, like a mule. When it came to that I hurled a clod at his head, which stopped him for a little while. Presently he fell to groaning again. I hurled sticks and stones at him, and stopped him again. After a long pause he resumed his doleful laborings of woe, when I let fly another clod with such dextrous aim that it must have hit him plumb on the back of his head. "Oh, Gosh!" he cried, in tones of the bitterest anguish. "I didn't think that of you, Mary Jane! I know'd you didn't love me; but I didn't think you'd throw taters at me!" The dreadful mystery was solved; the secret was out; George was the victim of unrequited love. Mary Jane was the cruel fair one who had destroyed his peace of mind, and driven him with the lash of her scorn, as he was driving mules with a black-snake, to seek the chances of life in the deserts of Arizona.

After our departure from the Monte we traveled slowly, in order that we might keep company with our provisions and escort. All along the route we heard vague rumors of one Ramon Castillo, a native bandit around whose career were centred all the charms of romance. He was represented to be a prodigy of strength and valor, an irresistible gallant among the ladies, a terror to his enemies, and a very dangerous character to the public. He had sworn vengeance against the American race, had assassinated many of his pursuers, and declared his determination never to be taken alive. Some supposed he was in the mountains with a band of thirty desperadoes; others thought he was lurking by the road with a few of his servientes for the purpose of waylaying travelers. All agreed upon one point—that Ramon Castillo was a man greatly to be admired. Of course he had many friends—such men always have in California—and there were few persons of respectable standing in Los Angeles County who would not have felt pride and pleasure in protecting him from arrest. I almost hoped we would meet Don Ramon, that we might enjoy the romance of a tilt with such an accomplished bandit.

The country through which we traveled for several days was not altogether new to me. I had passed through it before during a tour of exploration among the Southern Indians in 1860. But how different was it now! In former years the magnificent series of valleys, stretching all the way from Los Angeles to the borders of the Colorado Desert, were clothed in the richest verdure. Vast herds of cattle roamed over them rampant with life. The hill-sides were covered with flowers; the air was laden with sweet perfumes; it was the paradise of rancheros. Now, after two years of drought, all was parched, grim, and melancholy. The pastures scarcely showed the first faint tinge of green, and the higher grounds were barren as the road over which we traveled. For hundreds of miles the country was desolated for want of rain. At the Chino, and through the Temeculo, Warner's Ranch, San Felipe, and Vallecito the effects of the drought were fearfully apparent. Thousands of cattle lay dead around the black, muddy pools. A sickening effluvia from the carcasses filled the air. At least two-thirds of all the cattle on these ranches must have perished from starvation. Vaqueros were ever on the watch to strip each fallen animal of its skin. It was a grand carnival for the buzzards and coyotes. No more pitiable sight ever disturbed the eye of a traveler in this lovely region than the dreary waste of dead and dying animals. Thousands drawn to the pools by thirst were unable to extricate themselves from the mud; and the road was sometimes blocked by the gaunt, shrunken bodies of still living animals unable to get out of the way.

At the Santa Ana River, ten miles beyond the Chino, we had the usual lively time in crossing. Travelers who have had occasion to pass this river at certain stages of the water can not easily forget their experience of its quick-sands and currents. The surrounding country is weird and desolate. A few Spanish rancherias, with their dilapidated corrals and littered fronts, occupy the neighboring sand-banks. Below the crossing is a rugged cañon stretching to the vicinity of Anaheim, the German colony of wine-makers, whose vineyards have already acquired a high reputation on the Pacific coast. Immense undulating plains, bounded in the distance by barren ranges of mountains, lie above and beyond, and patches of sand-deserts, with a scrubby growth of willow and cotton-wood, lie along the banks of the river. The water is of a sickly, milky color, and is impregnated with alkali. Innumerable flocks of geese and ducks cover the green flats, and the wild croaking of the groojas, or sand-hill cranes, falls mournfully on the ear. There is something fierce and scathing in the blaze of the sun; and the unobstructed sweep of the wind across the deserts, the immensity of the distances and towering ranges of mountains, fill the mind with awe. All the associations of the wilderness are impressive; and the traveler instinctively feels that he is in a region of robbery and assassination, where the bones of the dead are seldom left to tell the tale.

We made a halt upon the bank of the river, and sent in our cavalry to tramp down the quick-sands. By repeatedly crossing they made a tolerably safe road for our wagons. The next half hour was occupied in urging in our mules, which seemed to have a mortal dread of the treacherous sands. At length the blows and shouts of our cavalry and the yells and whips of the teamsters, with volleys of stones hurled at the heads of the mules from various directions, prevailed, and the plunging, rearing, and strangling of the poor animals as they struggled through the surging waters were exciting in the extreme. Now they halt and begin to sink; now the shouts, and yells, and blows start them up again; now the harnesses are tangled up, and the wagons reel and sway upon their wheels as they sink in the sand; the current sweeps over the hubs of the wheels, and all seems lost. Our ambulance is in advance, our guns and ammunition are in imminent danger, our lives balanced on the slender chances of a struggle amidst the wreck of matter, when George rises to the sublimity of the occasion. His black-snake whizzes through the air and down on the back of the lagging wheeler. "You, Mary Jane!" he roars, in a wild frenzy. "Git!" And Mary Jane got. She plunged, she reared, she kicked; but out of the quick-sand she dragged us, and the baggage-wagon followed, and we were all safely landed on the firm earth. "Oh, Gosh!" groaned George, wiping the sweat from his brow and sinking back dismally in his seat. "Oh, Jeeminy Gosh!" But it was not of the river or its quick-sands or troubles he was thinking; his spiritual eye saw other quick-sands than those of the Santa Ana. His vision was turned inward; it saw but the cruel fair one, the inexorable Mary Jane, whose magic name had inadvertently escaped his lips in time to save us. Oh, Mary Jane, little did you know that salvation to us was lingering death to your devoted but unhappy George!

Of our journey along the picturesque shores of the Laguna, and through the beautiful but now barren valleys of Temecula, Warner's Ranch, San Felipe, and Vallecito, I must necessarily make short work. It was a continued feast for the soul of an artist; but as I come only incidentally under that head, I can not undertake to delineate it to the exclusion of the more important objects of the expedition. All the way along the road we saw great quantities of geese, ducks, and quail. I had my shot-gun always ready, and generally succeeded, by random shots from the ambulance, in getting a good supply of game by the time we reached camp, to which our cook, Dr. Jim Berry, did ample justice in the line of culinary preparation. We laughed and ate and slept and grew fat, day after day, till we reached Cariso, the last inhabited station on the road to the Desert. Here was the jumping-off place. Beyond this, for a hundred miles, we were at the mercy of the sands and storms and burning suns of Colorado.

I scarcely remember to have seen a wilder country than the first eight miles beyond Cariso. Barren hills of gravel and sand-stone, flung up at random out of the earth, strange jagged mountain-peaks in the distance; yellow banks serrated by floods; sea-shells glittering in the wavy sand-fields that lie between; these overhung by a rich, glowing atmosphere, with glimpses of Indian smokes far off in the horizon, inspired us with a vague feeling of the wonders and characteristic features of the desert region through which we were about to pass. I could not but think of the brave old Spaniards and their heroic explorations across the Colorado. Here was a glowing and mystic land of sunshine and burning sands, where human enterprise had in centuries past battled with hunger and thirst and savage races; where the silence of utter desolation now reigned supreme. There was a peculiar charm to me in the rich atmospheric tints that hung over this strange land, and the boundless wastes that lay outspread before us; and I drank in with an almost childish delight the delicate and exquisite odors that filled the air, and thought of my early wanderings, years long past, amidst the deserts and palms of Araby the Blest.

Yet, strictly speaking, the Colorado is scarcely a desert. Extensive belts of rich soil, that irrigation would render productive, occupy a large portion of the country. In these are seen the evidences of sudden and extraordinary vegetable growth in seasons of abundant rain, or when the Colorado River overflows its banks. A proposition has been entertained by Congress to reclaim this vast tract of country, embracing millions of acres of rich agricultural land, by means of a grand canal from the Colorado, with a connected system of acequias; and proofs are not wanting to show that the Montezumas and early Spaniards thus redeemed extensive ranges of country in Sonora and Arizona that would otherwise have remained valueless. The ruins of ancient cities, many miles in circumference, are found on the Rio Verde, above its junction with the Salado, where the whole country is now barren; and below the junction, on the Salado, the remains of immense acequias, with walls twenty feet high, are still to be seen. At least one hundred thousand acres of land were formerly irrigated by this system of acequias on the Salado. It is now a barren sand-plain, upon which stands in solitary majesty the Cereus grandeus—the Sentinel of the Desert.

Dr. O. M. Wozencraft has spent many years in advocating this great measure. The plan of irrigation proposed by him is generally ridiculed as impracticable, and the Doctor enjoys rather a visionary reputation based upon his Grand Colorado Scheme, which has been compared by unthinking men with the Great South Sea Bubble. I don't intend to establish a farm there myself until the canal is completed; but still I can see no great obstacle to success except the porous nature of the sand. By removing the sand from the desert success would be insured at once. An elaborate and exceedingly able report upon this subject has recently been issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

As we advanced into the desert each shifting scene developed its peculiar beauties. The face of the country, for the most part, is well covered with mesquit trees, sage bushes, grease-wood weeds, and cactus. Mountains are in sight all the way across, and the old stage-houses of the Overland Mail Company still stand by the watering-places. Many indications of the dreadful sufferings of emigrant parties and drovers still mark the road; the wrecks of wagons half covered in the drifting sands, skeletons of horses and mules, and the skulls and bones of many a herd of cattle that perished by thirst on the way, or fell victims to the terrible sand storms that sweep the desert. Only in a few instances, when we struck out upon the arid sand-belts that lie between the alluvial beds of earth, did we encounter any thing resembling the deserts of Arabia, and then only for ten or twelve miles at a time.

The climate in winter is indescribably delightful; in summer the heat is excessive, and travelers and animals suffer much on the journey. It was a perfect luxury to breathe such a pure soft air as we enjoyed in the middle of December, when our Atlantic friends were freezing amidst the ice and snow-banks of that wretched part of the world. Between the desert of the Colorado and the city of New York there is no comparison in any respect. Give me a pack-mule, a shot-gun, and a sack of pinole, with such a climate as this, and take your brick deserts on Fifth Avenue, and your hot-air furnaces, and brain-racking excitements, and be happy with them! Accept my pity, but leave me, if you please, to chase rabbits and quail where the sun shines, and to lie down of nights and sleep on the warm bosom of my mother earth.

There was a scene on a pleasant morning as we sallied forth on our journey from the Indian Wells never to be forgotten. The eye that looks upon it once must see it as long as mortal vision lasts. An isolated mountain in the distance seemed at the first view to rise abruptly out of a lake of silver, the shores of which were alive with water-fowl of brilliant and beautiful plumage. As we journeyed toward it the lake disappeared and the mountain changed to a frowning fortress, symmetrical in all its parts—a perfect model of architectural beauty. Still nearing it, the ramparts and embattlements melted into a dreamy haze, out of which gradually emerged a magnificent palace, with pillars, and cornices, and archways, and a great dome, from which arose a staff, surmounted by a glowing blue ball, encircled by a halo. At the same time another mountain on the right, distant many miles, assumed equally strange and fantastic shapes; and when the ball arose upon our palace, another ball answered the signal from the distant mountain on the right; and then a great railway opened up between them, supported by innumerable piles, stretching many leagues over the desert. So perfect was the illusion that we stopped in breathless wonder, almost expecting to see a train of cars whirl along and vanish in the warm glow of the horizon. This strange and beautiful display of the mirage has been witnessed by many travelers on the Colorado desert, who will attest that, so far from exaggeration, I have but faintly pictured its wonders. Nothing of the kind that I have seen elsewhere can compare with it in the variety and beauty of its illusions.

There was but one drawback to our happiness—the increasing wretchedness of our driver, George, who, by some fatal element in human nature, grew darker in soul as the light and joyousness of the outer world broke upon him with increasing splendor. “No,” he muttered to himself in despairing accents, “’tain’t no use; I can’t forget her. Oh, golly! golly!” And here, with an audible sob, he started as if from a trance, and swinging his black-snake over his head, yelled at the mules with ungovernable fury, “You git, dodburn you! What d’ye stand flopping yer ears for? Git!” Sic transit!—thus pass away the illusions of this world!

The entire distance from Cariso across the desert to Fort Yuma is 116 miles. Four stations where water can be had intervene on the road—Indian Wells, Alamo Mucho, Gardner’s, and Cook’s Wells. At all these points the water is tolerably good; and there are other points where brackish water can be had by digging a few feet.

About fifteen miles beyond Cook’s Wells; after coursing along the belt of the great sand-desert on the left, we struck into the Colorado bottom. Indications of our approach to water were every where perceptible. Thickets of arrow-weed lined the way, and forests of cotton-wood loomed up ahead, over which geese and cranes uttered their wild notes. Soon we passed some deserted rancherias, and in a little while more our eyes were rejoiced with a refreshing view of the great Colorado of the West, as it swept like a mighty serpent over the desert.

At Pilot Knob a delegation of the Yuma Indians, headed by Pasqual the chief, came out to meet us. They had heard of our coming, and were eager to do us honor. Every brave had his package of greasy certificates, derived from the officers who had at various times been stationed at the fort. These they thrust at us with the utmost simplicity, and in full faith that they would result in an immediate recognition of their claims to our distinguished consideration. There were good certificates and bad; complimentary notices of the services rendered by bearer to the American nation, and warnings to be on the look-out for other bearers, who were represented to be incorrigible thieves, addicted to stealing the buttons off travelers’ coats and the teeth out of travelers’ heads. It was all the same—all strong medicine from the white man; and we so regarded these testimonials, and shook hands with good and bad bearers, and gave them tobacco, and promised them more in a few days. There was a childlike simplicity about the poor creatures that touched our sympathies. Most of them looked gaunt and thin, and it was evident they had based some hopes of relief upon our arrival.

As it was incidentally my business to look after the Indians, in virtue of an honorary commission which I held from the Department of the Interior, I soon ascertained that those who reside in this vicinity were in a very destitute condition, owing to the low stage of the river during the past season and the failure of the customary crops. Heretofore the Yumas have supported themselves without much difficulty, and have only occasionally and at remote intervals received aid from the Government. Under ordinary circumstances, when the annual overflow of the Colorado takes place, they cultivate the low lands in their rude way, and generally succeed in raising abundant crops of corn, wheat, pumpkins, and melons. These bottom lands along the Colorado are light, rich, and easily worked, and afford ample means of subsistence to the tribes bordering on the river. During the past year there was no overflow, and consequently no crops were raised. It was a season of unusual drought—such a drought as the oldest inhabitant did not remember to have seen before. Even the mesquit beans, wild pease, and berries, upon which the Indians had been accustomed to depend in unfavorable seasons, had entirely failed, so that they were now left destitute. Their seed-wheat, which they had stored for planting, had long since given out; and for some months prior to our arrival they had been subsisting on rats, mice, lizards, snakes, and such other poor and scanty food of the kind as they could gather on the deserts and banks of the river. From their agricultural habits they are unskilled in procuring this kind of food, and many of them were in a starving condition. In some instances children had died from want of proper nourishment, and disease had spread among them with greater virulence than usual, as it always does in seasons of scarcity.

From Pilot Knob we had a pleasant drive through the mesquit thickets bordering on the river, as far as Mr. Hamblin’s, where we made a halt to refresh ourselves with a first experience of civilization on the Colorado. Here, in a good adobe house, with such comforts as this wild region affords, dwell Mr. Hamblin and his wife, an excellent and intelligent couple, who received us most cordially, and generously offered us all the accommodations of their establishment. Little did I expect to find in this isolated part of the world a lady of refined literary tastes; yet I have rarely met with one of more gracefully cultivated mind than Mrs. Hamblin, to whose pleasant conversation we were subsequently indebted for many delightful hours.

A little beyond we reached head-quarters and rancheria of Don Diego Jaeger—the famous pioneer of Fort Yuma, without whom that military establishment could no more have existed up to the present day than without light or air, fire, water, or frijoles. A German by birth, a frontiersman by instinct, Don Diego abandoned the haunts of civilization fourteen years ago and settled here among the savages. Many a hard rub has he had for his life during the years of trouble with the Yumas. Industry, energy, and perseverance prevailed over all difficulties; and in time prosperity rewarded his trials. Who, for the last dozen years or more, has ferried the military and the public across the Colorado?—Don Diego. Who has clothed the naked and fed the hungry of this howling wilderness during all that time?—Don Diego. Who has kept the military arm of the government from becoming paralyzed for lack of beef, pork, frijoles, and forage; supplied the roads with sustenance for man and beast; kept needy officers and thriftless men in funds; who but Don Diego! When the burning suns of the Colorado wilted every other man down to a state of inanity, who was it that always remained fresh and vigorous, and brimful of enterprise?—The irrepressible, the irresistible Don Diego! I say irresistible advisedly; for his only fault has been an overruling devotion to the fair sex, upon whom he has squandered his money even as the prodigal of old. But he is now the happy husband of a charming Sonoran lady, Doña Cloena, whose fascinations have at length subdued his erratic heart, and his children are even as the apples of his eyes. Rich in experience, rich in ranches, rich in silver mines, rich in family—long live Don Diego!

In half an hour more we reached Fort Yuma, where we were received with great kindness and hospitality by Colonel Bennet, the commanding officer, who provided us with excellent quarters.

Twelve days had passed since our departure from Los Angeles; and we were not slow to enjoy the luxury of a bath and a change of raiment. Captain Gorham and his command, a cavalry company of volunteers, had preceded us from Camp Drum, and were encamped near the fort. This command was destined for the protection of Arizona, and would probably soon be stationed at Tucson.

As soon as we had refreshed ourselves with the customary appliances of civilization at frontier posts—lemonade, if you please—we sallied forth to enjoy a view of the fort and surrounding country from the opposite side of the river.

I was not disappointed in my first impressions of Fort Yuma. Weird and barren as the adjacent country is, it is not destitute of compensating beauties. The banks of the river for many miles below are fringed with groves of mesquit and cotton-wood; above the junction of the Gila and the Colorado an extensive alluvial valley, clothed with willow, cotton-wood, mesquit, and arrow-weed, stretches far off to the foot-hills of Castle Dorne; and toward the great desert a rugged range of mountains, over which rises in solitary majesty the "Chimney Peak," forms the back-ground. An atmosphere of wonderful richness and brilliancy covers the scene like a gorgeous canopy of prismatic colors, and the vision is lost in the immensity of the distances. The fort stands on an elevated bluff, commanding the adjacent country for many miles around, and presents an exceedingly picturesque view with its neat quarters, store-houses, and winding roads. It was with emotions of national pride that we gazed upon the glorious flag of our Union as it swelled out to the evening breeze from the flag-staff that towered above the bluff; and we felt that, so long as that emblem of our liberty floated, there was hope for the future of Colorado and Arizona.

The climate in winter is incomparably finer than that of Italy. It would scarcely be possible to suggest an improvement. I never experienced such exquisite Christmas weather as we enjoyed during our sojourn. Perhaps fastidious people might object to the temperature in summer, when the rays of the sun attain their maximum force, and the hot winds sweep in from the desert. It is said that a wicked soldier died here, and was consigned to the fiery regions below for his manifold sins; but unable to stand the rigors of the climate, sent back for his blankets. I have even heard complaint made that the thermometer failed to show the true heat because the mercury dried up. Every thing dries; wagons dry; men dry; chickens dry; there is no juice left in any thing, living or dead, by the close of summer. Officers and soldiers are supposed to walk about creaking; mules, it is said, can only bray at midnight; and I have heard it hinted that the carcasses of cattle rattle inside their hides, and that snakes find a difficulty in bending their bodies, and horned frogs die of apoplexy. Chickens hatched at this season, as old Fort Yumers say, come out of the shell ready cooked; bacon is eaten with a spoon; and butter must stand an hour in the sun before the flies become dry enough for use. The Indians sit in the river with fresh mud on their heads, and by dint of constant dipping and sprinkling manage to keep from roasting, though they usually come out parboiled. Strangers coming suddenly upon a group squatted in water up to their necks, with their mud-covered heads glistening in the sun, frequently mistake them for seals. Their usual mode of traveling down the river is astride of a log—their heads only being visible. It is enough to make a man stare with amazement to see a group of mud-balls floating on the current of a hot day, laughing and talking to each other as if it were the finest fun in the world. I have never tried this mode of locomotion; have an idea it must be delightful in such a glowing summer climate.

The Colorado was lower than any of the residents at Fort Yuma had ever before known it. I don't see how it could fall any lower without going entirely through its own bottom. A more capricious river does not exist. Formerly it ran through the desert to the northwest, but for some reason or other it changed its course, and now it runs about three feet above the level of the desert. As a navigable stream it possesses some advantages during the dry season; boats can seldom sink in it; and for the matter of channels it has an unusual variety. The main channel shifts so often that the most skillful pilot always knows where it is not to be found by pursuing the course of his last trip. The little steamer which plies between the fort and the mouth of the river, distant one hundred miles, could not make the round trip in less than two weeks, owing to shoals and shifting bars. Up to La Paz and Fort Mojave the navigation was still worse. Twenty or thirty days up and down was considered a fair trip. The miners in that region were suffering for supplies, although six hundred tons of freight lay at the embarcadero awaiting transportation. I mention this as a hint to the delegate soon to be elected to Congress from Arizona. If he can prevail upon that liberal body to grant half a million of dollars toward plugging up or calking the bottom of the river so that it won't leak, or procuring rain by joint resolution, he will forever after merit the suffrages of his fellow-citizens.

Christmas-Day came, and with it some natural longings for home and the familiar faces of the family circle. Yet we were not so badly off as one might suppose in this region of drought and desert. Colonel Bennet and his amiable wife got up an excellent dinner at the fort; and in the evening we had a baile, or Spanish dance, at which there were several very dusky belles of the Sonoran race. Unfortunately two Jesuit Padres, attached to the Arizona command, had previously secured the attention of the principal Señoritas in the neighborhood; and what with baptizing and marrying and confessing, it was difficult to get up a quorum at the dance. However, there were plenty of officers, and what the ladies lacked in number they made up in spirit. The fiddlers scraped with an inspiring vim; whisky flowed, and egg-shells, containing dust and gilt-paper, were broken in the true Spanish style upon the heads of handsome gallants.

Not aspiring to distinction in that way, I was quietly seated on a bench, enjoying the dance, and unsuspecting of this peculiar custom, when a lovely belle of the darkest hue whirled by in the giddy waltz, dextrously cracking an egg on the crown of my head as she passed, and leaving me a spectacle of confusion and astonishment before the eyes of the crowd. The mischievous beauty struck me exactly on the spot where time has already laid his relentless hand; and I was not surprised at the merry shouts of laughter that ensued; for if my head looked like any thing upon earth, it must have borne a close resemblance to a boulder surmounted by croppings of gold and silver.

Next day Superintendent Poston and myself held a grand pow-wow with the Yuma chiefs and their people. From all parts of the neighborhood they came; warriors, squaws, and children; from the mesquit bushes and mud-holes of the Colorado; from the sloos and the arroyas of the Gila; the cotton-woods and the deserts and the mountains of Castle Dorne. Every village had its delegation of dusky tatterdemalions. Lizards and snakes and mice were hastily cast aside in the wild anticipation of muck-a-muck from the Great Father. Hungry and lean, painted and bedizened with ornaments, they came in to receive the bounty of the mighty Federal chief.

Great were the rejoicings when we opened the boxes and bales of merchandise so liberally furnished by the Government contractors, Cronin, Huntall, and Sears, of New York. Red, white, green, and gray blankets; military suits, glittering with tinsel; old swords, four feet long; sun-glasses for lighting cigars; and penny whistles for the small fry. It was indeed a wonderful display of the artistic triumphs of civilization, well calculated to impress the savage tribes of the Pacific with awe and admiration. There were axes of the best Collins brand, that flew to pieces like glass against the iron timbers of this anomalous region; and hats made by steam, and flaming red vests stitched by magic, and tobacco-boxes and tin kettles that might be opened, but never upon earth shut again. Surrounded by all the military paraphernalia of Fort Yuma, and with ceremony the most profound and impressive, we delivered our speeches and dry-goods to the various chiefs; we gave them damaged hominy and hoes, and spades and shovels, and sashes and military buttons, charms, amulets, tobacco-boxes, and beads; shook them by the hand collectively and in detail, and pow-wowed generally in the approved style.

I close this branch of the subject with a brief description of the principal chiefs as they appeared before us on that memorable day. Pasqual, the doughty head-chief of all the Yumas, long known to fame as the longest of his tribe, predominated over the ceremonies. A grave, cadaverous, leathery old gentleman, with hollow, wrinkled cheeks, and a prodigious nose, through the cartilage of which, between the nostrils, he wears a white bone ornamented with swinging pendants, is Pasqual the doughty. On account of the length of his arms and legs—which, when stretched out altogether, bear a strong similitude to the identical wind-mill against which Don Quixote ran a tilt—the mighty Pasqual is regarded with much respect and veneration by his tribe. His costume, on the present occasion, consisted of a shabby military coat, doubtless the same worn in ancient times by his friend, Major Heintzelman, the embroidery of which has long since been fretted out by wear and tear, and the elbows rubbed off by long collision with the multitudes of office-seekers among his tribe. Of pantaloons he had but a remnant; and of boots or shoes he had none at all, save those originally furnished him by nature. But chiefly was Pasqual conspicuous for the ponderous bone and appendages that hung from his nose. A slight catarrh afflicted him at the time of our pow-wow, and it was not without great inconvenience that he managed the ornamental part of his countenance—turning repeatedly away to blow it, or adjust the awkward pendants that swung from it, and always reappearing with tears of anguish in his eyes. I took pity upon his sufferings and gave him some snuff, assuring him it was a sovereign remedy for colds in the head. The result was such a series of explosions, contortions of the facial muscles, and rattling of the ornamental bones, as to alarm me for the sanity of the doughty chief, who seemed quite wild with the accumulation of his agonies. The assembled wisdom of the nation grunted repeatedly in token of amazement; and Pasqual muttered, between the paroxysms of his affliction, "Ugh! muchee pepper! velly strong dust! Burn 'um Injun nose!"

Vincente, the next chief in command, dressed in a blue cotton shirt of the scantiest pattern. It reached only a short distance below his waist, and, for the matter of respect to the prejudices of civilization, might have ended at the collar. I really wish the contractors would furnish longer shirts for the Indians. The Yumas are tall, and I know of no tribe on this coast averaging only fourteen inches from the crown of the head to the soles of the feet. Vincente had probably received a hint that the distribution would be honored by the presence of ladies. What he lacked in costume he made up in paint. Both his eyes were encircled with yellow ochre; blue streaks adorned his cheeks; his nose was of a dazzling vermilion, and his legs were gorgeously striped with mud. His only additional article of costume, visible to the eye, was a dusky cotton diaper, ingeniously tied behind, leaving a long tail to flutter majestically in the breeze.

Tebarro, the next great chief, wrapped himself in an American blanket, and dyed his face a gloomy black. I think he was in mourning. He wore tar on his head, and tar on his cheeks, and tar on his nose and chin, which becoming mingled with the grit and dust of the Colorado desert, gave him a sort of asphaltum look, like the house-tops and pavements of Los Angeles. When he stood in the sun he melted—such was the force of his grief. Black tears ran down from his head and cheeks and chin, and mingled with the wool of his blanket. Literally he wept tar.

Antonio, the fourth great chief, wore a strap round his waist, with a rusty old sword tied to it by means of rawhide. He didn't wear any thing else, save the usual girdle of manta upon his loins, that could be considered an article of costume; but his eyes were gorgeously encircled by a cloud of blue paint fringed with vermilion. Like his illustrious superior, Pasqual, he wore pendent ornaments in his nose, of the most inconvenient pattern. I should judge Antonio carried a quarter of a pound of native jewelry, consisting of bone and lead, upon the cartilage of his proboscis.

Juan, the fifth and last of noted warriors and head-men, was redundant in gamoose breeches and cotton rags. On his head he wore a helmet of Colorado mud, dried into the roots of his hair by the action of the sun. This I believe is accounted by the Yumas a sovereign remedy for vermin. The liveliest skipper is forever deprived of locomotion by the conglomerate of dried mud. When the helmet is broken off in segments, like a piece of baked crockery, it must present a curious spectacle of embalmed bodies.

These distinguished chiefs and their people received the presents allotted to them with great dignity and good-humor. There was no grabbing or stealing, nor any sign of discontent. Every man received his share with satisfaction, and with gratitude to the Great Father in Washington. When they shook hands with us for the last time, and we were about to part, the scene was really affecting. I almost shed tears at it myself, unused as I am to crying about what can't be helped. In squads, and couples, and one by one, they affectionately took their leave, with their hoes and axes, spades and shovels, gimcracks and charms stuck all over them—in their sashes, breeches, clouties, blankets, and pinafores. One went with a necklace of mattocks around his neck and three Collins axes in his girdle; another with his head thrust into a glittering pile of tin-ware; while a third, one of the unbreeched multitude, wore a frying-pan in front by way of an apron, and a corn-hoe behind, in the usual fashion of a rudder. Old men and young were tuning their jews'-harps; luxurious squaws were peeping at the redundant beauties reflected by their little zinc looking-glasses; children were blowing their tin whistles, and small fat papooses were hanging their heads out of compressed bundles behind their mothers, wondering, with open mouths and great round eyes, what could be the cause of all the hubbub. It was an impressive scene of barbarous happiness not easily forgotten. And so ended the Grand Pow-wow.

Our unhappy driver, George, who had never smiled during the whole course of the ceremonies, now turned away with an expression of the most profound and confirmed melancholy. Not even the warrior with the rudder, nor the chief with the mud roof to his head, could dissipate the intensity of his gloom. Nor were the blandishments of the dusky Yuma belles of any greater avail. With his hand pressed upon the pit of his stomach he groaned in agony of spirit as he descended the hill; and I fancied the plaintive words reached my ears, "Oh! Mary Jane, how could you? Think of him that loves you, and he among Injuns and savigges!"

THE INNER LIFE.

THOUGHTS of mine, so wildly pressing
Through the mystery of my soul,
While my calm face, unconfessing,
Keeps the solemn secret whole.

Oft I ponder,
With vague wonder,
Whence ye come—and what ye mean;
Visions of my world unseen!

Are ye nothing? all the longing?
And the deep bewildering doubt?
Till the old child-faiths come thronging
Back—and cast the tempter out.

Is this dreaming?
Only seeming,
All the strong love, and the pain
Which can never sleep again.

*Does all pass away unheeding,
Leaving no marks in its track?
Do the days, on days succeeding,
From the Past call nothing back?*

No! I only,
Sad and lonely,
In my weary soul bear trace
Of the wrestle and the race!

All, all, passes; but in token
Of the long-lost dreams, there lie,
In my silent heart, unspoken
Words and thoughts, that will not die.

Here, the cherished
Hopes, that perished
Ere those golden days were o'er,
Sleep enshrined for evermore.

ITALIAN BONNET MAKERS.

STRAW BONNETS.

AMONG the minor branches of New England industry, one of the most interesting is the manufacture of Straw Bonnets. A distinguishing feature of this is, that it is to a great extent a "Domestic Manufacture" in the strictest sense of the phrase, a large part of the work being done by families at their own homes, and only the finishing part performed in large factories.

Straw bonnets and hats were originally made in Italy. The Italian, or, as they are more commonly called, the "Leghorn" hats, are made of slender straws from a species of bearded wheat, which is grown expressly for the hat manufacture. The straw is prepared in a manner similar to that which will be described further on in this article. The making of these Leghorn hats gives employment to large numbers of the Italian peasantry, and an old convent, now and then, has to suffer transformation into a straw-hat establishment. It was not long before the Italian hat was adopted by the French, and a little over a hundred years ago it was introduced into England. This hat consisted of nothing more than an enormous circle of straw with a central skull-cap of the same material. It was, therefore, better fitted to receive the changes in form through which it was destined to pass than would have been the case if it had consisted of a more elaborate design. Many a chase after a blown-away hat induced the ladies to put their wits to work in order that they might put an end to the vexations which were caused them by their broad and flapping hat-brims. These they soon learned to fasten down upon the sides with ribbons, thus forming the so-called "gipsy hat," and making the first approach to a bonnet. Various unsuccessful attempts were made to modify the native ugliness of this form of hat, but no radical change took place until about the year 1790, when, the hinder part of the brim proving troublesome, some woman of fashion in a fit of spleen cut it off. Thus a second advance was made toward the modern bonnet. As if this had been a signal for the overthrow of the then reigning fashions, numerous new shapes of hats or bonnets began to appear. From all these changes the legitimate bonnet came out triumphant, and, notwithstanding its protean character, despite its numerous alterations in size and shape, has retained the same essential characteristics ever since.

Let us commence our investigations of the straw bonnet manufacture among us by taking a glance at the manner of preparing the straw. By the time that day dedicated to All-Fools arrives, the rye, which has been sown and even commenced its growth the fall before, covers the hill slopes with its verdure in place of the just departed whiteness of the snow, and in June, being nearly out of the blossom, its slender stalks are ready for the sickle. The reaper is very careful to cut his straw at just the right time, for he has learned that a too early gathering produces shriveled stalks, and a tardy reaping brittle ones. Having been cut, tied in small bundles, and the loose straws shaken out, the stalks are laid upon a block and lose their heads by the axe. The largest boiler to be obtained, the one used for scalding hogs the year before maybe, is now brought into requisition, set up perhaps in the field, filled with water, and a hot fire built under it. To this boiler the headless trunks are now brought. After a thorough scalding has removed much of their green sap, the bundles are undone and the stalks are laid upon a grassy slope to dry, the butts being placed uppermost in order that the moisture may not collect under the husks that spring up from every joint. Now the straw-maker is called upon to exercise even more watchfulness than the maker of hay; he observes every shower-betokening cloud, and carefully shields his straw from a particle of the rain which would destroy its much-prized clearness. After having turned it several times and allowed it to lie out for about forty-eight hours, the straw is for the last time bundled up and placed under cover.

When it is desired to braid the straw, children are employed to cut it at the joints, and to take off the easily removed hulls which grow up from these. The smooth lengths of straw between these joints are put into a boiler and a second time submitted to the action of hot water. Even now the tortures of the poor disjointed and scalded straw are by no means ended, but, passing from bad to worse, it has to be placed in a basket and exposed to that suffocating ordeal of brimstone smoke, which again and again, even after having been made into bonnets, it is doomed to pass through. It comes from the barrel or cupboard in which it has been fumigated far whiter than it went in, and is now ready, so far as color is concerned, for the braiding. The above is the process used if it is wished that the straw should be white; but if, on account of having been damaged in the drying perhaps, it is wished to color it, a kettle of dye stuff is substituted for the hot water and the bleaching is dispensed with.

After having been dampened, slit from end to end, and flattened out by being drawn over the back of the scissors, each straw is ready for what is technically termed "machining." The "machine" is rather a primitive affair, but little deserving the dignified name which it has received. The essential part of it is a series of sharp steel teeth inserted at regular distances on a slip of wood, over which the flattened straw is drawn. These teeth split the straw into a series of "splints," wider or narrower according to the distance between the teeth. There is a separate machine for each "number."

Much of the work heretofore has been done by children, and in the plaiting of the straw they continue to find scope for their industry. In this pursuit they were more especially employed to advantage in the early days of straw braiding, when to have a large family was rather a blessing than otherwise, since, with the high prices then given for braid, the children could frequently show as the results of their labor many of the comforts and luxuries of the farmer's house. The braid may be formed of either single straws or of double ones, i. e., of two with their inner surfaces laid together. In the first instance the polished outer face of the straw will alternate with the dull inner surface, forming the so-called "split straw" braid, and in the second case the braid will have the uniform, glossy appearance which characterizes the "Patent English Dunstable." We are speaking of domestic braids. There are foreign braids, as the "Canton," "Panama," and "Leghorn," which are made up of unsplit straws. From the number of strands used the braid receives the names "seven," "eleven," "fifteen," etc., being the finer of course, for any definite width, in proportion as the strands are more numerous.

The braid is by no means yet ready for the sewer, but, having been bought up in its rough state by the braid collectors, it is turned over to those whom we may call the finishers. Having been tied in bundles, the braid is placed in a barrel and thoroughly washed. After having been partially dried, it is reeled, in order to bring it into loose and open skeins convenient for bleaching. The skeins are hung up while yet damp in the smoke-house, and allowed to remain there during one "smoke." On the floor of the smoke-cupboard is placed a shallow vessel filled with pulverized brimstone. This is set on fire and the cupboard tightly closed. The fumes of the burning sulphur (sulphurous acid) ascend to where the straw is hung and bleach it. The cupboard is kept closed for ten hours or so, the fire, either from lack of fuel or air, goes out, and the straw has passed through one "smoke." After having been smoked the braid is hung in the air, in order that the action of the sun may "take the yellow out" to a further extent. In a few hours it arrives at the desired whiteness and is ready for the trimming. This process was formerly performed by hand, and the poor and unbraided ends of straw were tiresomely cut off with shears. A slight improvement was made upon this manner of doing the business when a razor was used in the same operation, the blade being fixed and the braid drawn under it. Of late years, however, a machine has been perfected by which one man can trim nearly four thousand yards of medium quality braid in a single day—an amount of work which it formerly required a good share of a week to perform. The braid, in passing through the machine, has been measured, and is now ready for being tied into the long flattish bundles in which it remains until ready for use. These bundles contain braid of uniform style; for thus early in bonnet-making has the system of numbering goods commenced, and during all the processes described the different qualities of braid are kept entirely distinct. The braid is now ready for the sewing.

There was a time when the manufacture of bonnets was a purely domestic affair. The straw was grown, prepared, braided, and sewed by the same family, and the bonnet stiffened with common starch and ironed with a common flat. But as the days of homespun have passed away, so have these days of home-made bonnets. Although no great invention has been produced to mark a progressive leap in the manufacture of straw bonnets—although the machinery now used is simple and not large in quantity, yet improvements have been gradually taking place, until now every operation has been so systematized that we have bonnet-factories as truly as cotton-factories—factories containing a great living machine, each portion of which has peculiar functions and is fitted for certain parts of the work. These factories have particular localities where they are most fully developed, or perhaps it would be better to say have a particular locality; for, aside from two establishments in Connecticut and two or three in New York city, they are all confined to Southeastern Massachusetts. Here we find a dozen towns, relying upon not quite a score of bonnet-factories for their principal means of support—towns in which straw is queen as truly as cotton is king in many other of our manufacturing villages. Twelve thousand persons would be a fair estimate of the number employed by these establishments, and from these are sent away annually nearly eight million bonnets and hats.

The manufacture of straw bonnets is confined to this section of New England, because it was here that the American branch of the business originated. In 1798 Miss Betsey Metcalf, of Providence, Rhode Island, now Mrs. Baker of West Dedham, Massachusetts, saw an imported Dunstable bonnet in a Providence store, and straightway wished one like it. Taking some oat stubble from a field where her father's laborers had been reaping, she split the straws with her thumb-nail and made her first attempts at plaiting. After several failures she succeeded in imitating the braid of the admired affair in the shop, and made herself a bonnet. Thus the ingenious girl, only twelve years of age, acquired the honor of being the first American manufacturer of straw bonnets. She is now an old lady of seventy-eight, and still braids, having presented us with a specimen of her handiwork, a beautiful straw ornament, on a late visit to her. Many persons urged her to get a patent on her process of braiding; but being then, as now, quite tenacious of her reputation as a Christian, she said her name should never go to Congress. A fac-simile of Mrs. Baker's first bonnet is preserved in the rooms of the Rhode Island Society for the Encouragement of Domestic Industry.

After braiding was once commenced it rapidly developed itself. Mrs. Baker taught her friends, and they taught theirs. The ladies were delighted that they had found an art by means of which they might further adorn themselves. Braiding was carried to the school-room; the meetings of church sewing-circles were transformed into braiding bees; ladies had their little straw bundles with them almost every where, and straw plaiting became, as it were, the crochet work of the day. The new invention suffered the common lot of all improvements, and was not without its enemies. By some it was thought to induce pride, and by others to be the precursor of famine, because it occasioned the cutting of the straw before the grain was ripe. Even as late as 1825 a Dr. Stanley wrote an "Essay on the Manufacture of Straw Bonnets," in which he laid all kinds of evil results at the door of straw braid, closing with some "moral, political, miscellaneous, and concluding remarks." Notwithstanding so great an opposition to it the majority of the ladies were in favor of the new art, and, of course, straw braiding daily increased in importance as a branch of manufacture. At first Mrs. Baker was a monopolist in the business, having orders sent her from forty miles away; afterward it became customary for the straw braiders to take the bonnets they had made to the village along with butter, eggs, etc., and exchange them for the various articles to be obtained at a country store. As the business increased straw bonnet merchants became an institution; later still "sewing halls" were established, and these last have gradually grown into the large establishments of to-day.

Among all the "straw towns" of Massachusetts is a not very large yet quite enterprising one, in which straw bonnets are made to a far greater extent than in any other. Foxborough is a beautiful town, situated on the highlands between Massachusetts and Narraganset bays, twenty-four miles from Boston, and less than twenty miles from the original seat of the straw bonnet manufacture. There were formerly several bonnet factories here, but they are now all united in the "Union Straw Works," which were established by the Messrs. O. and E. P. Carpenter in 1853, and which constitute the largest manufactory of the kind in either this country or Europe. Some idea of its magnitude may be formed when it is stated that the number employed in it (exclusive of braiders) is more than 3000 (800 within and 2500 outside the factory building), and that the value of its goods annually manufactured is two million dollars. Inasmuch as the immense business done here requires that every operation should be strictly systematized, we can not better get an idea of the processes through which the braid goes in order to become a bonnet than by tracing its progress through this establishment.

Consider the writer as your guide, if you please—for it would not be easy to traverse this three and four story acre of rooms without one—and he will endeavor to answer all questions. The numerous "No Admittances" placed upon the doors of the establishment are not in this case meaningless, but with a permit from the office we may safely begin our perambulations without fear of ejection.

We will commence our tour at the Stock

Room. The counters along its sides are covered with piles of braid, nineteen-twentieths of which is imported. Here is some from Italy, here a lot from Switzerland, and near it some from Germany; France and England have their straw delegates here; South America sends her representatives to this congress of straws; and even the Chinaman introduces his member from the Celestial Empire. We hear the workmen who are arranging the braid use a mixture of geographical and other names as they talk of "Pedale," "Fancy Hair," "Manilla Split," "Patent," "Luton," "Argovia," "Florence," "Canton," "Milan," etc., and conjecture rightly that they are speaking of the members of this international assemblage of straws. A portion of the Canton braid is imported from China in the shape of large, ungainly hats, the flat sides of the braid being sewed together, and each hat containing material enough for several bonnets.

We will then pass to the next, the Manufacturer's Room. Here we are confronted by a long row of latticed bins, in which the braid is arranged, ready for the use of the "manufacturer;" or, in other words, the one who carries out the stock. In order to understand what is meant by "carrying out" as here used, it must be noticed that the building in which we have supposed ourselves to be is used for hardly any thing else, save the finishing up of the work, which is made ready for the finishing process in many a family throughout the region within twenty miles of the factory. To these families the braid is carried out, and after a week or so brought back in the shape of bonnets. Each "manufacturer," or stock-deliverer, has in the room we are visiting his bin of braid; here he supplies himself with the little cloth tickets, or "numbers," to be used by the sewer, and with large skeins of a peculiar thread, which is made of Sea Island cotton expressly for the bonnet manufacture. Having loaded his covered wagon with all articles needed, and fastened a large bag for bonnets to the rack behind, he is ready for his departure for Attleborough, Dedham, Taunton, or some other one of the eighteen or twenty towns visited by the stock deliverers of the Union Straw Works, whither we will accompany him.

Arriving, after a few hours, at the scene of operations, the carriage is stopped at one of those story-and-a-half houses so common in Massachusetts, and we alight. Entering the cottage, we find a home scene peculiar to this part of the country. From the youngest to the oldest all are engaged in the straw business. To be sure, the little one is not of much help, as she puts the straws in disorder, watches every motion of her sister, and bothers her with questions; but said sister, the girl of ten years, is quite useful as she sits on her cricket and braids her daily stint. The mother plies the needle merrily as she, with flying fingers, forms the tip, laps braid upon braid as she sews spirally around it, and makes a splice when necessary; while the old grandmother, nearly seventy, a somewhat slower worker, manages to make a bonnet in no way inferior to that of her young competitors. In the laps of the sewers sit Plaster of Paris model blocks, the quite convenient substitutes for the paper patterns formerly used for regulating the shape of the growing bonnet. Upon these blocks the partially-completed bonnet is frequently fitted, in order to see if it comes to the proper marks, and if it is "made" in the right shape without requiring to be pulled into it.

The driving up of the "straw cart," with its coat of arms, a bundle of rye painted upon the panel, has been the signal for the sewer to bring out her bonnets from their receptacle, and when we enter she has them all ready for delivery to our companion. He inspects them to see if the numbers denoting the size, style of braid, and sewer, have been properly placed at the tip, having an eye also to the workmanship; gives credit on his book for the work done, and retires with his load to the cart for more stock. He does not effect his retreat, however, without being urged by the lady to give her the best and finest straw he has; for not only can she generally make more in sewing this, but, with a lady's taste, she finds it much pleasanter to work on a fine article, which shall look nice when done, than upon a coarse affair which she would be ashamed to wear herself. Of course our friend, the stock deliverer, is bound to comply with her request, or at least to seem to do so, and to have all of his sewers for special favorites. Bringing in a few pieces of braid of twenty or sixty yards each, with a sufficient quantity of thread to sew it and numbers to match, he charges the same upon her book and starts for the door.

We have already reached the carriage, but he is not with us. Ah! he has turned back to put his head into the room and give the usual injunction, "Be sure and have the stitches short on the outside!" Thus he leaves the sewer, who will be in a continual worry until he makes his next appearance for fear that amidst the ever-changing fashions she shall next week have to commence work on a new block, just as she has become accustomed to the one in accordance with which she now makes her bonnets.

As we ride along with the stock deliverer on his visits to his "lady friends," he gives us some particulars concerning the sewing of the braid. We learn that it takes about three hours to sew twenty-five yards of medium width braid, the quantity required for a bonnet, but that the sewer is paid according to the number of yards she sews without special reference to the number of bonnets made. By reference to a copy of the "Rules" which he has the kindness to show us, we find that the braid must not be sewed wet or damp (often transgressed), that the thread must be unwaxed and tightly drawn, that "back stitches" not exceeding half an inch in length are to be taken, and that clean hands while at work are insisted upon.

We have imagined ourselves to be in company with the stock-deliverer. We have obtained a glimpse of the manner in which the straw is sewed, and since our purpose has thus been accomplished, let us avoid the tedious, all-day ride, with its frequent halts, to which the stock-deliverer is doomed, and, reversing the course of our journey, consider ourselves back again at the Union Straw Works.

We are in the Receiving Room, the place where the bonnets are deposited after coming from the hands of our late companion. Here let us take heed to our steps lest we trample upon the bonnets and hats which lie about loosely upon the floor, seemingly in the greatest confusion. Bonnets of various colors, wholly regardless of general notions with regard to keeping the races distinct, seem to mingle in all but perfect disorder, while the white, black, and copper-colored join hands in brotherly love. Workmen are engaged in sorting and registering the bonnets and placing them in racks. Order having thus been brought out of confusion, a part of the bonnets are sent to the Dye House, while yet another portion is forwarded by families and detachments over the miniature railway which connects this part of the factory with the rear, and are disembarked at the Bleach House.

The passage way to the Smoke House has its unpainted wooden walls strangely discolored, and the further we proceed the more intensely comes the smell of brimstone to our nostrils, but on entering the precincts we find merely several long alley-ways, with their sides made up to a great extent of doors opening into large smoke closets. Bleaching having been temporarily suspended, some of these closets are open: let us look into them. On the floor are shallow pots of brimstone; above these, and on both sides of the apartment, are six tiers of rope-bottomed, berth-like fixtures, which serve to give to these closets the appearance of double state-rooms on a steamer. The bleachers are quite likely fellows in white aprons, and quite obliging as they show us around and describe the modus operandi of their department. And yet, after they have fully described the process which the bonnet here goes through, a certain air of mystery still surrounds it. That the bonnets are smoked for several hours once at least, and often twice, is quite evident, but when we come to inquire what is done to them in a room near by where we notice certain dipping operations going on, we are put off with some talk about whitening the bonnets, "acids," "alkalies," etc., which leaves us as much in the dark on the subject as ever. Questioning still further as to the operations here performed, and the materials used, we are frankly told by the mystic mixture-man that he and his brother workmen alone understand the process; that the Union Straw Works can not just yet afford to part with one of the secrets which renders their work famous, and that, furthermore, he has been placed under heavy bonds not to reveal it.

Having taken a hasty glance at the Drying Yard, where thousands of bonnets sun and air themselves on long rows of upright pegs, we will proceed, "by rail" if we like, to the Sizing Room. We will not delay long at this point, for it will take us but a moment to comprehend the operation performed here, to notice the stiffening of the bonnets with a thin solution of glue. While one workman, the "dipper," baptizes bonnet after bonnet in the galvanized iron "font" before him, his official assistants wipe lightly off the glue drops which have collected, and the bonnets are passed through a Receiving Room to the Blocking Room above.

Up to this time, save perhaps when first coming from the hands of the sewers, the bonnets have been characterized by a shapelessness far removed from their final beauty. The mysterious dipping, the day's rest in the berths of the brimstone closet, and the gluey baptism have combinedly left them in such a condition that no one but a "straw man" would ever suppose it possible to transform such affairs into any sort of an article of dress, much less into a head covering for a lady.

But in the Blocking Room, which we now visit, the bonnet commences a steady approach toward its final shape. Beside the counter which surrounds the room stand numerous workmen, each with several plaster model blocks before him. On these blocks the still damp bonnets are fitted, not a little pulling and judicious pounding being sometimes required to get them into shape, this being especially the case when the sewer, in disobedience to her rules, has allowed a carelessly formed bonnet to pass. Having been made to come up to the prescribed mark upon the block the bonnets are pinned there and set away upon numerous racks, placed over steam pipes, to dry. Afterward they are taken from the blocks and are ready for the next operation. This room being so uncomfortably warm, the thermometer standing at nearly 80° , we are quite willing to quit it and seek another.

The next in order is the Press Room. On entering this we find that we have, figuratively speaking, jumped out of the frying-pan into the fire, for if the Blocking Room was hot, this is hotter. Coats and vests are discarded as burdensome, and, it being a fair day, every window is thrown open. If we investigate the cause of this heat we shall find that it proceeds principally from the hot flats used by the many workmen here engaged in pressing bonnets. "But where are the bonnets?" the reader exclaims, as he examines the partial view of one of the Press Rooms given above. In answer to this very natural question it may be well to notice here that the establishment which we are visiting, manufactures, in its triple set of apartments, not only bonnets but both ladies' and gentlemen's hats. Save that a different shaped block is used in each case, these three forms of head-covering are made in very similar manners. To such an extent, indeed, is this true that we have not hesitated to present engravings of rooms in the hat departments, when we could thus more conveniently and better illustrate our subject than by prohibiting our artist's camera from entering any apartments save those devoted to bonnets. In the Press Room we are called upon to particularly observe the minute division of labor which is made a specialty by the proprietors of this establishment, and which is every where noticeable in it. We see the bonnet, during the simple operation of pressing, passing through three different hands, the tip, head, and front being pressed by different persons. So thoroughly, indeed, are these three processes separated that the "tip man" could no more perform the labor of those coming after him than the printer's imp could fill with dignity the editorial chair. In each operation the bonnet is placed upon a special wooden block, and pressed by means of a peculiar machine. The machines are similar, however, inasmuch as they all consist of a kind of turntable, upon which the block is placed, and which moves under a flat of several pounds weight. This flat is pressed down upon the bonnet by the application of the foot to a lever, connecting by a rod with the top of the machine. This is the usual manner; heavy hand flats, with handles at each end, are sometimes substituted, however, and the bonnets pressed upon blocks which allow of but little turning. With surprising rapidity the experienced presser places the bonnet upon the block of his machine, lays the damp cloth over it to prevent scorching, stands upon one foot, brings his flat to bear with the other, with one hand gives a few revolutions to the turn-table, with the other guides the flat as it smooths the bonnet, and then, with his portion of the work performed upon it, passes it on to undergo the next operation. Opening out of the Press Room, and separated from it by iron doors, is a yet hotter locality, the Heating Room, containing large furnaces in which numerous cubical pieces of iron are transformed into the red-hot cores used in the hollow pressing-flats.

We will follow the bonnet, now smooth and shining, to the Wiring Hall. This is the pleasantest room we have yet visited, not only from its situation, but also on account of its occupants. Heretofore, in our journey through the factory, we have met only with men, but in the Wiring Hall we are to find the other sex. Even before reaching it we know this to be the case; for through the halls leading to it we hear the music of female voices, and as we draw nearer recognize the patriotic strains of "Hail Columbia." Yes, the "girls" (as the female operatives are always called) are really singing! Let none of our precise crusty old manufacturers be horrified at the idea, and assert that the work can not be half done when the mind is diverted from it by such "carryings on." Let any one of them examine the workmanship and see if it is not quite as good in quality as that which comes from the drudges under his supervision—those rightly-called "poor factory girls," who are by him debarred from thinking of any thing from morning till night save the toilsome labor in which they are engaged. Having found, as he certainly will, that light-heartedness and good work are not mortal enemies, let him relax the oppressive rules which have previously crushed out the vivacious spirit of his operatives, and hereafter act upon the principle that the knight of St. Crispin who whistles will make the best shoe. But this is no place for moralizing. The "girls" are seated in couples at peculiar worktables, upon which are stands for bonnets, and in which are drawers for wire, thread, etc. In this room the thread-covered wire is sewn, as a stiffening, around the edge of the bonnet; the paper lining, to prevent the goods from sticking together when packed, is stitched into the crown; and a fancy ticket for price marks, with "Superfine" at the top and the wirer's number at the bottom, is placed upon one side. During these processes, which are rapidly gone through with, the bonnet gets much out of shape, and has to be sent to another room for the purpose of receiving the final touch. Here, in the Shaping Room, it is placed upon a block, by a pinch here and a pull there has its symmetry restored to it, and is finally complete.

We now proceed to the Packing Room. Here it might be supposed that considerable assorting would be required before the price could be fixed to the goods, and they be made ready for sale and for shipment; but such is far from the truth. During the various processes of manufacture, from the braid to the bonnet, one grade of goods has been kept entirely distinct from the other; and as the completed bonnets come by hundreds and thousands into the Packing Room, "Lot 999" is just as distinct from "Lot 1000" as if one had been made in Boston, the other in New York. Every thing, in fact, with regard to the manufacture of the goods has been so systematized, through subdivisions of labor and through systems of accounts, that not only can the final cost of any class of goods be readily determined, but the cost of each individual bonnet can at once be ascertained to the fraction of a cent in any department where it may be found. But little else is required then in the Packing Room than to show customers the goods, slip the bonnets into boxes from the large pile always in readiness, and send them off.

PORTION OF A WIRING HALL.

While in the Packing Room the sight-seeing reader could not but have been tempted to ask where so many boxes came from. Should he walk a short distance across the Common he would find, nearly buried in logs and boards, an old church, one in which the writer, many years ago, listened with childish impatience to long sermons, ate carraway, and slept. Having been more than doubled in size this old church is now a box manufactory, or, in the town parlance, the "steam-mill." The congregation daily attending here consists of about thirty persons. Through the agency of these about a million feet of lumber are annually converted into forty thousand cases, and from seventy-five to a hundred tons of straw board meet with a change into handboxes, all for the use of this single straw bonnet factory. Such is a part of the results that have grown out of little Betsey Metcalf's First American Straw Bonnet.

FIRST AMERICAN STRAW BONNET.

HEREAFTER.

O LAND beyond the setting sun!
O realm more fair than poet's dream!
How clear thy silvery streamlets run,
How bright thy golden glories gleam!

Earth holds no counterpart of thine.
The dark-browed Orient, jewel-crowned,
Pales as she bows before thy shrine,
Shrouded in mystery so profound.

The dazzling North, the stately West,
Whose rivers flow from mount to sea;
The South, flower-wreathed in languid rest,
What are they all compared with thee?

All lands, all realms beneath yon dome,
Where God's own hand hath hung the stars,
To thee with humblest homage come,
O world beyond the crystal bars!

Thou blest Hereafter! Mortal tongue
Hath striven in vain thy speech to learn,
And Fancy wanders, lost among
The flowery paths for which we yearn.

But well we know that fair and bright,
Far beyond human ken or dream,
Too glorious for our feeble sight,
Thy skies of cloudless azure beam.

We know thy happy valleys lie
In green repose, supremely blest;
We know against thy sapphire sky
Thy mountain peaks sublimely rest.

And sometimes even now we catch
Faint gleamings from thy far-off shore,
And still with eager eyes we watch
For one sweet sign or token more.

For oh, the deeply loved are there!
The brave, the fair, the good, the wise,
Who pined for thy serenest air,
Nor shunned thy solemn mysteries.

There are the hopes that, one by one,
Died even as we gave them birth;
The dreams that passed ere well begun,
Too dear, too beautiful for earth.

The aspirations, strong of wing,
Aiming at heights we could not reach;
The songs we tried in vain to sing;
The thoughts too vast for human speech;

Thou hast them all, Hereafter! Thou Shalt keep them safely till that hour
When, with God's seal on heart and brow,
We claim them in immortal power!

MRS. GISBORNE'S WAY.

THE wintry sunbeams fell one morning in a slant sheet through the blue smoke that filled the kitchen, a whole flight of them dipping directly into the frying-pan, where, in sizzling enjoyment, swam the roundest and richest of delectable dough-nuts.

Mrs. Gisborne stepped and dropped the painted curtain. "I sha'n't have the sun putting out my fire!" she said. And this, in fact, was the motto according to which she had governed herself through life, and every body else as well. Any higher luminary had always sung second to her own interior lights of hard sense and practical policy. A trait, however, that, so far as this world is concerned, did not impair her usefulness. It had been the severest trial of Mrs. Gisborne's experience that her daughter Kate inherited just enough of her own stamina to be quite as willful, after her peculiar fashion; and that, instead of being the careful housewife that some of her neighbors boasted in their daughters, she spun more street-yarn than her ancestors had ever footed in the course of their united lives, attended ismistic lectures on the nights of evening meeting, forsook that safe old-fashioned receptacle of wisdom the almanac for nauseous novels, and on no condition whatever would consent to frying dough-nuts. On this last point Kate was fortified, all modern ideas as well as many ancient prejudices coming to her support against the porcine root of the matter; and, armed with axioms, she reasoned that the devils once driven into the herd of swine had found such abode so congenial that they had ever since made it their resting-place. In point of truth, though, neither of the two elder ladies of the family of three were particularly fond of the edible in question: it was the veneration for good old generations that still laid them a sacrifice on the altar of discord; perhaps also a leniency toward the new, for it was to be remarked that, abstemious as were the two first-mentioned persons, these dough-nuts always disappeared in a rather precipitate manner. Aunt Nancy used to say it was done by mesmerism, that being a ghost she had never laid; but Kate said it was the old miracle over again, at which her mother, shocked by her profanity, ventured a little of her own, and declared that though not of the sort Kate affirmed, nevertheless there doubtless was devilry in it. Just now, being the sore subject, these dough-nuts, simmering so unconsciously in their round-faced, puffy good-nature, brought up all the ills of life to Mrs. Gisborne's ken again, and while her fire should brighten she sank upon a seat near the window opened for the smoke's escape, and, vigorously as she complained to herself, wiped her warm, rosy face with a corner of her apron. Here was she balked of her way. Mrs. Gisborne meant to have her way if it took her life. There was Kate at this moment probably in the Castle of the Pyrenees, a hundred feet underground with the Lady Victoria, she thought, while her Aunt Nancy was putting the patches on the table-cloth, and while her mother was grilling over the stove; and, warming on this anthropophagical hint, her heart burned over Mrs. Mudge's girls, and she had half a score, each one of them rubbing, scrubbing, scouring, choring, in a perpetual gala of business, and any one of them a capital look-out for whatever man should fancy her. And thereat the crowning grievance exalted itself. There was Kate, instead of contenting herself in her station, and taking up with a wholesome mechanic, as her mother had done before her, a man who loved her like his life—there she was with all her silly head turned by the attentions of Simon Symonds, and with the idea of being a lawyer's lady. Kate indeed might become a fine personage in time if she attained her ends; but so far above her beginnings that her mother would have to scrape her feet too carefully at her door ever to take any comfort in her house. No, that was not to be. Mrs. Gisborne shook her head afresh, and meant more than ever to have her own way in a matter so important to her own happiness as that. That her way, to all appearance, was not Kate's way, made small matter; for her way was Reed Dunroy—somebody she could crack her jests with when she chose, and, as she assured Aunt Nancy, not a bit of a gentleman! Meanwhile, whatever steps Mrs. Gisborne meant to take in order to have her way, or Kate hers, or Reed Dunroy his, Providence, which appears to forget our spiders'-webs in the great orbit-work of the universe, made them all unnecessary, and laid the corner-stone of their structure with the key of another's arch.

Yet with all Mrs. Gisborne's grumble, Kate was hardly the wretch that the mother's momentary exasperation made her appear. She was opposed on principle to dough-nuts—but put before her in the flesh, how could ravenous young blood resist the savory morsels? If Aunt Nancy patched the table-cloth, Kate had ironed it; and if her mother mended the fire, Kate had brought in the coal. It was Kate herself who made the tins so that the sun could see his own face therein, made the floors white as the even drift, and every Monday before sunrise had her strong arms in the washing-tub—

"Round glittering arms, plunged elbow-deep in suds, Like wild swans hid in lilies all a-shake."

The trouble was—and there was Kate's error—she made no stir about it all: she ought to have brushed about like a turbine-wheel or a Mudge girl. Then, too, the lectures were attended not so much from a strong-minded motive as for a place of rendezvous and a good time; and if drops of wisdom would creep in the girl was not to be blamed. And as for the two lovers, Nature had made her a coquette, her mother had made her ambitious, and if the one's ambition ran in a different channel from the other's, that was owing to the age. Which of the two suits she preferred perhaps she had not asked herself seriously; or, if she knew, had silenced the inner voice that told her. If she had sat down to consider it, it is possible that the open, manly face and sparkling eyes of Reed Dunroy would have made her heart tremble just enough for her to shut her hand over it; yet, on the other side, there would have been Mr. Symonds's position and learning. She could see Mr. Symonds's wife, in her mind's eye, going into the Lyceum, and Colonel This and Doctor That rising to give her a chair, to bring her a seat, to murmur a greeting; but Reed Dunroy's wife would slip into one of the lower rows, and nobody would turn his head; to be sure she would snuggle up close to Reed, and he would put his arm over the back of the settee, and they would laugh or listen as they chose. In which of the two plays she preferred to play her part she would not have liked to decide; both had their enticements. Mr. Symonds, to be sure, was not a very fine figure of a man; but then who wanted beauty in a lord of creation? Were not Reed Dunroy's good looks nearly as factitious a circumstance as Simon Symonds's learning was? Had they any more to do with the soul beneath them than the other had? Something would have answered yes, if Kate had not half wished to be deaf upon that side. If her mother had not pressed Reed's suit with too much avidity, after all was said, perhaps it would have needed no pressing. If Mr. Symonds had not pressed his own with too much avidity, it might not have occurred to Kate to throw out her line in play to find herself likely to be caught at last by her own bait. As it was, she hesitated, and the woman who hesitates being lost, according to the adage, it is safe to presume then that Kate was—lost, that is, to one of the lovers: but to which one of them it was not easy to say, especially while she herself was so unconscious of her fate. If she summed up decidedly her conclusions concerning it at all, she thought she was going finally to Reed Dunroy, and had hankerings after wealth and station with Mr. Symonds. A careful observer, who prided himself upon knowing all about such matters, might think differently, and be sure she was going to Mr. Symonds, to have hankerings after homely comfort with Reed Dunroy.

Meanwhile Mrs. Gisborne sat on her yellow chair and wiped her face with the corner of her apron. And while she thus consoled with herself a hand entered the open window, rolled up the painted curtain, tied its two tassels together, and then reposed with its mate on the frosty sill outside, while out of the keen, crisp weather its owner smiled in upon the heated kitchen and the florid matron.

"Why, Reed, you rascal, how you frightened me!" cried she.

"Rather had the start of you, eh?" said a round, cheery voice. "Jumped up as if you were on a spring."

"Now you quit your jokes!"

"Swap 'em for nuts?"

"You'll never be a man of dignity, Reed."

"Little out there. Just been sworn in special policeman."

"What's that for?"

"Dollar and a half a night."

"Pshaw! I mean what occasion is there just now?"

"None in particular. Since the army got demoralized it's kind of spread."

"What has?"

"And as I always was in mischief, you know—"

"You don't like to get your hand out!"

The last speaker was a new arrival, standing on the lowest step of the flight of stairs that opened down into the kitchen, leaning with both hands upon a broom, and wearing on her hair a gay bandana kerchief with the knot tied in two wings, like the petasus of Mercury, over her forehead, the better to protect the bright locks beneath from dust. Beneath this unique array a pair of golden-hazel eyes, large and luminous, lit up two pink cheeks, flushed at this moment (either from the cold of upper regions or because so many people are looking at her) from apple-blossom tint to damask rose, broken into dimples by the mischievous red lips, whose curves in turn were broken into smiles over the prettiest pearls of tiny teeth that ever guarded a saucy tongue. It was no wonder that at sight of the vivid picture in the dark frame-work of the stairway, for a second Reed Dunroy's eyes fell with just the least visible tremor. Then he looked up again bold as lover need be, and twice too much at ease. It was ridiculous that such an atom as this should make a stout man shake.

"Oh, how cold it is!" shivered she. "Just think of my sweeping the chambers such a day as this! Did you ever hear an icicle chatter? I'm blue all through!"

"Which is a new name for rose-color," remarked Reed.

"Oh, is that you? Why don't you come in, Reed, and shut the window? This breeze is straight from the North Pole by way of Spitzbergen."

"Was just asking after you, Kate."

"Oh! I thought you came for the nuts."

"So I did. Nuts to me."

"What's that?" asked Mrs. Gisborne, as Kate did not choose to do so.

"There's going to be a sleighing party over the river to-night, and a supper and dance at the Brooks'."

"Yes, I know," replied Kate. "I hope there'll be a thaw first before night."

"So do I, by George!" interluded Reed, with meaning.

"For I promised Mr. Symonds to go with him," said the damsel, in conclusion.

"Well," said Reed, coolly, "I thought I'd see whether you were going or not, because if nobody'd asked you I'd take you myself!"

"I'm obliged to you. Mother, I should think you'd offer Reed your nuts. Any body that's so very polite!"

"Mercy on us! they're not fit to eat—they'd burn his mouth."

"No danger of any thing's burning my mouth in this house!" said Reed.

"I should think that speech would make your ears burn!" cried Kate.

"Well, well! Instead of burning my mouth it's watering it at present."

"My nuts!" exclaimed Mrs. Gisborne. "I do believe they've soaked fat! Yes, they—now that's too bad—no, they haven't," breaking one open. "There, Reed, if you can eat them, you know you're welcome, I'm sure!" setting a dish before him on the sill.

"No, thank you; I was only fooling. Just been lunching. So you're going with Symonds, Kate? It seems he won't be nonsuited. Well! But you're coming home with me."

"How absurd you are! How can I come home with you if I go out with him?"

"To be sure! Change partners and all hands round. Fate finds a way. Well, if we were all lawyers there'd be no special police. Where you off to now, Dinah?"

"About my business;" and the bright face and the brilliant head-dress were whisked away.

Mrs. Gisborne was laying out a fresh supply of the raw material, but paused a moment to lean on her rolling-pin and exclaim,

"She don't deserve you, Reed, and that's a fact! You're a simpleton to dangle round her so. Why don't you make up to Abby Mudge—a girl that'll make a decent wife, and thank you for asking?"

"Don't want a wife that's so mighty willing. Besides, if you like the truth, old lady Mudge is not the widow Gisborne."

"Dear me! Likely story, that! As if 'twould make any difference to you whether I was black or white so long as Kate was my daughter!" said the pleased good-wife.

"Well, you are amazing bright, Mother Gisborne. Blood's thicker'n water, and that's a fact. Harkee! don't you fret till I do. And as for this snarl, I've got the right end of the thread in my hand. And as for her, if I only make up my mind to go, I'll drive her home to-night if I have to knock every tooth in his head down old Symonds's throat."

"That's you, Reed! I declare you do hearten one. Have Mr. Symonds for my son-in-law, and not dare to say my soul's my own the rest of my days? Not I! Your way's my way. And I'll have my way before another year ends, so sure's I'm alive!"

Reed laughed and nodded, and wondered what the little woman was up to. "There, now," said he, "your kitchen's clear of the smoke, and you'll be taking a chill with this sash lifted, if it is to leeward. The wind's coming up right smart for a cold snap equal to any Grinnell Expedition!" And contriving to close the window from the outside, and stamping his boots sturdily to rouse the feet that had cooled to a somewhat low temperature in the snow, the young man took himself off with a cheery, laughing good-by, entirely unconscious that Miss Kate was peeping at him from behind the shade up stairs, quivering the while like a poplar leaf.

"He does walk as if the earth did his feet good," acknowledged she to herself, between her chattering teeth—"real round, ringing tread, as if God made the earth for him to use. I don't know!"

What it was that Kate didn't know she didn't utter. But putting a shawl round her, she sat down to look over Mr. Symonds's note, and the present that it had accompanied of a gorgeous album, conspicuous on whose fly-leaf stood the worthy himself, and which she had not yet dared to show her mother, and encounter her ridicule of its first adornment. "Just flapping his arms to crow, Kate, isn't he?" she could hear her saying. The occupation, however, was of short duration, for the stinging cold obliged her to restore the marvel to its wrappings, and hurry down to one of the firesides with her knitting; and, like a chicken nestling under the wing, she preferred her mother's stove to Aunt Nancy's, though she knew a good quarrel would ensue.

"Well, Kate," said her mother, "I hope you're content after having insulted Mr. Dunroy the way you have."

"Me, mother?"

"Yes, you!"

"Does he complain?"

"Complain! I rather think he's found out that he has something better to do. I don't believe you'll be troubled with him again in a hurry."

"There's as good fish in the sea as ever were caught," said Kate, growing a trifle pale in spite of herself.

"So you can take up with your little, dried codfish of a lawyer! I've never seen any one find such delight in hurting people's feelings before."

"Then I've increased your stock of useful information, Mrs. Mother."

"You wicked girl! I do believe the Evil One's in you as much as ever he was in Mary Magdalene! There, take the fork and turn those."

"Much obliged. It takes one's mother to call one names."

"What do you mean, Miss?"

"And one can't retort, because if they do the ravens of the valley shall pick out their eyes, and the young eagles shall eat them."

"Quoting Scripture in that spirit!"

"Now, mother, why can't you let me be? You're making me tired to death of the sound of Reed Dunroy's name."

"And I'm tired to death already of the sound of Simon Symonds's!"

"You seldom hear it but from your own lips."

"Be quiet, you barefaced girl!"

"Just as you say." And Kate proceeded to turn the nuts, with a red cheek and an eye that said, plainly as words, "I vow, if it wasn't such a really disagreeable thing to do, I'd go and marry Mr. Symonds to-day, just to spite every body!"

In reality the girl already had an odd little liking for the lawyer, as people can not avoid having for one who is particularly civil to them, keeps his flattery just on the edge of courtesy, as if even further adulation would be sincere, and who seems to have stooped from a height in order to meet them at their level—and Kate was yet too young to perceive the intrinsic demerit of the man's character—for every woman at twenty-five must remember what a fool she was at eighteen. As it was, Mr. Symonds and his advantages dazzled her: he had money laid by, he had served as County Commissioner, and he was already spoken of as Judge of the Police Court. It is true he was forty years old, and Kate not the half of it; but then he did not look it. It is true he was a born ferret; but then Kate took that for his talent and acuteness. To her he was a member of aristocracy, and a thing that went far to neutralize all her mother's backbiting was the evident consciousness which the good woman had that she was all the time making a sacrifice of worldly superiority to more imponderable merit.

The enforced silence had reigned over the kitchen several minutes, when a timid tap was heard upon the outer door.

"Come in!" cried Mrs. Gisborne, testily, and something pulled at the latch and gave it up, and the place of the rattle was taken by a kind of weak sob.

Kate sprang to the door, and out of the blistering cold drew in a small girl, thinly clad, and shuffling along in a man's boots. She was purple, and nearly perishing with the weather. As soon as the child felt the penetrating warmth within, and saw the kind, young face bending over her, she sank in a little bundle upon the floor, and, something within her unsealing, her head fell on her knees, and she cried as if her heart would break. To her small vision matters were at their very worst; the cold had chilled the very vitality of her soul; her heart swelled and bounded and died in sobs—she was full of despair.

"Oh, mother!" cried Kate, forgetting feuds, "I do believe she's frozen. Just see how white her fingers are!"

"Get a basinful of snow and rub them. Frozen! Nonsense; she's starved."

"Starved, mother?"

"Yes. Frozen and starved too. What's your name, little one? Can't you speak? Here, Nancy, bring me a glass of cider, quick, please!"

Miss Nancy bustled in like a breeze directly, cider in hand, and would have poured it all down the little throat; but the prudent sister-in-law allowed only one pungent draught, while Kate rubbed the white fingers red in the snow, drew off the cavernous boots, found the feet frost-bitten, and proceeded to serve them likewise.

"Ah! ah! how they do burrrn!" cried the child, proclaiming her nationality, and catching up the injured member, while Kate began to work upon the other.

"Where do you live?" now inquired Aunt Nancy, as if the cider gave her a prerogative to know.

"Oh, m'am, I lives in the little house on the wharf, behint the great grain storr."

"I don't remember such a house," said Mrs. Gisborne, administering a second draught.

"Sure 'twas his shed, and he hauled it down to the wharf, and me mother rented it—barring she's paid no rent this three months. And she's warned out to-day," said the child, blowing on her burning fingers, "and it's meself's not knowing where in the wide world we'll be going!" And with the thought, the atom seemed to assume the responsibility of the whole of her house.

"What did you tell me your name was?" asked Kate.

"Nora Considine, Miss—if it do be me at all!" fresh tears flowing.

"Then your mother is Mrs. Considine."

"That same."

"I thought she'd gone off to the Mills."

"But the Mills is shet, and she came back. And we do a bit of washing and arrants and such, since."

"But where's your father?" asked Aunt Nancy, in spite of Kate's warning twitch.

"He's in his grave, m'am," said the child.

"Oh, to be sure! Oh, I never thought! Oh, I really—"

"Here, Nora, you just sit up on that chair," interrupted Mrs. Gisborne, "and see how you like that broth." For she had hastened to warm up a saucepanful of yesterday's soup. The child voraciously obeyed, much hindered by Kate's manipulations in pulling over her feet some thick woolen stockings whose superfluous length was turned down in a pair of her own shoes discarded years ago by reason of growth. The little girl staid her hand, spoon in air; this done, put out her feet and surveyed them. "Oh, Miss," said she, looking up with her flushed face and tear-washed eyes, a laugh breaking all over them, "you do be real good to me!" At which Kate set out to cry herself, and Mrs. Gisborne stirred round in much commotion to get her spider off the stove, the contents of which were scorched to a crisp.

"Well, dear," said Aunt Nancy, when she had kindly watched the last spoonful into the guest's mouth, "what did you come for?"

The child got down on the floor, so that one could see what a mite she was, and made a queer little bob of a courtesy. "Thanking you, m'am, I have what I came for, and more," said she.

"And don't you want to take something home?"

"I wouldn't be asking for more at one house!"

"But here's the rest of the soup—if you'll bring back the kettle," added cautious Mrs. Gisborne.

"Thank you, m'am. An' I will that."

"'Twill warm your little brother—you have a brother?"

"Five of them, m'am!" And she burst out crying again.

"Hush, hush! The more the merrier," cried Mrs. Gisborne. "Are you so badly off?"

"Och, m'am! Oh, howly saints! There's not that much in the house till ate!" and she expressed the larder's emptiness by her tiny, bare palm. "We've had the praties till the day; an' I fried them intil some wather for the b'ys, for a change like; but, pah! they were that nasty we could hardly bide them. An' 'twas the last!"

"Never mind! Something 'll turn up. Providence takes care of—" Mrs. Gisborne came near availing herself of a proverb, and announcing the guardianship of Heaven over the lame and the lazy, and them that won't work; but glancing at the child's face for a moment made a less general application, and hurried into the pantry, where various viands reposed awaiting the day of picked-up dinners. "There!" said she, depositing the broken meats in the child's basket. "I meant this cold joint for our own dinner to-day; but—"

"Sure, m'am, I'd not be afther robbing ye that gate."

"Oh, we'll get something else. There's bread. And here's some tea for your mother."

"An' 'twill put her on her legs again!"

"There's a little sugar. Not much. It's a quarter of a dollar a pound now. I'd give you the dough-nuts if it wasn't for my—"

Kate instantly swept the contents of the colander into Nora's basket.

"Thank ye kindly, m'am. God bless ye, Miss. Me mother 'll be afther wondering about me. I'll bid ye good-day," said the staid little creature. And picking up the old boots she had worn in, gathered her treasures, saying, "I'll be sure to bring the kettle back to-morrow, m'am," and trudged away.

She could by no means understand what a gulf of chance lay between her and to-morrow.

The house behind the store on the wharf was a quarter of a mile off; the cold was stinging, the wind blew a searching blast. But, warmed and of good heart, Nora took her way. She was thinking so happily of the glee with which little Michael would peep into the kettle, when she just lifted the lid a bit, and then look up at her with twinkling eyes; she had no doubt he would whip his naughty fingers in before she could reach the spoon. And then the tea—if only Johnny had brought back some chips, her mother should have it straightway—and 'twould hearten her who had been so long without her little drop! Then she saw the other boys, each with a dough-nut—unheard of luxury—ringing his finger; and, thinking of it, she softly put her hand under the cloth in her basket and drew out one of the articles in question for herself. But just as the first big bite told her how superlatively nice the rest was going to be, a double sleigh came dashing down the street, filled with the driver and a merry mass of children hastening home from school to comfortable homes, and beside it raced and gamboled an enormous Newfoundland dog full of frolic and fun. Now a dog of any description was Nora's horror, but such a mountain of a dog was as bad as a whole menagerie let loose, and though upon the sidewalk, she hastily drew up and made herself as much a part of the fence as possible till he should have gone by. Unlucky movement; Shag saw only sport in it, bounded upon her as he passed, tumbling her in the snow, snapping up her bit of dough-nut, nosing a moment in her basket, galloping off at full speed after his gay companions.

Somebody picked Nora up—a young man with an open face and hearty voice, but who looked as if nevertheless some brightness was on the point of deserting him—set her on her feet; asked if she were hurt, for she shrieked with fright; helped her gather up her fragments. Here was the tin kettle, there was the cover—what was that dark spot sinking into the snow? Oh, the soup! the soup! She would not believe it till she had searched the vessel, and shaken it upside down. She began to scrape together the scattered tea-leaves—her sugar was safe—the young man scrambled with her for the dough-nuts as if he knew where they came from—but where was the cold joint of meat? A mile off, held high in air between the stout jaws of the Newfoundland! Nora put her hand over her eyes, and hurried off blindly without a word of thanks. Still it might have been worse, and overcoming her burst of ingratitude she reached home.

Certainly her mother got off the bed and whipped her for spilling the soup, after which she thought wisest not to mention the joint; and when Johnny returned with some chips and shavings, the smart being over, she made the tea for her mother, and they all cowered together for a breath of warmth over the feeble blaze, and ate the dough-nuts with teeth that chattered in their sockets. Among seven it was not a very bountiful repast, though the sole one of the day and almost of the day before, and Nora had none, because she had already partly dined.

They were in this condition, except that hunger had begun again, when the landlord entered at about the middle of the afternoon, having already twice warned them out.

"You are not going, I see?" said he.

Mrs. Considine, loud-voiced and angry, assured him she had no intention of the kind on such a day as this.

"Very well," said he. "If you will not go the house must."

Mrs. Considine laughed a scornful laugh, and wrapped her cloak about her, and covered little Michael's feet with the warm ashes—one man could not very well take off the house on his back like a snail. The allusion was apt, for the landlord was a cold-blooded creature of slow movement, and Mrs. Considine, for all her misery, chuckled over it a moment, pleased with her wit. The chuckling was brief, and died in perplexed anger. The man had proceeded to the window opening on the river, loosened the sides, and removed the sash, upper and lower. The wind poured in a gushing torrent of icy air. So deftly and so quickly did he do it, that, if he had not claimed to be a gentleman, you would have thought him to the manner born. Then it flashed over the mother what the enemy was about. For an instant's while Mrs. Considine dreamed of measuring weapons with him, but a couple of glances told her she was no match for that wiry strength, and she lighted her dudeen with the sole remaining match, and smoked away in contemptuous silence, while the blue children huddled in a trembling group. One window finished, the visitor proceeded to the other, and then leisurely removed the stair-door from its hinges, there being but two divisions of the building, one above and one below. This door being unhung, he placed it aside till he should return, and prepared to descend with the four window-sashes. It was rather a hazardous thing to do in the presence of a wild Irishwoman maddened by spirit or the want of it; by cold, famine, fear, and outrage. He paused a moment on the brink to adjust his burden more conveniently; the next instant Mrs. Considine had rushed forward, her foot was high in the air, and he was lying at the bottom of the stairs in the midst of a tumult of shattered sashes and panes broken to a thousand flinders.

The mighty fallen rose at last, and wiped away the ooze from his stained temples, his purpose only deepened by the loud laugh of derision that resounded from above. He freed the single sash below, unhinged the door, carried both off, and hid them beneath a pile of boards. The other door he dared not return for; Mrs. Considine waited in vain with her squared fists for him to do so; then she sent Johnny and Nora upon a reconnoissance. The foe had vanished; with him all trace of window and door; neither Johnny, nor Nora, nor Matt could unearth the hidden quarry.

That certified, they set the remaining door up against one window-place, and put the old chest of drawers to secure it. Then the mother trundled out one sleeping-place, and shook up its straw; she had bought the potatoes of the day before with feathers from the other one. "Come to bed, children," said she, at last. So three at the head, and two at the foot, and two in the one beneath, still wrapped in the clothes they had worn all day, this miserable household went to bed, finding no mercy in the heart of man, but regally lighted off through the great bare door and window by heaven's red torches in the early sunset light of Christmas-eve.

Meanwhile Kate Gisborne looked through the casement of the cozy sitting-room, and wondered if it would not moderate by nightfall; she had heard say the wind went down with the sun; but here it was still careering straight from frigid ice-belts, or had the vane frozen on its rod? How was she ever going to drive to the Brooks' through such an atmosphere, and with that wire of a man beside her? The thought that came up, in contrast, of Reed Dunroy's strong, warm, protecting arm, though she refused to think it, vaguely made things seem all the colder and more impossible.

The red sunset was gone; a heavy blue bank of cloud, brooding full of mystical auroras to flash over the midnight drive home, covered the northern heavens; the spire of the neighboring church, like a sculptured flame, rose white as if transfigured against that supernatural violet sky, with its golden chanceler crowing down the wind. The air held an icy principle, as if its very elements were congealed, and it seemed as hard to draw fluid breath from it as from some transparent jewel. The steam of the horses that went by seemed to hang in a little frozen cloud about their distended nostrils; the drivers slung their arms together steadily. Within, the anthracite in the grates covered itself with a white ash, as if verily blistered by the cold itself. There was a raw edge to existence on that keen twilight; nobody expected to sleep either sound or warm that night, with the wind wedging through every seam, and sifting through the very furze of the soft-piled blankets; no thaw, and no sign of one.

So Kate sat discontentedly down to the hurried evening meal; and, such is the capricious feminine spirit, but that she knew Reed Dunroy was doing it for her, could have found it in her heart—it being so cold a night—to kindly wish Mr. Symonds in a warmer region. But she was a wicked little girl, as her mother said.

While cloaks, and shawls, and furs were being rummaged together in the Widow Gisborne's domicile; soap-stones heating, and overshoes toasting, and tart tongues declaiming against the folly of sleighing upon such a night at all—for, when all was said and done, Miss Kate was the pivot about which the house turned; while all this went forward, Mr. Symonds sat in his comfortable bachelor-apartment till the sleigh should be brought round, and slowly sipped a glass of something that had a ruby color and a tingling tang. It was not his fault that the room was comfortable; another had made it so. If it had cost less when uncomfortable, he would doubtless have had it that way, although in a cheap line he was given to small self-indulgences. As it was, the shutters tightly closed, the shades dropped, the long crimson curtains falling over crack and crevice till they lay upon the carpet, the thick rug that curled about his feet, the soft air of the furnace-heated house; and, lest that should be too little with the mercury like to freeze in the bulb outside, as one might say, the crackle of the sea-coal fire upon the hearth, and its sparkle in every thing whose depth or surface could reflect an angle of light, altogether made as rich and snug a picture as heart could wish. It was a little spoiled, it must be acknowledge, by this spine of a creature that sat there enjoying it, yet never seeming to warm into humanity with all the cordial combination of color, heat, and light. One might wonder how he would like to leave it, and explore the Arctic terrors of the night without in company with Miss Kate Gisborne; but pretty Kate Gisborne was color and heat and light herself, and with her Mr. Symonds was just as much in love as it was possible for an atomy without a drop of red blood in his frame to be in love with any body. There came a voice outside; the horse shook off a spray of frosty bell-notes; Mr. Symonds rose, brushed the lank hair over the plastered wounds upon his temples, bound the heavy scarf over his face, indued his over-coat, and threw round him the great cloak lined with otter; and in a few minutes, with Kate hooded and furred beside him, beneath Afghan, leopard-robe, and fox-skin—all the first mile of the four her laugh ringing defiance to the weather—they went swiftly sliding up the long winding street; past the grain store on the wharf and the little house behind it, with desolation looking from empty threshold and lintel; over the bridge and along the meadow-road, till the jangle of the silver bells was lost to any listener in the crack and split of the broad sheets of river ice and all the weird noises of the vast winter night.

It mattered little to Kate that the girls assembled in the dressing-room at the Brooks' that night laughed and told her that she came with a fox under a fox-skin—she remembered that Reed had declared he would go home with her; and keeping her own counsel, she only hoped in her naughty soul that he would keep his promise—without confessing to herself that thus she hoped. So she calmly laid aside the multitudinous wraps, perhaps half wondering if they'd dare to make so free with the lawyer's lady by-and-by as now they did with Kate Gisborne. For all that, the lawyer's lady would never look any prettier, the glass told her, than the little maiden did this night in her gown of soft maroon-dyed wool with the white swan's-down at throat and wrists, the gold net on her gold hair, the rose on her cheek, the light in her eye. She just drew herself up one grain more proudly at conjecture of what Reed Dunroy would think when he saw her; and then wondering who had come with Reed, she took at the door Mr. Symonds's arm into the long dancing-hall of the inn. Mr. Symonds was a gallant man; he eyed the fair thing by his side from the gleam of her bright hair to the pointed tip of her airy foot. Then bending toward her ear he repeated, in a low tone:

"She wears the colors I admire,
She moves the way that I prefer;
She smiles, and day has lost its fire;
She sighs, and balmy breezes stir.
For me she makes the sunbeams tire,
And night is sweet because of her—
Oh sweet the storm and sweet the shine!
But am I hers, or is she mine?"

And while he rhapsodized over the verse that some curious chance had left in his memory, Kate silently looked about her. Reed Dunroy was not there. Moreover, Reed Dunroy did not come. The violins began to scrape themselves into tune against the base of the violoncellos, the horns began to blow their golden breath upon the air, the flutes warbled and twittered, the little drum rumbled and rolled, and then the band broke out into merriest music, and the floor bent and sprung and danced itself with the swing of the dancing clusters. No foot in all the whirl was so light as Kate's, yet, somehow or other, she had no explanation of it unless the chill had somehow penetrated her—no heart so heavy. Where could Reed Dunroy be? All the girls that she knew were here, each with their attendant; Mr. Symonds found himself that night where pursuit of Kate had led him, not among the most aristocratic of the city certainly, but with as honest, happy people as a place could show. But Kate was not of them in that respect to-night. Of course she was not honest in walking one way and looking another. Of course she was not happy in seeking a shadow at the door that refused to fall. As she danced her glittering eyes ranged the room, through all the music she listened for a footfall, then caught herself back indignantly and danced with wilder gayety. Had Reed driven into the river? Pshaw! there was no crack wide enough to take him. Had he met with any accident? had he thought better of his threatened purpose? was he just dallying so that she might miss him more? She would let him see how much that had troubled her! And like the Vicar's daughter, her foot grew "as pat to the music as its echo." Then came the grand march down to supper—and still no Reed Dunroy. Mr. Symonds, as he led her down, could have told her in a breath all she wished to know: first, that Reed could not come alone, it being against the rules, and would not bring another; second, that he had found something better to do; and, third, that because it was faster and surer than others, he had lent Mr. Symonds his horse, and did not care on such a night to travel the distance afoot. Before the night was over, and while in a shiver of disgust, she heard her health drunk with Mr. Symonds's name: Kate found herself silently fearing that the waywardness which had accepted this man's escort to-night was something she would have leisure to regret during the whole of her remaining years. Nevertheless, Mr. Symonds was a man of note. With what respect they all turned toward him, how they received him into their sport, flattered by the condescension, though democracy and republicanism made them hold themselves erect as he, and only the least trifle in the world restrained by knowledge of his learning and ability. Every situation has its drawbacks—the only drawback to one with Mr. Symonds was Mr. Symonds himself. Kate plucked up her heart and grew gay again as any, and in buoyant mood they all muffled themselves at length and set out upon their homeward way, the soap-stones warmed, the robes tucked in, and behind them the band blowing out its melodies upon the crystal night till cold chilled the fingers and stiffened the lips and silenced the tune, and left no music but the wrangling, leaping bells. Over them the Northern Lights shot their swift spears, lancing lustre across the shaking stars from east to west, a shining, shifting shimmer of spectral fire dipping toward them every now and then till they shrank as if a ghastly air from the other land had stooped to brush the foreheads already cold as brows of polished marble. So curtain 1 in splendor they swiftly dashed through the night like the very wind itself.

In the doorless, windowless house on the wharf behind the great grain-store, in the city to which this gay troop hastened, that self-same wind all this time was pouring a tide of ambient iciness.

Blast after blast the trembling children, clutching together there beneath the scanty clothes, heard each one rise. Far, far off, like a wave one sees against the sky, they could fancy the white edge of that gust dividing the dark night. On it roared, gathering its hordes by the way, rearing till the heavens retired, plowing up the cold salt sea beyond, sweeping over the mile-wide ice-field of the frozen river, falling on the tiny shanty like live thunder, and tearing across them, as they clung to each other, in one terrible tempest of deadly piercing cold.

And with every blast they cowered and groveled closer; and the long shivers coursed over their frames and stiffened into shudders and seemed to coat them like a casing of sleet. Huddled together they felt, to one another's touch, already like the cold, white limbs of corpses. The very marrow of their bones was ice. They breathed a gelid air, and every breath brought pain.

Then all that hollow roar out of the black and immense regions of the atmosphere, sounding close about them, the supernatural sense of mighty powers, of awful agencies, unwhispered terrors, all that slow shaking awaiting of the shock, all that bareness to the gale and to the darkness, all that frigid horror overwhelmed them and palsied them; all that wide, intense passion of dread that only cold can inspire fell upon them and benumbed their souls; and as the icy chill searched deeper and deeper, and mingled with the innermost life itself and withered it, they grew torpid and foolish and bewildered, and with their expanded brains ceased at last to feel any longer the stings of either cold or fear.

Nora lay in the trundle-bed with little Michael in her arms. When the evening Christmas bells at the church had begun to peal out a merry rout and rabble of ringing through the crisp crystalline air, each note cut short with a metallic echo on the frost-filled sky, little Michael had begun to cry. The Christmas bells brimmed him with sorrow and sadness. He put his head in Nora's neck, and when she hushed him, still softly sobbed away to himself. Then noiselessly she rose, took off her frock and folded it about him, and lying down again close beside him, lifted his hands—bits of ice they were—and put them in her little bosom, and gathering him in slender arms again, lent him all the warmth that was left in her tiny body. Thus held so close in Nora's grasp, and all the thin clothes wrapped so about him that only the short curls of his hair were stirred by the wind of the black river, little Michael fell gently away into the embrace of a ruddy, rosy company of dreams.

"Are ye warrm, Nora darlint?" whispered Johnny, in a subdued tone, as if the awful night should hear.

"A little," shivered Nora, between her set teeth.

"It's not that am I. Cowld as the ice in the heart of him—that man! I wish you'd talk, Nora," said Johnny. "It do be so dark! Jist spake till us about the Banshees, or tell the tale of the great angels wid their silver wings."

Then Nora, looking up through the vacant casement, where, out of the bleak space of universal gloom, the invisible wind came rushing, saw one great star hanging there and trembling like herself, and in the strange rarefaction of her thoughts, where all things swam with unreal portents, there shaped itself the drama of the star.

And with her delicate thin voice she told the little listening wretches how once that star they could all see was one of the Little People, and wandering on the edge of a meadow too soon after sunset, it suddenly slipped into the great sky. It cried at first, and then with its tears it began to shine and shine; and when its folk missed it from the heart of the yellow cowslip they saw it looking softly out of the bright deep of the west, and they all began to lift up their little hands to pull it down again; but the great sky went drawing off and off, and drew it over the edge of the earth with it: and the next night it was a star. And it was the time," said Nora, "that the little brown bird begins to sing in the hedge, at home in the old country. Then every night, after a while, the star lingered longer in the heavens, and gathered all the evening light into itself, and the Little People used to flock beneath it and toss up whole armfuls of the fragrance of the flowers; and in return it lent them the evening dew. Then at last the winter weather came, and the Little People were all asleep at the roots of the lilies and violets; and the sweet brown bird sang no more, but had bunched up its feathers in chill and blown away with the rose-leaves. And the young star set out to walk through frozen fields and among a strange people whose language it did not know. And there came a great wind roaring on its way, and it shook the young star, who shivered and trembled and fluttered with fear, but could not shake it out of the sky. For it held on. Because it knew its folk all were hidden under the snow upon the fields; and it could hear, besides, high up in the air, the clear, loud ringing of the Christmas bells that night. But the path it traveled was so dismal that the young star could not see to take a step, and it was all alone; and at length it paused a moment and looked down. And it looked in at a great open window-place far away upon the outside of the world, and saw some poor children quaking with the cold—oh, such sad and dreadful cold! And the star thought how it had rays that it could send out, wide yellow rays, such as the sun has when he soaks the purple leaves of the wild flag in the swamp till they burn and glisten; and it said, 'I will try and warm these poor children.' And its heart beat with pity so that one could see it. So it hung there, and filled itself with the soft fire it had, and made itself warm, and kept stripping off the beautiful rays it had, and throwing them down through the black, empty window-place, that they might cherish the poor children. For they had no fire upon their hearth, and nothing but the roof above them. But the star had no right to stay, even for that; it was not set down in its part; it should have gone on step by step, as it could, till the kind sun had come to light its way. And while it shone there it began to feel a strange cold brightness come to and fro before it, like ghostly gleams of unseasonable dawning in the dead of dark. And the star looked, and lo! the great spirits with the broad swords were upon it, swooping in speed, wheeling nearer the shining blades, and clapping the awful wings before their eyes as they came. And in haste the star started up to go, still stripping off the rays as it went, to throw abroad. And all at once it shivered and shook and fluttered with fear again, and the glow of the vast wings flew upon it and covered it, and the star trembled and turned and fell out of heaven."

"And what became of her, Nora, darlint?" questioned Johnny, feebly, when the voice was still. But Nora did not reply.

"What happened till her, honey? Can't ye be saying?"

But Nora said no more.

"Sure it's there she do be twinkling in the windy all the time, like a great jewel to hang on the forehead of the blessed Mother of God. Oh, it's sick I am!" cried Johnny. "I'll be trying to kape down my stomach till the cramps takes me, an' the heart is jumping in the throat of me! Spake again, Nora! Bejazes, are ye going to spake to me no more at all, at all?"

And, as the silence reigned, with the whole strength that he had the boy set up a hoarse, intermittent cry.

How long and at what intervals Johnny had called and cried he never knew.

But suddenly—it might have been at two o'clock of the morning—a lantern's light flared over him, and a voice, resounding in as spirited an oath of utter amazement, compassion, and consternation as could be uttered and compressed in one, made the iced air ring again.

"What's your name, boy?" cried Reed Dunroy.

"Freezing to death!" said Johnny, reiterating his cry of the last hour or more.

"Here, taste this, then," said Reed, peremptorily. "How many are there of you?"

"The place do be full of sperrits," quavered he, as the lantern-slide fell and let the cold aurora fill the air with a shining glory again.

"Take another pull; that'll put the spirits into you. Here, mates!" And at the word three or four men came up the stairs. "Janvrin, you're the stoutest, take the woman. She's torpid. I reckon they all are but this chap in such a dashed ice-house. There's an armful apiece for the rest of you. Now, my little man, you've found your feet. There's a fire in the watch-house at least."

"I'll not be going to the watch!" whimpered Johnny.

"But there's a fire there, and there'll be blankets and things to eat presently," said Reed, coaxingly. "What's this bed? Here's somebody comfortable enough;" and he lifted the youngest boy from under Nora, where, the sweet dew of sleep making his curling locks heavy, he lay all flushed and rosy and warm with life. As the young man lifted him something rolled away from its hiding-place in the little clothes, and he picked it up, looking at it in a perplexed way till he remembered the child whom he had set to rights in the morning after her tumble in the snow.

"I'll be blest," said he, "if that's not one of Kate's nuts. She knows 'em then. She'll help about 'em. Somebody must. It's an infernal shame in a town like this! There, urchin, you take little Pat along."

"He was kirstened Michael, Sir."

"Well, Michael, you take the urchin, and hurry up after the men," said Reed, pushing him on. "I'll take the little girl myself. God! she's ice. Here, child! Here, child!" And he began to pour his restorative over the stony lips, and to rub her hands and forehead with its precious drops. "Wake up! wake up!" he cried. "She's clod-heavy. She's a log. She's frozen to death!" And tearing off his great buffalo-robe over-coat, he wound it again and again about her, and half running, half leaping down the stairs, was in the street.

The watch-house was no place in which to revive this delicate child. Where should he take her? Mrs. Gisborne would be sitting up for Kate. Just as the thought struck him a sleigh came rapidly dashing down the street, a mile ahead, it seemed, of all the others. Reed darted forward with a cry. Mr. Symonds raised the lash. But at the voice and the uplifted arm the horse knew his master, and staid himself, with quivering flanks and obstinate head, till Reed had thrown himself in with his load and seized the reins, when he flew forward at a speed Mr. Symonds had not dared ask of him. They stopped at Mrs. Gisborne's door. Reed tossed down the reins over the dasher and sprung out, heedless of who followed, and entered the open door. Mr. Symonds played the courteous gallant again, and then, filled, it must be confessed, with curiosity, covered the horse with the blankets and stepped in after Kate.

The great buffalo over-coat was thrown upon the floor; Mrs. Gisborne was kneeling on one side, Reed upon the other, between them, half undressed and white as a piece of alabastrine sculpture, lay a little dead girl.

Kate looked from one to another, as if some terrible dream suddenly oppressed her, and instead of the genial warmth and welcome she had expected, an arrow of chill pierced her heart. She drew back as if her foot had faltered on the brink of her own grave.

"It's no use, Reed," said Mrs. Gisborne. "There's no life here. There hasn't been any this two hours. The very blood is frozen in her veins. She's a clod of ice. A poor little clod of the valley. The valley of the shadow of death. Oh, poor thing! poor thing! what if it had been my Kate?" And the mother took little Nora in her arms, rocking to and fro upon the floor.

"Where did you find her?" asked Mr. Symonds, then, very much constrained by such a scene and fidgeting to be gone, yet scarcely knowing how to retire.

Reed wheeled upon him and faced the man.

"I found her," said he, with a pealing voice, "in the shanty behind the grain store on the wharf, whose owner had removed the doors and windows. I heard a child crying as I went home from duty to which I had been summoned, saw something odd about the place, went in, and found the villain's work. When he confronts this little soul," said the indignant Reed, "if there's any justice in things, he'll find a place not where he can freeze, but where he'll burn! To-day though, Mrs. Gisborne," continued he, turning to her with an air of the most supreme and superb contempt for his subject, "he was probably kicked down stairs for his pains, if blood and glass at the foot of the stairs can tell any story. And that is why he wears his face harlequined with court-plaster at this moment!"

Kate looked up in sudden astonishment. Mr. Symonds, in the war-paint of his gashes and their plasters, slunk away.

"Oh hush! hush!" she dryly sobbed, putting out her trembling hands. "I have been sitting beside a murderer all this night!"

As Kate's lip closed Mr. Symonds was sure of his fate. He darted upon Reed a look as full of venom as an asp's; but Reed in a transport of rage shook his fist in his face, and then seizing him by the shoulder shoved him through the door. The horse, left untied, had trotted off to his stable. "Taste what you gave!" cried Reed, and shot the bolt.

Mrs. Gisborne took the piteous pallid image away then to dress it for its supreme repose, while Kate hastened to bring down the garments of her own childhood that had been long since put away unsoiled. It was soon done, though reverently, for the little temple, though deserted by its deity, was still sacred. Then Mrs. Gisborne went and brought Reed back with her, what time Kate lighted a little taper at her head, as the child would have liked to have it.

All the room was dark save that one spot of light, and it fell upon the child's patient face, on the little hands crossed over the breast, and made the forehead shine out of the surrounding gloom like the star she had seen that night in heaven. Reed went gently to Kate's side, and gently after a moment his hand stole over hers. The gate of the great eternities was open before them as they stood, so that they seemed to see the spirit of little Nora fleeing through it; and there in the presence of such immutable witness as the open gate allowed, as if their hearts at last were bare to each other as to God, Reed's seeking eyes asked a silent question, and Kate's returned a silent answer.

It was an April afternoon some four months after this. The ice had left the river, the snow had melted from the hills, the sod on little Nora's grave was green with warm velvet verdure and sprinkled with sunbeams, the soft wind every where crept heavy with fragrance.

A coach which Mrs. Gisborne had tearfully declined to enter, renewing her protestations long after its departure, had come and borne Aunt Nancy away in festive attire. Kate had loitered down the back stairs and walked off, at last, blushing under her silver-gray veil, and arm in arm with Reed Dunroy—Reed Dunroy, who was looking far finer than working days allow, and was wearing a white rose in his button-hole. Mrs. Gisborne meanwhile knit and rocked herself with fury. It seemed a long afternoon to her, choking down her happy bubble of excitement under the phlegmatic demeanor that she aspired to wear unbroken, but was in reality only the lapse of half an hour before Aunt Nancy's chariot whirled up to the door again, and that lady blustered in, full of how it went off.

Mrs. Gisborne was cutting cake into square pieces of nightmare then. She left off a minute while Aunt Nancy went to lay aside her bonnet, and Kate stole in, just as she went out, shy and scared and blushing, and laid a little hand beside her mother's on the table, and silently suffered her to see how its ring glittered fresh from the priest's blessing. Somebody coming behind her then, raised the hand and kissed the ring. Mrs. Gisborne surveyed them both herself with mild satisfaction, but discreetly at that point deposited a generous piece of her barbarous dainty in the little greedy palm of Johnny Considine, long since promoted to the rank of Reed Dunroy's equerry, and now standing beside her, very busy with a pair of eager eyes.

"Wedding-cake is so much nicer than doughnuts!" said she, with merry meaning in her mother's malice. "Ah, Kate! I'm older than you. I never set out but I carried a thing through. Yes, yes," said she, finding it impossible to repress one little crow of triumph, "Mrs. Gisborne's had her way, and now Mrs. Dunroy shall have hers the rest of her life. Reed said you would come home with him that night!"

OCTOBER.

THE swollen grapes upon the vine
Seem bursting with their purple wine,
And underneath the scattered leaves remind me of the year's decline.

A languor fills these Autumn days,
And mellowed shine the sun's soft rays;
Beside the stream the golden reed with listless motion idly sways.

Her silver threads the spider weaves;
Ungarnered stand the yellow sheaves;
And burn like tongues of lurid flame the glowing maple's crimson leaves.

Like ships becalmed the white clouds lie
Along the dim horizon sky,
And flocks of birds that southward roam on restless wing go sailing by.

Down looking from this wooded steep
I see the sinuous river creep
Past sheltered farms; and far away, cloaked with pale mist, the mountains sleep.

How different seems this painted scene,
Decked like a gorgeous Indian queen,
Than when I viewed it last clothed in the Summer's shining robe of green.

Then had the flags of war not flown,
The charging trumpets had not blown,
Nor out of smiling Peace had then the jarring crash of battle grown.

The winds that kissed the bearded grain
Passed not o'er mangled heaps of slain;
How strangely like the hue of blood is yon bright blossom's crimson stain!

The clouds which then from heaven looked down Saw not the close beleaguered town—
Saw not upon the circling heights the grimy-throated cannon frown.

Nor heard from battle-plains arise,
Uplifted to the shuddering skies,
The ringing shout, the feeble moans, the piercing, anguish-laden cries.

Three times have burned the maple leaves,
Thrice have we bound the ripened sheaves,
And still the blood-red tide of war with restless surging motion heaves.

With even steps come round the years
Despite our smiles or bitter tears;
With Spring the purple violet blows; the yellow leaf with Fall appears.

Our yearning hearts await the day
That yet shall shine with purest ray,
When from our stricken land this troublous cloud of war shall pass away.

Then shall this night of sorrow cease,
And into broadest noon increase,
And guilt and cruel wrong shall fade, and Freedom dawn with lasting Peace.

HARBOR OF MARBLEHEAD.

SCENES IN THE WAR OF 1812.

XI.—PRIVATEERING.

ALLUSION has been made occasionally to privateering, or legalized piracy, as practiced by the belligerents during the war we are considering. A full history of that important branch of the United States naval service during that war would occupy two ponderous volumes. I propose to give a general outline of the most prominent events of that service in a single chapter. Privateering was sanctioned at that time by the laws of nations and the general sentiment of mankind; and considerations of expediency recommended that system of war for a nation like the United States, having but a feeble navy, when contending with a nation like that of Great Britain, having not only a powerful navy but a widely-extended commercial marine. Yet there were many persons eminent in public affairs whose consciences could not sanction a system which would seem to place the patriotic American seaman on a level with the marauding buccaneer. The pen (and the prestige of the name) of Thomas Jefferson was employed in the task of reconciling the people to a measure which, it was perceived, would add immense power to the force of the United States Government.

Jefferson argued with his usual vigor and effect. "What is war?" he asked. "It is simply a contest between nations of trying which can do the most harm," he answered. Again he asked and answered—"Who carries on the war? Armies are formed and navies manned by individuals. What produces peace? The distress of individuals. What difference to the sufferer is it that his property is taken by a national or a private armed vessel? Did our merchants, who have lost nine hundred and seventeen vessels by British captures, feel any gratification that most of them were taken by their Majesty's men-of-war? Were the spoils less rigidly exacted by a seventy-four gun ship than by a privateer of four guns, and were not all equally doomed? In the United States every possible encouragement should be given to privateering in time of war with a commercial nation. We have tens of thousands of seamen that without it would be destitute of the means of support, and useless to their country. Our national ships are too few in number to give employment to one-twentieth part of them, or retaliate the acts of the enemy. By receiving private armed vessels the whole naval force of the nation is truly brought to bear on the foe; and while the contest lasts, that it may have a speedy termination, let every individual contribute his mite in the best way he can to distress and harass the enemy, and compel him to peace."

—So argued and wrote Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic party then administering the national government, about a fortnight after the declaration of war against Great Britain. Congress had already, in the act declaring war, sanctioned the business of privateering by authorizing the President to issue to private armed vessels of the United States commissions, or letters of marque and general reprisals, in such a form as he should think proper. The President was not tardy in issuing such commissions and letters; and Congress from time to time legislated in favor of privateers. Very soon swift-sailing brigs and schooners were fitted out in New England ports, and with those of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, went out on the high seas in search of plunder, first along the coasts of the United States and among the West India Islands, and afterward in European waters. Before the middle of autumn New York and Baltimore alone had sent out forty-two privateers, many letters of marque, and quite a large number of armed pilot-boats. The former usually carried from six to ten guns and forty or fifty men each besides officers, all armed with muskets, cutlasses, and boarding-pikes. The pilot-boats usually carried a single long gun, mounted on a swivel in the centre, and this was called "Long Tom." They also carried about fifty men each. These vessels were all commissioned to "burn, sink, and destroy" the property of the enemy wherever it might be found, either on the high seas or in British ports. The apprehensions of the better informed classes of England, that Great Britain had more to lose than gain by a war with the United States, were soon realized, and the disappointment and chagrin of the Ministry could not be concealed.

Salem in Massachusetts, which became famous for the privateers during the war, seems to be entitled to the credit of having received the first prize captured by a private armed vessel of the United States after the declaration of war. This occurred on the 10th of July, or about three weeks after that declaration, when the armed schooner Fame, Captain Webb, brought into that port a captured British timber-ship of three hundred tons burden, and another of two hundred tons loaded with tar. On the same day the privateer Dash of Baltimore, Captain Conway, bound on a cruise, entered Hampton Roads and there captured the British Government schooner Whitney, Lieutenant Maycy, who was bearing dispatches from London to Washington.

On the 14th of July a staunch privateer of Gloucester, Massachusetts, named the Madison, fell in with a British transport ship from Halifax bound to St. John's. She had been under convoy of the Indian, a British sloop of war, which had just given chase to the Polly and Dolphin, two American privateers. The Madison pounced on and captured the transport, which, with the cargo, was valued at $50,000. She was sent into Gloucester. On the following day the Indian, after chasing the Polly for some time, manned her launch and several boats, and sent them to capture the fugitive. The Polly resisted so gallantly that she caused the launch to strike her colors. By this time the Indian was almost within gunshot, when the Polly took to her sweeps and escaped. The Madison soon afterward captured a British ship with twelve guns, name not given, and the brig Eliza of six guns.

On the 18th of July the letter-of-marque schooner Falcon, of Baltimore, armed with four guns and sixteen men, fought the British cutter Hero, five guns and fifty-five men, on the coast of France, for two hours and a half, and drove her off. On the following day the Falcon was attacked by a British privateer of six guns and forty men. She resisted for an hour and a half, when, her captain being killed and several of her crew wounded, she struck her colors and was taken into a Guernsey port. The first prize that arrived at Baltimore was a British schooner laden with a cargo of sugar valued at $8000. She was captured by the Dolphin. This was on the 26th of July. A little more than a month had elapsed since the declaration of war, yet within that time such displays of American valor had been made on the sea that the British began to feel some respect for their new foe on that element. During the month of July more than fifty vessels were taken from the British by American privateers, and brought into the harbors of the United States.

Toward the middle of July seven privateers sailed from Baltimore on a cruise. One of them was the swift clipper-built schooner Rossie, fourteen guns and one hundred and twenty men, commanded by the veteran Commodore Barney. His manuscript Journal of that and a second cruise lies before me, and bears evidence that it was one of the most exciting voyages on record. He sailed from Baltimore on the 12th of July (1812), left Cape Henry on the 15th, and cruised along the eastern coast of the United States for forty-five days without entering port. He was almost daily capturing English vessels, chasing and being chased, and informing all American vessels that fell in his way of the beginning of war.

COMMODORE BARNEY.

Nine days after he left Baltimore, July 22, Barney fell in with the brig Nymph, of Newburyport, and seized her for violating the non-importation act. On the following day the Rossie was chased by a British frigate, which hurled twenty-five shots after her, but without effect. The Rossie outsailed the frigate and escaped. Six days afterward, July 30, she was chased by another frigate, and again outsailed the pursuer. On the following day Barney took and burned the ship Princess Royal, and the day following took and manned the ship Kitty.

On the 2d of August Barney took and burned the brigs Fame and Devonshire and schooner Squid; and on the same day he captured the brig Two Brothers, put on board of her sixty of his prisoners, and ordered her as a cartel to St. Johns, New Brunswick, to effect an exchange for as many American prisoners. Barney sent his compliments to Admiral Sawyer, the British commander on the Halifax station, desired him to treat the prisoners well, and assured him very coolly that he would soon send him another ship-load of captives for exchange. On the next day he took and sunk the brig Henry and schooners Race-Horse and Halifax, captured and manned the brig William, and added forty prisoners to the number on board the Two Brothers. On the 9th of August he captured the ship Jenny of twelve guns after a brief action, and on the following day he seized the Rebecca of Saco from London for a breach of the non-importation law. On the 28th he seized the Euphrates, of New Bedford, for the same reason, and on the 30th of August he ran into Narraganset Bay and anchored off Newport. During his cruise of forty-five days he seized and captured fourteen vessels, nine of which he destroyed. Their aggregate capacity amounted to two thousand nine hundred and fourteen tons, and they were manned by one hundred and sixty-six men. The estimated value of his prizes was $1,289,000.

Barney remained in Newport until the 7th of September, when the Rossie started on another cruise. On the 9th she was chased by British ships of war, but by superior speed she soon left them out of sight. On the 12th she was chased by an English frigate for six hours, when she too was left so far behind that she gave up the pursuit. Four days afterward she fell in with and captured the British armed packet Princess Amelia. They had a severe engagement for almost an hour at pistol-shot distance most of the time. Mr. Long, Barney's first-lieutenant, was severely wounded, and six of the crew injured but not so badly. The Princess Amelia lost her captain, sailing-master, and one seaman killed, and the master's mate and six seamen were wounded. The Rossie suffered in her rigging and sails but not in her hull, while the Princess Amelia was terribly cut up in all.

Barney had just secured his prize when he fell in, on the same day, with three ships and an armed brig. From the latter the Rossie received an eighteen-pound shot through her quarter, which wounded a man and lodged in the pump.

She dogged the three vessels for four days in hopes of seeing them separate, thus affording her an opportunity to pounce on one of them. They kept together, and Barney gave up the game. On the 23d he spoke the privateer Globe, Captain Murphy, of Baltimore, and the two went in search of the three ships, but could not find them. On the 8th day of October, while they were sailing together, they captured the British schooner Jubilee and sent her into port. On the 22d Barney seized the ship Merrimac for a violation of law. She was laden with a valuable cargo. On the 10th of November he returned to Baltimore. The result of his two cruises in the Rossie was 3698 tons of shipping, valued at $1,500,000, and two hundred and seventeen prisoners.

The Dolphin, of Baltimore, Captain Stafford, was a successful privateer. She carried twelve guns and one hundred men. The first prize sent into Baltimore after the declaration of war was hers; and other ports received her captures. She entered Salem, Massachusetts, on the 23d of July, after a cruise of twenty days, during which time she had taken six vessels without receiving the least injury. She was repeatedly chased by British cruisers, but always outsailed them.

Captain Stafford was remarkable for kindness of manner toward his prisoners. Such was its power that, on several occasions when he was compelled to use sweeps to escape from the English men-of-war, they volunteered to man them.

The privateer Globe, of Baltimore, Captain Murphy, carrying eight guns and about eighty men, went to sea on the 24th of July in company with the letter-of-marque Cora. On the 31st of that month she chased a vessel about three hours, when she was within gunshot, and commenced firing. The fugitives hoisted British colors, and returned the fire from her stern chasers, consisting of two 9-pounders. The Globe could only bring a long 9 midships to bear during an action of about forty minutes, for it was blowing very fresh and the enemy crowded all sail. The Globe finally gained on her, and commenced firing broadsides. Her antagonist returned broadside for broadside, until the Globe, getting within musket-shot distance, fired deadly volleys of bullets. After a brisk engagement of an hour and a half at close quarters the British vessel struck her colors. She proved to be the English letter of marque, Boyd, from New Providence for Liverpool, mounting two guns. No person was injured in either ship. The Boyd's boats were destroyed, and she suffered much in hull and rigging. The Globe suffered in sails and rigging, but was able, after sending her prize to Philadelphia, to proceed on her cruise. On the 14th of August she captured a British schooner of four guns laden with mahogany; and a few days afterward she arrived at Hampton Roads, accompanied by a large British ship carrying twenty-two guns, richly laden and bound for Glasgow, which she captured not far from the Bermudas. Having secured her prize in port the Globe started immediately on another cruise.

The Highflyer, Captain Gavit, of Baltimore, was another successful cruiser on private account. She was armed with eight guns and manned by one hundred men. She left Baltimore early in July, and on the 26th captured the British schooner Harriet, in ballast, but with $8000 in specie on board. On the 19th of August, while in the Gulf of Mexico, Captain Gavit discovered the Jamaica fleet of merchantmen and gave chase. He soon perceived that they were convoyed by a British frigate. That vessel gave chase to the Highflyer. The latter outsailed her, and on the 21st pounced upon the Diana, one of the fleet, and captured her. She was of three hundred and fifty tons burden, and loaded with a valuable cargo of rum, sugar, coffee, etc. Gavit took out her crew and sent her as a prize to the United States.

On the following day the Highflyer fell in with and engaged two other British vessels at half gunshot distance, giving them about sixty shot. The breeze was too stiff to allow safety in boarding them, and so he hauled off and left them. These were the Jamaica of Liverpool, and Mary Ann of London, the former carrying — guns and twenty-one men, and the latter twelve guns and eighteen men. On the 23d the Highflyer fell upon these vessels again, the wind having moderated. Her people, after a severe cannonading and musket-firing from both sides, boarded the Jamaica and captured her. The Mary Ann struck her colors at the same time.

During the action Captain Gavit was shot through the right arm by a musket-ball, and one of his seamen was wounded in the cheek. These were the only casualties, excepting the damage (which was considerable) done to sails and rigging of the Highflyer. Her antagonists were severely bruised, and several of the seamen were wounded. Both ships were richly laden with the products of the West Indies.

On the 1st of August the privateer Yankee, carrying ten guns, while cruising along the coast of Nova Scotia, fell in with the letter-of-marque Royal Bounty, also carrying ten guns. She was a fine vessel of six hundred and fifty-eight tons, and manned by twenty-five men. The Yankee had the advantage of the wind, and bearing down upon the weather-quarter of the Royal Bounty, gave her a division broadside, which made her quake in every fibre. Making a quick movement she gave her an entire broadside, which was returned with spirit.

The marines of the Yankee were mostly sharpshooters, and the execution was terribly galling. At the same time the ship was well managed, and her great guns were making havoc with her enemy's sails and rigging. The Bounty's helmsman was killed, and she became so unmanageable that, after fighting an hour, she was compelled to surrender. She was terribly wounded; all her boats were stove; and no less than one hundred and fifty round shot, of various kinds, went through her rigging and sails, or lodged in her hull and spars.

The schooner Shadow, Captain Taylor, of Philadelphia, had a severe encounter with the British letter-of-marque May, Captain Affleck, from Liverpool bound to St. Lucia, carrying fourteen guns and fifty men. At noon, on the 4th of August, the Shadow discovered the May and gave chase. It continued until almost sunset, when an action was fought. At six o'clock, when the vessels were within gunshot of each other, the May commenced firing from her stern guns. The action was commenced at seven, and at half past seven the May hoisted a light in her mizzen rigging. The Shadow then hailed her, and Captain Taylor ordered her to send her papers on board of his vessel that he might examine them. This was only partially complied with. Taylor instantly sent a boat's crew to the May with a demand for the instant surrender of all the papers. The British captain refused. He sent a note to this effect to Captain Taylor, stated the character and force of his vessel, and informed him that a change of ministry had taken place in England, and that the Orders in Council had been rescinded. Again Captain Taylor demanded Affleck's papers, and again they were refused. At half past eight o'clock the action was renewed. The night was squally and dark. The vessels kept near each other, occasionally exchanging shots, and in the morning early they commenced a severe fight. Captain Taylor was shot through the head and instantly killed; and the Shadow was so much damaged that she withdrew, and by superior sailing escaped and returned to Philadelphia.

On the 3d of August the schooner Atlas, Captain David Maffit, attacked two British armed ships at the same time. After an engagement of about an hour the smaller vessel of the foe surrendered, and the fire of the Atlas was wholly directed upon the larger one. Suddenly the smaller one, notwithstanding her colors were down, again opened fire; but the Atlas soon silenced her, and in less than one hour and a half from the time of attack both vessels were captured. They proved to be the ship Pursuit, 16 guns, and a complement of 35 men, and the ship Planter, 20 guns and 15 men. They were both stored with valuable cargoes from Surinam, and bound to London. They were sent to the United States. The Atlas was badly damaged in the contest.

At about this time the privateer John, Captain Benjamin Crowninshield, of Salem, returned to that port after a cruise of three weeks, during which time she made eleven captures, some of which were sent into Marblehead. All along the coasts of the United States and the West Indies the American privateers were now exceedingly active. None were more so than the Paul Jones, Captain Hazard, of New York. Within a very short space of time she captured fourteen vessels near the island of Porto Rico, some of them of considerable value; and she obtained a crowning glory by the capture, early in August, of the British ship Hansa, 14 guns and 20 men, sailing from Gibraltar for Havana, with wines and dry-goods valued at $200,000. This was accomplished after a contest of half an hour.

One of the boldest of the privateersmen was Captain Thomas Boyle, of Baltimore, who sailed the Comet, of 14 guns and 120 men. One of his earliest exploits in the Comet was the capture, in August, 1812, of the British ship Hope-well, carrying 14 guns and 25 men. She was bound from Surinam for London with a cargo valued, with the ship, at $150,000. The two vessels had an obstinate combat, but the Comet was the victor. The prize was sent to Baltimore. Of the Comet and her Captain we shall have more to say hereafter.

Another active and successful Baltimore privateer was the Nonsuch, Captain Lesely, armed with 12 guns and carrying about 100 men. She was one of the famous "Baltimore clippers." On the 27th of September, when cruising near the island of Martinique, she fell in with a British ship mounting 16 guns, with about 200 troops on board, and a schooner mounting six 4-pounders, and manned with a crew of about 50 or 60 men. The Nonsuch ran in between the two vessels, within pistol-shot of each, and commenced a hot contest, which lasted three hours and twenty minutes. It was a fierce fight. The guns of the Nonsuch (carronades) became much heated by continual firing. Their bolts and breachings were carried away, and they were all dismounted. Captain Lesely now determined to board his antagonists, but the damage done to the rigging of the Nonsuch so disabled her that he was not able to bring her alongside for the purpose. In consequence of this disability the two vessels escaped, but not without severe punishment. The larger ship was much damaged in hull and rigging, and lost 23 of her men killed and wounded. The schooner was also much damaged. The performance of the Nonsuch was called by the journals of the day, "gallant but unprofitable conduct." The British spoke of the attack upon them as "exceedingly brave." Several persons of distinction on these ships were injured.

The privateer Saratoga, of New York, Captain Riker, armed with 18 guns and 140 men, was a successful cruiser. In the autumn of 1812 she captured the ship Quebec, 16 guns, from Jamaica, with a cargo valued at $300,000. In December following she had a desperate fight off La Guayra, Venezuela. It was on the 10th of that month, and she was then in command of Captain Charles W. Wooster. She entered the port of La Guayra on the 9th, but was warned off, the authorities being neutral. Going out of the bay, she captured a vessel with goods worth $20,000; and at nine in the morning on the following day, after the clearing up of the fog, she fell in with the brig Rachel, from Greenock, Scotland, which mounted 12 guns and carried 60 men. They were in sight of the town, and almost the entire population, from the beggar to the commander, turned out to see the conflict from the house-tops. The combat was quick and furious. It resulted in victory for the Saratoga, whose loss was only one man slightly wounded. The Rachel suffered much. The second mate was the only officer alive after the action.

Such is a brief record of some of the most prominent events in the history of American privateering from the declaration of war in June, 1812, until the close of the year. The record is of a small portion of the swarm of private armed vessels which were out at the beginning of 1813. These were harassing British commerce in all directions, and affording powerful and timely aid to the little navy of the Republic. The business was recognized as legitimate, useful, and practically patriotic. Merchants and other citizens of the highest respectability engaged in it, and Congress passed laws to encourage it by the allowance of liberal privileges, making provision for pensions for those engaged in the service, and for the families of those who might be lost on private armed vessels, etc.

The history of American privateering in 1813 opens with a letter from Captain Shaler, of the private schooner Governor Tompkins, which was armed with fourteen carronades and one Long Tom, and manned by about a hundred and forty men. She was built in New York, and was first commanded by Captain Skinner. Shaler wrote on the 1st of January that on the 25th of December he chased three British vessels, which appeared to be two ships and a brig. The larger he took to be a transport and ran down to attack her, when he found himself within a quarter of a mile of a large frigate which had been completely masked. He boldly opened fire upon her and received a terrible response. Of course he could not sustain a contest with such overwhelming odds, so he spread his sails to fly. He was successful. "Thanks to her heels," he said, "and the exertions of my brave officers and crew, I still have the command of her." He got out all of his sweeps, threw overboard all the lumber on his deck and about two thousand pounds of shot from the after-hold, and at half past five in the evening had the pleasure of seeing his pursuers far behind heaving about. The Tompkins lost two men killed and six wounded. One of the former, a black man named Johnson, "ought to be registered on the book of fame," Captain Shaler wrote, "and remembered with reverence as long as bravery is considered a virtue." A 24-pound shot struck him in the hip and took away all the lower part of his body. In this state the poor brave fellow lay on the deck, and several times exclaimed to his shipmates, "Fire away, boys, neber haul de color down!" The other man killed was also colored, and wounded in a similar manner. "Several times," says Shaler, "he requested to be thrown overboard, saying he was only in the way of others. While America has such sailors she has little to fear from the tyrants of the occasion."

We have already spoken of the Comet, of Baltimore, and her brave commander Captain Boyle. She sailed from that port late in December, 1812, passed through the British blockading squadron on a dark night, and went on a cruise toward the coast of Brazil. On the 9th of January, 1813, she was off the harbor of Pernambuco, and Boyle was informed by a coaster that some British vessels were about to sail from that port. The Comet watched until the 14th, when, a little past noon, four sails appeared. Boyle waited until they were well clear of the land and then gave chase. The Comet was a swift clipper and soon overhauled them; and at seven in the evening, having prepared for action, she hoisted her colors, and made for the larger of the four ships, which proved to be a Portuguese brig, mounting twenty heavy guns (32-pounders), and manned by one hundred and sixty-five men. She was convoying three English merchant-ships laden with wheat, and warned Captain Boyle not to molest them. To this injunction Boyle replied that his commission authorized him to capture them if he could, and that the Portuguese marine had no right to interfere.

All the vessels were now crowding sail with a stiffening breeze. The Comet shot past the others, summoned the Englishmen to heave to, and assured them if they did not he would open a broadside upon them. The Portuguese gave chase to the Comet. The latter tacked, came alongside of the merchantmen at half past eight o'clock in the evening and so distributed a heavy fire that she wounded all three.

The Portuguese suffered severely in the contest which followed, for the quick movements of the clipper gave her great advantage of position. The combat continued until an hour past midnight, when the moon went down and the night became dark and squally. In the mean time the merchantmen had surrendered, and one of them was taken possession of by Boyle. At dawn the Portuguese brig, with the other two English vessels, fled for Pernambuco, while the Comet and her prize, the Bowes, proceeded homeward. She soon afterward captured the Scotch ship Adelphia, and outsailed the famous British frigate Surprise that gave chase.

On the 6th of February the Comet captured first the brig Alexis, of Greenock, and soon afterward an armed brig which formed part of a convoy for nine merchantmen from Demerara. At the same time another man-of-war called the Swaggerer appeared. Boyle was anxious to get his prizes off, and he amused the brig until that desired end was accomplished. In the mean time he added the Dominico, a Liverpool packet, to his list of prizes. When they were fairly on their way he turned his heels upon the Swaggerer and soon outsailed his pursuer. At three o'clock in the afternoon he captured the schooner Jane, and before sunset he lost sight of the Swaggerer entirely.

Soon after this encounter Boyle turned his face homeward, and on the way met and fought a terrible battle for eight hours with the British ship Hibernia, eight hundred tons, twenty-two guns, and a full complement of men. The Comet lost three killed and sixteen wounded. The Hibernia lost eight killed and thirteen wounded. The Comet put into Porto Rico for repairs, and the Hibernia into St. Thomas. Both were much injured. The Comet arrived at Baltimore on the 17th of March.

Boyle was not long on land. His next cruise was in the beautiful Chasseur, a privateer brig, elegant in model and formidable in men and arms. She was the fleetest of all vessels, and the story of her cruises is a tale of romance of the most exciting kind. She seemed as ubiquitous as the "Phantom Ship." Sometimes she was in the West Indies, then on the coasts of Spain, Portugal, and France, and then in the Irish and British Channels, spreading the wildest alarm among England's commercial marine. So much was she feared in the West Indies and the islands of the Caribbean sea, that the merchants there implored Admiral Durham to send them "at least a heavy sloop of war" to protect their property. The Admiral immediately sent them the frigate Barossa, which the fleet Chasseur delighted to tease.

The Chasseur captured eighty vessels, of which thirty-two were of equal force with herself, and eighteen superior. Many of the prizes were of great value. Three of them alone were valued at $400,000. She seemed to sweep over the seas with impunity, and was as imprudent as she was bold. On one occasion, while in the British Channel, Boyle issued a proclamation as a burlesque on those of Admirals Warren and Cochrane, concerning the blockades of the ports of the United States, in which he declared "all the ports, harbors, bays, creeks, rivers, inlets, outlets, islands, and sea-coasts of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in a state of vigorous blockade." He assured the world that he possessed a sufficient force (the Chasseur) to compel obedience. This proclamation he caused to be sent in a cartel to London, with a request to have it posted up at Lloyd's Coffee House.

We have already noticed some of the earlier operations of the Dolphin, Captain Stafford. On the 25th of January, 1813, she fell in with a large ship and brig off Cape St. Vincent, and, as was common with the more daring American privateers, engaged them both. After a severe fight they were captured and sent to the United States. They were richly laden, and were valuable prizes. The wounded Captain Brigham, of the British ship (Hebe, 16), thought his capture "extronary." He did not expect to find a damned Yankee privateer in that part of the world; and when assured by Stafford that they would appear in the Thames by-and-by his eyes dilated with mute wonder. Stafford's kind and good nature won Brigham's heart, and, in a card published on his arrival in Boston in February, he thanked the commander of the Dolphin and his associates for their attention, and saying, "Should the fortunes of war ever throw the Captain or any of his crew into the hands of the British, it is sincerely hoped he will meet a similar treatment."

We again find the Saratoga, Captain Woolsey, on her destructive errand in February, 1813. On the 9th of that month she captured the Lord Nelson of 600 tons, and one of the finest vessels in the British merchant service. She was sent into New Orleans. At about the same time the Saratoga captured the British packet Morgiana, eighteen guns. The Saratoga had just been chased by a British frigate, and had been compelled, in order to lighten her to increase her speed, to throw overboard twelve of her guns: she had only four to attack the Morgiana with. Her armory was replenished with several of the fine brass pieces of the captured vessel, and the prize was sent to Newport with her Captain. The kindness of the prize-master was so conspicuous that the Captain of the Morgiana thanked him in the Newport papers.

On the 15th of February, 1813, the letter of marque Lottery, of Baltimore, armed with six guns and manned by thirty-five men, had a desperate fight in Chesapeake Bay with nine British barges containing two hundred and forty men. She fought them an hour and a half, during which time it was believed that more of the foe were killed than the number of the whole crew of the letter of marque. At length Captain Southcote, commander of the schooner, was severely wounded, and the enemy, in overwhelming numbers, boarded the vessel, hauled down the colors, and made her a prize.

At about this time we find the privateer Yankee, whose exploits we have already observed, entering the harbor of Newport after a cruise of one hundred and fifty days, during which time she had scoured the whole western coast of Africa, taken eight prizes, made one hundred and ninety-six prisoners, and secured as trophies sixty-two cannon, five hundred muskets, and property worth about $300,000.

The merchants of New York fitted out no less than twenty-six fast-sailing privateers and letters of marque within one hundred and twenty days after the declaration of war, carrying almost two hundred pieces of artillery, and manned by over two thousand seamen. Among the most noted of these privateers was the General Armstrong, a moderate-sized schooner, mounting a Long Tom 42-pounder and eighteen carronades. Her complement was one hundred and forty men, and her first commander was Captain Barnard.

Early in March, 1813, the General Armstrong was in command of Guy R. Champlin, and cruising off the Surinam River, on the coast of South America. Early on the morning of the 11th she gave chase to the Coquette, a British sloop of war, mounting in all twenty-seven guns, and manned by one hundred and twenty-one men and boys. Between nine and ten o'clock the vessels were within gunshot and commenced a brisk engagement. Convinced, by observation, that his antagonist was a British letter of marque, Champlin and his men agreed to board her, and for this purpose they ran the Armstrong down upon her. When too late to retreat they discovered her to be a much heavier vessel than they imagined. The two vessels poured heavy shot into each other, and for almost an hour the fight was fierce and obstinate, within pistol-shot distance. The Armstrong was severely injured, and her Captain received a ball in his shoulder, but continued some time on duty after the wound was dressed, and from the cabin gave orders until his vessel was fairly out of the clutches of the enemy. By the vigorous use of sweeps the Armstrong escaped under a heavy fire from the Coquette. For his gallant conduct on this occasion, and his skill in saving his vessel, the stockholders, at a meeting held at Tammany Hall on the 14th of April, presented Captain Champlin an elegant sword, and voted thanks to his companions in the combat. We shall meet the Armstrong hereafter.

The Ned, Captain Dawson, a New York letter of marque, arrived at that port ten days after the sword presentation to Champlin, and brought with her the British letter of marque Malvina, of Aberdeen, mounting ten guns. The Ned captured her after an action of almost an hour. Her captain was killed, and in the combat the Ned had seven men badly wounded. The Malvina was laden with wine from the Mediterranean, and was a valuable prize.

Another successful privateer, owned in New York, was the Scourge, Captain Nicoll. She mounted fifteen guns, and sailed from that port in April, 1813, for a long cruise in European waters, and was frequently in concert with the Rattlesnake of Philadelphia, Captain David Maffit. The latter commander went into the business at the beginning of the war, with the Atlas, and continued its pursuit until the close of the contest in 1815. The Rattlesnake was a fast-sailing brig of fourteen guns.

Captain Nicoll was often absent from the Scourge while on the coast of Norway, because he found it more profitable to remain on shore and attend to the sale of prizes brought or sent in, while his first officer skillfully commanded her in cruises. The Scourge made a large number of captures on the coast of Norway, and they were nearly all sent into Drontheim and disposed of there. The aggregate tonnage of prizes there and then disposed of, captured by the Scourge and Rattlesnake, was about 4500. The trophies were sixty guns. On her homeward passage from Norway the Scourge made several captures. She arrived at Cape Cod in May, 1812, having been absent little more than a year. During her cruise she had made four hundred and twenty prisoners. Her deeds made her name an appropriate one, for she scourged British commerce most severely.

The Yankee, already mentioned, left Newport on a cruise on the 23d of May, 1813. A month afterward, when off the coast of Ireland, she captured the British cutter sloop, Earl Camden, valued at $10,000. Eight days afterward she captured the brig Elizabeth, valued at $40,000, and the brig Watson, laden with cotton, valued at $70,000. On the 2d of July she took the brig Marine, with a cargo valued at $70,000. All of these prizes, worth in the aggregate about $200,000, were sent to French ports for adjudication and sale. The work was accomplished in the space of about six weeks. The Yankee returned to Providence, Rhode Island, on the 19th of August, without having lost a man during the cruise either killed or wounded.

The records of privateering during the summer of 1813 present one dark chapter, in the deed of a desperate wretch named Johnson, who commanded the Teazer, a little two-gun vessel that went out from New York with fifty men. When that vessel was captured by one of Admiral Warren's fleet, Johnson was released on his parole. Soon afterward, without waiting to be exchanged, he entered as first lieutenant on board another privateer named the Young Teazer. In June, 1813, she was closely pursued by an English man-of-war. She was likely to be overtaken, and Johnson knew that death would be his fate should he be caught. Dawson called his officers aft in consultation, and while they were debating on the subject one of the sailors called out to the captain that Lieutenant Johnson had just gone into the cabin with a blazing fire-brand. The next instant the Teazer was blown into fragments. Only six of all her people escaped destruction. The captain, Johnson, and all the others had perished in a moment.

Toward mid-summer, 1813, an affair occurred off Sandy Hook, New York, which created a great sensation. It properly belongs to the history of privateering. Commodore Lewis was then in command of a flotilla of gun-boats on that station, and the British man-of-war Poictiers, 74, was cruising in those waters. She had for tender the sloop Eagle; and early in July Lewis sent out a little fishing-smack named Yankee, which he borrowed at Fly Market, in New York, to capture this tender by stratagem. With a calf, a sheep, and a goose secured on deck, and between thirty and forty well-armed men below, the smack stood out for sea, with only three men on deck in fishermen's garb, as if going to the fishing-banks. The Eagle gave chase, overhauled her, and seeing live-stock on board, ordered her to go to the commodore. The watch-word "Lawrence!" was given, when the armed men rushed to the deck and poured a volley of musketry which sent the crew of the Eagle below in dismay. Sailing-master Percival, who commanded the expedition, ordered the firing to cease, when one of the Eagle's company came up and struck her colors. The surprise was so complete that her heavy brass howitzer, loaded with canister-shot, remained undischarged. Her crew consisted of her commander, a midshipman, and eleven seamen. The two former and a marine were slain. The Eagle and prisoners were taken to the city in view of thousands of the citizens, who were on the Battery celebrating the anniversary of the National Independence. They were received with shouts, salvos of artillery, the waving of hats and handkerchiefs, and the ringing of bells.

A month after the capture of the Eagle the privateer schooner Commodore Decatur, Captain Diron, of Charleston, South Carolina, carrying seven guns and a little over a hundred men, had a desperate encounter with the British war-schooner Dominica, Lieutenant Barrette, carrying sixteen guns and eighty-eight men. The Decatur was cruising in the track of the West India traders on their return to England, and on the morning of the 15th of August gave chase to a ship and schooner. At about one o'clock in the afternoon they were so near each other that the schooner fired a shot at the Decatur. The latter was immediately prepared for action, not with heavy guns alone, but with implements for boarding. Diron intended to run down near his adversary, discharge all his guns, great and small, and then board her under cover of the smoke. This was not immediately accomplished; for the Dominica was on the alert, and manœuvred so as to give the Decatur some damaging broadsides. Twice her crew attempted to board her antagonist, but failed, and the contest was kept up with cannon and musketry. Finally, at about half past three o'clock, the Decatur forced her bowsprit over the stern of the Dominica, and her jib-boom penetrated the Englishman's mainsail. In face of a murderous fire of musketry the Decatur's men, led by First Prize-master Safith and Quarter-master Washburn, rushed from her bow along the bowsprit, boarded the enemy, and engaged in a most sanguinary fight hand to hand, with swords, pistols, and small-arms. Both parties fought with the greatest courage and determination. The decks were covered with the dead and wounded. The colors of the Dominica were hauled down by the boarders, and she became the Decatur's prize. The Dominica lost sixty-four killed and wounded. Among the former were the captain, sailing-master, and purser. The Decatur lost twenty killed and wounded. Diron started with his prize for Charleston, and on the following day captured the London Trader, bound from Surinam to London, with a valuable cargo. She reached Charleston in safety with both prizes.

In the autumn of 1813 Captain George Coggeshall, whose History of the American Privateers has been frequently consulted, commanded the letter-of-marque schooner David Porter, of New York. Late in October she was lying at Providence, Rhode Island, where the President, Commodore Rodgers, was blockaded. In a thick snow-storm, on the 14th of November, and under the cover of night, the Porter passed the blockading squadron and put to sea. She reached Charleston, her destined port, in safety, where she was freighted for France with sea-island cotton, and sailed for "Bordeaux or a port in France" on the 20th of December. In the Bay of Biscay she encountered a terrible and damaging gale, but weathered it; and on the 20th of January entered the port of La Teste. Cogges-hall sent his vessel home in charge of his first officer, and remained in France some time. The Porter captured several prizes on her way to the United States.

We have noticed the arrival at Hampton Roads, with a large British ship as a prize, of the privateer Globe, of Baltimore, and her departure on another cruise. She was successful in the capture of prizes, but did not meet with any fair test of her sailing qualities or the valor and skill of her men until November, 1813. On the first of that month, while cruising off the coast of Madeira, she fell in and exchanged shots with a large armed brig, but considered it prudent to keep a respectful distance from her. She then proceeded to the offing of Funchal, where, on the 2d, she chased two vessels in vain; for night came on, dark and squally, and she lost sight of them.

On the 3d the Globe again chased two vessels, and at eleven o'clock was so near them that the larger of the fugitives opened her stern guns on her pursuer. A severe action ensued, when, at noon, the crew of the Globe attempted to board her adversary. They failed. Their vessel was much damaged, and while in this condition the other vessel came up and gave the Globe a terrible raking fire, which almost disabled her. Yet her crew fought on at close-quarters, and at half past three o'clock the larger vessel was compelled to strike her colors. The other was pouring in broadside after broadside within half pistol-shot distance. The Globe was reduced to an almost sinking condition, yet she managed to give her second antagonist such blows that she too struck her colors. She then hauled to windward to take possession of the first prize, when that vessel hoisted her colors and gave the Globe a tremendous broadside. She was compelled to haul off for repairs, and the two vessels, believed to be severely injured, sailed slowly away. They were packet brigs, one mounting eighteen and the other sixteen cannon, mostly brass. The Globe lost eighteen men killed and fifteen wounded in this desperate encounter.

During the first eight or nine months of the year 1814, although the American private armed ships were active and successful, there seems not to have been any performance by them that deserves the name of a naval action. This monotony of quiet business was broken in September, when the privateer Harpy fell in with the British packet Princess Elizabeth, and captured her after a short but sharp conflict. The Elizabeth was armed with ten guns and manned by thirty-eight men. She had on board the Turkish ambassador for England, an aid-de-camp to a British general, a lieutenant of 74 line-of-battle ship, and a large number of other passengers. Ten casks of wine and some of the cannon were transferred to the Harpy. The remainder of her armament was thrown overboard, and the ship was ransomed for $2000, when she was allowed to proceed on her voyage.

The most desperate and famous combat recorded in the history of privateering during the war was that maintained by the General Armstrong, of New York (whose earlier exploits we have already noticed), Captain Samuel C. Reid, in the harbor of Fayal, one of the Azores Islands of that name, belonging to Portugal. It occurred on the 26th of September, 1814, while she lay there at anchor in a neutral port. She was attacked by a large British squadron under command of Commodore Lloyd. The attacking vessels consisted of the flag-ship Plantagenet 74, the frigate Rota 44, Captain Somerville, and the brig Carnation 18, Captain Bentham, each with a full complement of men. The Armstrong carried only seven guns and 90 men, including her officers.

In flagrant violation of the laws and usages of neutrality, Lloyd sent in, at eight o'clock in the evening, four large and well armed launches, manned by about 40 men each. At that time Reid, suspecting danger, was working his vessel under the guns of the Castle. These and the cannon of the privateer opened fire almost simultaneously, and the launches were driven off with heavy loss. The first lieutenant of the Armstrong was wounded and one man was killed.

Another attack was made at midnight with 14 launches and about 500 men. A terrible conflict ensued, which lasted 40 minutes. The enemy was repulsed, with a loss of 120 killed and 130 wounded. At daybreak a third attack was made, by the brig-of-war Carnation. She opened heavily, but was very soon so cut up by the rapid and well-directed shot of the Armstrong that she hastily withdrew. The privateer was also much damaged. It was evident that she could not maintain another assault of equal severity; so Captain Reid, who had coolly given orders from his quarter-deck during the attack, directed her to be scuttled, to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy. She was then abandoned, when the British boarded her and set her on fire. It is a curious fact, that while the British lost over 300 in killed and wounded during ten hours, the Americans lost but two killed and seven wounded.

In addition to the glory won by the bravery of this resistance to the British squadron, Captain Reid and his gallant men deserve the just credit of having thereby saved the city of New Orleans from capture. This squadron was part of the expedition then gathering at Jamaica for the purpose of seizing New Orleans, and the object of their attack on the Armstrong was to capture her and make her a useful auxiliary in the work. She so crippled her assailants that they did not reach Jamaica until full ten days later than the expedition expected to sail from there. That expedition waited for Commander Lloyd, and, when it finally approached New Orleans, General Jackson was approaching to make competent arrangements for its defense. Had the fleet arrived ten days sooner that city would have been an easy prey to the British, for it was utterly defenseless until that General arrived with his troops.

The Portuguese Government demanded and received from that of England an apology for this violation of neutrality; also restitution for the destruction of Portuguese property at Fayal during the action. That Government also demanded satisfaction and indemnification for the destruction of the American vessels in their neutral port. This England refused, and from that day to this the owners of the privateers and their heirs have never been able to procure indemnification for their loss, either from England, or Portugal, or from their own Government.

The defense made by the Armstrong and the circumstances of the attack produced a great sensation throughout the United States. Captain Reid was justly praised as one of the most daring of American naval commanders, and he received varied honors in abundance. The State of New York gave him thanks and a sword, and he was every where received with the greatest enthusiasm on his return to the United States.

The New Yorkers sent out a splendid vessel of 17 guns and 150 men, called the Prince de Neufchâtel, in command of Captain Odronaux. She was a very fortunate privateer. During a single cruise she was chased by no less than seventeen armed British vessels, and escaped them all; and she brought to the United States goods valued at $300,000, with much specie. On the 11th of October, 1814, she encountered five armed boats from the British frigate Endymion, off Nantucket. The Neufchâtel was then very light-handed, having, when the fierce battle that ensued commenced, only 36 men at quarters. Early in the forenoon the engagement began. The boats were arranged for the assault, one on each side, one on each bow, and one under the stern. Within the space of twenty minutes the assailants cried for quarter. It was granted. One of the boats had gone to the bottom with 41 of 43 of her crew. The whole number of men in the five boats was 111, a large portion of whom were killed, wounded, or made prisoners. The privateer lost 7 killed and 24 wounded. She returned to Boston on the 15th of October. The Neufchâtel was afterward captured and sent to England.

At this time the terror inspired by the doings of the American privateers was intense. The British began to seriously contemplate the probabilities of the complete destruction of their commerce. Fear magnified their numbers, powers, and exploits. Meetings of merchants were held to remonstrate against their depredations. It was asserted that one of these "sea devils" was rarely captured, and that they impudently bid defiance alike to English privateers and stately 74's. Insurance was refused on most vessels, and on some the premium was as high as 33 per cent. "Thirteen guineas for £100," said a London journal, "was paid to insure vessels across the Irish Channel! Such a thing never happened, we believe, before." The Board of Admiralty and the Prince Regent were petitioned for aid in checking these depredations; and the Government was compelled, because of the state of public feeling, to give assurance (which they had not power to support) that ample measures should be taken for the protection of British commerce.

We have referred to the impudence as well as boldness of the American privateers. A small one, belonging to Charleston, mounting six carriage-guns and a Long Tom, appropriately named Saucy Jack, affords an illustration. She was every where, and being clipper-built and skillfully managed, was too fleet for the English cruisers. On one occasion, when cruising off the west end of St. Domingo, she chased two vessels—it was on the 31st of October, 1814, at midnight—and when near enough, at one in the morning, she fired upon them. On coming up it was ascertained that one of them carried 16 and the other 18 guns. Nothing daunted by this discovery, she boarded one of them at seven in the morning, when it was found that she was full of men and a war vessel. The boarders fled back to the Saucy Jack, and the little privateer made haste to get away. The two ships chased her, pouring grape and musket-balls upon her, but within an hour she was out of reach of even their great guns. She lost 8 men killed and 15 wounded. Her chief antagonist was the British bomb-ship Volcano, with the transport Golden Fleece. One of the lieutenants and two of the seamen of the Volcano were killed, and two were wounded.

On Sunday, the 1st of May, the Saucy Jack captured the fine English ship Pelham, carrying ten guns and thirty-eight men. She was bound for London from a West India port, and had a cargo valued at $80,000.

The schooner Kemp, of Baltimore, was a very successful privateer. She was commanded by Captain Jacobs, a small, active man, who was both brave and humane. At the close of November, 1814, she sailed on a cruise in the West Indies, from Wilmington, North Carolina. On the 1st of December she chased a squadron of eight merchant-ships in the Gulf Stream, under convoy of a frigate. The frigate in turn gave chase, but the Kemp dodged her in the darkness of the ensuing night, and early the next morning she again gave chase to the merchantmen. At noon the following day she found them drawn up in battle-line; and at two o'clock they bore down upon the privateer, each giving her some shots as they passed. She reserved her fire until by a skillful movement she broke through the line, and discharged her whole armament into the enemy. This produced the greatest confusion, and within an hour and a half four of the eight vessels were the prizes of the Kemp. She could have taken the whole, but she had not men enough to man them. The other four proceeded on their voyage. The convoy frigate all this time was absent, vainly looking for the saucy privateer! The prizes, which gave an aggregate of forty-six cannon and one hundred and thirty-four men, were all sent into Charleston. It was a profitable cruise of only six days.

The Monmouth privateer, of Baltimore, about the same time was dealing destruction to British commerce off Newfoundland. She had a desperate encounter with an English transport-ship with over three hundred troops on board. Her superior speed saved her from capture.

Another successful Baltimore frigate was the Lawrence, of eighteen guns and one hundred and eleven men. During a single cruise, which terminated at New York on the 25th of January, 1815, a month before the proclamation of peace, she captured thirteen vessels. She took one hundred and six prisoners, and the aggregate amount of tonnage seized by her was over three thousand tons. One of the original crew of the Lawrence was a colored man named Henry Van Meter, whom I met at Bangor, in Maine, near the close of 1860, and made the annexed sketch of him. He was then ninety-five years old. He had been a slave to Governor Nelson, of Virginia, during the Revolution. He was afterward owned by another master, and was in the army of General Wayne. He was captured in a privateer off Lisbon, and was in the prison at Dartmoor, in England, when the captives were massacred there by the guard. The Macdonough, of Rhode Island, had a severe fight with a British ship, whose name is not recorded, on the 31st of January, 1815; the action commenced at musket-shot distance at half past two o'clock in the afternoon. The tremendous musket fire of the enemy caused the people of the Macdonough to suspect her of being a troop-ship. Such proved to be the case. She had at least three hundred soldiers on board besides her crew. The Macdonough suffered terribly in sails and rigging and loss of men; for her antagonist, in addition to the overwhelming numbers of men, carried eighteen 9-pounders. She succeeded in escaping from the British vessel, and reached Savannah on the 7th of March.

The war ended early in 1815, but it was some time after the proclamation of peace had been promulgated before all of the fifty privateers then at sea were apprised of it, and many captures were made after the joyful event occurred. One of the latest arrivals of successful privateers was that of the Amelia, of Baltimore, in April, 1815. She had a full cargo of valuable goods. During her cruise she had captured ten British vessels. Some she destroyed, others she sent into port, and one she gave up as a cartel for her prisoners. She carried only six guns and seventy-five men. The vessels she captured amounted in the aggregate to almost two thousand three hundred tons, and her prisoners numbered one hundred and twelve. Her trophies in arms were thirty-two cannon and many muskets. She was frequently chased by English cruisers, but her fleetness allowed her to escape.

In this outline sketch of American privateering during the second war for Independence notice has been taken of only the most prominent of the vessels which actually sustained a conflict of arms on the ocean of sufficient importance to entitle the act to the name of a naval engagement. The record shows the wonderful boldness and skill of American seamen, mostly untaught in the art of naval warfare, and the general character of the privateering service. Nothing more has been attempted.

HENRY VAN METER.

The full history of the service, as it lies, much of it, unquarried, in the newspapers of the day and the manuscript log-books of the commanders, exhibits marvelous action and results.

After the first six months of the war the bulk of naval conflicts was carried on upon the ocean, on the part of the Americans, by private armed vessels, which "took, burned, and destroyed" about sixteen hundred British merchantmen, of all classes, in the space of three years and nine months, while the number of American merchant vessels destroyed during the same period did not vary much from five hundred. The American merchant marine was much smaller than that of the British; and owing to embargo acts, and apprehensions of war for several months before it was actually declared, a large portion of the former was in port when war was declared. Many vessels were taken far up navigable rivers for security against British cruisers or marauding soldiers, while others were dismantled in safe places.

The American private armed vessels which carried such disasters to British commerce numbered two hundred and fifty. Of these forty-six were letters of marque, and the remainder were privateers. Of the whole number one hundred and eighty-four were sent out from the four ports of Baltimore, New York, Salem, and Boston alone. The aggregate number sent out from Philadelphia, Portsmouth (New Hampshire), and Charleston was thirty-five. Large fortunes were secured by many of the owners, and some of them are enjoyed by their descendants at the present day. The practice of privateering is growing in disfavor more and more every year; and the Government of the United States, with a Christian spirit and enlightened public policy, has been for a long time endeavoring to form a league with the other great Powers of the earth to repeal the law of nations which sanctions it. Divested of all its specious habiliments of necessity, expediency, and law, it stands revealed in all the naked deformity of black PIRACY.

DOBBS'S HORSE.

ABOUT five years ago Theophilus and I prepared to realize the dream of our married life. We purchased a cottage in the country.

This was nearly the last round of the ladder of circumstances which had sprung, in all its vast proportions, from a pearly little speck of ivory that made more stir in coming into this world than the most enormous tusk ever thrust by elephant into an Indian jungle. I need not add that it was our Philly's first tooth.

Philly, christened Theophilus after his father, stood third on our family record. Being the first male item, he was of course invested with peculiar interest. Indeed, to our discerning eyes he at once evinced traits which lifted him far above all other babies in the created world. And now the dear little fellow was teething.

What wonder that, as Philly, growing paler and weaker every day, kicked and screamed his protest against the existing order of things, Theophilus became less pompous concerning him, and finally bowed his head meekly at my announcing one morning at breakfast that "something must be done at once." Every wedded man, unless his dura mater presents that abhorred condition a vacuum, knows very well what "something must be done" means when his wife says it. It means penetration. It means compliance. It means that all the hints lately sown on his unsuspecting mind are expected to suddenly burst into full flower. Therefore, when Theophilus heard me say that something must be done, he at once responded,

"Well, my dear, I suppose we shall have to try country air—the child is certainly failing."

The point was gained. My hints had bloomed. But this was only a bud, and I wanted the full-blown flower. So I remarked—with the air of a woman who had other things to think of—that he was right; the baby was failing, and, as far as my experience went, I thought that a country hotel or boarding-house would soon finish him.

"Then what is to be done?" cried Theophilus, thoroughly alarmed, and in a highly receptive condition.

Lifting the lid of the coffee-pot, and peering into it with intense interest, I remarked, abstractedly, that when people wished to go to the country, and had objections to boarding, they generally hired a cottage or something of that kind.

Now, one need not have gone through Euclid or studied Whately to know how this little breakfast scene finally resolved itself into a tiny country-box, packed with the entire Smith family, or, to speak more accurately, with our particular branch of it.

Our country-box was not exactly "the thing," because, to be candid, Theophilus was not, pecuniarily speaking, in a position to purchase just such a place as we desired in addition to our city expenses. Still it was a cottage; and our imaginations soon festooned its porch with coming vines, and rejoiced in the proposed lawn, where our little ones should roll "like tumbled fruit." The advertisement which had originally attracted us toward the place had described it as being well stocked with trees of every description. In fact, we purchased it mainly on the representations of this same advertisement. Theophilus had time to pay it only a flying visit after business hours, and as, according to the owner, there were no less than "six other gentlemen" eager to pounce upon the prize, we really did not dare to deliberate.

Accordingly, Theoph hired a man-of-all-work, and before dispatching him to the scene of action, gave him a list of written orders, foremost among which were special instructions concerning the aforesaid vines and lawn. There was to be a fine vegetable patch in the rear, and, as far as I could make out from the chart laid out by Theoph, the space between lawn and kitchen garden was to be filled with roses, honey-suckles, shrubs of all kinds, and showy annuals of every hue imaginable.

"Won't it be delightful, Theoph, for us to sit out under the vines when you come up from town in the afternoon—so different from that bleak piazza at Stamford; and while the children are rolling and chasing each other about the lawn, we can read and talk to our heart's content. Oh, it will be grand!"

Theoph kissed me, and said in his cheerful way that the very prospect made me look bright and rosy again. But he shook his head gravely when he heard Philly's feeble cry, and asked why in the world we couldn't go there at once. The gardener's wife must have the cottage all cleaned by this time, he said, and I had nothing to do but to pack up and go.

With the moths already flying about, it was trying to a woman with five Brussels carpets and all the parlor curtains and furniture on her mind—to say nothing of the summer's shopping—to hear the grand business of moving into the country for a summer spoken of so cavalierly; but I conquered the outraged spirit within, and even entered into an amicable consultation with Theophilus concerning the amount of furniture to be transferred to our five-room cottage.

His counsel was invaluable. Better to take up almost nothing in the furniture line, he said. We needed only to fit out a comfortable sitting-room—something a little tasteful, you know; four or five bedrooms for the family; a dining-room of some sort; and—oh yes!—a spare room by all means, for he meant to have Dobbs up there half the time; and, above all, plenty of kitchen equipments, for if there was any thing in the world he did hate it was a half-way dinner.

Striving to look as much like St. Cecilia as possible, and yet retain an impressive cast of countenance, I ventured to suggest, at this point, that there were but four rooms in the house besides the kitchen.

"No!" exclaimed Theophilus, staring innocently.

"I have counted them, my dear," I replied, with concentrated quietness of tone.

"You've counted them wrongly then, my love."

"Now, Theoph, do be reasonable. There's the large sitting-room on the first floor—you certainly don't call the crockery closet between it and the kitchen a room?"

"No," said Theophilus meekly, at the same time holding up the first finger of his left hand to represent the sitting-room.

"Then on the second floor there's the small bedroom for Ellen over the hall."

Up went another finger.

"Well, the little room makes two; then there's the large front one, where the ceiling was bro—"

"By George!" cried Theoph, dropping his patent tally in a twinkling, "there's Dobbs!"

Alas! Dobbs was indeed crossing the street.

My husband was soon in the hall holding the front door wide open.

"Hallo! old fellow, how are you?" cried a hearty voice.

"All right, thank you. Walk in, walk in!"

Then there was a slight shuffling of boots on the oil-cloth, and in the next instant I heard the parlor blinds thrust violently open.

"Ha! ha!" laughed Mr. Dobbs, "that is something like. Now one can see out. Why in the world, Smith, do all you married men keep your parlors so dark?"

Whatever Theoph's reply may have been it is to this day locked in the bosom of Mr. Dobbs, for Philly required strict attention just then. The question made a deep impression upon me, however; and after that I took care to have the parlors rather lighter than formerly.

Why Mr. Dobbs should have been so fond of Mr. Smith, and why Mr. Smith so doted on Mr. Dobbs, are questions that I never expect to solve while in the flesh. To spiritual ken the mystery may be revealed clear as day. So I must be patient, and content myself by remarking that, in all the annals of masculine friendship, I have never met with so remarkable a case.

Mr. Dobbs was good enough in his way, but no more like Theoph than I to Hercules. In the first place, he was one of the restless sort, or, as he forcibly expressed it, "always on the go." He was a superb gymnast too; Theoph never moved a muscle unnecessarily, and looked forward to a heaven of perfect rest. Mr. Dobbs was soothing and conciliatory, Theophilus was an inveterate tease. Mr. Dobbs had a peculiar distaste for children; Theoph had doted on them since his own toddlehood. Mr. Dobbs was never unconquerable; Theoph's stubbornness when fairly aroused amounted to inspiration. Theophilus was extremely fond of music; Mr. Dobbs wished that the heavenly maid had died young. Dobbs delighted to shock one with his moral and social heterodoxy; Theoph was a model of propriety. Theoph was fastidious, too, in his personal habits; Dobbs was careless to a fault. Theoph reveled in the choicest literature; Mr. Dobbs never read a line if he could avoid it.

Yet, I repeat, these two men clung to each other with a love marvelous to behold. The friendship of Damon and Pythias was as nothing compared to it; for the two Syracusans were willing only to die for each other; and these were willing to live in friendship in spite of differences of opinion and taste.

Therefore when Theophilus first discovered there would be no spare room for his dear Dobbs, he stood transfixed with dismay and a sense of desolation. But Dobbs, nothing discouraged, assured him it was a matter of no consequence at all; he could be stowed away any where—in the barn, under a hen-coop, on the kitchen dresser for that matter.

"But," exclaimed my spouse, forgetting proprieties in his despair, "there isn't any dresser, hang it!"

"Well," rejoined Dobbs, soothingly, "there'll be a sofa, or a table, or we'll swing a hammock somewhere—never fear, man."

We were in our country-box at last, and before we were fairly "settled" Philly began to show decided signs of improvement. That was the main thing, of course. But how shall I describe the sense of disappointment with which we gradually awoke to the conviction that our imaginations had been far more fertile than our land. That the vines and flowers which had sprung up so profusely there were of exceeding slow growth in actual soil? The "trees of every description" were so young and tender that they were visible only from particular points of view. Bare was our porch in June, and but for a neighbor's hint bare it would have remained. Our gardener's vine was one of the "slow and sure" kind, warranted to cover the lattice in five years; whereas Theoph and I were hardly willing to wait as many days.

The hint proved cheering, however; for with our new neighbor's assistance we planted morning-glory seed on one side of the porch and Madeira roots on the other; and, I am happy to say, Theoph and I did sit under the shadow of its vines before the summer was over—that is, when the mosquitoes allowed us the privilege.

As for the velvety lawn—if a wide expanse bearing six stones to each blade of grass constitutes a lawn, we had one with a vengeance. The flower-garden also fell short of our anticipations, certainly as far as luxuriance was concerned. Most of the "showy annuals" were like their modest sisters alluded to by Gray: they "blushed unseen," if they ever blushed at all, for we never saw any thing but their tombstones, or rather the labels which, at the time of planting, Mike had carefully erected over the grave of each particular variety.

The kitchen-garden was more promising, and that was of the most importance, after all. For what, as our neighbor, Miss Kimso, observed, are so delightful as pure, sweet, country vegetables, fresh from "your own vines and fig-trees?" This remark must be taken with mental reservation, for it was a peculiarity of Miss Kimso never on any account to use a quotation correctly, though she was overflowing with them at all hours and upon all occasions.

Blithe and agile, apparently nearing her fortieth summer, with light curls falling, "in a spring-like way," on either side of a face over which Time had tenderly drawn his finger, pressing hardest round the mouth and eyes, she diffused an electric influence that had light rather than life in it. Her short, quick footfall impressed one with a sense of the instability of things generally. If there was strength any where it was in her eye, but it was the strength of banded sentiments rather than of thought—of kindness rather than of sacrifice. That a warm heart was fluttering somewhere in her wisp-like little body we soon had ample proof. From the evening of our arrival, when she ran over with a kettle of hot tea and a dish of buttered biscuit, saying, by way of apology, that she was a stranger, but "were we not all men and brothers?" we felt that we should like her, whatever might be her peculiarities.

After a while we began to feel quite comfortable in our new abode. The servants ceased to complain that the place was "so dreary-like." As for the children they were in Elysium, and reveled and romped from morning till night. Here and there a flower bloomed on some solitary spike, and a faint greenish hue broke out in spots over our lawn. The tree, too, was an unfailing source of joy and admiration; and Miss Kimso's cow, with a tinkling bell swinging from its neck, served to give a rustic charm to the scene. Besides, the birds exerted themselves when they found we were not dull-eared country-folk, and crickets and katydids gave a pulse to the very air we breathed. Theoph had smuggled a great trunkful of books among the baggage, and was never at a loss—though the children's muddy shoes and their freckled little noses distressed him exceedingly.

The crowning joy of all, however, was our horse and rockaway. Theophilus and I had held many a consultation before we decided upon this piece, or rather these pieces, of extravagance. But there was such a snug little barn on the premises, and Philly needed the rides so much, and—in short, we wished it; and when did any one ever cultivate a wish without producing a plentiful crop of good reasons in its favor?

I may inform the trusty reader that our rockaway was second-hand; as good as new, however, or even better, if the representations of Messrs. Jacobs and Co., carriage-dealers, are to be relied upon. The horse was represented to be a rare mixture of physical perfection and all the cardinal virtues. Certainly a prettier, more graceful animal never trod in harness. He had such grand ways too; would paw the earth with impatient hoof, and curve his neck as though he felt the blood of old Bucephalus coursing in his veins. The daintiness of his appetite was charming; and for a while our great pastime, whenever he was brought to the door, was to pull up spears of grass for him, and put lumps of sugar, one by one, into his lordly mouth. I used often to lay my cheek against his warm neck, and fancy myself Di Vernon, until one day Mike startled me with,

"Have a care, or he'll be steppin' on yer foot, mum! He was near takin' the toes off meself this mornin'!"

I sprang back, knocking Julie and Nelly over in the act.

"Why, Mike, you don't mean to say that there's any thing vicious about him, do you?"

"Well, indade, mum, perraps he's not afther knowin' that your fate's any tinderer thin his own is," he answered, adjusting the harness as he spoke; "and the flies has him oneasy like. Would ye be wantin' me to drive, mum, or is the gentleman intendin' to go?"

"I shall drive," answered Theophilus, stepping from the porch.

When we were all in—two on the front seat, and two on the back—Mike retreated a few steps, and, without raising his eyes, said,

"Would ye be stoppin' at the village, Sir?"

"Yes," replied Theoph, tightening the reins. "Why?"

"There's hay a-wantin', Sir, if ye'd plaze spake till them about it down to the bridge."

Theoph nodded, and off we started. The horse went beautifully, and his driver was in high spirits.

"There's a stride for you!" he exclaimed, after a moment's silence. "Free as air, isn't it?"

After we had stopped at the village post-office, attended to a little marketing, and left an order for the hay, Theoph turned the horse's head homeward.

"I say, Em, this is a glorious animal! I can sell him in the fall for double his cost. Why in the world Jacobs let me have him for a hundred and fifty I can not conceive!"

"He belonged to Jacobs's brother, you remember, who was going unexpectedly to California," I said.

"Yes," returned Theoph; "but Jacobs was probably ignorant of his worth. He said he knew nothing at all about horse-flesh. He's descended from the famous Black Prince, you know."

"Who?—Jacobs?" I asked, in astonishment.

"No; the horse. It strikes me, Emma," continued Theophilus, between his teeth, "you're inclined to be rather facetious this morning."

"Oh, not at all, darling! go on. I love to hear you talk about the beautiful creature—"

"Who?—Jacobs?"

Of course I pouted now. Theoph would have been quite restored to good-humor by his own joke had not the horse's tail become hopelessly entangled in the lines at this moment.

"That rascally Mike has forgotten the fly-net again! The fellow is too careless for any thing!"

"It is provoking," I assented, amiably, "especially as I called to him, while he was harnessing the horse, not to forget it."

One bright morning in June it occurred to me that there could not be the slightest possible harm in my taking the nurse and children to the village myself. The rockaway was in perfect order, and Prince was so gentle that, as Jacobs had said, a baby could manage him. Besides, Miss Kimso would be delighted to accompany me; she knew all about driving, and would attend to the horse while I was in the store.

Accordingly our party was soon ready to start. Miss Kimso and I were on the front seat, and Ellen the nurse, Philly, and the two little girls were compactly stowed away in the rear.

It was a lovely day, and we enjoyed our ride to the utmost. Philly actually crowed with delight; and his sisters, when they ceased complaining that they were "so cowed," laughed and sang with glee.

A pleasant letter from my dear friend Mary C—— was handed me at the village post-office; our purchases were made; and we were turning out of the village when, suddenly, an unusual sound in that region broke upon us—the sound of a brass band in the distance playing that inspiriting air, "The Campbells are coming." It came from a showy-looking wagon moving slowly toward us. The effect was really charming. Nelly cried, "Soljers, soljers!" and but for the nurse would have fallen from the rockaway in her excitement. I chirruped to Prince, and gave myself up to the pleasure of the moment.

The notes grew more distinct. Flags were waved merrily from the approaching wagon, and Master Prince stood stock-still, and pricked up his ears.

"Ah!" said Miss Kimso, rolling up her eyes, "'Music hath charms to soothe the savage beast:' let him listen."

Prince did listen, and listening, he concluded to accompany the music with a merry dance. He pranced, he ambled, he chasséd, and, finally, he stood on his hind-legs and bowed to an imaginary partner before commencing the grand galopade.

Ellen and the children screamed, Miss Kimso clutched at the reins, and I, in the flash of a second, remembered every cross word I had ever said to Theophilus.

In an instant two men had the descendant of the Black Prince by the head, and were speaking soothingly to him.

"Whoa boy! whoa boy!"

His Royal Highness, after a few more flourishes and fantastic turns, subsided into a pathetic tremble.

"Jim," said one of the men in a low tone, "there's one of them blasted circuses a-comin'; you'd best drive the ladies home. It's Miss Smith, you know, the Yorkers that bought Weeks's cottage. Couldn't that young woman there on the back seat walk home?" he continued, looking toward me and raising his voice. "It ain't more'n a mile an' a 'alf."

"It's two," muttered the other man, raising his hat, and scratching his head as he spoke; "it's a good two."

Ellen was only too glad to get out.

"An' will I carry the child, mum?" she asked, composing her skirts with one hand while supporting Philly, professionally, with the other.

"Oh no, he's too heavy!" cried Miss Kimso, jumping nimbly over the back seat. "Here, hand him to me, the sweet, budding innocent. I'll take good care of him."

Jim sprang in beside me and drove off cautiously amidst a shower of "Thank you's" from Miss K. and myself.

Just before we came to a bend in the road Master Prince began to prick up his ears again. Jim gave me the reins in a twinkling. "Good land!" he exclaimed, jumping out and seizing the animal by the head—"he smells somethin' a-comin', depend on it!"

Indeed he did; two great elephants, and a party of horsemen. We could see them distinctly now.

"Keep yer seats, ladies! There ain't no danger!" panted Jim, as the horse's head gave him arm some pretty vigorous jerks. "There, whoa boy! whoa! whoa!"

Strange to say, Prince faced the elephant more bravely than he did the music. He twitched and trembled all over at first and seemed ready to drop with fear; but the man's voice and touch gradually reassured him.

It was an old elephant and her young one. What wonder that a poor little horse should quiver and start beside that mighty bulk with the stealthy, ponderous tread!

The young elephant stalked closely by its mother, and, by the senseless flourishes of its smooth trunk and the twitches of its stumpy little tail, betrayed the youthful spirit that time and worldly cares had quite subdued in its parent.

"Oh, mamma!" cried Julie, as soon as her astonishment would allow her to speak, "Oh, mamma, do look! see the dear, little, baby elephant: isn't he, too, cunnin'?"

"Yes, dear, very," I responded, abstractedly, looking anxiously at Prince, who was about one-third of the "dear little" creature's size.

We reached home without any further mishap. Theophilus and Mr. Dobbs had come up by an early train and stood by the gate to welcome us.

Theoph gave one of his queer looks as he spied the coatless youth beside me, but Dobbs took in the thing at a glance.

"Good-day, Madame! Horse has been a little fractious, hey?"

The next day, after dinner, Theophilus proposed a ride. "Will you go, Em?" said he.

"Not to-day, dear, thank you! I have lost my confidence in Prince somewhat."

"Nonsense, Em. I'd like to see the horse I can't manage. Besides, one doesn't meet elephants in this latitude every day. Put on your things, love, we'll drive to Eagle Rock."

Llewellyn Park and Eagle Rock were always conquering temptations with me. While I stood in front of the glass, between the windows, putting on my bonnet, I saw our hired man drive Prince to the door. The beautiful creature looked so gentle, and pawed the ground so reflectively, that my foolish fears were gone in an instant. I called out of the window to my spouse,

"Shall we take Philly, dear?"

"Certainly, by all means," he replied, "if the little dumpling is not too heavy for you."

"I'll hold her," called up Mr. Dobbs, looking utterly wretched in an instant.

"Oh no!" laughed Theoph, "let the nurse come also, Em. There is plenty of room." Then I heard him say in an under-tone to his friend,

"How often must I tell you, Dobbs, that the baby is a boy? Theophilus Smith, Junior; now, don't forget it again."

"Beg his pardon, really; but you see the name, 'Philly,' misled me. I thought it was Phillis. The rest of the children are all girls—ain't they, Smith?" he asked, in a tone of deep interest.

We were off at last. Prince, thoroughly penitent, never went better. If any thing, he showed scarcely enough spirit, for Theoph and I were very proud of him, especially as people in the neighborhood began by this time to know who we were.

"He's a free goer, Smith," said Mr. Dobbs, regarding him critically. "Hallo! he don't interfere a little in the hind-legs—does he?"

"Of course not," rejoined Theoph, scornfully. "Why, look at him, man! There's not a sounder set of legs any where. Did you notice his breadth of chest?"

"No; but I see he's uncommon high in the flanks. He'd make a racer, Smith, that horse would!"

Theoph grew radiant.

"Give him the reins, Smith. George! what a neck he has! He's kind, too, depend upon it. Not one animal in a hundred but would have run like all creation, coming suddenly upon an elephant in that way."

"Certainly," assented Theoph, becoming ecstatic, "I don't want any better test than that. You could walk him up to a whole menagerie, Sir!"

Just then we heard a shout, and a great muddy white pig came dashing through a farm-gate.

I have a vague remembrance of clutching wildly for the baby; of seeing Dobbs high up in the air; of my cheek being dragged heavily against the gravel, and of scrambling to my feet just in time to see Prince dashing off madly in the distance with our rockaway, minus top and passengers.

What bundle was that lying heavily on the bushes beside the road? Theoph was picking it up. It was Philly! Paralyzed at the sight, I managed to gasp out, "Oh, Theoph, is he dead?"

"No, all right!" he shouted, clasping the terrified little creature to his heart. "There's not a scratch on him, thanks to those good bushes!"

"Hollo, Smith!" exclaimed a dusty figure sitting in the middle of the road; "allow an old sinner to correct you. I'd give a little credit to Providence, if I were you."

"Dobbs, my dear fellow, you all safe, too? Yes, indeed, we have reason to thank Providence!" he exclaimed, fervently.

"For which, the escape or the accident?" asked the incorrigible Dobbs, getting up slowly and knocking the dust from his clothes.

"For both," returned Theoph, solemnly. "Good gracious, Emma, look at your cheek!"

I couldn't very well look at my cheek, under the circumstances, and as I certainly felt no sensation there, I scarcely noticed his exclamation in my excitement, but ran over to Ellen, the nurse, who sat upon the grass looking wildly about her.

Theophilus and Mr. Dobbs stood her upon her feet and worked her arms like pump handles. There were certainly no bones broken. Yet she seemed bewildered and unable to walk.

"Oh, Theoph, dear, she is injured internally!" I cried, in distress. "One of you must run to Orange for a doctor."

"How! Fathers! where am I?" broke forth the poor girl at last.

"You're all safe now, Ellen," I replied, kneeling beside her and putting my arm tenderly round her shoulder. "We have been thrown from the carriage. See, here's dear little Philly—don't you know him?"

Theoph held the baby on her lap. In an instant she caught him in her arms, and kissed him over and over again, sobbing as if her heart would break.

"Och, me darlin'! me darlin'! Is it kilt ye are? Ah, my poorty baby! Bad look to the murtherin' baste thin!"

We knew she was all right now. This point settled, I suddenly felt a great tingling in my left cheek. Mr. Dobbs and Theoph were talking together. I heard the latter say, hurriedly,

"Yes, you may try—somebody has probably caught him before this. I must stay and attend to Em."

By this time there were a few persons around us. One fleshy lady, bearing a pitcher of water and a bundle of rags, who declared it was "the most mirac'lous accident she ever heard of"—two teamsters, and a sprinkling of deeply entertained children.

The men were soon busily examining the remnants of our rockaway-top; lifting broken bits of iron, wood, and any amount of leather and torn cushion arrangements.

"If it hadn't a bin sich a rotten old thing it would a gone harder with you," observed one of the men, sententiously, to my crest-fallen Theophilus.

"Yes, it must have went all to pieces at the first go," remarked the other teamster, reflectively.

The fat lady conducted our dilapidated party to her cottage near by, and in true Oriental style gave us water, and bade us wash and be welcome. My cheek proved to be badly scraped; but Theophilus, bless his heart! is the tenderest nurse in the world, and soon made me comparatively comfortable.

Our habiliments, though, were past repair. Such looking objects as we were! My "love of a bonnet" was a hopeless wreck. As for Theoph's clean linen "duster" it was past redemption by either soap or needle. Ellen was all excitement, and remembered the accident in its minutest particulars.

"Och! indade, ma'am," she repeated again and again, "but it was areful. I saw the horris give one lep, and thin over we wint all forninst the other! but I never onst let go the dear child, ma'am, but jist held on till him through it all. If ye'll belave me, ma'am, I gathered his very cloak around him—so I did!"

After putting our hearts all aglow with the thought that God's children were good and kind to each other after all, our adipose friend sent us home in her only vehicle—a farm wagon filled with clean straw.

To our astonishment, as we neared the house, we saw Mr. Dobbs and the man rubbing down Prince, who, steaming and panting, stood near a cart-like looking affair that proved on inspection to be the remains of our lovely, "better-ash-new" rockaway. He had dashed in with it at a furious rate, much to the consternation of our home force.

A lame, aching party were we the next day. Mr. Dobbs was sorely bruised, and couldn't think of going to town. Theoph and Kelly, our hired man, took Prince back to Mr. Jacobs and entered their complaint.

All the satisfaction they could get was that "he vash not a horsh-dealer—it vash his brudder's horsh—he know notting 'bout him—his brudder vash gone to Canadah—"

"You told me California," interrupted poor Theoph.

"Vell, vat if I did?" retorted Mr. Jacobs, in no way disconcerted. "My brudder vill go to both country 'fore he come home. You ax me take de horsh off you hand? Vat for? I no vant him. A horsh run vay vonce he ish no vorth zat" (snapping his fingers).

Just as Theoph, after a despairing protest, was about to leave the spot in disgust, accompanied by Kelly and the Prince, Jacobs called him back.

"I tell you vat I vill do, and I can do no more. I can not give you pig price for runavay horsh; he ish not vort twenty dollar. But I vill do zis. You say you carriage all broke: vell, I vill give you good coupé, most so good ash new, for him; vat you say to zat, hey?"

At first the offer was rejected with disdain; but, finally, my Antonio, not having his Portia there to attend to the case, let it go by default. The (horse) flesh fell to Shylock, and the coupé was sent to "Flowery Grove" by the evening train.

The only excuse Theophilus gave on his return to that prematurely-named spot was that he could not conscientiously sell the animal to any one else; and he knew carriage number one was past repairing. As to another horse he really did not know how in the world he could spare the cash to get one just then, but he would try to manage it somehow.

At this point Damon came to the rescue of his Pythias.

"Smith!" he exclaimed, springing from a recumbent position, and slapping Theophilus on the shoulder, "have I been asleep! Why in the world didn't I think of it before? There's just the very animal you want, over in Westchester County, waiting for you to come and take him!"

Theoph stared hopefully, and Mr. Dobbs continued: "Just the very thing, I tell you. A good, sound family horse—not young, but all the safer for that. Has been a splendid-looking creature in his day; but the people up there have let him go down a little. All they care for is to get the price of his board. I have had my misgivings of late that it's not exactly the right place for him. All you need do is to have him brought here at once. You will soon get him in high condition, and may have the full use of him for his keep. There you are, my man! Hold! I'll give him to you, though there's not another man in the world that should have him.

Pythias thanked him heartily, and declared that he thought, under the circumstances, it would be about the best thing for both sides.

"Certainly it would, my boy, certainly it would," said Damon, tumbling back again on the sofa, "we'll have him here at once."

As an interested spectator to the scene I could not help wondering why Mr. Dobbs, who evidently was not burdened with a surplus worldly treasure, should have assumed the expense of keeping a horse in this manner. Theophilus relieved me by asking the question point-blank.

Mr. Dobbs replied rather gruffly,

"He belonged to my mother—" and closed his eyes with pretended drowsiness. I saw his lip tremble, though, and from that hour have loved him in spite of his queer notions.

The horse was on a farm in Westchester County, near the old cottage where our friend had lived through his happy childhood, and where his parents had, within a year of each other, fallen into their last sleep. A simple marble slab in the village church-yard, bearing the inscription "Father and Mother," marks their resting-place. My tears fell one bright day last autumn when an old woman living near the spot pointed out the grave, and told me that she saw a tall gentleman with waving brown hair plant the ivy and roses there with his own hands.

Great was my surprise, on the second day after our upsetting, to receive a note from Theophilus saying that he would not be up that night, and that he wished Mr. Dobbs, "lame or not, to come down, without fail, by the first train!" "No cause for alarm," the letter added; it was "only a business affair requiring immediate attention," etc.

On the next evening Theoph came back alone.

"Well, Em," he exclaimed, while kissing all three of the children at once, as nearly as practicable, "Dobbs is off!"

"Off! where?"

"Why, he's gone. Gone to California. A splendid opening for him turned up yesterday. He saw the parties last night, and was off this afternoon at a few hours' notice. The energy of that man is prodigious!"

"How long will he be away?"

"Oh, perhaps three months, perhaps a year; can't tell. Where's Kelly? Down in the village?"

"Yes. Why?"

VOL. XXIX.—No. 173.—S s

"I shall have to send him to Westchester by the first train to-morrow morning. Dobbs's horse is to be brought down."

"That is good news!" I exclaimed, quite delighted. "But how did you have an opportunity to make the arrangements?"

"Oh, Dobbs thinks of every thing. You never saw any thing like it. Just before he started he handed me this letter, which he says will make it all right with Fowler, the man who has the horse. The last thing he said as the boat let go was, 'Take care of old Charley, my boy. "Love me, love my dog," you remember.' And then he waved his handkerchief and was off."

All the next day our household, Philly excepted, were in a fever of expectation; and when six o'clock came (the time when Kelly and the horse were expected to make their appearance) the excitement was intense. Even Miss Kimso ran over to witness, as she said, the arrival of "The gallant young man on a spirited steed."

The two little girls clapped their hands and ran about the lawn like bewildered chickens; and the cook, housemaid, and Ellen were constantly running in turn to the front gate, screaming, "There he comes! No, it's a wagon, sure." "Faith, he's bringin' two horses, mum. Oh no, it's the stage that's comin'!" At last Ellen cried out, in a tone of unmistakable certainty,

"An' by the powers, mum, here he is! Well, if iver I saw the like!"

Heralded by this announcement, Kelly (yelept "Pat" by his intimates) rode in state through the grand entrance, now officiously thrown open by Julie and the cook. Theophilus, who had been under the pear-tree reading Motley with dignified composure all the afternoon, threw down his book and came forward.

There we all stood, an eager group, every eye intent upon Charles and his rider. Kelly appreciated his opportunity, and tried for once "To witch the world with noble horsemanship." Alas! it was useless. Feeling that an apology was required he exclaimed, after jerking angrily at the bridle without producing any visible effect,

"Ah, Sir, divil a bit off uv a walk would he move for me the day! The craythure's bones is a'most through the skin, Sir."

At the peroration of this startling address he presented a side-view to the assembled spectators. The effect was electric. Theophilus looked tragic; Miss Kimso uttered an ejaculation of horror; Ellen and Kitty giggled; and the cook clapped her hands on her knees and laughed immoderately.

"Faith, he's a jewel, Sir," said Kelly, with a grin, sliding down from the animal's back and gaining courage from the sounds around him. "Upon me sowl, Sir, I'm thinkin' it's feedin' him on barrels they've bin, if seein' the staves betokens any thing."

"Silence!" exclaimed Theophilus.

"Will I take him yonder to the stable, Sir?" asked Kelly, sobered in an instant.

"Yes. Stay!" said Theophilus, with some hesitation. "Are you sure you've made no mistake—that you've brought the right horse?"

"Faith, Sir," answered Kelly, brightening, "it's meself axed that same question, Sir. But there wasn't, barrin' this one, another horris in it. Perraps the letther, Sir, will tell yez about it," he continued, as, after tugging at his pocket for a minute or so, he succeeded in producing a crumpled note.

"Yes, it's all right," said Theoph, after reading the missive and handing it to me with a hopeless air.

"Theoph, dear," I ventured, soothingly, as soon as we were alone, "we may as well take it as a joke. It's the funniest thing that has ever happened to us, so why not laugh at it?"

"Humph!" replied my spouse, stiffly. "If you can see any fun in our keeping that snuff-colored skeleton for the rest of his days you're very welcome. What in the world Dobbs was thinking of in saddling me with that lank, long-backed, high-hipped affair I can not conceive."

"But he had not seen him for some time," I urged, knowing that the best way to get Theoph in a good humor was to take his Damon's part. "He told us the horse would probably be in bad condition, you know."

"Yes, so he did. Let Dobbs alone for being fair and honest. Well, care and good feeding may possibly bring up the old nag after all. He said he had been a splendid animal, didn't he?"

"Certainly he did. Every body knows what a difference a little flesh makes with a horse. When once we get him good, and fat, and well-brushed, and all that sort of thing, he will be a different creature; and, after all, the great comfort is, he will be perfectly safe and reliable."

"There's a skeleton in every house," says some old croaker, I forget who, and sometimes one can't help believing that it is so. Our skeleton was most emphatically old Charley. Rubbing, brushing, combing, blanketing, feeding the creature were of no avail; a skeleton he remained. To be sure, when compelled to use him, we managed to conceal his anatomy by means of an elaborate fly-net, adding a sort of double night-cap arrangement which went over his ears, and, with its dangling tassels, gave a slightly animated effect. This arranged, Kelly, by tightening the check-rein so as to raise the long neck to a slight angle with the back, and plying the whip industriously, strove to keep up appearances while conveying us to church or to the village. Theophilus, who walked to and from the station every day, couldn't and wouldn't drive the creature; but Miss Kimso and myself sometimes, on rare occasions, assumed that responsibility. That it was a mortification both to the flesh and the spirit to do so I will not deny. But the baby needed mountain air; and Kelly, who was coachman, footman, stable-boy, gardener, and wood-cutter, all in one, could not always make it convenient to accompany us.

In simple justice, however, to the venerable

Charles, it must be stated that balking was not a frequent practice with him. As a general rule he jogged along at a regular gait, engrossed in brown study; and it was only when, apparently, the subject under consideration became too much for him that he stopped short, in order to take it up deliberately in all its possible bearings. I really did not dare to tell Theophilus of this little peculiarity, for fear my career as a whip should suddenly be ended by imperial command. With his high sense of honor and the claims of friendship I knew he would keep old Charley at any cost, and the luxury of another horse was not to be thought of for an instant. Poor Theoph felt the deprivation keenly, but he never hesitated when following, as he believed, the simple line of duty. He would be true to Dobbs, and Dobbs's horse, whatever might happen. Sometimes, from his high altitude, he would try to regard Charley as a real treasure, or, as his friend Sparrowgrass would say, "a most excellent thing to have in the country;" but this was carrying high-toned principle a little too far.

One afternoon my husband came from town by an earlier train than usual. I should have been alarmed, fearing he was ill, had I not heard him whistling "Il Segreto" as he walked up the path.

"Em!" he shouted, as he bustled into the cottage, "want to go to town to-night? I've taken seats at the Academy. They're going to have 'Lucrezia Borgia' for the last time this season!"

"Oh, Theoph!" I cried, in dismay, "how could you? You know I can not possibly leave the children."

"Yes, you can, my dear; I have made arrangements for Aunt Ann to come up by the half past five train on purpose."

"Oh, thank you, Theoph! What a dear, thoughtful creature you are! but—" And my heart sank at a thought which flashed upon me.

"But what?" asked Theoph, impatiently.

"My bonnet!" I faltered. "I have no bonnet!"

"No bonnet! Why what in the world did you wear to the village yesterday?"

"Oh that was a distressed old thing. My best one was ruined on that day—"

"What day?"

"Why the day that Prince ran away with us. Don't you remember?"

Theoph did remember perfectly, of course; but he wished to go to the opera, and so would not admit any thing in reference to the damaged head-gear. He flung the tickets upon the sitting-room table, and asked, with an injured air, what was to be done?

Suddenly his mood brightened. "I have it! Wear one of those worsted things such as you hang over the chairs in winter. What do you call them? Riddle—riddle—something?"

"Rigolette!" I laughed. "Yes, so I can. My rigolette will answer admirably; but—oh dear!—how can I wear it coming home to—" morrow? No lady would wear such a thing, traveling, in the day time."

Theoph threw up his arms in desperation. "Well, if it's not easier to start a ship of war than a woman any time! There are hats in New York, I presume. You can buy one in the morning."

Prudence forbade the suggestion that ladies were also not in the habit of shopping by daylight in rigolettes. Trusting that somebody at Aunt Ann's would lend me a bonnet for the purpose, I hastened from the room, in fine spirits, to make the necessary arrangements for our departure.

In an instant Theoph called out, in a tone of despair,

"Em, it's no use! The next train doesn't stop at this station, and there is no other until nine o'clock!"

"Never mind!" I called back, leaning over the baluster. "The 5.30 train stops at Orange."

"But Orange is six miles off," groaned Theoph.

"What if it is?" I responded, cheerily. "Old Charley can take us if we start in time."

"Hurrah! so he can; and stop for Aunt Ann too at our dépôt on his return. Hurry, dear!"

Our turn-out didn't look so very badly after all when Kelly, arrayed in his best clothes, drove around to the door. That fly-net was certainly a great institution. After kissing the children a dozen times, and thanking Miss Kim-so for her kind offer to remain with them until Aunt Ann's arrival, we sprang into the coupé, and directed Kelly to drive with all practicable speed to the Orange Dépôt.

Charley seemed determined to do his best; and Theoph, leaning back complacently, remarked, "If we keep on at this rate we shall have time enough and to spare."

Before we had proceeded a mile, however, my unfortunate spouse suddenly clapped his hands on his pockets, looked blank, and gasped,

"There! I have left the tickets in the pocket of my other coat. Stop, Kelly; we must go back for them: there's ample time."

Kelly turned toward home, and Charley, well pleased at the change, started off at quite a lively pace. More for the sake of saying something than for any other reason I remarked that I thought I saw him throw them on the sitting-room table. Quick as a wink Theoph clapped his hands on his pockets again.

"No—all right—I have them. I remember now picking them up the last thing. Turn around again, Kelly."

Order easily given, and, one would suppose, easily obeyed. But alas! what can willing mind avail against obstinate matter? Kelly pulled one rein, clicked, shouted, and plied his whip—all to no purpose. He even stood up to give additional vigor to his strokes, then jumped out and took "the baste" insinuatingly by the head. Charles's determination was evident. Go forward he would; turn around again he would not.

"Then, by the powers!" exclaimed Kelly, seating himself with new energy, and lashing his horse forward, "but I'll get ahead of ye yet, yer varmint!"

"What are you going to do now?" cried Theoph.

"I'm going up a bit, Sir, to the next turn there by the churrich. If I can just kape his attintion till we get onto the other road it's all right wid yez yet."

Theoph looked admiringly at Kelly, and whispered something to me about "native wit;" but I was too much discouraged to listen.

The ruse succeeded. Charley turned down the next road during one of his fits of brown study, and was soon going once more, slowly but surely, toward the station.

After proceeding a few miles further we saw our train, far in the distance, hissing its way along like some great reptile.

"All right!" exclaimed Theoph. "We'll catch it yet, if this old bag of bones doesn't tumble down."

Now what decent, high-minded horse could be expected to stand such a remark as this?

Charles stopped short.

"Get up!" shouted Kelly, in a tone of alarm.

The distant train became more distinct.

"Get up, you baste!"

We could almost count the cars.

"Ge-et up!"

The smoke-pipe would soon be visible.

"Arrah! be gar! whill ye get up?"

Charles stood after the manner of a kitchen-bench—legs all out at an angle of forty-five.

"I'll tell ye what, Sir," said Kelly, laying down the lines, "There's nothin' for yez but ter get out an' walk. It's not near a half mile, Sir, and ye'd be there in time. They wait a good bit ter take on the wood."

Springing out with alacrity—for I was not going to miss the opera after all this trouble—I led the way resolutely, and Theoph followed.

"This is what I call seeking pleasure under difficulties," he panted, gaining my side as I hurried on.

"Yes, but it's worth it," said I; "we can rest in the cars."

And so we might have rested in the cars had not the locomotive, with a fiendish shriek, dashed out of the dépôt with the whole train just as we were within twenty feet of the platform.

Shall I enter into the details of that exciting six-mile walk homeward, or tell how we hastened in the hope that we might still find Charley in statu quo; how we had the agony of seeing him, in the distance, finally yield to Kelly's labors; how Theophilus called and shouted in vain, as the equipage rattled homeward hopelessly in advance of us; how we still flew on and trusted that Charley, who never ran so before nor since, would take a rest and enable Kelly to hear our beseeching cry; how, finally, we did overtake them just before we reached our own gate; and how Aunt Ann soon came puffing up the road quite indignant that no carriage had been sent to the station to meet her? No. Rather let the reader fancy us sleeping sweetly and calmly that night after our unwonted exercise.

Let him also imagine my emotions when, in the dead of night, I was wakened by a mysterious thumping, apparently within three inches of my head.

I sprang to the floor. The window was open, but it was too dark to see any thing. Presently the thumping was repeated, and I heard Kelly's voice calling outside,

"Mr. Smith, are ye there, Sir?"

"What is the matter?" I called, terror-stricken.

"It's Mr. Smith I'm wantin', mum. The horris is very bad. Would ye ask him to come till the stable, mum?"

"Theoph! Theoph!" I cried, "wake up! Old Charley's sick!"

He gave a dismal moan at the name, but never stirred.

"Theoph" (shaking him vigorously), Theophilus! old Charley's sick—dying perhaps—oh do wake up. What would Mr. Dobbs say if—

"Dobbs be hanged!" muttered Theoph, glaring wildly at me. "There goes the train!" and he tumbled back on his pillow like a 40-pounder.

After rummaging frantically for the matches I lit a candle. By this time Philly was awake and screaming lustily. Theoph yielded to our combined efforts.

"What is the matter?" he asked, sitting up and rubbing his eyes. "Is the baby sick?"

"No. Kelly wants you to go to the stable. I'm afraid old Charley's dying."

"You don't say so!" exclaimed Theoph, leaping up with great alacrity. "If he is very bad we'll probably want whisky, or something of that kind, Em, and hot water. Perhaps four pails, too, so that we can soak all of his feet at once," he added, chuckling. In fact I never saw Theoph in better spirits, though he seemed resolved to do all he could to save the poor beast.

Soon after Theoph went out Kelly came to ask for the "dimmyjohn, ma'am."

"Och! but there's a hape in it!" he exclaimed, shaking it as he walked out.

Next, Theoph ran into the house for a long-necked bottle, with which to administer the whisky. We had quite a long search before we found one, especially as the draft blew out our candle three times. At last we were successful. I put on a big shawl over my double gown and went with Theoph to hold the lantern.

We found Kelly in excellent spirits, and more talkative than was his wont amidst

"The din and tell-tale glare of noon."

Poor Charley took the whisky quietly enough, though he had a kind of spasm afterward. His struggles were really frightful.

"Rub his legs, Kelly," said Theoph.

"Ah, be gorra, Sir," answered Kelly, obey-ing after a fashion, "I wouldn't be after troubling meself about the craythur, Sir. It's dyin' he is, anyhow. Arrah! an' it 'll be an aise till his bones to be under the sod! Divil a wooden over-coat he'll be wantin', at all, at all!"

Being soon weary of this style of eloquence, I put the lantern upon the ground and returned alone to the house. Theoph followed in a few moments.

"Em," he called, "where can I find some wood? I shall have to make a fire and heat some water. Hadn't you better wake Bridget or Kitty?"

Rather than call up the poor girls, who had gone to bed "worn-out with their week's ironing," I assisted my comfort-loving spouse through this mighty performance, and smiled to hear him whistling "Il Segreto" as he thrust in stick after stick.

"How is Charley now?" I asked, as soon as the blaze was fairly started.

"Pretty bad; may get over it, though. We've given him a stiff dose of whisky; and I told Kelly to rub his legs (the horse's legs, Mrs. Smith) until I returned."

It seemed as if the water would never get hot. At last Theoph, by deliberately scalding his hand in it, satisfied himself that it would "do," and was about to start off with a pailful, when a shrill scream caused him to splash about a quart of the fluid upon the floor.

"Help! Murder! Thieves!" screeched a voice from the sitting-room.

"Oh!" laughed Theoph, "it's Aunt Ann. Go quiet the poor soul, Em, while I call Kelly to take this pail."

In vain "Kelly!" "Kelly!" rang out on the midnight air. No individual of that name made his appearance. Theoph told me afterward that, when in desperation he carried the hot water to the barn himself, he found Kelly on his knees hugging old Charley most affectionately.

"Ah, my honey," whispered Kelly, confidentially, to Charles, "but we've had the fine time thegither. It's long since I've had a drop like that to warrum me. By Saint Pater! but whisky's the stuff for a boy, anyhow!"

"You've been at the whisky, have you? you scoundrel!" exclaimed Theoph, lifting the demi-john and shaking it with unexpected facility.

"Come, get up! Do you hear?"

"Have I bin at the whisky, yer Honor?" replied Kelly, indignantly, as he raised his head from Charley's neck. "Och! is it dhrinkin' I would be, an' the poor baste a dyin'?" and Charley received another hug.

Theophilus may have had great trials during the remainder of that night. I do not doubt it. But that was no reason why he should have been so fearfully cross all the next day. Kelly was a model of penitence, and promised by all the saints on the calendar never to transgress again, "exceptin'," he added, "I'm left all alone twicet forninst a dimmyjohn wid the corrik out—and St. Patrick himself couldn't howld out agin the like o' that."

Charley did not die—not a bit of it. He was only, as his keeper said, “a little overdid.” In a few days he was quite himself again; and before the week was over I was tempted to travel en voiture to the village once more.

I am happy to say our Rosinante quite redeemed himself on the occasion. The only fright he gave me was in showing decided symptoms of lying down while Kelly was in the feed-store. To my great relief a good-natured negro boy came to the rescue.

After tugging a while at Charley's head, and giving him a mouthful of water, he volunteered a remark or two.

“Dat yere horse is weak, Miss Smith, he is—can't har'ly stan' up—dat's a fac, he can't—'pears to me dey ort ter gib him more ter eat.”

This was a little too much. As I had no other audience I ventured to inform the sable youth that the animal had always more food offered him than he would take.

“Den he wants powders—juss let dem gib him 'dition powders fur de ap'tite—dey'd foteh him up mighty quick.”

The result of this little dialogue was, that before long we purchased a package of Hadley's famous Condition Powders. Young Africa was right. They did give Charley an appetite. He became ravenous as a wolf; but not an ounce of fat appeared in consequence. As Kelly facetiously remarked, it was “a race with him, whether to get higher in the bone or lower in the flesh.” Even Bridget had her joke at his expense, and talked of borrowing him for a wash-board. Theophilus grumbled, and declared that it cost more to feed him than it would a span of ordinary horses; and finally I announced, that ride behind his miserable carcass I never, never would again.

Abandoning, therefore, all hope of using him for the present, his afflicted owner, paying well for the privilege, had him turned loose every day in an adjoining field. Theoph even examined the fences himself, to be certain that they were all secure; for he had just received a letter from his dear Dobbs, alluding to “old Charley” in affectionate terms.

Here the creature's first exploit was to deliberately rush upon a broken rail and injure himself so badly that we were obliged to send for a horse doctor. Accordingly, Kelly was dispatched on foot to a small brick house in the village, proclaiming itself, by sundry signs, to be the abode of one Sanders, veterinary surgeon, and also of one Amos Dodd, who made and repaired gentlemen's clothing in the neatest possible style.

It was mournful, after all, to see Kelly riding back with the “dochter” in a muddy gig, and to watch them standing near old Charley in solemn consultation. I felt as if there was a death in the family already. Dr. Sanders, however, bound up the injured leg, administered a pill of about the shape and size of the end of a potato-masher, and proclaimed his patient out of danger.

But no: Charles keeled over during the afternoon, and lay upon the grass whizzing like a capsized locomotive. Theophilus used some inelegant expressions while gazing upon him, and sent for Dr. Sanders again. After that the hot mashes that Kelly was forced to prepare in the kitchen (especially on baking days), the calls for flannel, Castile soap, rags, and hot water, to say nothing of the “dimmyjohn,” were enough to drive a woman wild. At last Charles grew better. His wounds began to heal. Kelly tethered him in the very centre of the field, and went about his work whistling, until one day when that sorely tried individual ran up to the house in high wrath.

“Ah, Mr. Smith, Sir, would ye come look at the horris?—whatever it is is the matter wid his leg—bad look to it! It's bladin' worse ner ever, Sir.”

Sure enough, Charles, feeling something itching unmercifully, and having no finger-nails, had used his teeth with effect. Dr. Sanders swore when he looked at him.

“That 'ere horse needs knockin' on the head more'n any thing else,” he observed.

“I can't do that,” answered Theoph, bitterly; “he's the gift of a friend.”

“Friend be d——!” was the irreverent comment. “I wouldn't give such a creetur as that standing room.”

To make a long story short, Charles repeated the biting process so often that Dr. Sanders declared “it wasn't any use for him to be running on this fool's-errand business any longer;” he “couldn't do any good to the beast unless he had him down to his own place.”

Theophilus was only too glad to have the patient removed, and Flowery Grove was accordingly relieved of his presence pro tem.

It was now late in August. Philly was getting on so well, all things considered, that our physician recommended us to remain in the country as long as practicable. Theoph hired a pretty good horse by the month, and every thing went on swimmingly, except that the coupé, after costing more than its value for repairs, was pronounced by competent judges to be “rather unsafe.”

Meantime letters came from Mr. Dobbs that filled the heart of Theophilus with delight.

“Dobbs would be comfortable—rich—in less than two years,” he said; and he “shouldn't be surprised, either, from certain hints, etc., if the scamp had formed an attachment down there, or rather if he were hopelessly ‘smitten,’ for there had not been time for any thing deliberate.” “It is strange, too,” he added, “that he does not reply to a solitary point in any of my letters. Oh! the rascal is surely in love!”

The conclusion of Mr. Dobbs's last letter, received in October, left no room for doubt in the matter:

“I shall start for New York by the next steamer,” he wrote, “for a short stay only. California must be my home for some years to come. And, Smith, old boy, I shall not start alone! The loveliest, sweetest, dearest creature that God ever made will accompany me as my wife. We sailed out here in the same vessel, have known each other ever since, and, well—wait until you see her, that's all. Then, if you have any fault to find, fire away.

"If you are still at 'Flowery Grove' (ha! ha!), and you can get a room for us at Miss Kimso's, we shall be most happy to give you a week of our delightful company immediately after landing. By-the-way, old chap, why don't you write? Not a line from you have I received. Ruggles & Co. have turned out prime.

"Pat old Charley for me, and (beg her pardon for the juxtaposition, but love for that horse is my weak spot) present my warmest remembrances to your dear wife. She will love my Annie, I know. Adieu! Pray for your Benedict. Yours, DOBBS."

"He will be here in ten days!" cried Theoph, ecstatically, as he folded the letter; "and here comes Miss Kimso. Now we can ascertain about the room."

Miss K. assented to the arrangement very cheerfully, though it was with great difficulty that we could prevail upon her to accept any remuneration. Theophilus was expatiating upon the virtues of his adorable Dobbs for our benefit, when Dr. Sanders, driving by in his dingy-looking gig, held up his horse to shout:

"Mr. Smith, you'd better send for that horse of yours. He's just eating his head off where he is."

"I'll send the man around this evening. And, Sanders—just let him have your bill at the same time, will you?" answered Theoph.

"All right!" shouted the horse-doctor as he drove off, leaving a cloud of dust behind him.

When Kelly brought old Charley home that evening (looking more bony and rickety than ever), and delivered the bill, I really was afraid Theophilus would say something wrong, he looked so desperate for an instant; but he evidently restrained himself.

"Eating his head off!" he exclaimed, at last, after gazing upon the startling bit of paper; "better say eaten the whole of his wretched carcass again and again."

In due time Mr. and Mrs. Dobbs made their appearance. As for Mr. Dobbs's wife, she was certainly a charming young person. We were friends from the very first. It was such a relief to see somebody else besides Theophilus worshipping Mr. Dobbs!

Before they had been with us an hour we were all, including Miss Kimso, clustered together near the porch, laughing and chatting like old friends.

Suddenly the countenance of Theophilus assumed a sardonic grin.

"Dobbs," said he, "I'm going to do something handsome. From this hour old Charley is yours again. Accept him as a wedding-gift to yourself and lovely young bride!"

Mr. Dobbs stammered forth his thanks, and declared he would be "right glad to see the noble old fellow again."

"Let the noble old fellow be brought forth!" commanded Theoph, in a tragic voice.

Kelly soon appeared, dragging the wedding-gift after him by main force.

Mr. Dobbs sprang to his feet.

"That's not old Charley!" he cried, as soon as his emotions would allow him to articulate; "that's—" And the gentleman doubled himself with laughter.

"It is old Charley, though," returned Theoph, positively.

"I tell you it is not," gasped Mr. Dobbs; "it's—oh dear! I shall die!—it's a horse that I sold long ago to Jim Fowler over in Westchester County for fifteen dollars!"

Theoph turned red, rushed into the house, and soon came out again with a crumpled sheet of paper.

Mr. Dobbs seized it, and read aloud:

"J. Fowler:

"DEAR SIR,—Wishing to have my old horse again, I inclose $40, which, I believe, covers every thing. Please deliver him to bearer, and (to prevent mistake) return this letter with your receipt by same hand. In haste,

"Yours, respectfully, CHARLES G. DOBBS."

"That's straight enough, Sir, isn't it?" exclaimed Theoph, triumphantly. "Kelly brought it back with him on that same day, and here's the receipt. Kelly!"

"Yez, Sur."

"Didn't you get this horse from Mr. Fowler?"

"Sure, Sur—" began Kelly.

"Of course he did!" interrupted Mr. Dobbs. "They're all named 'Fowler' in this place. But it was John Fowler that had old Charley, not James. By-the-way," he continued, drawing a package from his breast-pocket, "I have brought some unopened letters with me. There were such stacks of them waiting for me when I landed that I've not had time to read half. Let's see. Ah, here we are! This looks like it." And he tore a yellow envelope asunder.

"Mr. Dobbs:

"RESPECTED SIR,—(this is it, sure enough)—'as your remittances have not come to hand since last April, I take the liberty to send my little account for your horse's board—which please to pay as soon as you can, as I have none too much on hand at present to settle my spring bills. Old Charley looks better now than any young horse in the place. He would fetch a price, if you could make up your mind to sell him. There's people asking me about him most every day. I've rented my house and stables, out and out, after this summer, but can get Charley in prime selling order in two weeks. Excuse me for asking, but I do wish I knew why you gave Jim Fowler, down the road, $40 for that old nag of his. It was $25 more than he gave you for him.

"Please settle the inclosed bill as soon as you can, and oblige, Your obedient servant, JOHN FOWLER."

By the time Mr. Dobbs ceased reading Theophilus was quite prepared to appreciate the joke. In fact we all laughed—Kelly roared—and even old Charley (?), who stood near, threw up his head, and made a sound wonderfully like ha! ha!

Theophilus spoke first:

"Dobbs," said he, "I have a proposition to make. There is an unpaid bill in this pocket from the horse-doctor who has attended yonder steed through various slight ailments. You have one for your Charley's board. We are both ignorant of their amounts. What say you to a blind exchange? Will you do it?" and he held out the folded bill at arm's-length.

Mr. Dobbs glanced once more at John Fowler's "little account." Then he put his hands in his pockets, and gave one long, penetrating look at "old Charley."

Finally he looked up. "No, Smith," said he, solemnly, "I couldn't do it; upon my soul I couldn't."

After this Charley drooped, and no wonder. He did not die after the usual manner of horses, but slowly shriveled away; and before we returned to town we laid him tenderly under our pear-tree.

A ROYAL BENGAL TIGER.

YEAR by year the far-away ends of the earth are made commonplace by the invasion of some Yankee trader or English filibuster, who straightway sets up a colony, introduces trowsers, brandy cock-tail, and the latest Paris fashions, and brushes away romance, and strangeness which makes romance. India is already English—as the Sandwich Islands are American—in manners and customs; and our children may travel around the globe without losing sight of the ugly black silk hat which ought to be the signal of civilization. Cuba is girt with railroads, whose engines go snorting up and down the ever-faithful isle; adventurous travelers go to Jerusalem in the early train, and telegraph from Jericho to London for a supply of clean linen; the Nile has been seen by so many that the hunter after novelties must turn up his nose at it; and between Du Chaillu and Speke and Livingstone there remains only a narrow tract of terra incognita in Africa, which some outrageous and impetuous Briton or Yankee will presently explore, and leave the world a waste of too well known platitudes to the next generation.

"There's nothing new, and nothing true, and it don't matter," said a misanthropic Briton; let us go back to the old, therefore. We know all about the world now; but no modern traveler, choke-full of information, is half so interesting as one of Purchas's old voyagers, who knew nothing—but believed much. And while we turn up our noses at a book about the India of to-day—and with reason, too, for it is sure to discuss the cotton question, and the indigo question, and the opium question, and the progress of common schools, and the advancement of learning, and the growth of the public debt, and the annual increase of wearers of trowsers and black hats—a book about India actually written thirty years ago, but only just published, gives us some hopes of a delightful hour.

We remember a poor sailor-boy who passed his earlier years in a vain search after monkeys. He went voyage after voyage; he saw a few unhappy quadrumanes, chained and spiteful, for sale here and there; but when he inquired after the forests full of monkeys, which his grandfather had told him of—no matter in what part of the world he asked—people shrugged their shoulders, and replied, "Ah, yes; there were such things hereabouts once, but they're all gone long ago; monkeys are scarce now." Now, what an empty and foolish world it is, where monkeys are scarce! Consider the relation of this interesting animal to Christian civilization. He is the very antipodes, the opposite extreme, of the black hat; he abhors the sight of trowsers; brandy cock-tail does not agree with him; a Yankee is a monstrous creature, before whose appearance the poor beast flies, as though he knew by instinct that every Yankee carries a locomotive in his pocket.

Colonel Campbell went to India in 1830, before railways were yet firmly believed in; when Professor Morse had not yet happened upon the idea of the abominable electric telegraph; when yet the monkey was in his glory over a large part of the world. He went thither a young officer, a hunter—not a murderer, like Gordon Cumming—a naturalist, and therefore a close observer of natural objects. In Colonel Campbell's time there was no overland line; no short cut by steamer; men went to India in good, stanch, safe, kettle-bottomed sailing ships—tea-wagons they were sometimes called; and, if it was their first voyage, they were favored on crossing the equator with a sight of Neptune, and duly initiated into the mysteries of the sea.

"The ceremony commenced by Neptune asking me, through a speaking-trumpet applied close to my ear, 'How old I was'—'Why I had come to sea'—'Whether I had previously crossed the line,' etc.; and each time I attempted to answer having the enormous shaving-brush, covered with lather, stuffed half-way down my throat. Declining to answer only made matters worse; for the doctor was immediately called upon to restore my power of speech.' This he dextrously accomplished by digging his lancet into my foot, and completed the cure by cramming one of his abominable boluses into my mouth. My face was now copiously lathered and scraped, and my legs being tilted up, I fell backward into a sail filled with water to the depth of three or four feet. Blindfolded as I was, I fancied myself overboard, and struck out for my life. But my miseries were not yet ended. I was startled by a hoarse roar, and the two bears, who had been lying in wait for their victim, seizing me in their tarry paws, ducked my head under water, and bundled me about till I verily thought I should be drowned. At last I managed to tear the bandage from my eyes, upset one of the bears, and, jumping on his prostrate body, succeeded in making my escape. Being now one of the initiated, I was provided with a fire-bucket, and allowed to amuse myself by ducking the unfortunates who succeeded me."

Landing at Madras, they found the beach beset with clamorous natives, all eager to serve the new-comers, and all talking at once. "Salaam Sahib!—Master please to want Dobash?"—asked a sleek, well-fed butler, in scarlet turban and flowing white muslin robes—making a profound obeisance, and thrusting into my hand a huge packet of written certificates of character, the greater number of which he had probably stolen or hired for the occasion. "I very good 'bootleer.' Plenty good character I got: General H—, Sahib; Colonel S—, Sahib; Doctor H—, Sahib—plenty great gentlemen I serve. Look, Sahib; Master please to read; that time he see I tell true word. I very good man—Hindoo caste—not can tell lie. Ya, ya! suppose Hindoo man tell lie, that time Debil come catch!"

You see that so long ago as 1830 they had already imported the devil into India. The English have been playing him there ever since. In those days, when the pagoda-tree still grew "on India's coral strand" as well as in the up-country, and young Englishmen went out on purpose to pluck the ripe fruit and stuff their pockets with it, every British officer traveled, on the march, like the governor of a province; and a clerk in the civil service could not stir abroad without an elephant and a small army of retainers. Colonel Campbell gives an instructive list of the "principal things required on taking the field," which will make the captains and lieutenants of our Union army grin:

A tent—single-poled for a subaltern, and double-poled for a captain, or field-officer—with two or four bullocks to carry it, according to its size.

A portable camp-table, chair, and basin-stand.

A camp-cot, consisting of a light frame-work of wood, with a rattan bottom, and a thin cotton mattress, on which is packed the table, chair, and other light articles—the whole being carried by two coolies on their heads.

A good horse—or two of them, if you can afford it—with his attendants, a gorah-wallah, or horse-keeper, and a grass-cutter—one of each being required for each horse.

A sufficient number of bullocks to carry your baggage.

Two servants: a dobash, or head man, and a maty-boy.

Two cowrie-baskets, containing a sufficient stock of tea, sugar, coffee, brandy, and wax-candles, carried by a coolie, suspended from the ends of an elastic slip of bamboo.

A couple of hog-spears—the spear-heads made by Arnatchelem, at Salim, and the shafts of male bamboo brought from the Conkan.

A hunting-knife, also made by Arnatchelem, if possible.

A hunting-cap, strong in proportion to the respect you have for your skull—a thin plate of iron let into the crown is not a bad thing in a stony country.

A good stock of cheroots, and plenty of ammunition—it being taken for granted that you are already provided with a gun, a rifle, and a telescope.

If you survey this list attentively, you will find that a captain in the English East India army took the field accompanied by a personal train of not less than nine servants of various grades, and probably as many bullocks. The Colonel adds, modestly: "Some men, who study their comfort rather than their purse, indulge in a palanquin, a Chinese mat, a tent carpet, and many other little luxuries; but the fewer things of this kind a man hampers himself with the better." Stonewall Jackson's hungry fellows would have been delighted to fight with an army carrying a train in this proportion.

When the captain traveled "post" to his station it was by palanquin, each conveyance of this kind being borne by twelve men, with a thirteenth to carry a light by night; and if he traveled "dawk," which is as much as to say by express train, he was carried incessantly forward, day and night, relays of bearers being in readiness at the end of each stage of ten or fifteen miles.

A man so well fed, well attended, and thoroughly cared for might well have stomach for a fight with the royal Bengal tiger, whose appearance, even in the menagerie, is sufficiently formidable and majestic to make his chase warm the coldest blood. The tiger of India is a much more respectable animal than the African lion, who stands charged with rank cowardice by so eminent and trust-worthy an authority as Dr. Livingstone. We shall see further on that even the tiger has nerves, and is capable of running away when surprised by the wild whoop of an accomplished tiger hunter. But he has abundance of courage, and besides this, pertinacity, resource, ingenuity, and some little notion of strategy; while his brother-in-law, the lion, is, after all, only a great handsome lubber, whom a Frenchman shoots by moonlight alone. "Never attack a tiger on foot—if you can help it," says Colonel Campbell. But it is on foot that the lion is commonly met and killed.

To have a Bengal tiger for your neighbor is no joke. "Were not tigers very numerous in Kandeish?" General Briggs was asked by the Parliamentary committee on cotton-growing in India. He replied on oath, "Yes; I was called upon by the Government to make a return of the damage they had done during the four years I was there;" and he mentions that during that time 350 men had been carried off and 24,000 head of cattle had been devoured by these animals. This is an average of nearly 90 men and 6000 head of cattle per annum. The royal tiger might sit for the original of the famous dragon of Wantley, who devoured whole villages.

The "man-eater" is generally a tigress, an old beast, no longer active enough to capture antelopes or other alert and active game, and with teeth too poor to tackle a buffalo. She takes to preying upon men, therefore, at first from necessity, and afterward from choice, and, Colonel Campbell assures us, does not care to look after other game. She is a sneak, cowardly, cautious to the last degree, savage and treacherous as all of her kind. Nothing, not even fire, can drive her from her concealment. Sometimes half the hair is burnt from her back before she breaks cover. A confirmed man-eater generally lurks around a village, or in the neighborhood of a frequented road. Then this horrible beast becomes a plague to the unfortunate people. They can not stir abroad without danger: they are attacked at the plow; the women dare not fetch water from the well; wherever the villagers go the eye of this silent monster is upon them. "The persecuted laborers, returning at sunset from their toil, may be seen hurrying along with trembling speed, and uttering loud yells in hopes of scaring their hidden foe."

The tiger is most commonly hunted on elephants. The first proceeding of the hunters is to track the animal to its haunt; and in this, which is the work of a peculiar and trained set of men, these display the utmost skill, patience, and courage. Not infrequently a tiger is tracked three days before he is at last "marked down." But when this is accomplished he is said to be already half killed. Where no tracker can be got, a rather expensive, but also effective, way to get at the brute is to fasten a bullock somewhere near his walk. The unfortunate animal is generally carried off in the course of the night, but the tiger leaves in that case plain marks by which to trace his course homeward.

To say that an animal carries off a bullock seems a tough story; but Colonel Campbell proves, on abundant evidence, that this is regularly done. He tells a surprising story, even, of a tiger who killed a bullock and actually leaped over a hedge with the dead animal in its mouth; and this occurred under his own notice! Here is another example of the tremendous strength of the tiger:

"Four fine oxen, harnessed in the same team, were destroyed by a tiger while their owner was driving them in the plow. He described their death as having been the work of a few seconds. When in the act of turning his cattle at the end of a furrow a tiger sprang from some neighboring brushwood on the leading bullock, broke his neck by a single wrench, and before the other terrified animals could disengage themselves all were destroyed in the same manner. The man fled to a neighboring tree, from whence he saw the monster finish his work of death, and then trot back into the jungle without touching the carcasses; as if he had done it from mere love of slaughter, and not to satisfy the cravings of hunger. My friend Elliot, from whom I had this anecdote, saw the bullocks immediately after they were killed, and found that one of them had been thrown back with such violence that his horns were driven into the ground to a considerable depth."

A good sporting elephant must have courage and patience. He must search the cover inch by inch, tearing down small trees and trampling under foot brushwood, to make a clear track. At the command of his driver the sagacious brute picks up stones and hands them to the driver, to throw ahead into the jungle. When he sees the tiger he lifts up his trunk—his vulnerable part, at which the foe always leaps—and trumpets. Above all, he must never charge the tiger. It is his business to stand perfectly still, and leave the enemy to the three or four marksmen who are placed upon his back. A charging elephant is not a pleasant companion. He generally pitches himself down upon his knees to meet the attack of the tiger, and by the motion pitches his passengers out of the howdah, perhaps into the very jaws of their prey.

The mahout, or driver, who sits upon the neck of his beast, occupies the place of danger, and requires also great courage. It is his duty during the fray to keep the elephant steady, and, after the tiger is killed, to reward his charge with lumps of sugar dipped in tiger's blood.

Tiger shooting is a sport which requires a number of men, and several appliances not used in the ordinary chase. For instance, rockets are used to drive a reluctant animal from its lair; other fire-works to turn it back if it attempts to run off; and horns are blown for the same purpose. Meantime a hundred men surround the thicket, and give warning from tree-tops or elevated rocks of the animal's movements.

What cunning an old man-eater possesses is shown by the story of one who, being marked down after great labor and repeated efforts, and driven out of her lair by an elephant, actually followed upon the elephant's tracks, immediately behind him, in silence, and was not discovered till the hunters had completed a large circle in their reconnoissance, and to their amazement came upon their old tracks, and found the marks of a tiger covering them! Sir John Outram, to whom this occurred, happened to look behind, and saw the tiger crouching close under the elephant's crupper and intently watching the mahout, as though making ready to spring upon him.

Tigers are sometimes shot from trees; they never climb, and a man ten feet from the ground in a tree-top is perfectly safe. Indeed the monster never looks up, but only straight before him, as he rushes off. Men have been known to hunt the tiger on foot, but also they have been known in such cases to be torn to pieces miserably. Several Englishmen have speared tigers successfully, but few have the nerve to attempt what would be sure death to them if they missed their quarry; and we should imagine few horses could be trusted to take one up to a tiger.

The tiger dislikes, or perhaps fears, the Indian wild-dogs, who are said to attack him in herds. It is certain that he will not remain in any neighborhood where they take up their abode. It comes out after its prey most generally in the evening, except in the case of a confirmed man-eater, who does not avoid the daylight. The tigress has little or no affection for her young, and when pursued readily abandons them.

Such is the King of the Indian jungles at home. One can hardly recognize his likeness in the Royal Bengal Tiger of the menageries, cowering down in a corner of his cage or lazily pacing its narrow bounds, with hardly spirit enough to set up a feeble growl, or rather snarl, when the keeper stirs him up for the amusement of the crowd who have gathered to look at him. In exile and captivity he reminds us of certain other dethroned monarchs—of James II. at Versailles and Napoleon at St. Helena. At home and in power he is, as we have seen, like most other monarchs, treacherous, savage, and selfish—a sort of four-footed George the Fourth—with few qualities to admire beyond strength and a kind of gentlemanly elegance; for the rest, a scourge and terror to the country which he infests.

FROM A SOLDIER'S WIFE.

AT Paducah, Kentucky, I first realized what it required to be a soldier's wife. I had seen much before, and borne a great deal, yet it seemed but little comparatively when I came to take leave of my husband, and turned back to my lonely room to await his return.

True, I had expected this—was prepared for it in a measure; yet a strange and overpowering sense of my position came over me that I had not felt before, when I stood by the window to catch a last glimpse of a beloved form. He was standing upon the deck of a large boat, with hundreds of others around him; yet I seemed to see him only, his sad face turned to me in a mute farewell as the bell clanged and the ponderous vessel swept slowly out into the stream, and turned her prow toward the mouth of the Tennessee. It was but a moment, during which I leaned against the casement, breathless, agonized. There the waters lay cold and glittering under the spring sunbeams, and the sadness of utter desolation seemed to have fallen upon my spirits.

I am ashamed to say that I shut every ray of the bright, beautiful sun from my room, feeling as if it was a mockery too bitter to endure in that hour; that I threw myself upon my couch and wept as if my heart would break, for the time forgetful that there were any in the world more sorrowful, and with deeper cause for sorrow than I. But it is true, and here I confess my selfish weakness repentantly, glad to be able to say that I have since that time learned to think less of myself and more of others on whom the hand of affliction has fallen heavily, while I am still unscathed.

After the first burst of grief I roused myself with the question, "What shall I do?" and the answer came so quickly that my cheek was dyed with shame. What should I do, with three hospitals in sight of my window? No need to ponder the question long. The call of duty was loud and strong, and I obeyed it without delay.

It was about two o'clock in the afternoon when I first entered the Presbyterian church, which had been converted into a hospital, and walked up its aisle under the gaze of a hundred eyes. The very remembrance of that time thrills me again with the same sensation of pity and pain that rose in my heart as I looked upon the pale, emaciated faces around me. Near the pulpit two men were standing, whom I rightly supposed to be the doctor and steward. Toward them I went directly, and addressed the tallest of the two.

"Is this the attending physician of the hospital?"

"It is, madam. Dr. L——, at your service. What can I do for you?"

"Tell me, Sir, how I can make myself useful to others. My husband has gone to Pittsburg Landing, to be away for several weeks, perhaps, during which time I shall have nothing to do, unless you make me useful here. Can I be of service?"

"Look about you and see. There has not been a lady within these walls since I came, nearly five weeks ago. Your voice is soft, your hand light and skillful—all women's are—and I have no doubt but your eyes will be quick to see what should be done. I shall be glad to have you come."

"Thank you. I may come to you for advice when I want it?" I asked.

"Certainly. I shall be happy to assist you at all times."

I bowed and turned away, feeling as if about to realize, indeed, some of the terrible consequences of war.

In a few moments I had laid aside my hat and cloak, rolled my sleeves away from my wrists, and constructed an impromptu apron of an old sheet which I found among the bandages in the linen room. Thus prepared for the work which I saw before me, I went out to the kitchen and obtained warm water, a tin wash-basin, and some towels. For combs and brushes I was compelled to send out before I could do any thing.

Then the work began in earnest. Commencing with the lower berth, I went up the entire length of the aisle, taking each patient in his turn until I got through. Grimed faces and hands were to be bathed, hair and beard trimmed and brushed—a long and distressing task. But I had undertaken it with a will, and, though my arms and neck ached, I would not yield until the last sufferer had been relieved.

It was half past eight o'clock in the evening before I had done, and when I reached the hotel I could scarcely stand for very weariness. Such duties were new to me then, and the excitement helped to wear away my strength. But the memory of grateful thanks, tearful eyes, and broken, trembling exclamations of relief more than repaid me. Even as I sat beside them, passing the cool sponge over their faces or brushing the tangled hair, many of the sufferers had fallen asleep.

I slept little that night. It was vain to attempt sleep after such an experience. Moreover, an idea came to me that filled me with unrest. I had observed when tea was brought in how coarse and unpalatable the food was, and that many turned from it with loathing. There was hard, brown bread crisped to a blackened toast; some fat bacon, and black tea without milk served to the men on that evening. The tea was sweetened with very coarse brown sugar, stirred into it with large iron spoons. They drank from tin cups and ate from tin plates. This would have made little difference had the food been nice and palatable, which it certainly was not. Some of the men told me, in answer to my questions, that they could not have swallowed a mouthful to save their lives.

I rose very early the following morning, filled with the idea that many of those brave sufferers were actually starving, and determined to look into the matter more closely. But few of the nurses were astir in the hospital, and I went to the kitchen, where the cook had just commenced the preparation of the morning meal, and was greeted with a surly "Good-morgen" in mixed German-English. In a moment I saw that I should not have a very pleasant time in my examinations. After a few careless remarks, to set the man in a good-humor, I asked him to show me the hospital stores for the day's consumption, which he did ungraciously enough. A moment's observation filled me with horror and indignation.

"Do you tell me that you are going to cook all this stuff for those men in the other room?" I said, indignantly. "Look at this tea, black and mouldy as it can be, and this bacon is one living mass! Here are salt fish laid upon boards over the sugar-barrel, brine dripping through into the sugar! I hope you have not been using this for their tea."

"It is not my fault. I am not ze provider fur ze hospital," growled the cook in response.

"I does my duty so fur as I can. I cooks ze rations zat is bring to me, and zat is all so fur as I go."

"Well, that is farther than you will go in less than a week from now!" I answered, quickly. "If you had the soul of a man in you you would refuse to have any thing to do with such horrible things as those! Poor boys! No wonder they turned away from such food in disgust. Some of those men are starving to death. Do you know it?"

He stared at me aghast and made no reply.

"It is really true, and I know it. How can they eat such bread and meat—drink such tea as this? They are weakened by illness, and require delicacies. It would be utterly impossible for many of those men to swallow coarse food, even if clear and palatable. How then can they eat this?" I repeated, looking at him steadily till his head drooped, and I began to suspect that he was even more guilty than at first appeared. Afterward I found that he had carefully put aside all the delicacies that found their way to the hospital and feasted upon them, while those for whom they were intended faded and pined day by day under his eyes.

When Dr. L—— came I went to him at once and told him how I had been engaged, and what I had found in my researches. He looked so much surprised that indignation was redoubled, and I could not forbear expressing it in plain words.

"Can it be possible that you, the physician in charge of a hospital, do not know, after five weeks' service, what your patients have to eat?"

"I am not here when the meals are served. I give orders for such diet as my patients must have, and my steward's business is to carry out my instructions."

"Do you never inquire into the condition of the stores? Have you never examined to see if they were as they should be? It seems to me you ought to know all about what is going on here. If three hundred lives were in my hands as they are in yours I should not dare to trifle with them thus!"

"You are severe, madam!"

"Ask yourself if I am unjustly so, Sir. I do not desire to appear rude or assuming; but indeed I won't look upon this unmoved. What I saw last night and this morning has opened my eyes to a condition that is a shame to any hospital. See the confusion all around us! Remember how long helpless men have lain without even a face bath or a wound dressed for three days, to say nothing of the more dreadful slow starvation to which they are subjected! If all hospitals are kept like this God pity the poor soldiers!"

"Since you see the evils so plainly, perhaps you can suggest a remedy," remarked Dr. L——, sarcastically.

"I will try, if you will act upon the suggestion," I answered, quickly.

"Well?"

"In the first place, then, what do you do when a man fails to draw his regular rations?"

"He is entitled to its value in money if he wishes it."

"Then why not refuse to draw such rations as those, and with the money buy food that can be eaten?"

"It might be done if there was any thing to buy. I am afraid it will be hard work if you attempt it."

"No matter; it must be done. If you will furnish me with a boy to do errands, I will see if I can not get fresh butter, eggs, and chickens, at least—perhaps milk also. These would prove invaluable just now. To-day I intend to send to a Society for some sheets and mattresses; and, if you have no decided objection, will try to bring order out of chaos, if possible."

"I see you are one of the working kind," said the Doctor. "Do all you wish, and call upon me when I can render any assistance."

"That will be very frequently, I assure you." And with that I turned away, still too much incensed to treat him civilly. He was willing enough to let other people take his work off his hands, since he would come in for a full share of the credit in the end. At least that was my uncharitable thought at the moment; and I am not sure now that I was far wrong, as I know his character better.

The same day I went to him again about the boy, but he had forgotten all about the matter, so I went to the Quarter-master instead. He furnished a horse, and I sent my own waiting-man out to the country for supplies, making him take a receipt for every penny he paid in his purchases. This was for the purpose of ascertaining precisely how much was spent, as I desired to render a faithful account of my stewardship. I was fully aware that the ground I was taking might easily prove a dangerous one should I fail to keep precise accounts of my expenditures, and resolved to give no chances for misrepresentation. Every receipt and bill of sale, after being duly copied in my own account-book, was carefully filed in the Quarter-master's office, subject to the inspection of any who chose to examine them.

Mr. P——, the Quarter-master, was a kind, gentlemanly man, in whom I found an ever-ready assistant. He had received a donation in money, for the benefit of the wounded, from some one in Illinois, which he begged me to use as designed, and I did so gladly. Even with that I had not enough, and was often compelled to draw from my own purse the means wherewith to supply the many wants of the patients.

It took me a week to get fairly started in my vocation as hospital nurse. There was such an entire absence of system in the establishment, that it seemed almost impossible to bring it into any thing like order. The nurses were detailed each day from the convalescent corps—weak, spiritless men, who thought more of themselves than of the charges placed in their hands. I had seen them lounging about and sleeping while the sicker men, failing to make them hear, would try to struggle into a sitting posture to get at the medicines to be taken from time to time.

All this had to be changed, and strong, able men detailed for duty. The ward-master drank fearfully, and I was compelled to report him and get another man put into his place. With the assistance of these, however, after the changes were made I got along very well. Every morning we had the floor nicely washed, and when the sun shone the windows were opened to let in the fresh, balmy air, the effect of which was almost magical; eyes would brighten, and lips wreath in pleasant, hopeful smiles, beautiful to behold.

It was with more joy than words can express that I observed the rapid improvement of the men under careful attention. When the new sheets and comforters, with pillows and mattresses came, we were able to keep the place perfectly fresh and comfortable. But it required the most constant attention. I went to my hotel only for my meals, devoting the day, from half past five in the morning to nine in the evening, to the care of the sick. I must be there at every meal, or many would go without any thing at all. Some of the feeblest had to be fed like children, and what they ate could be prepared by myself only. I must toast the bread and make the tea; then I must sit down and support their heads with my left hand, while with the right I conveyed the food to their lips. Such constant care was very wearing, and I was often tempted to steal away for an hour's rest, trusting to some one to take my place for a time; but when I gave it a second thought the temptation faded. Suppose the man should die, could I feel that I had done all in my power to save him? Not if I should yield to the inclination I felt to abandon my post; so I remained, and tried to be patient.

Two hours each day were devoted to letter-writing for those who were unable to correspond with their friends. And sometimes, after tea, I would send for my guitar and sing for them, at the request of the music-loving ones under my charge. So the days sped, and all things began to run smoothly—for a time, at least. Death was not banished from our midst, however. Sometimes it was my fate to walk up the aisle in the morning and find some berth empty in which a favorite patient had lain. I might here go into particulars, and detail some of the most touching scenes in life; but I will here speak of only one case:

One evening I was sitting by a dying man, reading a favorite chapter in the Bible, to which he listened eagerly, even while his eyes drooped under the shades of death. One clammy hand groped for mine, and clasped it with a feeble, tremulous touch, and as I finished his lips moved painfully: "Write to my wife and children. Tell them I can not come to them, but they may soon follow me to that place of which the Saviour said, 'In my Father's house are many mansions: I go to prepare a place for you.' Oh, how sweet and comforting! 'Let not your hearts be troubled: ye believe in God; believe also in me.' Jesus, Saviour, I do believe in thee. Receive thou my spirit!" And the voice sank softly. A few moments later the last fluttering breath went out, and the mysteries of the unknown world were mysteries to him no longer.

Tears fell fast as I pressed the white lids over the blue eyes, thinking of those who were far away, and denied the sad privilege of paying the last tender rites to the dead. Poor children! Poor mother! How my heart ached to think that mine must be the task to tell them the story of death, of which, perhaps, they were not dreaming now!

Before I had finished a boy came in hurriedly and said something to the steward, of which I caught only the words, "been fighting all day ...rebels attacked them this morning...had a very hard time of it."

I grew for a moment sick with a terrible fear. A battle had taken place, and who should say how many lives in a few short hours had been crowned with the thorny wreath of affliction? It might be that I, too, was destined to feel the force of an awful blow. If so, God help me!

I could gain no particulars at the hospital, and was forced to wait until I reached home. There I learned that an attack had been made upon our forces Sunday morning, and the Confederates had occupied our camps for some time. Afterward they were driven out again, but we had lost many lives. They were still fighting an hour before nightfall. Further than this nothing was known.

All night I walked the floor in an agony of suspense and dread. Would the morning's dawn come to me with a message of gladness; or should I rank among the doomed, who henceforth must walk the earth in the darkness and gloom of utter desolation?

Ah, how I prayed that night! How I wrestled with my own fearful heart, and chided myself for the lack of faith which should have borne me up in that hour!

Monday came, freighted with death to thousands! All day the battle raged, and at night it was said that the Federals had achieved a great victory. A victory it was; but oh! at what a fearful cost! How many hundreds of young heads were that day laid low in the dust, never to rise again! How many hopeful hearts throbbed their last impulses of human aspirations and ambition!

Tuesday and Wednesday brought hundreds from the field of action. Some of the wounded were transported to Paducah, and I was called upon to dress their wounds and to assist in amputations, which required all the strength I possessed. The duty was a terrible one; but I nerved myself resolutely to perform it, hoping that, if need be, some one would as willingly attend to one of whose fate I had as yet learned nothing.

On Thursday morning the St. Francis Hotel was alive with officers from Shiloh, but still I was left in ignorance of my husband's fate, and the suspense was becoming insupportable. Every excuse that could be made for a delay of tidings had been utterly exhausted, and I felt now that he was either killed or wounded.

In the hope of hearing something definite I went out to the table for the first time since the battle, and took my usual seat, near which sat two wounded officers. One had his head bandaged; the other's arm was in a sling; and both were pale and weary-looking. But they were talking of the late contest, and after listening for a few moments I yielded to an uncontrollable impulse and asked the one nearest me if he knew any thing of the fate of the — Regiment.

He turned politely, with a look of interest I could but remark, and answered:

"I am sorry to say, madam, that it fared very badly. Some other regiments of the same division showed the white feather, and, perfectly panic-stricken, broke ranks and fled. That gallant regiment alone stood its ground, and was literally cut to pieces. Those who were not killed were taken prisoners, only a few escaping."

"And the officers—were they all—?" I could not finish the sentence for the deathly sickness that was choking my utterance, and he answered it gently:

"I believe every one was killed. Did you have any friends among them, may I ask?"

"My husband," I gasped. "Captain S——."

I saw them exchange glances; and then, as if in a dream, a voice seemed to murmur afar off amidst the rushing of waters.

"Poor thing! He fell in the first onset. But see! She is falling!"

A strong hand grasped my arm, and a glass of water was pressed to my lips; but the shock of that deadly blow was too heavy, and I sank slowly into utter oblivion, conscious of a wish, as sight and sound faded, that I might never waken again!

It was an hour before they brought me back to a sense of my bereavement, and then I turned from the kind faces clustered about the couch to which I had been borne, and gave vent to a bitter cry.

"Ah! why did you not let me die? The world is so cold and desolate!"

Two firm, soft hands clasped mine, and drew them away from my face, and I saw the mild, reproachful eyes of a stranger gazing into mine. He was an old man, with hair as white as the snows of winter, and a voice soft and gentle as a tender mother's.

"My child, you are rebellious! Rouse yourself, and learn to say, Not my will, but thine, O Lord, be done!"

"I can not!—I can not bring myself to feel that there is any mercy or love in the power that could deal such a blow. God knew that he was all I had on earth, and he has taken him from me. It was cruel!"

"Hush! Resignation will come when you have time to think. Perhaps, after all, it is a mistake. There has been no official report of your husband's death, and he may only be wounded or a prisoner."

I started up, wild with the hope his words awakened.

"Nay, be not too hasty! I only say it may be possible."

I was silenced, but the hope was not crushed. It stung me to life again, and made every idle moment seem like an eternity of agony.

In a few moments they began to leave the room, and only one or two ladies remained in conversation with the old gentleman, who was a physician, and had been summoned hastily when I fainted. Seeing them thus engaged, I formed a sudden resolution, and raised myself from the pillows.

"What are you going to do?" asked the doctor, turning his face toward me.

"Find my husband—dead or alive," I answered, getting off the bed.

"My dear child, you are mad!" he expostulated. "You can not do any thing. Look at your face—it is as pallid as marble, and your eyes would frighten any one."

"That is because I have not slept or eaten scarcely since last Saturday night," I said, in reply. "Besides, I have been half mad with suspense. Only for the sick at the hospital, who claimed my care, I don't think I could have borne it at all."

"Go back and lie down on the bed," pleaded one of the ladies. "It makes my heart ache to look at you."

"How dreadfully you must have suffered!"

"God and my own heart only know how much," I answered, gulping down a sob. Her tone of womanly sympathy shook my strong self-control till I trembled. Then I broke down entirely, and with a bitter cry fell upon my knees by a chair.

"O Charley, Charley! my heart is breaking!"

Instantly her kind arms were twined round me—her soft lips pressed to my forehead. She held me to her heart, and suffered me to weep until the fountain of my tears was exhausted.

"There! you feel better now, don't you?" said the doctor, kindly. "You must lie down and keep quiet a while, or you will be ill. Your hands are like two burning coals now, while only a moment since they were like ice. You must not fall ill."

"Oh no! I can not afford to be ill. I must search for my husband," I answered, rising. "There—it is over now! I am done with tears for the present, and am ready to work. If I do not, I shall soon lose my reason. Don't talk to me, any of you!" I cried, as I saw them about to remonstrate. "I am determined to go up the river, and if I should never return, try to remember me kindly."

"The authorities will not permit you to go," said the doctor. "An order has been issued to allow no lady to pass up the river, and Colonel N—— has locked himself up to escape the importunities of the people."

"I shall go, nevertheless," was my reply.

"How will you manage it?" asked the old man, curiously.

"I don't know yet. But I shall go. Before night I will be on my way to Pittsburg Landing."

They looked at me pityingly; but I paid no attention further, and when they left the room I began to pack some articles in a small trunk which I could easily take with me.

About noon a boat, chartered at Cincinnati and sent after the wounded, touched at Paducah, and I obtained passage. Fortune seemed to favor me here, for I not only found myself able to carry out my design, but came into the midst of sympathizing friends, who received me cordially, and did all in their power to make me comfortable.

There were a number of surgeons and their assistants on board. Three Sisters of Charity and two ladies from Cincinnati completed the list, and in about an hour we entered the mouth of the river and proceeded on our sorrowful errand.

I will not dwell upon the tediousness of the trip. To me it seemed like an eternity of misery. On Thursday, about one o'clock, we left Paducah, and did not arrive at Pittsburg Landing until Saturday night, near eight o'clock.

I shall never forget that night or a single incident connected with it. As we made fast to the shore I was standing upon the hurricane deck, looking abroad, with my heart full of a wild and bitter fear. Here was Shiloh! There were the black, forbidding bluffs directly over my head, the banks of the river lined with boats from which profane and noisy men were unloading Government stores. Across the river two or three gun-boats stretched their black, snake-like lengths along the waters, and from them only a fiery gleam was now and then discernible. Above, the sky was clear and blue, and studded with myriads of stars that looked, oh so calmly! down upon that terrible spot. There, where rivers of blood had flowed, lay the silvery white moonbeams, and on the death-laden air floated the rich perfume of spring flowers.

Even while I stood looking around me the Continental swung loose from her fastenings, and rounded out into the stream followed by half a dozen others. Now the lights blazed from every vessel, and a band struck up "Dixie" in the most spirited manner.

General Halleck was going up the river to destroy a bridge, and, convoyed by two of the gun-boats, they started two and two abreast, keeping in this order until a sudden turn hid them from sight.

Turning my face once more toward the shore, some dark objects became visible lying some distance up the side of the hill; but I could not discern precisely what they were, and the next moment my attention was absorbed in a painful scene taking place on the deck of a boat just along side of the Lancaster.

There were a number of men lying upon berths in the open air, and around one of them was a surgeon and his group of assistants. The wounded man had his arm bared to the shoulder, and had I not seen the glittering of instruments in the light of the numerous lamps held around him I should still have divined his fate. Poor fellow! I heard him sob and plead piteously, "Oh, doctor, don't take my arm off! If I lose it my little sister will have no one to work for her. I'd rather die!"

"Die you will if it does not come off, and that very soon," was the response. "No help for it, boy, so be a man and bear it bravely."

The next moment a handkerchief was held to his face, and after a brief struggle he yielded to the powerful influence of chloroform. I hear the deep, quick gasping so painful to the listener and the tears ran down my cheeks unrestrainedly.

Captain V—— came up to me.

"Mrs. S——, I have been making inquiries for you, and can gain no intelligence whatever concerning your husband. I see no way but to wait until daylight, and then I will find a conveyance and send some one with you."

"Can not I go to-night? It seems as if it is impossible to wait."

"No, it is out of the question. The mud is two feet deep on shore, and it is quite dark in the woods. I am sorry for you, but it will be only a little while longer. Try to be as patient as you can."

"Thank you, I will. But it is very, very hard."

"I am sure of it. But let me say a word to you here, Mrs. S——. I fear you are hoping too much. Remember he fell early on Sunday, and the chances are that he was hastily buried with many others in the trenches."

"For Heaven's sake go no further!" I implored. "My husband buried in a trench! Oh, God forbid!"

He took my hand, and drawing it within his arm led me to the ladies' cabin, which now presented a singular appearance, converted as it was into a hospital, and peopled by the wounded which the men were carrying on board.

There were three rows of mattresses spread upon the floor, the one in the middle capable of accommodating two patients, and one on each side a single man.

All these were filled already, and the clamor was terrible. Some called for food, others for water, and a few lay moaning piteously, their hunger and thirst forgotten in the sharp pain of undressed wounds.

One boy near the stern of the boat seemed to be in such distress that I hastened to his side and bent over him.

"Where are you wounded?" I asked.

"In the shoulder. I got it Monday, and it's never been dressed. I can not get at it myself."

Hastily getting a basin of water, sponge, and bandages, I exposed the inflamed and swollen shoulder and began to bathe it carefully. He regarded me for a moment with wide, fearful eyes, then as he felt the gentle touch and cooling sponge, his eyes closed and he heaved a great sigh of relief.

"Ah, that is so nice!" he murmured, presently. "I tell you it's hard enough to be shot down like a dog; but when it comes to lying out for a whole week in the open air, with only a blanket, a cracker, and a slice of dried beef, with an occasional drink of water, it's harder still. I thought I should starve to death before they could get a boat to take us off, and if I could only have had my shoulder dressed! Oh, how good that feels!"

I had just laid a folded napkin wet with ice-water over the wound, and it was this which called forth such an exclamation of delight.

"I am glad you feel better. Now I am going to bring you a cup of tea, with some bread and butter. If you are so nearly starved, it is time you should have something to eat."

"Oh, thank you!"

I hastened away, and in a few moments came back with the tea and bread, which he ate like a man who was indeed starving. The glare of his large dark eyes was perfectly terrible.

"More, more!" he gasped pantingly, swallowing the last drop of tea at a draught.

"Not now. In half an hour you shall have more. To give it you now will do you more harm than good. We must try to keep down fever. Now, shall I bathe your face and hands for you?"

"If you please," with an eager, wistful look at the empty cup and plate that made my eyes grow humid.

While I was engaged in the operation Doctor P——, from Cincinnati, passed me.

"Who taught you to nurse?" he asked. "I wish all women would take right hold of the boys as you do. There would be less suffering."

"They have surely earned this much at our hands, at least," I said, in reply.

"Ay, to be sure. But I know plenty who would never get down on their knees on the floor as you are doing, and take hold of an object like that."

"I hope not. I believe there are few who would not do it if in such circumstances. There is not one who has a father, brother, or husband in the service who would refuse to do it, I am sure."

He passed on with some careless reply, and I continued attending the soldiers until it grew late. After three o'clock I threw myself upon a sofa in the chamber-maid's room, and slept until half past five. Then I rose and went again among the wounded until such an hour as I could set out upon my journey over the field.

I will here mention a case that may seem incredible to many; but if so, it will not surprise me, for I could scarcely believe the evidence of my own senses, when one of the surgeons came to me directly after I entered the cabin the night before, and asked me to come and "see a sight." I told him I would as soon as I finished "feeding my patient;" and did so, he meeting me half-way when he saw me coming.

About midway of the cabin lay a rebel prisoner, badly wounded in the head. A ball had passed behind his eyes, forcing both upon the cheeks, where they lay in a most horrible and swollen condition. From the wounds in each temple a portion of the brains was slowly oozing, and the doctor pointed to it, saying,

"In all my life I have seen nothing like that. He has been lying here for the last ten minutes in that condition, quarreling with this Federal soldier just opposite."

"Surely he can not know what he is saying!" I ejaculated.

"Yes, he does, perfectly. You should hear him."

I had an opportunity soon, for in a moment he called out:

"Say! look here, Yank! I want a drink of water!"

"All right! You shall have it in a moment," answered one of the men in waiting. "I'm tending to a feller, and shall be done in a minute."

"Oh yes, I'll be bound you'll tend to your Yanks before you do to me! But when a man's on his last legs you might stop a moment to give him a drop of water. I sha'n't ask it of you more than an hour or so longer. Then I'm going straight to—!"

I shuddered and retreated from the spot. Such profanity and recklessness upon the very brink of eternity! It was awful!

"Poor wretch! God pity and have mercy upon you!" said the doctor. "You have none for yourself."

"I don't want any of your cant, Sir," said the man, in reply. "My soul is not yours, and you need not trouble yourself about it in the least."

When I came again into the cabin the following morning he was just breathing his last—going home to his Creator hardened, reckless—utterly careless of the fate that awaited him.

An hour later Captain V—— sent for a conveyance, but could get none, to carry me over the field in search of the camp from which I hoped to gain some intelligence that should end suspense. While striving to devise some means the medical director of the —— Division came on board, and offered me one of his horses, proposing himself to guide me to the place where the —— Regiment was camped. There were but few left, he said, but what there were had pitched their tents about five miles distant, and he thought he could take me to the place without difficulty.

Thanking him warmly I accepted the offer, and ere long found myself mounted and laboring through the mud up the side of the bluff.

The path led round it, ascending gradually to the top, and once upon the shore, I discovered the dark objects that had puzzled me the night previous were human bodies lying under the broiling sun waiting for burial.

Through the mud, over fallen trees, broken artillery, and pieces of shells, the carcasses of horses and mules, and by strips of woodland cut down like grass by the rains of iron and lead! How strange and solemn and fearful it seemed! Giant trees pierced by balls and shorn of their bark till the trunks showed a hundred grinning scars; boughs severed and hanging by a single fibre, or lying prone upon the ground, trampled and blood-stained!

Our progress was slow. It was long past noon ere we reached the little hollow in which the tents I sought had been pitched; and then, as we came in sight of the little blue wreaths of smoke, and saw a few solitary men moving about, I began to tremble. I knew that I was about to meet my fate, and the thought of what it might be almost deprived me of the necessary strength to go on to the end.

Presently, after passing through several encampments, we descended into the hollow and alighted before the officers' quarters, which seemed almost deserted. There the doctor bade me go in and wait while he made inquiries of those around outside.

On first entering I saw nothing but a berth, on which lay a man with his face turned from me; but the next moment I discovered that another was seated beyond, his head resting against the side of the berth, fast asleep. A pillow supported the right arm of the invalid, and by the bandages I knew he had been wounded. My heart swelled with pity, and stealing softly toward the bed, I leaned over to catch a glimpse of his face.

Pale—oh, so pale and wan! with the rich brown hair pushed back from the broad brow, pure and white as marble. The blue eyes were half closed, and the lips parted with such an expression of suffering that a loving woman's heart might almost break in looking upon it.

Yet I did not moan, nor faint, nor cry out. I only fell upon my knees, and taking the white, clammy fingers of the left hand in my own, covered it with warm tears and gentle kisses—for it was my own dear husband, whom God had spared to me, and I had found him at last!

"I thank Thee, O my Father!" was the cry of my soul in that hour, and my lips breathed it audibly. With the sound Charley opened his eyes and looked into my face with a bewildered stare. Then a light broke all over his pale face, and his glad smile sent happy tears raining over my cheeks.

"Is it you, darling? I thought you would never come!" he breathed faintly. "But you are here now, and you will not leave me again, will you?"

"No, indeed. I will take care of you, and get you well again. Ah, how you must have missed me!"

"Missed you! It has been an eternity of misery since I fell, and I have called your name vainly a thousand times."

"They told me you were killed!" I said, chokingly. "I waited for tidings from you till I thought I should go mad, and then they said you were dead, and when I declared my intention of finding you, tried to keep me from coming. But I would not be stayed, and, thank God! I have found you alive."

"Ay! Thank God from your soul, for it is one of His greatest blessings that he is here now!" said the doctor, who had entered and laid his hand upon my head.

"Tell her all about it," whispered my husband's faint voice, and as his fingers clasped mine closer the old man sat down upon a campstool and began:

"I have just heard the story from one of the boys, and it is a wonder to me how he lived through that long time without the least care. He must have crept into the thicket where they found him very soon after falling, and there remained for four days. There was a dead soldier near him, and from his canteen and haversack he managed to obtain water and food; but his wound bled terribly. They say, to judge by the stains around and where they came across him, he had just a spark of life left. He will need you now to nurse him back to life again, and it will take nice nursing too."

"Will he lose his arm, doctor?" I asked, in a suppressed voice, lest Charley should hear.

"I will tell you after a while," was the answer; and accordingly "after a while" he examined it closely. As he left the tent I followed him out.

"Well, doctor?"

"All right, my little anxious woman! The Captain can carry that arm through several campaigns yet, I hope," he said, heartily; and I went back to my boy, my eyes wet with glad tears.

Three weeks later we were within our own quiet home, where I was nursing him back to strength to be ready for the Fall campaign.

SHELLS ON LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN.

IN the past time, perchance, some thoughtful man
Has mused on Lookout Mountain's airy height
Of all the changes and the changeless plan
Through which has passed the circle in his sight.

River and field and forest, mountain peak,
In solemn silence mock his asking eye;
The outward forms of nature never speak,
Lest like our language even theirs should die.

But in close seam and scar and under-field
The truth is hid which time shall ne'er outwear;
The word of prophecy, if left unsealed,
Were breathed as thoughtless as the common air.

Where some fresh scar by falling rocks is made,
The man has found a perfect, sea-born form,
A word of knowledge in earth's volume laid,
When swept above this height the ocean storm.

A delicate shell, yet breathing of the deep;
And lo! before his sight the white foam glides,
And far below, through centuries of sleep,
Earth's bosom sinks and rises with the tides.

The upper war enfolds the under peace,
Slow spreading sea-flowered vales on barren stone,
The hills grow rich for harvests, waters cease,
And fertile lands await the ripening sun.

And in the time to be some man shall stand
On Lookout Mountain wondering what change
Has pearled with villages the lower land,
And set with jeweled homes each mountain range.

And he shall find, deep set in some scarred tree
Late lightning-riven, yet another form
Than that frail spiral of a vanished sea,
To tell of other and life-changing storm.

A battle shell—a broken, rusted thing,
Born of a fire-sea, with a heart of fire;
No delicate life e'er grew from ring to ring
Within its globe, or tipped with pearl its spire.

Its single life-throb was a spasm of death,
Bursting its fervid heart with flame and roar,
And lips of men clutched eagerly for breath
A moment, then forever moved no more.

All he shall see; the upper fire and storm,
The wreck, the ravage, and the cloud-veil white,
And death beneath, the ever-changing form,
Smoothing old barren, rocky wrongs to right.

And hear the voice before which kingdoms bow
Bid the sea pass away with all its strife,
Nor wonder whence, on vale and mountain's brow
Have come the better, nobler forms of life.

THE CANDIDATE FOR ST. JUDE'S.

I.

A LONG and singular pause in the midst of the prayer for the President of the United States made the brilliant and fashionable congregation of St. Jude's raise their heads and look at the minister. They saw nothing unusual, and, as the prayer proceeded, the circumstance passed from their thoughts. It was set down as perhaps a curious eccentricity of the strange clergyman, who was thought none the worse of in consequence, for eccentricity in the pulpit is not a little fashionable nowadays.

But Mr. Samuel Stem did see something unusual; remarkable, nay, amazing.

Mr. Samuel Stem was senior warden of St. Jude's, and it behooved him to watch very warily every motion of the Reverend Henry Blomfield, undergoing that day the terrible ordeal of a "trial," to see whether he would suit the people of that wealthy and fastidious parish, now in want of a rector.

It behooved, therefore, we say, Mr. Samuel Stem, as church-warden—as senior church-warden—and as a man whose words had weight at vestry meetings commensurate with a heavy balance at bank, to "look sharp" in this momentous business of choosing a pastor. He felt called upon in this case to exercise extraordinary vigilance, as the Reverend Henry Blomfield was not only a young man, but unknown to metropolitan fame—a circumstance which Mr. Stem was decidedly of opinion was much against him.

On an occasion like this, Mr. Samuel Stem did not think reverence required that he should close his eyes and bend his head in the prayers. When the minister had been "called" and duly settled, Mr. Stem proposed to be as devoutly decorous as any member of the parish; his office as warden, and especially as senior warden, made this to him an imperative duty. But while the choice was pending, he felt upon himself a great responsibility, and he therefore sat bolt upright, alert, and wide awake, while the congregation knelt in prayer.

Justice must be done at the outset to Mr. Samuel Stem. He was not only a stanch churchman, but a thoroughly conscientious man. He would have severed his right hand from his body before he would willfully have wronged a human being. If he was hard or exacting it was only in the interest of his church, and especially of that integral portion known as "St. Jude's." Intense and irrepressible church-wardenship was his foible, if foible it was. His official dignity seemed as much his natural clothing as the shining broadcloth that encased his imposing figure.

To Mr. Samuel Stem's efforts St. Jude's owed its existence, and very much of its envied pre-eminence. He had been senior church-warden from the hour the parish first had corporate being, now more than twenty years, during which period his voice had been very naturally a potential—some insisted controlling—one in its secular affairs; for, be it said to his honor, that to the spiritual guardian, after the choice had been formally and deliberately made, he left the guidance of the flock in all things spiritual, lending a cordial and zealous co-operation in his sphere, but never laying straw of let or hindrance in the way. During his incumbency three rectors had been settled, all of whom he, to all practical intents, had chosen; and it was a source of honest pride to him to hear, as he did not seldom, his taste and prudence in such matters extolled in the congregation; and he gloried immeasurably in the undeniable fact that not one of the shepherds he had placed over St. Jude's had failed to give general satisfaction.

Mr. Stem had, in natural course, come to believe that his knowledge of what St. Jude's needed in a rector was so precise, and his acumen in judging of the fitness of a candidate for that position so singular, that he could not fail to make a right selection. He knew, moreover, that his opinion in the matter now under consideration would be practically as decisive as an autocratic ukase. He would not for a kingdom make a blunder now; and, considering all these things, every candid reader will allow that he was perfectly right in resolving to watch very narrowly in ritual and sermon the Reverend Henry Blomfield, candidate for the succession to the Reverend Theodore Warmplace, his last triumphant choice, who these four weeks had slept at peace with his fathers, and whose memorial slab for the transept of St. Jude's was now in active preparation at the fashionable stone-cutter's hard by.

It has been said that the obscurity of the new candidate was much against him. It is true that he came warmly commended to the vestry of St. Jude's as a young man of a very high order of talents, and a model of Christian graces and priestly accomplishments. This warm testimonial came from a professor in the Theological Seminary, for whom Mr. Stem had great respect. A confidential letter, also, addressed to parties in the back-country parish, over which the candidate had been settled after taking priest's orders, elicited a reply in the main satisfactory, although there was a vague hint about his being "independent" and "high-strung." But these words from outside parties weighed very little with Samuel Stem. He knew all about those things. It was easy enough for a man to get recommendations. It was Mr. Stem's determination to give the new candidate a fair trial, just as all his predecessors had received; yet circumstances, as has been already hinted, were against him. Although probably not conscious of the feeling, the senior warden of St. Jude's possessed, in common with nearly all men, a respect for the general verdict, and in his eyes Popularity was a distinguished merit in a minister. If Mr. Blomfield had come knocking at the golden gate of St. Jude's Incumbency, shining in the éclat of a successful metropolitan pulpit career, it would have helped him mightily even with independent and impartial Samuel Stem. Coming upon his pure merits, to stand or fall without the aid of a single adventitious prop, the autocrat was "free to say," before he had seen or heard Mr. Blomfield, that he "did not expect much of him:" which was very inconsistent in Mr. Samuel Stem. Mr. Blomfield's chances were not brilliant.

But as matters had turned his case was partially prejudged against him in the mind of Mr. Samuel Stem. It happened in this wise:

Mr. Stem was very well aware that to be simply a fine preacher was not by any means all that was requisite to make a good parish priest. He attached a proper value to industry, tact, good-breeding, and ambition. He was accustomed to say that a minister who could do nothing but preach was like a ship with full top-hammer and no ballast. The reader will perceive that Mr. Stem knew what he wanted, and that the man who would fit his standard was not likely to offer every day. No minister had been settled over St. Jude's who had failed either to captivate the people from the pulpit, or, in a private interview with its astute senior warden, to give tolerably satisfactory evidence of his fitness for the everyday, hack-horse work of a thorough-going, well-ordered parish.

"A cozy dinner and a glass or two of wine is the thing to draw a man out," he would say. Mr. Stem prided himself upon his ability to read a man's character, and he considered, with much truth, that there was no better talisman to call to his aid than a dinner. Mr. Blomfield had, according to his custom with candidates, been invited to dine with Mr. Stem on the day before he was to preach. It was the first time the warden had met him; and when the servant ushered into his drawing-room a young man, slightly built, though tall, and with a face almost boyish in its youthfulness, and clad in a suit of black, which not even its admirable fit to the graceful form nor the absence of a speck of soil or dust could redeem from hopeless seediness, Mr. Stem could not help contrasting his appearance with the entrée on a similar occasion of the Reverend Theodore Warmplace, with his shining broadcloth and his gold spectacles and grand "air," bearing upon him the unmistakable stamp of the popular and powerful city divine, and the contrast was not favorable to the young country clergyman. But this was not all.

Mr. Blomfield went through what Mr. Stem was wont jocularly to call his "table test" triumphantly. In fine, the dinner proved that he was a perfectly bred gentleman. This was a strong point gained, for the families of St. Jude's liked to have their rector often to dinner, and they were fastidious in matters of table etiquette. But when Mr. Stem came to his grand coup of drawing his guest out, to his amazement he abjectly failed! There was something about the young clergyman that puzzled the worthy warden. He could see plainly that he was no ordinary man; the first ten words he uttered assured him of that. The grace he said over meat was very simple, and evidently very sincere. "No affectation about him, anyhow," thought Mr. Stem. But he was not to be "drawn out." Perhaps the warden was angling for minnows in a pool which contained no such small fish. His line, possibly, did not sound deep enough.

Mr. Stem was impressed with this young priest in a way he could not explain; but, upon the whole, he could not decide that he would do for St. Jude's. And when he noted that Mr. Blomfield gave abstracted and irrelevant answers to some of his most searching questions, his amour propre was severely wounded; and he was positively angry when his guest hastened to take his leave after dinner, before the warden had nearly finished his category of "tests." Still he was determined that the candidate should have a fair chance on the morrow before the congregation: but it must be confessed that his mind was half made up against him.

St. Jude's was crowded on Sunday morning. The weather was brilliant, and it was known that a "candidate" was to exhibit his paces. When the Reverend Henry Blomfield walked up the centre aisle from the robing-room there was a general preliminary verdict of favor. The surplice gave becoming fullness to his tall, graceful figure, and there was a grave self-possession about him which was exceedingly winning. He had a noble head, a clear, piercing, frank eye, and a mouth whose lines were sweet, yet firm and powerful. On the whole, the impression that he made upon that critical assemblage was singularly favorable. His entire freedom from the awkwardness and embarrassment which a man in his trying position might be supposed naturally to feel, was afterward wonderingly commented upon in the circles of St. Jude's. They did not then know the secret of Henry Blomfield's perfect self-possession. He was in his Master's house—the Church of God—and there was no awe or restraint for him in any human congregation. Upon entering the portal of that House he was met by an invisible but awful Presence, and it was clothed with a reverence that banished all other emotion that he walked up the aisle of St. Jude's. It is probable that he did not think even of Samuel Stem himself as he passed to the chancel and knelt in prayer. Yet, as he thus knelt, a strong, almost passionate appeal for aid in that trying ordeal went silently out from the heart of that devoted minister of Christ. No one but himself in that crowded church knew how great was his need of help, or how much depended upon his acquitting himself with credit. But when he stood up to begin the service there was no shade of care upon his face—nothing but a heavenly light.

"The Lord is in his holy temple: let all the earth keep silence before him." The full, round tones rolled from his lips without an effort, but they reached in melodious waves the remotest corner of the church. By the time the "Absolution" was pronounced every member of the congregation was rapt in the service with a new and indescribable delight! Such reading—so musical, sonorous, and impressive, yet so utterly devoid of any effort for mere effect—had never been heard in St. Jude's. Every one felt that here, certainly, stood a true evangelist of God. They were conscious of a keen intellectual pleasure in those exquisitely modulated tones; but overcoming all was a sense of spiritual enjoyment, a hushed and reverential impulse of worship, which seemed to pervade even the atmosphere, and to draw the most careless within its holy spell.

All this Samuel Stem saw and marked well. The candidate was gaining ground rapidly.

And now in the prayer for the President came that singular pause alluded to at the commencement of this story. No one, perhaps, of all the congregation, save Samuel Stem, saw what caused that interruption, and he could scarcely credit his senses. It was a broad and unmistakable yawn.

The senior warden sat through the sermon in a state of bewilderment, not unmixed with indignation. The audacity which could permit a minister, and he a candidate, deliberately to yawn in the face of St. Jude's was to him amazing. The impropriety of the thing was unequaled in all his experience. Not even by the eloquent and powerful sermon that followed could the young minister recover his lost ground with Mr. Stem.

It was the unanimous affirmation of old and young of St. Jude's that never had they enjoyed such a treat as that sermon. It was long enough—twenty-five minutes by the watch—but it did not seem to be more than ten minutes, so breathlessly did the people drink in every word. The text was the yearning cry of our blessed Saviour for souls: "Behold I stand at the door and knock." The style of the sermon was limpidity itself, while every one of its sentences—brief and pithy as epigrams—drove home some vital truth and clenched it fast. That wonderful voice, when reinforced by an action at once striking and graceful, had a rare charm for that people, upon whose ears had so long broken with monotonous jar the sonorous platitudes of the Reverend Theodore Warmplace. But, as with the service, every body confessed that the principal merit of the sermon was the deep sincerity which imbued it. It neither refrained from unsparing denunciation of guilty souls nor withheld an atom of the fullness of the divine love and mercy. Many a heart received an arrow that seemed shot straight at that single mark.

The truth was that Henry Blomfield always preached as if that sermon was to be his last chance of saving some perishing soul. He preached this trial sermon not more hoping to win a parish than earnestly praying that haply some might thereby be brought to believe and be saved.

St. Jude's went home more thoughtful than was common, and not only hoping but confident that the Reverend Henry Blomfield would be called to be their rector.

Samuel Stem went home with a curious and perplexing admixture of feelings. He knew that if he omitted to secure that reading for St. Jude's he could not hope to match it elsewhere. (The "reading" of the departed Warmplace had been his weak point.) And then after service he had been nearly overwhelmed with the enthusiastic eulogies of those members of the congregation who found opportunity to exchange a word with him. Mr. Stem could not but acknowledge that Mr. Blomfield had won the hearts of the whole congregation; and yet, that dreadful yawn! It was unpardonable. Mr. Stem went to dinner, and from thence to vestry meeting, which had been summoned for three o'clock of that Sunday, the necessity for deciding upon the question of a rector being deemed urgent enough to justify the meeting on that day.

II.

Henry Blomfield, hastening from church as soon as he could take off his surplice, met Dr. Hart at the door of the cheap boarding-house where the minister's family had their temporary home.

"Is there any change, Doctor?"

"No, I'm sorry to say there is not yet. She is still alive, and that is all."

"Doctor," and there was a wild despair in the voice, and an imploring appeal in the eyes, "is there then no hope? Must we give her up? Doctor, I know you will not give her up while there is any hope."

"My friend," replied the worthy Doctor, clearing his throat vigorously, and blowing his nose sonorously and suspiciously—"I need not remind you, a minister of God, that the issue is in His hands alone. I do not say, understand me, that the case is altogether hopeless. There is hope; but not much. I do not think it right to feed you with false hopes. There must be a change for the better or worse in the course of two or three hours. If for the worse, my work is done. You may depend upon my standing by you to the last."

Mrs. Blomfield was sitting by the sick child, but rose as her husband entered the room. Their hands met in a silent pressure, and together they bent over the little form lying there so fearfully beautiful in the burning bloom of the fever.

"May! May! don't you know papa? Papa's come home."

The blue eyes were wide open and rolling wildly about, seeming to see now this and now that object upon which their restless glances fell. But in vain the anxious father looked for any sign in those unnaturally bright orbs to indicate that she knew him.

Suddenly she began to sing, in a clear, sweet, child-warble, a fragment of one of the beautiful hymns of the Church which her mother had taught her:

"The gentle Saviour calls
Our children to his breast;
He folds them in His gracious arms;
Himself declares them lost."

Then the sweet voice prattled on: "Papa—mamma—don't hold me so tight. Don't take my hand out of Baby Harry's. He wants me to go with him." And then her voice dropped, and the dear head turned heavily, leaving the long, frayed, golden curls lying spread out upon the white pillow.

The stricken father dropped upon his knees with a heavy groan. "O Father," he cried, using in his bitter grief those words of matchless woe that erst went up from the midnight damps of Gethsemane, "if it be possible, let this cup pass from me!"

Long and fervently he prayed, and he found that consolation and strength that never fail to come when we throw ourselves upon the support of the Everlasting Arms.

The blue eyes of the sick child were closed when the minister rose from his knees, and she seemed to have fallen into one of those heavy but brief slumbers that had been attendant upon her illness. Mr. Blomfield now sat down with his wife by the window of the small apartment, and told her of the experiences of the morning.

"I have not the least idea of what my prospects of success are," he said. "For your sake, and hers" (looking toward the bed), "Mary, I did my best; but a frightful weariness seemed to overcome my brain and body. And once, in prayers—you would hardly credit it—I was for a moment fairly overcome by drowsiness, and only roused myself by a prodigious effort from dropping fast asleep at the desk."

"I do not wonder at all—my poor husband!" said Mrs. Blomfield. "Perhaps, however, no one noticed it. If they had, and had known that for three days and nights you had hung sleeplessly over the sick bed of a dear child, they would have excused you, I am sure."

Mr. Blomfield stooped and picked up a worn and broken little shoe, which had been lying on the floor. For a few moments he gazed at it, and then pressed it to his cheek with unutterable tenderness, while his eyes slowly filled with tears. His glance then wandered to the face of his wife, who sat grief-worn and care-wasted beside him, bearing her equal fatigue with a womanly strength which overmatched his own. An expression of pain, which had a dash of anger, came over his countenance as he read, plainly graven in the lines of her face, weariness, anxiety, and privation. A dark frown disfigured his forehead as his gaze fell and lingered upon her poor, plain, faded dress. From this his eye swept rapidly around the room, and took an inventory of its humble furniture at one flashing glance. When he spoke again it was with an emphasis and vehemence which showed that powerful feeling was working within him.

"Mary, I don't care for this place for myself. If I only were concerned I would even now leave the city without waiting for an answer, for my very soul revolts at the idea of being put up on trial—forced to go through my paces like a horse they want to buy. That man who insisted yesterday on my going to dinner I could see only did it that he might measure me, as a carpenter would a board he wants to build into a house. Of course it's all proper enough, but I can't force myself to endure it decorously; and the more he labored to turn me inside out, the more irresistibly I felt impelled to shut myself up. But then I do want to succeed in this trial for your sake and May's, if it shall please the Merciful Lord to spare her to us. God knows your lot has been hard enough since you became a poor minister's wife! And yet no man has worked more faithfully than I have. To think that angel lying there should have had to wear such shoes as these because her father could not afford to buy her a decent pair! It is wrong; and the parish that has for five years worked me to death and half-starved my wife and child have extortion and robbery to answer for in the sight of God. And yet even that poor pittance was better than to be penniless in a strange place, and scrambling for a parish I have no hope of getting among the score of better-known men that are after it."

Not for the first time now did Henry Blomfield know what courage and wisdom dwelt in the woman's heart that now beat tenderly against his own, and what strength and control in the little hand that was now pressed cool and firm upon his throbbing temples. When that pure, brave Christian woman who sat by his side told him sweetly and calmly that with him the meanest hovel was richer than a palace would be without him, he knew she uttered no romantic conventionalism, but the truth of a heart that knew no guile or dissimulation. When she reminded him that the duty he had so often taught to the children at the chancel rail, which was to be faithfully done in that station of life to which it had pleased God to call them, was as much his duty as theirs, he felt that the quiet rebuke was just, and that he who aspired to lead others was himself being led by this gentle, womanly hand. In a few words of calm, earnest, homely talk she swept every cloud from his mind and eye, and he felt his feet brought back again to firm ground.

A sound from within made him start as with an electric shock, and hastily turn toward the bed. His little daughter was sitting upright in the full splendor of that delicious light which poured in at the window. From her eyes had gone out the hot glitter of delirium, and the flush of the fever was no longer in her cheeks. She knew her father, and called him softly.

"Papa!"

In a second he was at the bedside.

"Papa, will you please give me a drink of water?"

She was perfectly rational, and her father in this fact felt the most profound joy. He had feared she was to pass away without one word of recognition, or without leaving them a single message of remembrance. But would she die? Would she not now live?

The doctor said there would be a change. Was this change unto life or death? Had she come back to them now, or only to herself, for a little while, before going away finally? Was this clear vision only that which comes so often to the sufferer whose eyes are about to close upon mortal scenes forever? They could not tell. A great hope and a great fear struggled together in their hearts, and they prayed for the doctor to come, while they almost dreaded to hear his step. When by-and-by he did come he found his patient lying pallid and quiet, with drops of perspiration dotting her face, where he had left her two hours before crimson with fever, and tossing in delirium. He took her pulse in his fingers with a grave air, while the father and mother watched his face with breathless suspense. The brief moments seemed hours, but when he spoke it was to thrill their hearts with joy.

"Thank God, she will live!"

There was a knock at the door, which Mrs. Blomfield opened to the landlady who brought a note addressed to "Rev. Henry Blomfield." No answer was wanted, she said.

"And how is she?" whispered the kind-hearted woman. Upon hearing from the rejoicing mother the good news she stole into the room on tip-toe to look at little May, and just remaining long enough to shake hands with them all, she went sobbing out of the door, and clattered off down stairs to spread the news through the house, where May was reigning pet from attic to cellar.

As Mr. Blomfield tore open the envelope with a trembling hand a vague prescience of bad news crept chillingly over him and brought a choking lump into his throat. The note ran thus:

"VESTRY ROOM OF ST. JUDE'S PARISH,
"Sunday Afternoon, June 26, 1864."

"REV. AND DEAR SIR,—At a full meeting of the wardens and vestrymen of St. Jude's Parish, held this P.M., the matter of your application for the vacant rectorship was duly considered. After a full interchange of views it was resolved that, while recognizing many qualities in yourself which would eminently adorn the position, the vestry feel constrained to decline to enter into the engagement which you seek.

"With the best wishes for your happiness and welfare, I remain, yours very respectfully,

"SAMUEL STEM, Senior Warden.

"REV. HENRY BLOMFIELD."

Notwithstanding Mr. Blomfield's misgivings he was not fully prepared for this disappointment, and a sharp pang shot through his brain as he read in those formal sentences the crushing of all his hopes. A few moments before he would have welcomed a lifetime of beggary to be assured of the restoration to him of his darling child; now she was saved to him the sense of his forlorn condition came back to him with redoubled poignancy. He had not even money to pay the doctor who had labored so faithfully to save his precious child. He was already three weeks in arrears for board, and he knew that his landlady was perfectly aware of his circumstances. He felt that she had already gone beyond her means in keeping him, and that if she had only hinted once or twice at the settlement of his bill, it was because of his affliction in the sickness of his little girl. He felt sure that she would not be able, however willing, to keep him much longer. The world looked very dark before him just now.

As soon as the doctor had left, which he did after he had written a prescription and given Mrs. Blomfield directions for the night, the poor minister sank into a chair, and covering his face with his hands, groaned aloud. Mrs. Blomfield was by his side in a moment; but it required all her tenderness and taxed her Christian strength to the utmost to lift from his heart the heavy load that had fallen upon it. But she did remove it partially, and the minister came that night to the family altar, if not very hopeful, at least not despairing of the future; and when, as they were singing (softly, for they thought May was asleep), a sweet, tremulous voice from the bed joined them in good old Bishop Ken's immortal hymn—

"Glory to Thee, my God, this night
For all the blessings of the light;
Keep me, O keep me, King of Kings, Under thine own Almighty wings!"

he felt the cloud lifted as if by angel hands, and his heart became light as it had not been for months. He thought what bitterness of soul would now have been his if that sweet voice were hushed in death, and the light of those dear eyes gone out forever. On the wings of prayer he mounted near to the Throne. From the darkness he stretched out his hands and felt the hand of God, and clasping it became again courageous and strong.

That night Henry Blomfield and his wife sat long by the window talking cheerfully over plans for the future. It was determined that he should go in the morning and answer an advertisement for a teacher of elocution in a flourishing school for young gentlemen, which advertisement he had noticed the day before. Mary insisted that he should now go to bed and get a little sleep, lest, as she jocosely said, he "might nod in the face of the principal on the morrow when he went to seek his fortune." She would lie down by May, and would be sure to hear her if she stirred ever so little. So they both slept.

In the morning, as soon as breakfast was dispatched, Mr. Blomfield went to the seminary. There had been twelve applicants, and the place had been filled on Saturday evening. This was unfortunate. But now that his manhood had come back to him he was not to be discouraged by a single disappointment.

But a greater trouble awaited him. Returning home, hot and weary from his long walk, he was met in the hall by Mrs. Emmons, the landlady of the house, who, with much circumlocution and stammering, made her business known.

"You know, Sir, that I have only my boarders to depend upon, and what with the high prices of every thing I have trouble enough to make ends meet. Now, while your dear little girl was so sick I wouldn't have done it for the world. But now she's doing so nicely (I was up to see her a bit ago, and she was as chirp as a cricket), I feel that I would have been doing my own children wrong if I hadn't. It will only be giving you the trouble of finding another boarding-house, and I'm sorry enough to have you go, I am sure." She said this last with sincere energy.

She had not yet explained herself fully, but Mr. Blomfield felt, with rapidly sinking heart, that what she was hesitating to say plumply was that he was to vacate his room for another family. And this she finally managed to say. "They have been wanting that room for several weeks, but I have refused 'em; and they came again this morning and said I must take them, and offered me a good price; and you see, Sir, I am in a way compelled to let them have it. I have, however, put 'em off as long as I could, so that May need not be moved too soon. I have promised they may take it this day week. I don't say any thing about the bill you owe me, Sir. I know that you will pay me when you can, and I am willing to wait." And with many apologies for what Mr. Blomfield could not but acknowledge was truly generous conduct, the worthy woman went off about her work, leaving the poor minister standing in the hall overwhelmed with misery. Here was a trouble indeed! To be turned out of this home—left with this helpless family adrift in the great city, without money or friends! He had, it is true, dreamed of such a contingency, but was nevertheless utterly unprepared for it. And this was the tidings he was to carry to his wife, instead of the good news she probably expected. With a heavy heart he mounted the stairs to his room.

III.

Mr. Samuel Stem sat in his snug library, enjoying a fragrant after-dinner cigar and meditating on St. Jude's. He was not quite satisfied that he had acted wisely in counseling the rejection of Mr. Blomfield's application for the rectorship. He was not willing to confess that the objections he urged against him were pushed more strongly and pertinaciously from the fact that, for the first time, the vestry showed a disposition to have an opinion other than Mr. Samuel Stem's, and that more than one member very warmly advocated the claims of the gentleman under discussion. Contending that it was the plain sentiment of the people that he should be called, Mr. Brown, the junior warden, who was nearly as rich as Mr. Stem, was conspicuous in his advocacy of Mr. Blomfield, and even went so far as to say that he thought the wishes of the parish ought to outweigh the prejudices of any individual. Mr. Stem thought he snuffed a faction in the vestry. He had more than once suspected Mr. Brown of aspiring to the senior wardenship and the autocracy of the parish; though, to do Mr. B. prompt justice, he had never had such a thought, and was acting in this matter from a sincere sense of duty. But Mr. Stem was stirred and stiffened by this unexpected opposition, and had finally the satisfaction of learning that his throne was still secure by carrying all the members, save Mr. Brown, in favor of rejection. And yet Mr. Stem was not well at ease about the matter as he smoked his after-dinner cigar.

Mr. Stem's meditations were interrupted by the entrance of his old friend and neighbor Dr. Hart, who often dropped in after dinner for a smoke and a chat. Dr. H. was a genuinely Christian man, but of a different denominational family from the one embracing St. Jude's, and consequently not particularly well informed concerning matters in that parish. Between these friends it was not often that church affairs were brought into the conversation, for both gentlemen were stout polemicists, and in maintaining their several dogmas of ecclesiastical faith were apt to get heated beyond the point of comfortable fellowship. After a few disputes of this kind, which had resulted in their parting in mutual high dudgeon, to the premature ending of a social evening, such controversy came to be tacitly tabooed. But it so fell out, on this particular evening, that Mr. Stem, having his mind full of St. Jude's and its rectorate, did mention the matter of the young minister to Dr. Hart.

The fact was, that notwithstanding their differences of doctrine, there was no man living in whose judgment, outside of Samuel Stem, that gentleman had so much confidence as in his outspoken Calvinistic neighbor. His own opinion he was apt to maintain pretty stoutly, as we have seen, against all ordinary cavilers; that opinion, reinforced by the coincidence of Dr. Hart, he would have upheld against a dissenting world. Hence, being sorely perplexed in his own mind, and extremely anxious to be fortified in the decision he had made, and feeling assured, moreover, that when he sought his friend's advice sincerely, even in a matter like the present, he could count upon its being sincerely rendered, he laid the whole case of Mr. Blomfield before Dr. Hart, yawn and all, stating it as frankly and fairly as he could.

When Mr. Stem came to the name of the Rev. Henry Blomfield in his narration, Dr. Hart repeated it after him as if in some surprise, but made no comment at the moment. Mr. Stem finished by asking,

"And now, Doctor, what is your candid opinion about the matter? Have I done right or wrong?"

Before Dr. Hart could reply little Johnny Stem, a sweet child of seven years, and his father's pet and idol, came bounding into the room in bare feet and snowy night-gown, to claim his father's good-night kiss. Mr. Stem stroked his flossy brown curls and looked into his dancing hazel eyes with a fondness he did not attempt to conceal. Johnny was also a great favorite with Dr. Hart, and after bidding his father good-night he bounded to the Doctor and put up his sweet rose-bud mouth to kiss him too, and then gamboled out of the room and up the stairs with merry shouts that made the house musical.

"Samuel," said the Doctor, gravely, after the door had closed upon the child, "do you love that boy?"

Samuel Stem looked at his friend with surprise.

"Do I love Johnny? Indeed I do. I fear sometimes I am making an idol of that dear child."

"It would be a sore trial for you to lose him?"

"God in mercy forbid!" exclaimed Mr. Stem, with a strong, sharp shudder. "But, Doctor, what do you mean? Surely you don't think that Johnny is—that there is any danger that he will—" and the voice of the alarmed father died away to a tremulous whisper as a frightful possibility, suggested by the grave looks of the Doctor and his strange questions, crept chillingly into his thoughts.

"Reassure yourself, my friend. The boy is perfectly well, and, if it pleases God, in the ordinary course of nature will grow to hale manhood. But I want you to answer me another question, after which I will explain, if indeed you do not guess my drift before I finish it. Suppose that boy were to be stricken down by a malignant disease, so that for days and nights together life and death were so evenly poised that a feather would turn the scale, do you think you would go about your business, eat, drink, and sleep as usual?"

"No, I'm sure I wouldn't. I would not be willing to leave him for an hour."

"Very well. Now suppose, after watching by his bedside for three sleepless and anxious days and nights, you should be compelled by business you could not forego to leave him for a time, would you be apt to give much thought to the ordinary proprieties of life? Would you, I ask?" (the Doctor here fixed his eyes keenly upon Mr. Stem, and threw a startling emphasis into his tone), "think the worse of yourself if you, with your nature unbent from the sharp tension of watching your possibly dying child, and prostrated with sleeplessness and fatigue, should go about yawning in the face of the whole city?"

"No, I'm sure I wouldn't," replied Mr. Stem, with great energy. "But what does all this mean?" he continued. "You don't mean to say that—"

"I mean to say that for three days and nights, save for the hour he spent at your dinner-table, and the hour and a half at the desk of St. Jude's, the man you have just rejected as your pastor has sat by the bedside of as sweet a child as ever blessed a parent's heart, and when he stood in your church on trial he did not know but when he returned to that bedside he would find his child gone to the angels."

Samuel Stem's eyes were full of tears and his head was bent low. He asked,

"Does the child live?"

"She does, and will recover."

"Thank God!" exclaimed Mr. Stem, fervently.

"I have seen that man," continued Dr. Hart, "under trying circumstances. I have studied him with an interest few men have ever awakened in me. He is, in my judgment, one of the noblest, purest, and most Christ-like men I ever saw. Presbyterian as I am, I know of no man to whom as a spiritual guide I would more willingly commit myself than to that young Episcopal priest. And now I will answer your question. You did not do wrong in acting as you did with the light you had. My opinion is you have made a great miss, and that you had better reconsider the matter if possible."

It was later than usual the next day when Dr. Hart came to Mr. Blomfield's room, but his patient was so much better that they had not missed him. After some brief directions to the mother the Doctor turned to Mr. Blomfield and said, "I hardly think it will be necessary for me to come again, she will do very well with mother's good nursing, and if you think it necessary you can call me in at any time. Doctors are pretty expensive friends nowadays, and I have conscience enough to cut off my visits as soon as I see they are not needed any longer."

Mr. Blomfield answered the smile of the Doctor as he said this with another, but so melancholy as to be almost ghastly. A new trouble now beset the poor man. It seemed absolutely necessary that he should say something about pay for the Doctor's services; indeed he probably expected it, and had thrown out this hint about the expense to open the way. Thus thought Mr. Blomfield, but what to say he knew not. He was a stranger to the Doctor, having called him in hastily in the first hours of May's sickness, and he certainly had no right to ask him to wait for his money. But he must say something, and trusting to the kindness of heart which the Doctor had seemed to possess in an eminent degree, he began:

"Dr. Hart, I trust you will not think that I would willingly delay for an hour the payment of a debt. I feel that I owe to you something more than money; I owe you a debt of gratitude which I can never repay. I feel that to your skill and attention I owe, under God, the life of my dear child. But I am forced to tell you that I am at this time without funds. I will be frank with you, and tell you that I know not when I shall be better off. This misfortune of the illness of my daughter befell us at a time when I was out of employment, and found me nearly destitute of money. I am now in search of employment, and trust that I may soon meet with success. I shall certainly not delay a moment in discharging my debt to you when it is in my power."

"Mr. Blomfield," replied Doctor Hart (with a cough that sounded very dry and harsh, and turning his head away so that the minister did not see a merry twinkle in his eyes, which, however, dear reader, you and I ought to know was shining through a watery film), "I earn my living by my profession; and, although I am not a hard man, I don't feel as if I could afford to give my services to people who are perfect strangers to me."

Mr. Blomfield thought: Heaven help me. How I have been mistaken in this man! But he was stung to the quick by what he fancied the doubt of his honesty in the Doctor's remark about giving his services, and with a touching dignity he said:

"Sir, I most deeply regret that my great necessity has compelled me to incur this obligation to you, but I beg you will spare me any doubt of my honor. I have here, Sir, in these trunks, a few books, some of them valuable. Will you permit me to send them to your house to retain as security for the payment of this debt, and I will be glad if you will at once furnish me with the amount, that I may settle it as speedily as possible?"

"There, there, let's have an end of this nonsense!" almost shouted the good old Doctor, who could not carry his mask any longer. "Take your books, indeed! Not if you never paid me. What do you suppose I want of a lot of trump-ery Episcopal theology, a double-dyed Calvinist like me? Here, I'll tell you what I'll do; I'll compromise the matter, if you like. Let May, here, come and see me every day and give me a kiss, and I'll take off a dollar for every time. Here, baby, give us the first installment now." And the old fellow made a great show of fondling May, who for her part wondered what made her cheeks so wet of a sudden.

"But, hold on, maybe I will get the cash after all. Here is something that I think contains good news for you." And the Doctor produced from his ample pocket-book a note, the counterpart of the one Mr. Blomfield had read with such sorrow the day before. But how different were the contents of this! It ran:

"VESTRY ROOM OF ST JUDE'S, June 27, 1864.

"REV. AND DEAR SIR,—It becomes my pleasing duty to inform you that the declination by the wardens and vestry-men of this parish of your application for the rectorship which was communicated to you yesterday was reconsidered at a meeting held this day, and it was unanimously resolved to tender you a call to the vacancy, at a salary of $3000 per annum, to date from the 1st of the present month. I may add, that it is the ardent wish of the officers, as well as the congregation of the parish, that you may find it convenient to accept this call.

"I beg to assure you that you will receive in the discharge of your duties the cordial co-operation of this body, and of none more cheerfully than "Your obedient servant,

"SAMUEL STEM, Senior Warden.

"REV. HENRY BLOMFIELD."

After reading, first to himself and then aloud, this good news, which at once made every thing bright before him, Mr. Blomfield caught the hand of Dr. Hart with a fervent grasp, and said: "I am sure, Sir, you have in some way brought to my door this marvelous good fortune. But will you pardon me if I ask you to join us in ascribing devout gratitude to God for this His merciful interposition in our behalf? Let us pray."

Samuel Stem does not hesitate to divide with Calvinistic Dr. H. the credit of his last and most successful choice of a rector for St. Jude's.

A LETTER.

I GOT a letter not long ago,
Three close pages the letter filled,
Telling me how in a recent fight
A gallant friend of mine was killed;
And it bade me tell the woman he loved—
There the words seemed somehow to blend—
For as I read it my heart was moved
With grief for her and the loss of my friend.

That night was the night of a brilliant ball,
And I knew that I should meet her there:
Oh, how stately and grand she looked,
With milk-white pearls in her shining hair!
How like a queen she moved through the rooms
Mid the hum and heat and the gaslight's glare,
Where the mingled odors of rich perfumes
Heavily hung on the indolent air!

"Ah, where are her thoughts?" I asked of myself,
As past she whirled in the mazy dance,
Her bright eyes sparkling, her cheek aglow,
And a smile on her lip as she met my glance.
"Does she never think of the battle-plain,
Of the terrible cannon's fiery breath,
Has never a white face, fraught with pain,
Chilled her heart in a vision of death?"

I took her hand for the last quadrille,
And in the pauses we talked of the past,
Talked of her lover, our old school-days;
Yet ever the bugle's ringing blast
Sounded to me in the cornet's strain,
And in place of that scene with its flood of light,
Wrecks of battle and heaps of slain
Loomed like shadows before my sight.

The dull dance ended; the music ceased;
The night waned close on the morning hours;
A languor lurked in the women's eyes;
And an odor of crushed and withered flowers
Had chased from the air its rich perfumes,
As I drew her jeweled arm through my own,
And led her out of the lighted rooms,
That we might speak together alone.

We stood where the failing moon looked in Through the dim conservatory's shade—
There I told her the sad, sad news,
And saw the rose on her young cheek fade,
Saw her droop like a blighted flower,
With her white hands clasped on her heaving breast:

"O God!" I said, "in thine own good hour, End this strife as to thee seems best!"

In a soldiers' hospital, nursing the sick,
But a week ago I saw her last,
Wearing the "sister's" plain black garb
(Oh how different she looked in the past!),
And the poor lads followed her with their eyes—
Moving among them from bed to bed—
As though she were a saint from Paradise,
And there shone a halo around her head.

THE LITTLE MONK.

THERE are many famous cities in Italy: Milan has its wonderful Cathedral, Venice the great square of St. Mark's, Verona the tomb of Juliet, and Rome the nursery of the world; but Florence alone is called beautiful—the beautiful Florence. It lies in the heart of Tuscany, along the silver Arno, surrounded by sloping plains and rounded hills clad in the greenest verdure. Villages crowd the hills and nestle in the valleys, and in the distance you see the woody Apennines shrouded in purple haze. Florence is an old city, time-worn and gray, and unlike any on this side of the water. Its streets are narrow, and the style of its architecture is massive rather than graceful; but it is filled with works of art, abounds in noble palaces and churches, and in its neighborhood are several pious monasteries, among others that of La Certosa.

La Certosa stands on a gentle hill covered with vines and olives, and consists of several chapels and cloisters with gardens attached. Imagine a range of buildings, half church and half fortress, with heavy porches and stained windows; here a court enlivened by a sparkling fountain; there an embowered walk with a crucifix at the end; and there a solitary cell for penance.

In the spring of 1360, when our story begins, it was at the height of its renown: at present it is but the shadow of its former self, so much has it suffered from the violence of the early Italian wars, the gradual decay of the monastic system, and the silent but certain assaults of Time. It is something, however, that it still remains, even in decay. It would have perished long ago, I am fond enough to believe, but for its being haunted by the memory of Hilario, and the fact of his story remaining yet untold. And who was Hilario, you ask? One of its abbots whose life was a round of holiness, whose days were passed in meditation, and whose nights were sleepless vigils? One of its monks renowned for fasts and penances, or the noble prince whose liberality endowed and upheld it? Neither prince, abbot, nor monk, I reply, but a simple peasant-boy—a dreamer, some twelve years old. Let me relate his story.

Hilario was the second child of peasant parents who lived in the neighborhood of Florence. Of his father but little is known, save that he was a handsome, graceless scamp, with a passion for rattling the dice-box and breaking female hearts. His mother was young and beautiful. Conceive a Florentine girl of sixteen; give her strange, bright eyes, and long black hair, rounded cheeks not too bloomy, a light and graceful form, and a pretty hand and foot. Such was Fiammetta when she became the wife of Martillini, and such was she to the last in spite of his ill-usage and neglect. Her first child, a little girl, died in its infancy; the second was Hilario, who lived, for any thing that I know to the contrary, till he was three-score and ten. His mother, however, died when he was a wee babe of six months. She perished by the Great Plague, which, in 1348, devastated Florence and the greater part of Italy. She was among the first who caught the infection, or the monks would hardly have been so willing to receive her little Hilario. A few months later and he must have perished with her, so powerless were they to succor those who sought shelter within their walls. But as it was, they adopted the child, and promised to bring him up in piety and good works. The next day Fiammetta died, and was buried in the shade of an olive-tree hard by, and Hilario became a little monk.

Luckily for the child, as well as the good fathers, the gardener of La Certosa had a wife, who consented to nurse Hilario, having just lost a little boy of her own. She suckled the babe until he was able to be weaned, and when he was able to go alone she was swept away by the Plague, as was the gardener also.

The next year or two Hilario took care of himself, child though he was, so dreadful were the ravages of the Pestilence, and so busy the monks of La Certosa administering the sacrament to the sick and dying in Florence and the villages round about. Wandering at will through the various buildings of the monastery, he found his way to the refectory at meal-times, to the chapel at vespers, and to the garden and its winding walks at all hours. At the start he was afraid of the stone cherubims between the windows, and the figures of the couchant hound on the tomb of the knight Niccolo; but by degrees he took courage and stared unflinchingly into the eyes of the first, and offered the last an ortolan, in hopes that he would eat it and become good friends with him.

This was in the smallest cloister, which was ever after a favorite with him; for when his timidity wore off he discovered that the panes therein were beautifully stained with monks, and nuns, and angels, and the good St. Bruno. As his boldness increased he explored the other chapels, and finally ventured into the largest as far as the altar. Behind the altar was a great window of stained glass, dusk and dim by day, and hardly lighted on the most radiant of summer eves. It was several days before Hilario saw it in its glory; but when at last the setting sun shone upon it he was delighted beyond measure. Not that the simple child guessed what it was that he beheld, or knew how much it entranced him; he merely sat down on the steps of the altar, and gave himself up to the picture before him as we give ourselves up to a dream.

And a beautiful dream it was, the picture in the window—the most benign dream that has yet visited this gray old world—the Virgin and Holy Child! The Virgin sat on a sort of throne-chair, with a high back and sculptured arms, and in her lap rested the Child Jesus, holding a gilded globe and cross. Before him knelt the Wise Men offering gums, spices, and jewels, their swarthy faces brightened by the halo round his brow; above him glittered the miraculous Star, and above the Star hovered the Holy Dove, bearing an olive bough in its bill. The dove was no novelty to Hilario, for he remembered noticing a flock of similar ones flying over the garden; but the child was the first he had ever seen, and he wondered thereat. He was not alone then in the shadowy chapel, but had a little brother on the gorgeous window (such was the meaning of his childish reveries), and a mother to watch over and love him. For the pictured Virgin seemed to smile on the motherless Hilario, while the Child Jesus offered him the gilded globe and cross! When the monks came into the chapel to celebrate vespers they found Hilario with his hands clasped, and his eyes fixed on the face of the Blessed Child. During the service they gazed at their young brother full as often as at the Infant Saviour, and felt no compunctions at heart therefore; for they remembered what the Lord himself says, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Hilario grew rapidly, and was wise beyond his years; an earnest and thoughtful child. Not pale and thin like most young dreamers, but stalwart and strong, with brave blue eyes and chubby red cheeks. How could it well be otherwise when he spent hours each day playing in the gardens of La Certosa, fanned by the warm wind and sunned by the light sky of Tuscany? There were flowers to be weeded and watered (for the monks had procured another gardener, a widower with a little daughter named Annunciata), shrubbery to be clipped and trimmed, doves to be fed; and, when all this was done, purple butterflies to chase, and golden bees to listen to—honey-making bees, whose hives were somewhere near. He must have been a house-child indeed who could have kept indoors while gardens like those of La Certosa were always open to him.

But we can not always live in gardens, however much we may love the flowers, nor yet in chapels and cloisters, albeit under the very eyes of the saints; there is other business in life, and other lore to be learned, duties to be performed, and many a good and wise book to be read and pondered on.

"It is about time," said the abbot, when Hilario had attained his fourth birthday—"it is about time that our little brother should know how to read his Psalter."

"I have long thought so, my lord," answered Father Michael, one of the gravest of the monks; "and was about to propose teaching the boy the rudiments of the Latin tongue."

"Do so, my brother," continued the abbot; and calling Hilario to him, Father Michael began his first lesson. He opened an illuminated copy of the Gospels, and laying it on his knees pointed out the different letters. It was no easy task to engage Hilario's attention, for when summoned by the abbot he was in the act of catching a butterfly; besides, he was never at any time overfond of Father Michael.

Failing to interest the child with the alphabet, the good Father turned over the leaves and showed him the emblazoned initials and the strips of illumination. They were pretty enough, with their manifold colors, crimson, and purple, and blue, laced and barred with gold and silver inks; lattices of scroll-work, sprigs of leaves, garlands of vines, bunches of white lilies, and flocks of doves. Hilario was pleased with the pictures, and he tried to be interested in the letters, but a stray sunbeam distracted him.

"It is brighter than the gold ink in your book," said he to Father Michael, "and, hark! your doves don't coo like those in the garden."

Father Michael knew that well enough, for he had a fine taste for nature, in spite of his asceticism; but it would not do to confess it to Hilario just at that time, when the lad was hunting about for an excuse to escape his purposed studies; so he shaded the grating of the cell till it kept out the sunshine, and read aloud the best of the Gospel parables, tracing with his finger the printed words as the spoken ones dropped from his tongue; he then translated the Latin into Italian, the soft dialect of Tuscany. He read the Parable of the Sower, the story of the Marriage at Cana, and how the Child Jesus sat in the temple and taught the Jewish Rabbins. Hilario listened attentively, standing by the side of the grave monk; and when the latter ended his reading in the middle of the Parable of the Unjust Steward, the curiosity of the child was thoroughly aroused. He waited a moment for Father Michael to finish the parable, and finding that he did not, but on the contrary shut the book and fastened its clasps, he asked, "What became of the steward?"

"That our little brother will know when he learns to read."

From that hour there was no further trouble in teaching Hilario his alphabet and the rudiments of Latin. Sunbeams in the grating, doves in the garden, the flowers which Annunciata threw in the cell—nothing drew the young student from his lessons at Father Michael's knee. He was soon able to read and understand the Breviary, which Father Michael used at matins and vespers, and he succeeded in making the good monk read to him the remainder of the Unjust Steward. It was not long before Father Michael had two pupils instead of one; for the little Annunciata, growing tired of throwing flowers at the rapt Hilario, ventured into the cell herself, to see what kept him from her so many sunny hours. With Father Michael's permission he showed her the illuminated Gospel; and the two young heads bent over it, almost touching the leaves with their eyes.

To reward Hilario for his diligence Father Michael gave him a little robe of white serge with a hood of the same; a cord to wear around his waist; sandals for his feet; and a cross and rosary to hang by his side. He was an exact copy of the brothers of La Certosa; and when they first saw him in his new robe—it was at vespers—not one but smiled to himself and remembered his own childhood. To tell the truth, the boy was a gleam of sunshine on the sombre walls of the monastery. He touched the withered hearts of the old monks, and made them living and loving men.

About this time the family of the Knight Niccolo, the hound upon whose tomb frightened Hilario so in his baby years, wishing to honor their pious relative, dug for his dust a subterranean chapel, and dedicated it to his memory. When it was finished there came an architect from Florence, Messire Andrea Orcagna, who erected a grand monument over the saintly warrior. Four twisted columns supported a canopy under which lay an image of Niccolo in full armor, his sword by his side, and his hands folded on his breast. It was a fine piece of workmanship, and the monks were loud in its praise. To Hilario it was a miracle, and he was never tired of looking at it. His admiration pleased the good architect, who begged permission one day to take the child with him to Florence.

"The boy has a soul for art," said he to the abbot; "let me show him some of its masterpieces." The abbot consented, and the pair set out for the city—Messire Andrea in his silken cloak, and Brother Hilario in his robe of serge.

Walking side by side in pleasant talk, now in the shade of chestnuts and pines, and now in the sunny spaces between them; up hills and down dales; past convents, churches, and villas; the distance between La Certosa and Florence rapidly lessened, and our travelers soon found themselves at the city gate. Messire Andrea would fain have carried Hilario, for it was a gala day, and the streets were somewhat crowded; and Hilario the child was quite willing to be carried, for the journey had wearied him, but Hilario the monk, Brother Hilario, wouldn't for a moment hear of it, but trudged behind the smiling architect, struggling through the opposing crowd with a stout heart and a very weak pair of legs.

They passed the Vecchio Palace, with its projecting battlements and its lofty bell-tower; the unfinished Cathedral of Santa Maria del Fiore, and Grotto's Campanile, and finally came to the Church of Santa Maria Novello. The morning service was over, and the church was nearly deserted. The priest was disrobing; the censerboys had already departed; only the sacristan remained.

"This little monk," said the architect, pointing to Hilario, "comes to see the Golden Virgin of Cimabue. He won't detain you long; in the mean time take this sequin," and he slipped one into the hand of the sacristan.

"Bless his little hood," replied the sacristan; "he shall stay as long as he pleases. Let me show his reverence the way."

On the walls of the west nave they found the Golden Virgin. It was not, as you may suppose, a golden image, but a picture on a gold ground, the work of the illustrious Cimabue. It was the boast of Florence in those days, the glory of all her citizens, and old chronicles describe the enthusiasm with which it was first received when fresh from the easel of the inspired master; how it was borne home from his studio on a triumphal car drawn by milk-white steeds, preceded by chanting monks and young girls strewing flowers, and followed by the shouting populace; and how Charles of Anjou, then on his way to Naples, crossed himself devoutly as it passed him, and hung a diamond chain on the neck of the modest painter.

"How does little Hilario like the picture?" inquired the architect.

"It is beautiful, maestro mio; but I don't like it like the one at home. In that the Virgin loves me, and the Jesus Child smiles; here they say, 'Worship us.' I like that angel better;" and he pointed to a tomb on which was sculptured an angel with inverted torch, the Greek Genius of Death.

"Many thanks, Brother Hilario," said the flattered sculptor; "that figure is mine. You like Greek art, I see. Let me carry you a while, and I will show you more of it. Come, jump in my arms." The offer was too tempting to be resisted; monk Hilario pleaded, but child Hilario triumphed; for he took the hand of Messire Andrea, and, springing into his arms, nestled on his broad breast, and was borne down the aisles and into the street, drowsed with fatigue. He must have slept while in the arms of his friend, for when he came to himself it was near noon, and in a different part of the city. Instead of the dim old church and its gorgeous pictures, he saw a beautiful room filled with marble statues—figures of men and gods, graceful and strong, and pure as snow. He trod on a marble pavement of divers colors, and over him rose a vaulted dome inlaid with mother-of-pearl.

"Does our good father like the statues?" inquired the architect after the boy had gazed his fill.

"I like that man who kneels to sharpen his knife;* he is a grand fellow, his eye fairly flashes. And the two yonder with limbs locked, tugging and straining to throw each other down;† won't they fall and break? But that queer man with shaggy thighs and goat's feet,‡ I would love him the most if he would only finish his dance. Look! he snaps his fingers, and shakes his beard. Let us hide behind the door, and he will begin again. Dance, faun, dance!"

They went from room to room, the sculptor pointing out the master-pieces of his art, and Hilario prattling about them in his odd, childish way. "We have been indoors long enough," said Messire Andrea, when he had finished showing Hilario the treasures of the chamber. "I will take you to the garden of Florence, and then we must back to the monastery, for I promised Father Michael to return you before vespers."

Opposite the court-yard, at the back of what is now the Pitti Palace, was a large amphitheatre, from which diverged a number of paths that ascended the hill whereon the garden stood. Hither Messire Andrea led Hilario, and climbing from terrace to terrace they soon arrived at the summit. Down long and winding avenues, arched over with leafy laurels; through groves of acacia, and pine, and oak; past thickets of bay, and among beds of flowers till they came to Orange Island. Messire Andrea threw himself at full length on the turf and gave himself up to his thoughts, and Hilario wandered about at his pleasure, chasing the almond blossoms as they drifted by on the wind, and skimming pebbles over the surface of the lake. The city lay below steeped in the afternoon sun, a cluster of palaces and towers, with here and there a dome lifted in the air. Beyond its walls on the north and east you saw the wooded Apennines; on the south the valley of the Arno, studded with olive groves and green with summer; and on the west the Arno itself, glittering like fire. Feasting his eye with these delights, and lulled by the hum of the city, Messire Andrea slipped from dream to dream till the declining sun warned him to awake. He looked for Hilario, and not finding him any where about ascended an avenue of cypress, which led from the margin of the lake to the highest summit of the garden. The avenue was lined with statues of fauns and wood gods, except at its upper end where the circle of the terrace commenced, and there some one had placed the figure of a little monk. He stood on a pedestal two or three feet in height, with his back to Messire Andrea. There was a similar pedestal on the other side of the avenue, but it was vacant. "What can this mean?" thought the sculptor; for he remembered no monk there when he last visited the place: "I must see into the mystery." It was no mystery at all, but only brother Hilario, who had climbed the pedestal to have a better view of the city. He it was whom the sculptor had mistaken for a statue, as you or I might have done ourselves, so motionless was the dreaming child, and so calm and white the folds of his robe and hood. There was nothing of the statue though in his red cheeks and blue eyes when you saw them; and neither you nor I ever saw a statue jump from its pedestal and walk down a cypress avenue as did the little monk. For Hilario was as anxious to return to the monastery as was Messire Andrea to have him return; so off they started at full speed, walking in the yellow sunset, and finally entered the great chapel just as vespers began.

The next day, and for days and months afterward, Father Michael resumed his teaching of Hilario, exercising the boy in the Latin and Tuscan tongues. His other pupil, the little Annunciata, studied with them, but more because she was lonesome without Hilario than because she loved Father Michael's Gospels. The Gospel of woman (and what save a budding woman is a little damsel of eight, the age of Annunciata!) is her heart, and from the beginning she reads it intuitively. While we, poor dullards, are fretting over our horn-books, mastering their contents line by line, she unclasps the Gospel of Love and is soon deep in its glowing pages!

Hilario and Annunciata! Were I a painter I would select these children for a theme, and paint them in a picture as I see them in my fancy, reading together in the old monk's cell. They sit on a little bench at Father Michael's feet, the light of the grated casement slanting on their faces, the illuminated Gospel open on their knees. The wind plays with the book, mistaking its vignettes for flowers, and the hair of the children for sunshine! A hand of each secures the rebellious leaves, and now and then brushes back the clustering curls. Father Michael turns his head, the hands meet and press each other, and from behind the curls what glances! They are studying the Gospel, old man! They have found the text which says, "Little children, love one another."

Yes, Hilario and Annunciata loved—loved in that old monastery, in the midst of those gray priests. It was as strange as the growth of flowers down in deep dark mines, or up in the intense cold of mountain peaks. But so it was. And if any body was to blame in the matter, it was Father Michael and the old romancers. For you must know that when Hilario had gone through the Evangelists, and was beginning to read the Fathers, the old priest showed him his library of MSS., and let him read them at his leisure in the cell or the garden, or wherever else he pleased.

I am afraid the Fathers fared badly for a time, the children were so wrapt in the chroniclers. Their favorite haunt was the garden. At the end of its chief walk there was a little bower which Annunciata had begged from her father. Four almond-trees were its pillars, and a lattice-work of vines inclosed them. The day stole in from above tinged with bloom, and from the sides greenly, as if through curtains of emerald. The floor was a plat of grass, in the centre of which stood a rustic seat of woven twigs. It was just the place to read romances in; so green, and fresh, and still. You heard no noise, save the wind in the leaves, or the murmur of some adventurous bee; and saw nothing alien to your thought—almond boughs overhead, bunches of grapes on each side, and in front, down the garden-walk, flowers and butterflies.

As soon as their lesson was over Hilario and Annunciata tripped from Father Michael's cell, the former with a roll of MSS. under his arm, the latter with a frame of broidery, and hid away in the bower. Had you been near at such times you would have heard them reading with whispery voices, not much louder than the bees (who are reading too, for aught I know, when we think they are only humming) or the wind in the leaves. Peeping in the bower, you would have seen them side by side on the rustic seat, Hilario with his hood thrown back, and his sandaled feet on the grass, and Annunciata bending over her broidery, drinking every word as it fell from his lips. Or you might have seen Annunciata reading while Hilario held her broidery. They read the best of the old romances—King Robert of Sicily, Gawain and Gologlass, The Squire of Low Degree, and Launcelot of the Lake. These were in Latin; in Tuscan they had the history of the Trojan War, by Guido of Colonna, and that medley of things sacred and profane, The Gesta Romanorum.

They were ripe for the seed of romantic love, and it blossomed at once in their hearts and brains, imparting an air of courtliness to their manners, and a sweet extravagance to their dreams. Hilario imagined himself a king or knight, according to the romance he was reading, and Annunciata was a queen or damsel in distress. He spurred his steed against Paynim foes, and she waved her scarf from gloomy battlements. Or they walked side by side in enchanted vales under a rainbow moon. Their hands met, and were locked together, like the tendrils of the vines around them, and the almond blossoms dropped on their hair. And when they read the mournful story of Francesca of Rimini (for Father Michael had a copy of the Divina Commedia in Dante's own handwriting), their tears dropped faster than the blossoms, blotting the precious parchment. That day they read no more.

But during all this while, the days of romance-reading and the months and years of Father Michael's teaching, Hilario never forgot that he was a monk or neglected his duty in the chapel. It was his duty to wait on the abbot at mass; he helped him change his vestments, swing the smoking censer, and rang the bell at the elevation of the Host. Picture to yourself the dim old chapel and its massive pillars; the procession of hooded monks in the aisles; the lighted tapers and the glittering altar; and in the stained window behind them the Holy Mother and Child! The gray-headed abbot chants the prayers, the brethren beat their breasts, the voices of the choir tremble, and the organ oppresses the air with its thunder. The gloom deepens and weighs upon the soul. But see in front of the altar a little dreamer in white! His hands are clasped prayerfully over his breast, and the dying sunset, smiling through the Jesus Child, imparts a halo to his hair! Nor only Hilario but Annunciata likewise, standing behind her father, the tanned old gardener. She counts her beads demurely, but her eyes are fixed on Hilario. He seems not to see her, but gazes steadfastly on the Jesus Child, and sees her all the more!

Up to the time of his falling in love with Annunciata it never came home to Hilario that he was a monk. To be sure every body called him the little monk, and he wore his monk's robe and hood daily; but he ceased to remember, or never perhaps knew, the obligation imposed upon him. Living in a monastery may be a very good preparation for heaven, but it keeps one from knowing a great many things on earth. In his journey to Florence with Messire Andrea, and the walks to which it gave rise among the neighboring villages, Hilario saw noble lords and ladies walking in splendid gardens, and in drooping vineyards laughing lads and lasses. Hands met hands, eyes answered eyes, and Youth and Beauty went up and down the world together. It was not so in the monastery; except himself and Annunciata no one there loved, unless in secret, and parted from his dear one. The gray-headed abbot, austere and cold, Father Michael the studious book-worm, Father Geronymo and the rest of the brethren, it could not be that they had known the weakness of human passion. "No," said Hilario, "I am the only lover here." But could he have read the hearts and memories of the monks he might have thought otherwise.

A paragraph or so back I mentioned Annunciata's father, the tanned old gardener. It was to him that Hilario went, like Sir Degore to the Soldan, and confided the secret of his love. It amused the old man vastly; but he preserved a grave face, and affected to feel honored by the proposed alliance.

"There is but one objection, Hilario; you are a monk, and monks can not marry."

"If monks are not allowed to marry, then I will be one no longer. But can not I be absolved?"

"Yes," said the gardener, "if the Pope will grant you a dispensation; and I dare say he will. You have only to go to Rome."

"To Rome be it, then," said Hilario, as he walked away.

"When the sky falls we shall have larks," laughed the gardener, and went on plucking his weeds.

This was in the afternoon of a bright day in May, 1360, and shortly after Hilario had attained his twelfth birthday. The next morning he rose at dawn and set out for Rome, telling no one of his intention, not even Annunciata. The abbot missed the boy at matins, and supposing him in the garden sent thither for him. He was not found, so the service proceeded without him. His chair was vacant at breakfast in the refectory; nor did he make his appearance in Father's cell at the hour of recitation. Annunciata came and attempted to say her lesson; but missing the company, and, it may be, the prompting of Hilario, she made but sorry work of it. Father Michael dismissed her before she was half through, and they separated for the day, the monk to wonder afresh what had happened to the boy, and the damsel to wander forlornly in the garden.

Here for a time we must leave her and follow the fortunes of Hilario. Starting from the monastery at daybreak, he struck at once into an unfrequented path, which ran in the same direction as the public highway, and was soon a league on his journey to Rome. The dew was so bright under his feet and the sky so blue over his head that he fairly sang for joy, forgetting the distance he had to travel, and almost forgetting Annunciata, for whose sake he was traveling. But that and more was to be forgiven in a child like him, so delightful were the landscapes by which he was surrounded.

The Valley of the Arno is the most beautiful spot in all Italy, a region of divine slopes and hollow vales, studded with graves and vineyards, a very dreamland of form and color. It has no equal in the New World. Through its groves and vineyards, across its vales, and up its slopes went Hilario, shouting aloud, now chasing a hare or bird, and now stopping to pluck a handful of grapes. He walked on till near noon, when he came to the foot of a mountain, across which his pathway wound; beyond that point the monastery would be lost to him. He ascended the mountain a short distance to obtain a better view of what he had left, and spying a stone cross which some pious soul had erected, he knelt before it and counted his beads, praying for himself and Annunciata, wondering the while whether she missed him much, and what she was at that moment doing. While he was musing the bells of La Certosa rang for noon; and so sweet were their chimes, floating from vale to vale, and mellowed by distance, that he half wished himself back. But when he remembered his love for Annunciata he took heart again, and set his face for Rome, trudging manfully around the mountain, framing in his mind what he intended to say to the Pope. "Holy Father," thought he, and here his fancy stopped.

In the afternoon he crossed the Arno, and before evening reached the village of Cucina, where he slept for the night. His food through the day, and for many days afterward, was grapes, vineyards of which grew all along his route, and his drink water, or the light wines of Tuscany. He had nothing to fear from want in a country like Italy; and as for shelter, was he not a monk? And what peasant but felt himself honored when a monk stopped at his cottage? It was beautiful to see the tenderness with which he was regarded by the simple folk of Tuscany. Those whom he passed in the fields crossed themselves and said an Ave; on the road he was stopped and his blessing asked; and when he drew near a cottage its inmates came to the door and invited him in.

There was a strange mingling of the monk and the child in his words and actions, and it captivated the hearts of all who saw him, especially mothers with children of his own age. They saw at once his orphaned condition, and loved and pitied him as only women can love and pity the children of the dead. Some gave him fruit and bowls of cream, while others threw back his hood and kissed his brow and cheeks. But those who had children dead, pale mothers of unseen angels, it was they who loved him most, parted his curls oftenest, and looked the deepest into his soft blue eyes. To their hearts his "Peace be with you!" was as a message from God.

On the morning of the second day the valley of the Arno broadened into a plain, across which Hilario trudged, breaking for himself a path in the untrampled grass. The morning wind rolled the waves of verdure around his feet, and went sweeping away beyond him, ruffling the long billows as far as the eye could see, where they poured down some vale on the east, or broke against the base of the Apennines. From the hour of his leaving Florence till he reached the Eternal City—a ten days' journey—the Apennines were always in sight, stretching along his path like the wall of the world. In some places they seemed to huddle together, peak behind peak; at others leagues intervened between, vistas of valley and plain opening on soft skies and snowy clouds. It was difficult to distinguish the clouds above the mountains from the snow on their summits, so dazzlingly white were both in the clear Italian light. The mountains were clothed with forests of pine, oak, and chestnut, old and trackless, and frowned grandly through the haze of distance. "Holy Father," said Hilario, pursuing his yesterday's speech, "you see a little monk;" and here he ceased, for his fancy wandered off and was lost in the mountains.

From fertile plains to sandy hills, brown and barren, worn by old floods in a thousand shapes; down desolate gullies and ravines; along the source of the Tiber, a mere thread; through Arezzo, Camuscia, and Cortona; past the haunted lake Thrasymene, the olive-hedged road of Passignano, the fields and orchards of Clitumnus, the Roman gate of Spoleto, the leafy defiles of Mount Somma, the ruins of Otricoli, the dreary waste of the Campagna; in the morning light, the blaze of noon, the sober golden eve; under the white moon and stars; day by day and league by league, plodded Hilario on his pilgrimage to Rome, as lone and lovely in the changing landscapes through which he passed as a southward-flying bird. Occasionally some peasant gave him a lift in his cart, and once a mounted horseman seated the boy on his saddle, and they rode together seven or eight leagues, chatting pleasantly.

The ninth morning of his journey saw Hilario beyond Civita Castellana, on the road to Nepi. He passed the Roman Aqueduct, old in the days of the Cæsars, which supplied the latter city with water, and lingered, as many a traveler has done since, to watch the river that flows through its arches, and falls through clouds of spray in the rocky ravine.

Then came the Campagna, a boundless grassy waste, moving to and fro like the surface of the sea; not in waves or billows, but with a slow and level motion, monotonous and wearisome. It was watered by rivulets and streams; lighted by miniature lakes, paven with the marble sky or matted weeds; and sown with wild-flowers, the chiefest of which were poppies:

"And far and wide, in a scarlet tide,
The poppy's bonfire spread."

Brushing flowers at every step, and frightening the shy lizards from their hiding-places in the hedges, on and on plodded Hilario, till he reached Baccano, and came in sight of Rome. He passed groups of shepherds clad in sheep-skin cloaks, and followed by dingy white dogs, or mounted horsemen armed with long lances in pursuit of buffaloes; and now and then he was overtaken by peasants driving carts laden with wine-casks, or heavy wains drawn by majestic oxen. Others were on foot, jaunty-looking fellows with steeple-crowned hats bound with ribbons, scarlet vests embroidered with gold, silver buckles at their knees, and around their waists fringed scarfs of some gay color; and peasant-girls in bodices and short skirts, with head-dresses of white linen, and silver arrows in their hair.

Beyond Baccano he saw Rome in the distance, looming over the waste of the Campagna, a mass of domes and towers, drawn darkly against the horizon. "Now," thought he, "I shall see the Pope, and he will absolve me from my vow. 'Holy Father, you see a little monk, who loves a little damsel'"—but his fancy outran him, and reveled in Rome.

A league farther and the city grew more distinct; he saw its seven hills crowned with palaces and churches, the belfries topping its convents, and finally the obelisk inside the Gate of the People.

It was late in the afternoon when he entered the city, too late for him to see the Pope that day, so he shook the dust from his sandals, and sat down and rested a while in the shadow of the obelisk. Worn out by his ten days' journey, and lulled by the sleepy dash of the fountains, his head drooped on his bosom, his hand unclasped from his staff, and he was soon fast asleep, and dreaming of Annunciata. It seemed to him that they were sitting together in the garden of La Certosa, not as of old, a little monk and damsel reading stately romances, but she a blushing lady with orange-flowers in her hair, and he a dainty cavalier, with sword and cloak and plume. Then they knelt in the chapel, as was their custom at vespers, not apart, as of old, but side by side, in front of the altar, at the feet of the abbot. The abbot chanted the service, the choir sang an anthem, and the organ thundered and thundered. Annunciata passed from his sight, he knew not how, the abbot disappeared in the sacristy, and the whole chapel seemed to undergo a change; only the music remained, a storm of sound—the music and Father Michael. But no, it was not Father Michael either; for, opening his eyes drowsily, Hilario found himself in the arms of a strange monk; not where he sat down to rest, in the shadow of the obelisk, but in a lighted chapel where vespers were being celebrated; in the chapel of St. Costanza, whither the monk had borne him, dead asleep. He woke up as far as he was able till vespers were done, and finished his night's rest in the cell allotted him.

The next morning he was awakened by the ringing of the bells that ushered in Ascension Day. Donning again his monk's robe, he followed the brethren of St. Costanza to the Church of St. John Lateran; saw the Pope officiating in the high mass, and then stole softly out, and awaited his coming. It was impossible to get near, much less to speak to, His Holiness on his way to the papal palace. What with the bands of horsemen and pikemen, the long procession of monks and friars, the citizens that kept pouring in from every street, and the crowds of pilgrims like himself, Hilario was nearly trampled to death. One moment he caught a glimpse of the canopied chair of the Pope, the next he was swept back by the surging sea; the red caps of the cardinals mingled with the gray robes of the friars, and then his hood was pushed over his eyes. Luckily for him there was a puppet-show near, and when the multitude were done with the Pope, as most of them were by the time he reached the palace, they ran off to see the puppets, leaving the road tolerably safe for little folks like Hilario. He pushed his way through the stragglers that remained, and climbed the steps of the papal palace, eager and yet afraid; his heart beat wildly, the blood flushed up in his cheeks, and he trembled in every limb. At the second staircase he was stopped by one of the Pope's guard, a handsome knave in slashed doublet and hose.

"Halt, my little master!"

"Stand aside, fellow!" said Hilario, stoutly; "I have business with His Holiness."

"Indeed, your reverence," said the soldier; "then I will let you pass; but I must see my captain first. Will you take my battle-axe, and keep guard in my absence, or will you go and find monseigneur yourself?"

"I will keep guard," replied Hilario, and took the battle-axe, which the soldier placed in his hands. It was as much as he could do to hold it, the head was so heavy; but he managed to keep it upright till the soldier returned with his captain.

"I have come all the way on foot from Florence," said Hilario to the captain, "to obtain a dispensation from the Pope, and I hope you will admit me to him. Pray, Sir, do, and Annunciata will thank you."

"Oh ho!" smiled the captain, "there is a lady then in the case. Come with me, Father Francis—I think you said Francis?—and I will see what can be done. I am the slave of the ladies."

Up the passage they strode, the sandals of Hilario pattering on the pavement to the jingling of the captain's rapier. Reaching the door of the Pope's chamber, the captain tapped thrice thereon. "Come in," answered a voice beyond. The door opened, the soldier bowed and retreated, and Hilario found himself in the presence of Innocent the Sixth. He sat at a large table, covered with books and papers, in full canonicals, just as he came from mass, his mitre by his side, and a half-opened letter in his hand. His hair was thin and white, and he looked anxious and care-worn. The troublous times in which he lived weighed upon his heart and occupied all his thoughts. He started when Hilario entered, like one who fears treachery every where; but when he saw that his visitor was a mere child he reassured himself, and smiled, partly at his timid fancies, and partly to cheer Hilario.

"Come hither, my son, and tell me who you are, and what you want."

"Holy Father," said Hilario, "you see a little monk who loves a damsel named Annunciata. We live in the monastery of La Certosa. I love Annunciata, and Annunciata loves me. The gardener says a monk can not marry. Now I am a monk, and I want to marry Annunciata. And I beseech you, Holy Father, to absolve me. I have walked all the way to Rome to see your Highness."

"Poor child!" thought the Pope, sadly, "and you, too, protest against the creed that crushes the heart of its priests." Then aloud: "So you love the little Annunciata?"

"Dearly, your Grace."

"I will absolve you, then, on one condition—that you tell me all about it. Come, begin, and I will write the dispensation. You have a father?"

"I know none, except Father Michael."

"A mother?"

"With the angels."

And thus they went on, the Pope asking questions and the child answering them, till he had unfolded the few incidents of his uneventful life. It was a plain tale, simply told; but it charmed that worn and wearied man, so seldom did he come in contact with a fresh, unworldly nature. For all his having lived years in La Certosa, and worn the garb of its brethren, Hilario was no monk, and stood in no need of being absolved on account of his love for Annunciata. But who could have told him so, after such a brave pilgrimage to Rome? Not Innocent the Sixth; for he humored the boy's mistake by writing him a free dispensation. And thus it ran:

"We, Innocent the Sixth, successor of St. Peter, and Pope of the Church of Rome: By virtue of the power vested in us as Head of the Faith and Vicar of God on Earth: We hereby permit our beloved Brother Hilario to love the damsel Annunciata, daughter of the gardener of La Certosa, and to wed her when he grows up to manhood.

"And may God bless them both, now and evermore.

"Given at our Palace in Rome, and sealed with the Fisher's Ring, ASCENSION DAY, 1360."

"And now," said the Pope to Hilario, after sealing the precious missive, "receive an old man's blessing." The absolved monk knelt at the feet of his spiritual Father, who laid his consecrated hand upon him, and breathed a solemn prayer—In nomine Deus, et Filius. He then summoned one of his Cardinals, to whom he whispered a few words, apparently concerning Hilario, and made his exit by a private staircase, leaving the boy delighted and amazed

Ten days afterward the brethren of La Certosa were taking their evening meal in the refectory. It was Pentecost, and vespers were over. The air was dusk, although the tapers were not yet lighted. The abbot sat at the head of the table, with Messire Andrea Orcagna on his right hand, and Father Michael on his left: the monks sat below—a line of glimmering forms, ending with the old gardener on one side and Annunciata on the other.

"Any news of Hilario yet?" inquired Messire Andrea.

"None," said the Abbot.

"Alas! none," sighed Father Michael.

"I fear he will never return," the sculptor added.

"He has returned!" answered a strange but well-known voice. The lights at that moment appeared, and, sure enough, there was Hilario, standing at Father Michael's elbow, his dispensation in his hand; not as when he left the monastery, a little monk in robe and hood, but a dainty cavalier in sword and cloak and plume! Yes, it was Signor Hilario, whom the Pope had sent back by a courier. And right glad was the signor to get back to his old friends the monks and his dear mistress Annunciata. And right glad were they to have him back, especially the little lady, although I doubt whether she told him so at first.

What finally became of Hilario—whether he grew up to manhood and wedded Annunciata, or whether they quarreled and parted, as the truest of lovers sometimes will, is a matter of dispute among the chroniclers. My own opinion is that they were wedded, and that Hilario became a sculptor with Messire Andrea. For when I was last in Florence—it is now five years ago—sauntering in the Pitti Garden, at the end of the cypress avenue I saw on a pedestal the figure of a monk, a little monk like Hilario; and opposite it was another, a damsel with orange flowers in her hair. To be sure they may have been carved by Messire Andrea, or some other sculptor of that period; but I choose to think them the first work of the Little Monk.

DEATH AND LOVE.

I CRIED to Life, "All earthly things above,
Let me behold the radiant brow of Love!"

The fierce desire stirred all my passionate heart:
"Love! let me look on Love ere I depart!"

The waters rounding to the rounded shore,
One melancholy voice of warning bore:

The one cloud golden in the sunset swept
Into the gloom—a wraith that warned and wept:

Through the dumb woods of June a shudder went,
As the crisp leaves to lips prophetic bent.

And Life in sorrow raised the perilous fold,
"Importunate as Psyche's self—Behold!"

Longing to horror yielded in a breath,
I who had looked on Love had looked on Death!

CHAPTER XIV.

THE BIRD OF PREY BROUGHT DOWN.

COLD on the shore, in the raw cold of that leaden crisis in the four-and-twenty hours when the vital force of all the noblest and prettiest things that live is at its lowest, the three watchers looked each at the blank faces of the other two, and all at the blank face of Riderhood in his boat.

"Gaffer's boat, Gaffer in luck again, and yet no Gaffer!" So spake Riderhood, staring disconsolate.

As if with one accord, they all turned their eyes toward the light of the fire shining through the window. It was fainter and duller. Perhaps fire, like the higher animal and vegetable life it helps to sustain, has its greatest tendency toward death, when the night is dying and the day is not yet born.

"If it was me that had the law of this here job in hand," growled Riderhood with a threatening shake of his head, "blest if I wouldn't lay hold of her, at any rate!"

"Ay, but it is not you," said Eugene. With something so suddenly fierce in him that the informer returned, submissively: "Well, well, well, t'other governor, I didn't say it was. A man may speak."

"And vermin may be silent," said Eugene. "Hold your tongue, you water-rat!"

Astonished by his friend's unusual heat, Lightwood stared too, and then said: "What can have become of this man?"

"Can't imagine. Unless he dived overboard." The informer wiped his brow ruefully as he said it, sitting in his boat and always staring disconsolate.

"Did you make his boat fast?"

"She's fast enough till the tide runs back. I couldn't make her faster than she is. Come aboard of mine, and see for your own selves."

There was a little backwardness in complying, for the freight looked too much for the boat; but on Riderhood's protesting "that he had had half a dozen, dead and alive, in her afore now, and she was nothing deep in the water nor down in the stern even then, to speak of," they carefully took their places, and trimmed the crazy thing. While they were doing so, Riderhood still sat staring disconsolate.

"All right. Give way!" said Lightwood.

"Give way, by George!" repeated Riderhood, before shoving off. "If he's gone and made off any how Lawyer Lightwood, it's enough to make me give way in a different manner. But he always was a cheat, con-found him! He always was a infernal cheat, was Gaffer. Nothing straightfor'ard, nothing on the square. So mean, so underhanded. Never going through with a thing, nor carrying it out like a man!"

"Hallo! Steady!" cried Eugene (he had recovered immediately on embarking), as they bumped heavily against a pile; and then in a lower voice reversed his late apostrophe by remarking ("I wish the boat of my honorable and gallant friend may be endowed with philanthropy enough not to turn bottom-upward and extinguish us!") Steady, steady! Sit close, Mortimer. Here's the hail again. See how it flies, like a troop of wild-cats, at Mr. Riderhood's eyes!"

Indeed he had the full benefit of it, and it so mauled him, though he bent his head low and tried to present nothing but the mangy cap to it, that he dropped under the lee of a tier of shipping, and they lay there until it was over. The squall had come up, like a spiteful messenger before the morning; there followed in its wake a ragged tear of light which ripped the dark clouds until they showed a great gray hole of day.

They were all shivering, and every thing about them seemed to be shivering; the river itself, craft, rigging, sails, such early smoke as there yet was on the shore. Black with wet, and altered to the eye by white patches of hail and sleet, the huddled buildings looked lower than usual, as if they were cowering, and had shrunk with the cold. Very little life was to be seen on either bank, windows and doors were shut, and the staring black and white letters upon wharves and warehouses "looked," said Eugene to Mortimer, "like inscriptions over the graves of dead businesses."

As they glided slowly on, keeping under the shore and sneaking in and out among the shipping by back-alleys of water, in a pilfering way that seemed to be their boatman's normal manner of progression, all the objects among which they crept were so huge in contrast with their wretched boat as to threaten to crush it. Not a ship's hull, with its rusty iron links of cable run out of hawse-holes long discolored with the iron's rusty tears, but seemed to be there with a fell intention. Not a figure-head but had a menacing look of bursting forward to run them down. Not a sluice gate, or a painted scale upon a post or wall, showing the depth of water, but seemed to hint, like the dreadfully facetious Wolf in bed in Grandmamma's cottage, "That's to drown you in, my dears!" Not a lumbering black barge, with its cracked and blistered side impending over them, but seemed to suck at the river with a thirst for sucking them under. And every thing so vaunted the spoiling influences of water—discolored copper, rotten wood, honey-combed stone, green dank deposit—that the after-consequences of being crushed, sucked under, and drawn down, looked as ugly to the imagination as the main event.

Some half hour of this work, and Riderhood unshipped his sculls, stood holding on to a barge, and hand over hand long-wise along the barge's side gradually worked his boat under her head into a secret little nook of scummy water. And driven into that nook, and wedged as he had described, was Gaffer's boat; that boat with the stain still in it, bearing some resemblance to a muffled human form.

"Now tell me I'm a liar!" said the honest man.

("With a morbid expectation," murmured Eugene to Lightwood, "that somebody is always going to tell him the truth.")

"This is Hexam's boat," said Mr. Inspector. "I know her well."

"Look at the broken scull. Look at the t'other scull gone. Now tell me I am a liar!" said the honest man.

Mr. Inspector stepped into the boat. Eugene and Mortimer looked on.

"And see now!" added Riderhood, creeping aft, and showing a stretched rope made fast there and towing overboard. "Didn't I tell you he was in luck again?"

"Haul in," said Mr. Inspector.

"Easy to say haul in," answered Riderhood. "Not so easy done. His luck's got fouled under the keels of the barges. I tried to haul in last time, but I couldn't. See how taut the line is!"

"I must have it up," said Mr. Inspector. "I am going to take this boat ashore, and his luck along with it. Try easy now."

He tried easy now; but the luck resisted; wouldn't come.

"I mean to have it, and the boat too," said Mr. Inspector, playing the line.

But still the luck resisted; wouldn't come.

"Take care," said Riderhood. "You'll disfigure. Or pull asunder perhaps."

"I am not going to do either, not even to your Grandmother," said Mr. Inspector; "but I mean to have it. Come!" he added, at once persuasively and with authority to the hidden object in the water, as he played the line again; "it's no good this sort of game, you know. You must come up. I mean to have you."

There was so much virtue in this distinctly and decidedly meaning to have it, that it yielded a little, even while the line was played.

"I told you so," quoth Mr. Inspector, pulling off his outer coat, and leaning well over the stern with a will. "Come!"

It was an awful sort of fishing, but it no more disconcerted Mr. Inspector than if he had been fishing in a punt on a summer evening by some soothing weir high up the peaceful river. After certain minutes, and a few directions to the rest to "ease her a little for'ard," and "now ease her a trifle aft," and the like, he said, composedly, "All clear!" and the line and the boat came free together.

Accepting Lightwood's proffered hand to help him up, he then put on his coat, and said to Riderhood, "Hand me over those spare sculls of yours, and I'll pull this into the nearest stairs. Go ahead you, and keep out in pretty open water, that I mayn't get fouled again."

His directions were obeyed, and they pulled ashore directly; two in one boat, two in the other.

"Now," said Mr. Inspector, again to Riderhood, when they were all on the slushy stones; "you have had more practice in this than I have had, and ought to be a better workman at it. Undo the tow-rope, and we'll help you haul in."

Riderhood got into the boat accordingly. It appeared as if he had scarcely had a moment's time to touch the rope or look over the stern, when he came scrambling back, as pale as the morning, and gasped out:

"By the Lord, he's done me!"

"What do you mean?" they all demanded.

He pointed behind him at the boat, and gasped to that degree that he dropped upon the stones to get his breath.

"Gaffer's done me. It's Gaffer!"

They ran to the rope, leaving him gasping there. Soon the form of the bird of prey, dead some hours, lay stretched upon the shore, with a new blast storming at it and clotting the wet hair with hailstones.

Father, was that you calling me? Father! I thought I heard you call me twice before! Words never to be answered, those, upon the earth-side of the grave. The wind sweeps jeeringly over Father, whips him with the frayed ends of his dress and his jagged hair, tries to turn him where he lies stark on his back, and force his face toward the rising sun, that he may be shamed the more. A lull, and the wind is secret and prying with him; lifts and lets fall a rag; hides palpitating under another rag; runs nimbly through his hair and beard. Then, in a rush, it cruelly taunts him. Father, was that you calling me? Was it you, the voiceless and the dead? Was it you, thus buffeted as you lie here in a heap? Was it you, thus baptized unto Death, with these flying impurities now flung upon your face? Why not speak, Father? Soaking into this filthy ground as you lie here, is your own shape. Did you never see such a shape soaked into your boat? Speak, Father. Speak to us, the winds, the only listeners left you!

"Now see," said Mr. Inspector, after mature deliberation: kneeling on one knee beside the body, when they had stood looking down on the drowned man, as he had many a time looked down on many another man: "the way of it was this. Of course you gentlemen hardly failed to observe that he was towing by the neck and arms."

They had helped to release the rope, and of course not.

"And you will have observed before, and you will observe now, that this knot, which was drawn chock-tight round his neck by the strain of his own arms, is a slip-knot:" holding it up for demonstration.

Plain enough.

"Likewise you will have observed how he had run the other end of this rope to his boat."

It had the curves and indentations in it still, where it had been twined and bound.

"Now see," said Mr. Inspector, "see how it works round upon him. It's a wild tempestuous evening when this man that was," stooping to wipe some hailstones out of his hair with an end of his own drowned jacket, "—there! Now he's more like himself, though he's badly bruised—when this man that was rows out upon the river on his usual lay. He carries with him this coil of rope. He always carries with him this coil of rope. It's as well known to me as he was himself. Sometimes it lay in the bottom of his boat. Sometimes he hung it loose round his neck. He was a light-dresser was this man—you see?" lifting the loose neckerchief over his breast, and taking the opportunity of wiping the dead lips with it—"and when it was wet, or freezing, or blew cold, he would hang this coil of line round his neck. Last evening he does this. Worse for him! He dodges about in his boat, does this man, till he gets chilled. His hands," taking up one of them, which dropped like a leaden weight, "get numbed. He sees some object that's in his way of business, floating. He makes ready to secure that object. He unwinds the end of his coil that he wants to take some turns on in his boat, and he takes turns enough on it to secure that it sha'n't run out. He makes it too secure, as it happens. He is a little longer about this than usual, his hands being numbed. His object drifts up, before he is quite ready for it. He catches at it, thinks he'll make sure of the contents of the pockets any how, in case he should be parted from it, bends right over the stern, and in one of these heavy squalls, or in the cross-swell of two steamers, or in not being quite prepared, or through all or most or some, gets a lurch, overbalances and goes head-foremost overboard. Now see! He can swim, can this man, and instantly he strikes out. But in such striking-out he tangles his arms, pulls strong on the slip-knot, and it runs home. The object he had expected to take in tow floats by, and his own boat tows him dead, to where we found him, all entangled in his own line. You'll ask me how I make out about the pockets? First, I'll tell you more; there was silver in 'em. How do I make that out? Simple and satisfactory. Because he's got it here." The lecturer held up the tightly clenched right hand.

"What is to be done with the remains?" asked Lightwood.

"If you wouldn't object to standing by him half a minute, Sir," was the reply, "I'll find the nearest of our men to come and take charge of him—I still call it him, you see," said Mr. Inspector, looking back as he went, with a philosophical smile upon the force of habit.

"Eugene," said Lightwood—and was about to add "we may wait at a little distance," when turning his head he found that no Eugene was there.

He raised his voice and called "Eugene! Holloa!" But no Eugene replied.

It was broad daylight now, and he looked about. But no Eugene was in all the view.

Mr. Inspector speedily returning down the wooden stairs, with a police constable, Lightwood asked him if he had seen his friend leave them? Mr. Inspector could not exactly say that he had seen him go, but had noticed that he was restless.

"Singular and entertaining combination, Sir, your friend."

"I wish it had not been a part of his singular and entertaining combination to give me the slip under these dreary circumstances at this time of the morning," said Lightwood. "Can we get any thing hot to drink?"

We could, and we did. In a public-house kitchen with a large fire. We got hot brandy and water, and it revived us wonderfully. Mr. Inspector having to Mr. Riderhood announced his official intention of "keeping his eye upon him," stood him in a corner of the fire-place, like a wet umbrella, and took no further outward and visible notice of that honest man, except ordering a separate service of brandy and water for him: apparently out of the public funds.

As Mortimer Lightwood sat before the blazing fire, conscious of drinking brandy and water then and there in his sleep, and yet at one and the same time drinking burned sherry at the Six Jolly Fellowships, and lying under the boat on the river shore, and sitting in the boat that Riderhood rowed, and listening to the lecture recently concluded, and having to dine in the Temple with an unknown man, who described himself as M. R. F. Eugene Gaffer Harmon, and said he lived at Hailstorm—as he passed through these curious vicissitudes of fatigue and slumber, arranged upon the scale of a dozen hours to the second, he became aware of answering aloud a communication of pressing importance that had never been made to him, and then turned it into a cough on beholding Mr. Inspector. For he felt, with some natural indignation, that that functionary might otherwise suspect him of having closed his eyes, or wandered in his attention.

"Here just before us, you see," said Mr. Inspector.

"I see," said Lightwood, with dignity.

"And had hot brandy and water too, you see," said Mr. Inspector, "and then cut off at a great rate."

"Who?" said Lightwood.

"Your friend, you know."

"I know," he replied, again with dignity.

After hearing, in a mist through which Mr. Inspector loomed vague and large, that the officer took upon himself to prepare the dead man's daughter for what had befallen in the night, and generally that he took every thing upon himself, Mortimer Lightwood stumbled in his sleep to a cab-stand, called a cab, and had entered the army and committed a capital military offense and been tried by court-martial and found guilty and had arranged his affairs and been marched out to be shot, before the door banged.

Hard work rowing the cab through the City to the Temple, for a cup of from five to ten thousand pounds value, given by Mr. Boffin; and hard work holding forth at that immeasurable length to Eugene (when he had been rescued with a rope from the running pavement) for making off in that extraordinary manner! But he offered such ample apologies, and was so very penitent, that when Lightwood got out of the cab, he gave the driver a particular charge to be careful of him. Which the driver (knowing there was no other fare left inside) stared at prodigiously.

In short, the night's work had so exhausted and worn out this actor in it, that he had become a mere somnambulist. He was too tired to rest in his sleep, until he was even tired out of being too tired, and dropped into oblivion. Late in the afternoon he awoke, and in some anxiety sent round to Eugene's lodging hard by to inquire if he were up yet?

Oh yes, he was up. In fact, he had not been to bed. He had just come home. And here he was, close following on the heels of the message.

"Why what bloodshot, draggled, disheveled spectacle is this!" cried Mortimer.

"Are my feathers so very much rumped?" said Eugene, coolly going up to the looking-glass. "They are rather out of sorts. But consider. Such a night for plumage!"

"Such a night?" repeated Mortimer. "What became of you in the morning?"

"My dear fellow," said Eugene, sitting on his bed, "I felt that we had bored one another so long, that an unbroken continuance of those relations must inevitably terminate in our flying to opposite points of the earth. I also felt that I had committed every crime in the Newgate Calendar. So, for mingled considerations of friendship and felony, I took a walk."

CHAPTER XV.

TWO NEW SERVANTS.

Mr. and Mrs. Boffin sat after breakfast, in the Bower, a prey to prosperity. Mr. Boffin's face denoted Care and Complication. Many disordered papers were before him, and he looked at them about as hopefully as an innocent civilian might look at a crowd of troops whom he was required at five minutes' notice to manoeuvre and review. He had been engaged in some attempts to make notes of these papers; but being troubled (as men of his stamp often are) with an exceedingly distrustful and corrective thumb, that busy member had so often interposed to smear his notes, that they were little more legible than the various impressions of itself, which blurred his nose and forehead. It is curious to consider, in such a case was Mr. Boffin's, what a cheap article ink is, and how far it may be made to go. As a grain of musk will scent a drawer for many years, and still lose nothing appreciable of its original weight, so a halfpenny-worth of ink would blot Mr. Boffin to the roots of his hair and the calves of his legs, without inscribing a line on the paper before him, or appearing to diminish in the inkstand.

Mr. Boffin was in such severe literary difficulties that his eyes were prominent and fixed, and his breathing was stertorous, when, to the great relief of Mrs. Boffin, who observed these symptoms with alarm, the yard bell rang.

"Who's that, I wonder!" said Mrs. Boffin.

Mr. Boffin drew a long breath, laid down his pen, looked at his notes as doubting whether he had the pleasure of their acquaintance, and appeared, on a second perusal of their countenances, to be confirmed in his impression that he had not, when there was announced by the hammer-headed young man:

"Mr. Rokesmith."

"Oh!" said Mr. Boffin. "Oh indeed! Our and the Wilfers' Mutual Friend, my dear. Yes. Ask him to come in."

Mr. Rokesmith appeared.

"Sit down, Sir," said Mr. Boffin, shaking hands with him. "Mrs. Boffin you're already acquainted with. Well, Sir, I am rather unprepared to see you, for, to tell you the truth, I've been so busy with one thing and another that I've not had time to turn your offer over."

"That's apology for both of us: for Mr. Boffin, and for me as well," said the smiling Mrs. Boffin. "But Lor! we can talk it over now; can't us?"

Mr. Rokesmith bowed, thanked her, and said he hoped so.

"Let me see then," resumed Mr. Boffin, with his hand to his chin. "It was Secretary that you named; wasn't it?"

"I said Secretary," assented Mr. Rokesmith.

"It rather puzzled me at the time," said Mr. Boffin, "and it rather puzzled me and Mrs. Boffin when we spoke of it afterward, because (not to make a mystery of our belief) we have always believed a Secretary to be a piece of furniture, mostly of mahogany, lined with green baize or leather, with a lot of little drawers in it. Now, you won't think I take a liberty when I mention that you certainly ain't that."

"Certainly not," said Mr. Rokesmith. But he had used the word in the sense of Steward.

"Why, as to Steward, you see," returned Mr. Boffin, with his hand still to his chin, "the odds are that Mrs. Boffin and me may never go upon the water. Being both bad sailors, we should want a Steward if we did; but there's generally one provided."

Mr. Rokesmith again explained; defining the duties he sought to undertake, as those of general superintendent, or manager, or overlooker, or man of business.

"Now, for instance—come!" said Mr. Boffin, in his pouncing way. "If you entered my employment, what would you do?"

"I would keep exact accounts of all the expenditure you sanctioned, Mr. Boffin. I would write your letters, under your direction. I would transact your business with people in your pay or employment. I would," with a glance and a half-smile at the table, "arrange your papers—"

Mr. Boffin rubbed his inky ear, and looked at his wife.

"—And so arrange them as to have them always in order for immediate reference, with a note of the contents of each outside it."

"I tell you what," said Mr. Boffin, slowly crumpling his own blotted note in his hand; "if you'll turn to at these present papers, and see what you can make of 'em, I shall know better what I can make of you."

No sooner said than done. Relinquishing his hat and gloves, Mr. Rokesmith sat down quietly at the table, arranged the open papers into an orderly heap, cast his eyes over each in succession, folded it, docketed it on the outside, laid it in a second heap, and when that second heap was complete and the first gone, took from his pocket a piece of string and tied it together with a remarkably dextrous hand at a running curve and a loop.

"Good!" said Mr. Boffin. "Very good! Now let us hear what they're all about; will you be so good?"

John Rokesmith read his abstracts aloud. They were all about the new house. Decorator's estimate, so much. Furniture estimate, so much. Estimate for furniture of offices, so much. Coach-maker's estimate, so much. Horse-dealer's estimate, so much. Harness-maker's estimate, so much. Goldsmith's estimate, so much. Total, so very much. Then came correspondence. Acceptance of Mr. Boffin's offer of such a date, and to such an effect. Rejection of Mr. Boffin's proposal of such a date, and to such an effect. Concerning Mr. Boffin's scheme of such another date to such another effect. All compact and methodical.

"Apple-pie order!" said Mr. Boffin, after checking off each inscription with his hand, like a man beating time. "And whatever you do with your ink, I can't think, for you're as clean as a whistle after it. Now, as to a letter. Let's," said Mr. Boffin, rubbing his hands in his pleasantly childish admiration, "let's try a letter next."

"To whom shall it be addressed, Mr. Boffin?"

"Any one. Yourself."

Mr. Rokesmith quickly wrote, and then read aloud:

"Mr. Boffin presents his compliments to Mr. John Rokesmith, and begs to say that he has decided on giving Mr. John Rokesmith a trial in the capacity he desires to fill. Mr. Boffin takes Mr. John Rokesmith at his word, in postponing to some indefinite period the consideration of salary. It is quite understood that Mr. Boffin is in no way committed on that point. Mr. Boffin has merely to add, that he relies on Mr. John Rokesmith's assurance that he will be faithful and serviceable. Mr. John Rokesmith will please enter on his duties immediately."

"Well! Now, Noddy!" cried Mrs. Boffin, clapping her hands, "That is a good one!"

Mr. Boffin was no less delighted; indeed, in his own bosom, he regarded both the composition itself and the device that had given birth to it, as a very remarkable monument of human ingenuity.

"And I tell you, my deary," said Mrs. Boffin, "that if you don't close with Mr. Rokesmith now at once, and if you ever go a muddling yourself again with things never meant nor made for you, you'll have an apoplexy—besides iron-moulding your linen—and you'll break my heart."

Mr. Boffin embraced his spouse for these words of wisdom, and then, congratulating John Rokesmith on the brilliancy of his achievements, gave him his hand in pledge of their new relations. So did Mrs. Boffin.

"Now," said Mr. Boffin, who, in his frankness, felt that it did not become him to have a gentleman in his employment five minutes without reposing some confidence in him, "you must be let a little more into our affairs, Rokesmith. I mentioned to you, when I made your acquaintance, or I might better say when you made mine, that Mrs. Boffin's inclinations was setting in the way of Fashion, but that I didn't know how fashionable we might or might not grow. Well! Mrs. Boffin has carried the day, and we're going in neck and crop for Fashion."

"I rather inferred that, Sir," replied John Rokesmith, "from the scale on which your new establishment is to be maintained."

"Yes," said Mr. Boffin, "it's to be a Spanker. The fact is, my literary man named to me that a house with which he is, as I may say, connected—in which he has an interest—"

"As property?" inquired John Rokesmith.

"Why no," said Mr. Boffin, "not exactly that; a sort of a family tie."

"Association?" the Secretary suggested.

"Ah!" said Mr. Boffin. "Perhaps. Anyhow, he named to me that the house had a board up, 'This Eminently Aristocratic Mansion to be let or sold.' Me and Mrs. Boffin went to look at it, and finding it beyond a doubt Eminently Aristocratic (though a trifle high and dull, which after all may be part of the same thing) took it. My literary man was so friendly as to drop into a charming piece of poetry on that occasion, in which he complimented Mrs. Boffin on coming into possession of—how did it go, my dear?"

Mrs. Boffin replied:

"The gay, the gay and festive scene,
The halls, the halls of dazzling light."

"That's it! And it was made neater by there really being two halls in the house, a front 'un and a back 'un, besides the servants'. He likewise dropped into a very pretty piece of poetry to be sure, respecting the extent to which he would be willing to put himself out of the way to bring Mrs. Boffin round, in case she should ever get low in her spirits in the house. Mrs. Boffin has a wonderful memory. Will you repeat it, my dear?"

Mrs. Boffin complied, by reciting the verses in which this obliging offer had been made, exactly as she had received them.

"I'll tell thee how the maiden wept, Mrs. Boffin,
 "When her true love was slain ma'am,
 "And how her broken spirit slept, Mrs. Boffin,
 "And never woke again ma'am.
 "I'll tell thee (if agreeable to Mr. Boffin) how the steed drew nigh,
 "And left his lord afar;
 "And if my tale (which I hope Mr. Boffin might excuse) should make you sigh,
 "I'll strike the light guitar."

"Correct to the letter!" said Mr. Boffin. "And I consider that the poetry brings us both in, in a beautiful manner."

The effect of the poem on the Secretary being evidently to astonish him, Mr. Boffin was confirmed in his high opinion of it, and was greatly pleased.

"Now, you see, Rokesmith," he went on, "a literary man—with a wooden leg—is liable to jealousy. I shall therefore cast about for comfortable ways and means of not calling up Wegg's jealousy, but of keeping you in your department, and keeping him in his."

"Lor!" cried Mrs. Boffin. "What I say is, the world's wide enough for all of us!"

"So it is, my dear," said Mr. Boffin, "when not literary. But when so, not so. And I am bound to bear in mind that I took Wegg on at a time when I had no thought of being fashionable or of leaving the Bower. To let him feel himself any ways slighted now would be to be guilty of a meanness, and to act like having one's head turned by the halls of dazzling light. Which Lord forbid! Rokesmith, what shall we say about your living in the house?"

"In this house?"

"No, no. I have got other plans for this house. In the new house?"

"That will be as you please, Mr. Boffin. I hold myself quite at your disposal. You know where I live at present."

"Well!" said Mr. Boffin, after considering the point; "suppose you keep as you are for the present, and we'll decide by-and-by. — You'll begin to take charge at once, of all that's going on in the new house, will you?"

"Most willingly. I will begin this very day. Will you give me the address?"

Mr. Boffin repeated it, and the Secretary wrote it down in his pocket-book. Mrs. Boffin took the opportunity of his being so engaged to get a better observation of his face than she had yet taken. It impressed her in his favor, for she nodded aside to Mr. Boffin, "I like him."

"I will see directly that every thing is in train, Mr. Boffin."

"Thank'ee. Being here, would you care at all to look round the Bower?"

"I should greatly like it. I have heard so much of its story."

"Come!" said Mr. Boffin. And he and Mrs. Boffin led the way.

A gloomy house the Bower, with sordid signs on it of having been, through its long existence as Harmony Jail, in miserly holding. Bare of paint, bare of paper on the walls, bare of furniture, bare of experience of human life. Whatever is built by man for man's occupation, must, like natural creations, fulfill the intention of its existence or soon perish. This old house had wasted more from desuetude than it would have wasted from use, twenty years for one.

A certain leanness falls upon houses not sufficiently imbued with life (as if they were nourished upon it), which was very noticeable here. The staircase, balustrades, and rails had a spare look—an air of being denuded to the bone—which the panels of the walls and the jambs of the doors and windows also bore. The scanty movables partook of it; save for the cleanliness of the place, the dust into which they were all resolving would have lain thick on the floors; and those, both in color and in grain, were worn like old faces that had kept much alone.

The bedroom where the clutching old man had lost his grip on life was left as he had left it. There was the old grisly four-post bedstead, without hangings, and with a jail-like upper rim of iron and spikes; and there was the old patch-work counterpane. There was the tight-clenched old bureau, receding atop like a bad and secret forehead; there was the cumbersome old table with twisted legs at the bedside; and there was the box upon it, in which the will had lain. A few old chairs with patch-work covers, under which the more precious stuff to be preserved had slowly lost its quality of color without imparting pleasure to any eye, stood against the wall. A hard family likeness was on all these things.

"The room was kept like this, Rokesmith," said Mr. Boffin, "against the son's return. In short, every thing in the house was kept exactly as it came to us for him to see and approve. Even now, nothing is changed but our own room below stairs that you have just left. When the son came home for the last time in his life, and for the last time in his life saw his father, it was most likely in this room that they met."

As the Secretary looked all round it his eyes rested on a side-door in a corner.

"Another staircase," said Mr. Boffin, unlocking the door, "leading down into the yard. We'll go down this way, as you may like to see the yard, and it's all in the road. When the son was a little child it was up and down these stairs that he mostly came and went to his father. He was very timid of his father. I've seen him sit on these stairs, in his shy way, poor child, many a time. Me and Mrs. Boffin have comforted him, sitting with his little book on these stairs, often."

"Ah! And his poor sister too," said Mrs. Boffin. "And here's the sunny place on the white wall where they one day measured one another. Their own little hands wrote up their names here only with a pencil; but the names are here still, and the poor dears gone forever."

"We must take care of the names, old lady," said Mr. Boffin. "We must take care of the names. They sha'n't be rubbed out in our time, nor yet, if we can help it, in the time after us. Poor little children!"

"Ah, poor little children!" said Mrs. Boffin.

They had opened the door at the bottom of the staircase giving on the yard, and they stood in the sunlight, looking at the scrawl of the two unsteady childish hands two or three steps up the staircase. There was something in this simple memento of a blighted childhood, and in the tenderness of Mrs. Boffin, that touched the Secretary.

Mr. Boffin then showed his new man of business the Mounds, and his own particular Mound which had been left him as his legacy under the will before he acquired the whole estate.

"It would have been enough for us," said Mr. Boffin, "in case it had pleased God to spare the last of those two young lives and sorrowful deaths. We didn't want the rest."

At the treasures of the yard, and at the outside of the house, and at the detached building which Mr. Boffin pointed out as the residence of himself and his wife during the many years of their service, the Secretary looked with interest. It was not until Mr. Boffin had shown him every wonder of the Bower twice over that he remembered his having duties to discharge elsewhere.

"You have no instructions to give me, Mr. Boffin, in reference to this place?"

"Not any, Rokesmith. No."

"Might I ask, without seeming impertinent, whether you have any intention of selling it?"

"Certainly not. In remembrance of our old master, our old master's children, and our old service, me and Mrs. Boffin mean to keep it up as it stands."

The Secretary's eyes glanced with so much meaning in them at the Mounds that Mr. Boffin said, as if in answer to a remark:

"Ay, ay, that's another thing. I may sell them, though I should be sorry to see the neighborhood deprived of 'em too. It'll look but a poor dead flat without the Mounds. Still I don't say that I'm going to keep 'em always there for the sake of the beauty of the landscape. There's no hurry about it; that's all I say at present. I ain't a scholar in much, Rokesmith, but I'm a pretty fair scholar in dust. I can price the Mounds to a fraction, and I know how they can be best disposed of, and likewise that they take no harm by standing where they do. You'll look in to-morrow, will you be so kind?"

"Every day. And the sooner I can get you into your new house, complete, the better you will be pleased, Sir?"

"Well, it ain't that I'm in a mortal hurry," said Mr. Boffin; "only when you do pay people for looking alive, it's as well to know that they are looking alive. Ain't that your opinion?"

"Quite!" replied the Secretary; and so withdrew.

"Now," said Mr. Boffin to himself, subsiding into his regular series of turns in the yard, "if I can make it comfortable with Wegg, my affairs will be going smooth."

The man of low cunning had, of course, acquired a mastery over the man of high simplicity. The mean man had, of course, got the better of the generous man. How long such conquests last is another matter; that they are achieved, is everyday experience, not even to be flourished away by Podsnappery itself. The undesigning Boffin had become so far immeshed by the wily Wegg that his mind misgave him he was a very designing man indeed in purposing to do more for Wegg. It seemed to him (so skillful was Wegg) that he was plotting darkly, when he was contriving to do the very thing that Wegg was plotting to get him to do. And thus, while he was mentally turning the kindest of kind faces on Wegg this morning, he was not absolutely sure but that he might somehow deserve the charge of turning his back on him.

For these reasons Mr. Boffin passed but anxious hours until evening came, and with it Mr. Wegg, stumping leisurely to the Roman Empire. At about this period Mr. Boffin had become profoundly interested in the fortunes of a great military leader known to him as Bully Sawyers, but perhaps better known to fame and easier of identification by the classical student, under the less Britannic name of Belisarius. Even this general's career paled in interest for Mr. Boffin before the clearing of his conscience with Wegg; and hence, when that literary gentleman had according to custom eaten and drunk until he was all a-glow, and when he took up his book with the usual chirping introduction, "And now, Mr. Boffin, Sir, we'll decline and we'll fall!" Mr. Boffin stopped him.

"You remember, Wegg, when I first told you that I wanted to make a sort of offer to you?"

"Let me get on my considering cap, Sir," replied that gentleman, turning the open book face downward. "When you first told me that you wanted to make a sort of offer to me? Now let me think" (as if there were the least necessity). "Yes, to be sure I do, Mr. Boffin. It was at my corner. To be sure it was! You had first asked me whether I liked your name, and Candor had compelled a reply in the negative case. I little thought then, Sir, how familiar that name would come to be!"

"I hope it will be more familiar still, Wegg."

"Do you, Mr. Boffin? Much obliged to you, I'm sure. Is it your pleasure, Sir, that we decline and we fall?" with a feint of taking up the book.

"Not just yet a while, Wegg. In fact, I have got another offer to make you."

Mr. Wegg (who had had nothing else in his mind for several nights) took off his spectacles with an air of bland surprise.

"And I hope you'll like it, Wegg."

"Thank you, Sir," returned that reticent individual. "I hope it may prove so. On all accounts, I am sure." (This, as a philanthropic aspiration.)

"What do you think," said Mr. Boffin, "of not keeping a stall, Wegg?"

"I think, Sir," replied Wegg, "that I should like to be shown the gentleman prepared to make it worth my while!"

"Here he is," said Mr. Boffin.

Mr. Wegg was going to say, My Benefactor, and had said My Bene, when a grandiloquent change came over him.

"No, Mr. Boffin, not you, Sir. Any body but you. Do not fear, Mr. Boffin, that I shall contaminate the premises which your gold has bought with my lowly pursuits. I am aware, Sir, that it would not become me to carry on my little traffic under the windows of your mansion. I have already thought of that, and taken my measures. No need to be bought out, Sir. Would Stepney Fields be considered intrusive? If not remote enough, I can go remoter. In the words of the poet's song, which I do not quite remember:

Thrown on the wide world, doom'd to wander and roam,
Bereft of my parents, bereft of a home,
A stranger to something and what's his name joy,
Behold little Edmund the poor Peasant boy.

—And equally," said Mr. Wegg, repairing the want of direct application in the last line, "behold myself on a similar footing!"

"Now, Wegg, Wegg, Wegg," remonstrated the excellent Boffin. "You are too sensitive."

"I know I am, Sir," returned Wegg, with obstinate magnanimity. "I am acquainted with my faults. I always was, from a child, too sensitive."

"But listen," pursued the Golden Dustman; "hear me out, Wegg. You have taken it into your head that I mean to pension you off."

"True, Sir," returned Wegg, still with an obstinate magnanimity. "I am acquainted with my faults. Far be it from me to deny them. I have taken it into my head."

"But I don't mean it."

The assurance seemed hardly as comforting to Mr. Wegg as Mr. Boffin intended it to be. Indeed, an appreciable elongation of his visage might have been observed as he replied:

"Don't you, indeed, Sir?"

"No," pursued Mr. Boffin; "because that would express, as I understand it, that you were not going to do any thing to deserve your money. But you are; you are."

"That, Sir," replied Mr. Wegg, cheering up bravely, "is quite another pair of shoes. Now, my independence as a man is again elevated. Now, I no longer

Weep for the hour,
When to Boffinses bower,
The Lord of the valley with offers came;
Neither does the moon hide her light
From the heavens to-night,
And weep behind her clouds o'er any individual in the present Company's shame.

—Please to proceed, Mr. Boffin."

"Thank'ee, Wegg, both for your confidence in me and for your frequent dropping into poetry; both of which is friendly. Well, then; my idea is, that you should give up your stall, and that I should put you into the Bower here, to keep it for us. It's a pleasant spot; and a man with coals and candles and a pound a week might be in clover here."

"Hem! Would that man, Sir—we will say that man, for the purposes of arguement;" Mr. Wegg made a smiling demonstration of great perspicuity here; "would that man, Sir, be expected to throw any other capacity in, or would any other capacity be considered extra? Now let us (for the purposes of arguement) suppose that man to be engaged as a reader: say (for the purposes of arguement) in the evening. Would that man's pay as a reader in the evening be added to the other amount, which, adopting your language, we will call clover; or would it merge into that amount, or clover?"

"Well," said Mr. Boffin, "I suppose it would be added."

"I suppose it would, Sir. You are right, Sir. Exactly my own views, Mr. Boffin." Here Wegg rose, and balancing himself on his wooden leg, fluttered over his prey with extended hand. "Mr. Boffin, consider it done. Say no more, Sir, not a word more. My stall and I are forever parted. The collection of ballads will in future be reserved for private study, with the object of making poetry tributary"—Wegg was so proud of having found this word that he said it again, with a capital letter—"Tributary, to friendship. Mr. Boffin, don't allow yourself to be made uncomfortable by the pang it gives me to part from my stock and stall. Similar emotion was undergone by my own father when promoted for his merits from his occupation as a waterman to a situation under Government. His Christian name was Thomas. His words at the time (I was then an infant, but so deep was their impression on me that I committed them to memory) were:

Then farewell my trim-built wherry,
Oars and coat and badge farewell!
Never more at Chelsea Ferry
Shall your Thomas take a spell!

—My father got over it, Mr. Boffin, and so shall I."

While delivering these valedictory observations, Wegg continually disappointed Mr. Boffin of his hand by flourishing it in the air. He now darted it at his patron, who took it, and felt his mind relieved of a great weight: observing that as they had arranged their joint affairs so satisfactorily, he would now be glad to look into those of Bully Sawyers. Which, indeed, had been left overnight in a very unpromising posture, and for whose impending expedition against the Persians the weather had been by no means favorable all day.

Mr. Wegg resumed his spectacles therefore. But Sawyers was not to be of the party that night; for, before Wegg had found his place, Mrs. Boffin's tread was heard upon the stairs, so unusually heavy and hurried, that Mr. Boffin would have started up at the sound, anticipating some occurrence much out of the common course, even though she had not also called to him in an agitated tone.

Mr. Boffin hurried out, and found her on the dark staircase, panting, with a lighted candle in her hand.

"What's the matter, my dear?"

"I don't know; I don't know; but I wish you'd come up stairs."

Much surprised, Mr. Boffin went up stairs and accompanied Mrs. Boffin into their own room: a second large room on the same floor as the room in which the late proprietor had died. Mr. Boffin looked all round him, and saw nothing more unusual than various articles of folded linen on a large chest, which Mrs. Boffin had been sorting.

"What is it, my dear? Why, you're frightened! You frightened?"

"I am not one of that sort certainly," said Mrs. Boffin, as she sat down in a chair to recover herself, and took her husband's arm; but it's very strange!"

"What is, my dear?"

"Noddy, the faces of the old man and the two children are all over the house to-night."

"My dear?" exclaimed Mr. Boffin. But not without a certain uncomfortable sensation gliding down his back.

"I know it must sound foolish, and yet it is so."

"Where did you think you saw them?"

"I don't know that I think I saw them anywhere. I felt them."

"Touched them?"

"No. Felt them in the air. I was sorting those things on the chest, and not thinking of the old man or the children, but singing to myself, when all in a moment I felt there was a face growing out of the dark."

"What face?" asked her husband, looking about him.

"For a moment it was the old man's, and then it got younger. For a moment it was both the children's, and then it got older. For a moment it was a strange face, and then it was all the faces."

"And then it was gone?"

"Yes; and then it was gone."

"Where were you then, old lady?"

"Here, at the chest. Well; I got the better of it, and went on sorting, and went on singing to myself. 'Lor!' I says, 'I'll think of something else—something comfortable—and put it out of my head.' So I thought of the new house and Miss Bella Wilfer, and was thinking at a great rate with that sheet there in my hand, when, all of a sudden, the faces seemed to be hidden in among the folds of it and I let it drop."

As it still lay on the floor where it had fallen, Mr. Boffin picked it up and laid it on the chest.

"And then you ran down stairs?"

"No. I thought I'd try another room, and shake it off. I says to myself, 'I'll go and walk slowly up and down the old man's room three times, from end to end, and then I shall have conquered it.' I went in with the candle in my hand; but the moment I came near the bed the air got thick with them."

"With the faces?"

"Yes, and I even felt that they were in the dark behind the side-door, and on the little staircase, floating away into the yard. Then I called you."

Mr. Boffin, lost in amazement, looked at Mrs. Boffin. Mrs. Boffin, lost in her own fluttered inability to make this out, looked at Mr. Boffin.

"I think, my dear," said the Golden Dustman, "I'll at once get rid of Wegg for the night, because he's coming to inhabit the Bower, and it might be put into his head or somebody else's, if he heard this and it got about, that the house is haunted. Whereas we know better. Don't we?"

"I never had the feeling in the house before," said Mrs. Boffin; "and I have been about it alone at all hours of the night. I have been in the house when Death was in it, and I have been in the house when Murder was a new part of its adventures, and I never had a fright in it yet."

"And won't again, my dear," said Mr. Boffin. "Depend upon it, it comes of thinking and dwelling on that dark spot."

"Yes; but why didn't it come before?" asked Mrs. Boffin.

This draft on Mr. Boffin's philosophy could only be met by that gentleman with the remark that every thing that is at all must begin at some time. Then, tucking his wife's arm under his own, that she might not be left by herself to be troubled again, he descended to release Wegg. Who, being something drowsy after his plentiful repast, and constitutionally of a shirking temperament, was well enough pleased to stump away, without doing what he had come to do, and was paid for doing.

Mr. Boffin then put on his hat, and Mrs. Boffin her shawl; and the pair, further provided with a bunch of keys and a lighted lantern, went all over the dismal house—dismal every where but in their own two rooms—from cellar to cock-loft. Not resting satisfied with giving that much chase to Mrs. Boffin's fancies, they pursued them into the yard and outbuildings, and under the Mounds. And setting the lantern, when all was done, at the foot of one of the Mounds, they comfortably trotted to and fro for an evening walk, to the end that the murky cobwebs in Mrs. Boffin's brain might be blown away.

"There, my dear!" said Mr. Boffin when they came in to supper. "That was the treatment, you see. Completely worked round, haven't you?"

"Yes, deary," said Mrs. Boffin, laying aside her shawl. "I'm not nervous any more. I'm not a bit troubled now. I'd go any where about the house the same as ever. But—"

"Eh!" said Mr. Boffin.

"But I've only to shut my eyes."

"And what then?"

"Why then," said Mrs. Boffin, speaking with her eyes closed, and her left hand thoughtfully touching her brow, "then, there they are! The old man's face, and it gets younger. The two children's faces, and they get older. A face that I don't know. And then all the faces!"

Opening her eyes again, and seeing her husband's face across the table, she leaned forward to give it a pat on the cheek, and sat down to supper, declaring it to be the best face in the world.

CHAPTER XVI.

MINDERS AND RE-MINDERS.

THE Secretary lost no time in getting to work, and his vigilance and method soon set their mark on the Golden Dustman's affairs. His earnestness in determining to understand the length and breadth and depth of every piece of work submitted to him by his employer was as special as his dispatch in transacting it. He accepted no information or explanation at second-hand, but made himself the master of every thing confided to him.

One part of the Secretary's conduct, underlying all the rest, might have been mistrusted by a man with a better knowledge of men than the Golden Dustman had. The Secretary was as far from being inquisitive or intrusive as Secretary could be, but nothing less than a complete understanding of the whole of the affairs would content him. It soon became apparent (from the knowledge with which he set out) that he must have been to the office where the Harmon will was registered, and must have read the will. He anticipated Mr. Boffin's consideration whether he should be advised with on this or that topic, by showing that he already knew of it and understood it. He did this with no attempt at concealment, seeming to be satisfied that it was part of his duty to have prepared himself at all attainable points for its utmost discharge.

This might—let it be repeated—have awakened some little vague mistrust in a man more worldly-wise than the Golden Dustman. On the other hand, the Secretary was discerning, discreet, and silent, though as zealous as if the affairs had been his own. He showed no love of patronage or the command of money, but distinctly preferred resigning both to Mr. Boffin. If, in his limited sphere, he sought power, it was the power of knowledge; the power derivable from a perfect comprehension of his business.

As on the Secretary's face there was a nameless cloud, so on his manner there was a shadow equally indefinable. It was not that he was embarrassed, as on that first night with the Wilfer family; he was habitually unembarrassed now, and yet the something remained. It was not that his manner was bad, as on that occasion; it was now very good, as being modest, gracious, and ready. Yet the something never left it. It has been written of men who have undergone a cruel captivity, or who have passed through a terrible strait, or who in self-preservation have killed a defenseless fellow-creature, that the record thereof has never faded from their countenances until they died. Was there any such record here?

He established a temporary office for himself in the new house, and all went well under his hand, with one singular exception. He manifestly objected to communicate with Mr. Boffin's solicitor. Two or three times, when there was some slight occasion for his doing so, he transferred the task to Mr. Boffin; and his evasion of it soon became so curiously apparent, that Mr. Boffin spoke to him on the subject of his reluctance.

"It is so," the Secretary admitted. "I would rather not."

Had he any personal objection to Mr. Lightwood?

"I don't know him."

Had he suffered from lawsuits?

"Not more than other men," was his short answer.

Was he prejudiced against the race of lawyers?

"No. But while I am in your employment, Sir, I would rather be excused from going between the lawyer and the client. Of course if you press it, Mr. Boffin, I am ready to comply. But I should take it as a great favor if you would not press it without urgent occasion."

Now, it could not be said that there was urgent occasion, for Lightwood retained no other affairs in his hands than such as still lingered and languished about the undiscovered criminal, and such as arose out of the purchase of the house. Many other matters that might have traveled to him now stopped short at the Secretary, under whose administration they were far more expeditiously and satisfactorily disposed of than they would have been if they had got into Young Blight's domain. This the Golden Dustman quite understood. Even the matter immediately in hand was of very little moment as requiring personal appearance on the Secretary's part, for it amounted to no more than this:—The death of Hexam rendering the sweat of the honest man's brow unprofitable, the honest man had shufflingly declined to moisten his brow for nothing, with that severe exertion which is known in legal circles as swearing your way through a stone-wall. Consequently, that new light had gone sputtering out. But the airing of the old facts had led some one concerned to suggest that it would be well before they were reconsigned to their gloomy shelf—now probably forever—to induce or compel that Mr. Julius Handford to reappear and be questioned. And all traces of Mr. Julius Handford being lost, Lightwood now referred to his client for authority to seek him through public advertisement.

"Does your objection go to writing to Lightwood, Rokesmith?"

"Not in the least, Sir."

"Then perhaps you'll write him a line, and say he is free to do what he likes. I don't think it promises."

"I don't think it promises," said the Secretary.

"Still, he may do what he likes."

"I will write immediately. Let me thank you for so considerately yielding to my disinclination. It may seem less unreasonable if I avow to you that although I don't know Mr. Lightwood, I have a disagreeable association connected with him. It is not his fault; he is not at all to blame for it, and does not even know my name."

Mr. Boffin dismissed the matter with a nod or two. The letter was written, and next day Mr. Julius Handford was advertised for. He was requested to place himself in communication with Mr. Mortimer Lightwood, as a possible means of furthering the ends of justice, and a reward was offered to any one acquainted with his whereabouts who would communicate the same to the said Mr. Mortimer Lightwood at his office in the Temple. Every day for six weeks this advertisement appeared at the head of all the newspapers, and every day for six weeks the Secretary, when he saw it, said to himself, in the tone in which he had said to his employer, "I don't think it promises!"

Among his first occupations the pursuit of that orphan wanted by Mrs. Boffin held a conspicuous place. From the earliest moment of his engagement he showed a particular desire to please her, and, knowing her to have this object at heart, he followed it up with unwearied alacrity and interest.

Mr. and Mrs. Milvey had found their search a difficult one. Either an eligible orphan was of the wrong sex (which almost always happened), or was too old, or too young, or too sickly, or too dirty, or too much accustomed to the streets, or too likely to run away; or it was found impossible to complete the philanthropic transaction without buying the orphan. For, the instant it became known that any body wanted the orphan, up started some affectionate relative of the orphan who put a price upon the orphan's head. The suddenness of an orphan's rise in the market was not to be paralleled by the maddest records of the Stock Exchange. He would be at five thousand per cent. discount out at nurse making a mud pie at nine in the morning, and (being inquired for) would go up to five thousand per cent. premium before noon. The market was "rigged" in various artful ways. Counterfeit stock got into circulation. Parents boldly represented themselves as dead, and brought their orphans with them. Genuine orphan stock was surreptitiously withdrawn from the market. It being announced, by emissaries posted for the purpose, that Mr. and Mrs. Milvey were coming down the court, orphan scrip would be instantly concealed, and production refused, save on a condition usually stated by the brokers as "a gallon of beer." Likewise, fluctuations of a wild and South-Sea nature were occasioned, by orphan-holders keeping back, and then rushing into the market a dozen together. But the uniform principle at the root of all these various operations was bargain and sale; and that principle could not be recognized by Mr. and Mrs. Milvey.

At length tidings were received by the Reverend Frank of a charming orphan to be found at Brentford. One of the deceased parents (late his parishioners) had a poor widowed grandmother in that agreeable town, and she, Mrs. Betty Higden, had carried off the orphan with maternal care, but could not afford to keep him.

The Secretary proposed to Mrs. Boffin, either to go down himself and take a preliminary survey of this orphan, or to drive her down, that she might at once form her own opinion. Mrs. Boffin preferring the latter course, they set off one morning in a hired phaeton, conveying the hammer-headed young man behind them.

The abode of Mrs. Betty Higden was not easy to find, lying in such complicated back settlements of muddy Brentford that they left their equipage at the sign of the Three Magpies, and went in search of it on foot. After many inquiries and defeats, there was pointed out to them in a lane, a very small cottage residence, with a board across the open doorway, hooked on to which board by the arm-pits was a young gentleman of tender years, angling for mud with a headless wooden horse and line. In this young sportsman, distinguished by a crisply curling auburn head and a bluff countenance, the Secretary descried the orphan.

It unfortunately happened as they quickened their pace, that the orphan, lost to considerations of personal safety in the ardor of the moment, overbalanced himself and toppled into the street. Being an orphan of a chubby conformation, he then took to rolling, and had rolled into the gutter before they could come up. From the gutter he was rescued by John Rokesmith, and thus the first meeting with Mrs. Higden was inaugurated by the awkward circumstance of their being in possession—one would say at first sight unlawful possession—of the orphan, upside down and purple in the countenance. The board across the doorway too, acting as a trap equally for the feet of Mrs. Higden coming out, and the feet of Mrs. Boffin and John Rokesmith going in, greatly increased the difficulty of the situation: to which the cries of the orphan imparted a lugubrious and inhuman character.

At first, it was impossible to explain, on account of the orphan's "holding his breath:" a most terrific proceeding, superinducing in the orphan lead-color rigidity and a deadly silence, compared with which his cries were music yielding the height of enjoyment. But as he gradually recovered, Mrs. Boffin gradually introduced herself, and smiling peace was gradually wooed back to Mrs. Betty Higden's home.

It was then perceived to be a small home with a large mangle in it, at the handle of which machine stood a very long boy, with a very little head, and an open mouth of disproportionate capacity that seemed to assist his eyes in staring at the visitors. In a corner below the mangle, on a couple of stools, sat two very little children: a boy and a girl; and when the very long boy, in an interval of staring, took a turn at the mangle, it was alarming to see how it lunged itself at those two innocents, like a catapult designed for their destruction, harmlessly retiring when within an inch of their heads. The room was clean and neat. It had a brick floor, and a window of diamond panes, and a flounce hanging below the chimney-piece, and strings nailed from bottom to top outside the window on which scarlet beans were to grow in the coming season if the Fates were propitious. However propitious they might have been in the seasons that were gone to Betty Higden in the matter of beans, they had not been very favorable in the matter of coins; for it was easy to see that she was poor.

She was one of those old women, was Mrs. Betty Higden, who by dint of an indomitable purpose and a strong constitution fight out many years, though each year has come with its new knock-down blows fresh to the fight against her, wearied by it; an active old woman, with a bright dark eye and a resolute face, yet quite a tender creature too; not a logically-reasoning woman, but God is good, and hearts may count in Heaven as high as heads.

"Yes sure!" said she, when the business was opened, "Mrs. Milvey had the kindness to write to me, ma'am, and I got Sloppy to read it. It was a pretty letter. But she's an affable lady."

The visitors glanced at the long boy, who seemed to indicate by a broader stare of his mouth and eyes that in him Sloppy stood confessed.

"For I ain't, you must know," said Betty, "much of a hand at reading writing-hand, though I can read my Bible and most print. And I do love a newspaper. You mightn't think it, but Sloppy is a beautiful reader of a newspaper. He do the Police in different voices."

The visitors again considered it a point of politeness to look at Sloppy, who, looking at them, suddenly threw back his head, extended his mouth to its utmost width, and laughed loud and long. At this the two innocents, with their brains in that apparent danger, laughed, and Mrs. Higden laughed, and the orphan laughed, and then the visitors laughed. Which was more cheerful than intelligible.

Then Sloppy seeming to be seized with an industrious mania or fury, turned to at the mangle, and impelled it at the heads of the innocents with such a creaking and rumbling that Mrs. Higden stopped him.

"The gentlefolks can't hear themselves speak, Sloppy. Bide a bit, bide a bit!"

"Is that the dear child in your lap?" said Mrs. Boffin.

"Yes, ma'am, this is Johnny."

"Johnny, too!" cried Mrs. Boffin, turning to the Secretary; "already Johnny! Only one of the two names left to give him! He's a pretty boy."

With his chin tucked down in his shy childish manner, he was looking furtively at Mrs. Boffin out of his blue eyes, and reaching his fat dimpled hand up to the lips of the old woman, who was kissing it by times.

"Yes, ma'am, he's a pretty boy, he's a dear darling boy, he's the child of my own last left daughter's daughter. But she's gone the way of all the rest."

"Those are not his brother and sister?" said Mrs. Boffin.

"Oh, dear no, ma'am. Those are Minders."

"Minders?" the Secretary repeated.

"Left to be Minded, Sir. I keep a Minding-School. I can take only three, on account of the Mangle. But I love children, and Fourpence a week is Fourpence. Come here, Toddles and Poddles."

Toddles was the pet-name of the boy; Poddles of the girl. At their little unsteady pace they came across the floor, hand in hand, as if they were traversing an extremely difficult road intersected by brooks, and, when they had had their heads patted by Mrs. Betty Higden, made lunges at the orphan, dramatically representing an attempt to bear him, crowing, into captivity and slavery. All the three children enjoyed this to a delightful extent, and the sympathetic Sloppy again laughed long and loud. When it was discreet to stop the play, Betty Higden said "Go to your seats Toddles and Poddles," and they returned hand in hand across country, seeming to find the brooks rather swollen by late rains.

"And Master—or Mister—Sloppy?" said the Secretary, in doubt whether he was man, boy, or what.

"A love-child," returned Betty Higden, dropping her voice; "parents never known; found in the street. He was brought up in the—" with a shiver of repugnance, "—the House."

"The Poor-house?" said the Secretary.

Mrs. Higden set that resolute old face of hers, and darkly nodded yes.

"You dislike the mention of it."

"Dislike the mention of it?" answered the old woman. "Kill me sooner than take me there. Throw this pretty child under cart-horses' feet and a loaded wagon sooner than take him there. Come to us and find us all a-dying, and set a light to us all where we lie, and let us all blaze away with the house into a heap of cinders, sooner than move a corpse of us there!"

A surprising spirit in this lonely woman after so many years of hard working, and hard living, my Lords and Gentlemen and Honorable Boards! What is it that we call it in our grandiose speeches? British independence, rather perverted? Is that, or something like it, the ring of the cant?

"Do I never read in the newspapers," said the dame, fondling the child—"God help me and the like of me!—how the worn-out people that do come down to that, get driven from post to pillar and pillar to post, a-purpose to tire them out! Do I never read how they are put off, put off, put off—how they are grudged, grudged, grudged, the shelter, or the doctor, or the drop of physic, or the bit of bread? Do I never read how they grow heart-sick of it and give it up, after having let themselves drop so low, and how they after all die out for want of help? Then I say, I hope I can die as well as another, and I'll die without that disgrace."

Absolutely impossible my Lords and Gentlemen and Honorable Boards, by any stretch of legislative wisdom to set these perverse people right in their logic?

"Johnny, my pretty," continued old Betty, caressing the child, and rather mourning over it than speaking to it, "your old Granny Betty is nigher fourscore year than threescore and ten. She never begged nor had a penny of the Union money in all her life. She paid scot and she paid lot when she had money to pay; she worked when she could, and she starved when she must. You pray that your Granny may have strength enough left her at the last (she's strong for an old one, Johnny), to get up from her bed and run and hide herself, and sworn to death in a hole, sooner than fall into the hands of those Cruel Jacks we read of, that dodge and drive, and worry and weary, and scorn and shame, the decent poor."

A brilliant success, my Lords and Gentlemen and Honorable Boards, to have brought it to this in the minds of the best of the poor! Under submission, might it be worth thinking of, at any odd time?

The fright and abhorrence that Mrs. Betty Higden smoothed out of her strong face as she ended this diversion showed how seriously she had meant it.

"And does he work for you?" asked the Secretary, gently bringing the discourse back to Master or Mister Sloppy.

"Yes," said Betty, with a good-humored smile and nod of the head. "And well too."

"Does he live here?"

"He lives more here than any where. He was thought to be no better than a Natural, and first come to me as a Minder. I made interest with Mr. Blogg the Beadle to have him as a Minder, seeing him by chance up at church, and thinking I might do something with him. For he was a weak rickety creetur then."

"Is he called by his right name?"

"Why, you see, speaking quite correctly, he has no right name. I always understood he took his name from being found on a Sloppy night."

"He seems an amiable fellow."

"Bless you, Sir, there's not a bit of him," returned Betty, "that's not amiable. So you may judge how amiable he is, by running your eye along his height."

Of an ungainly make was Sloppy. Too much of him longwise, too little of him broadwise, and too many sharp angles of him angle-wise. One of those shambling male human creatures, born to be indiscreetly candid in the revelation of buttons; every button he had about him glaring at the public to a quite preternatural extent. A considerable capital of knee and elbow and wrist and ankle had Sloppy, and he didn't know how to dispose of it to the best advantage, but was always investing it in wrong securities, and so getting himself into embarrassed circumstances. Full-Private Number One in the Awkward Squad of the rank and file of life was Sloppy, and yet had his glimmering notions of standing true to the Colors.

"And now," said Mrs. Boffin, "concerning Johnny."

As Johnny, with his chin tucked in and his lips pouting, reclined in Betty's lap, concentrating his blue eyes on the visitors and shading them from observation with a dimpled arm, old Betty took one of his fresh fat hands in her withered right, and fell to gently beating it on her withered left.

"Yes, ma'am. Concerning Johnny."

"If you trust the dear child to me," said Mrs. Boffin, with a face inviting trust, "he shall have the best of homes, the best of care, the best of education, the best of friends. Please God I will be a true good mother to him!"

"I am thankful to you, ma'am, and the dear child would be thankful if he was old enough to understand." Still lightly beating the little hand upon her own. "I wouldn't stand in the dear child's light, not if I had all my life before me instead of a very little of it. But I hope you won't take it ill that I cleave to the child closer than words can tell, for he's the last living thing left me."

"Take it ill, my dear soul? Is it likely? And you so tender of him as to bring him home here!"

"I have seen," said Betty, still with that light beat upon her hard rough hand, "so many of them on my lap. And they are all gone but this one! I am ashamed to seem so selfish, but I don't really mean it. It'll be the making of his fortune, and he'll be a gentleman when I am dead. I—I—don't know what comes over me. I—try against it. Don't notice me!" The light beat stopped, the resolute mouth gave way, and the fine strong old face broke up into weakness and tears.

Now, greatly to the relief of the visitors, the emotional Sloppy no sooner beheld his patroness in this condition, than, throwing back his head and throwing open his mouth, he lifted up his voice and bellowed. This alarming note of something wrong instantly terrified Toddles and Poddles, who were no sooner heard to roar surprisingly, than Johnny, curving himself the wrong way and striking out at Mrs. Boffin with a pair of indifferent shoes, became a prey to despair. The absurdity of the situation put its pathos to the rout. Mrs. Betty Higden was herself in a moment, and brought them all to order with that speed, that Sloppy, stopping short in a polysyllabic bellow, transferred his energy to the mangle, and had taken several penitential turns before he could be stopped.

"There, there, there!" said Mrs. Boffin, almost regarding her kind self as the most ruthless of women. "Nothing is going to be done. Nobody need be frightened. We're all comfortable; ain't we, Mrs. Higden?"

"Sure and certain we are," returned Betty.

"And there really is no hurry, you know," said Mrs. Boffin, in a lower voice. "Take time to think of it, my good creature!"

"Don't you fear me no more, ma'am," said Betty. "I thought of it for good yesterday. I don't know what come over me just now, but it'll never come again."

"Well, then; Johnny shall have more time to think of it," returned Mrs. Boffin; "the pretty child shall have time to get used to it. And you'll get him more used to it, if you think well of it; won't you?"

Betty undertook that, cheerfully and readily.

"Lor," cried Mrs. Boffin, looking radiantly about her, "we want to make every body happy, not dismal!—And perhaps you wouldn't mind letting me know how used to it you begin to get, and how it all goes on?"

"I'll send Sloppy," said Mrs. Higden.

"And this gentleman who has come with me will pay him for his trouble," said Mrs. Boffin. "And Mr. Sloppy, whenever you come to my house, be sure you never go away without having had a good dinner of meat, beer, vegetables, and pudding."

This still further brightened the face of affairs; for, the highly sympathetic Sloppy, first broadly staring and grinning, and then roaring with laughter, Toddles and Poddles followed suit, and Johnny trumped the trick. T and P considering these favorable circumstances for the resumption of that dramatic descent upon Johnny, again came across-country hand in hand upon a buccaneering expedition; and this having been fought out in the chimney-corner behind Mrs. Higden's chair, with great valor on both sides, those desperate pirates returned hand in hand to their stools, across the dry bed of a mountain torrent.

"You must tell me what I can do for you, Betty my friend," said Mrs. Boffin, confidentially, "if not to-day, next time."

"Thank you all the same, ma'am, but I want nothing for myself. I can work. I'm strong. I can walk twenty mile if I'm put to it." Old Betty was proud, and said it with a sparkle in her bright eyes.

"Yes, but there are some little comforts that you wouldn't be the worse for," returned Mrs. Boffin. "Bless ye, I wasn't born a lady any more than you."

"It seems to me," said Betty, smiling, "that you were a born lady, and a true one, or there never was a lady born. But I couldn't take any thing from you, my dear. I never did take any thing from any one. It ain't that I'm not grateful, but I love to earn it better."

"Well, well!" returned Mrs. Boffin. "I only spoke of little things, or I wouldn't have taken the liberty."

Betty put her visitor's hand to her lips, in acknowledgment of the delicate answer. Wonderfully upright her figure was, and wonderfully self-reliant her look, as, standing facing her visitor, she explained herself further.

"If I could have kept the dear child, without the dread that's always upon me of his coming to that fate I have spoken of, I could never have parted with him, even to you. For I love him, I love him, I love him! I love my husband long dead and gone, in him; I love my children dead and gone, in him; I love my young and hopeful days dead and gone, in him. I couldn't sell that love, and look you in your bright kind face. It's a free gift. I am in want of nothing. When my strength fails me, if I can but die out quick and quiet, I shall be quite content. I have stood between my dead and that shame I have spoken of, and it has been kept off from every one of them. Sewed into my gown," with her hand upon her breast, "is just enough to lay me in the grave. Only see that it's rightly spent, so as I may rest free to the last from that cruelty and disgrace, and you'll have done much more than a little thing for me, and all that in this present world my heart is set upon."

Mrs. Betty Higden's visitor pressed her hand. There was no more breaking up of the strong old face into weakness. My Lords and Gentlemen and Honorable Boards, it really was as composed as our own faces, and almost as dignified.

And now, Johnny was to be inveigled into occupying a temporary position on Mrs. Boffin's lap. It was not until he had been piqued into competition with the two diminutive Minders, by seeing them successively raised to that post and retire from it without injury, that he could be by any means induced to leave Mrs. Betty Higden's skirts; toward which he exhibited, even when in Mrs. Boffin's embrace, strong yearnings, spiritual and bodily; the former expressed in a very gloomy visage, the latter in extended arms. However, a general description of the toy-wonders lurking in Mrs. Boffin's house, so far conciliated this worldly-minded orphan as to induce him to stare at her frowningly, with a fist in his mouth, and even at length to chuckle when a richly-caparisoned horse on wheels, with a miraculous gift of cantering to cake-shops, was mentioned. This sound being taken up by the Minders, swelled into a rapturous trio which gave general satisfaction.

So the interview was considered very successful, and Mrs. Boffin was pleased, and all were satisfied. Not least of all, Sloppy, who undertook to conduct the visitors back by the best way to the Three Magpies, and whom the hammer-headed young man much despised.

This piece of business thus put in train, the Secretary drove Mrs. Boffin back to the Bower, and found employment for himself at the new house until evening. Whether, when evening came, he took a way to his lodgings that led through fields, with any design of finding Miss Bella Wilfer in those fields, is not so certain as that she regularly walked there at that hour.

And, moreover, it is certain that there she was.

No longer in mourning, Miss Bella was dressed in as pretty colors as she could muster. There is no denying that she was as pretty as they, and that she and the colors went very prettily together. She was reading as she walked, and of course it is to be inferred, from her showing no knowledge of Mr. Rokesmith's approach, that she did not know he was approaching.

"Eh?" said Miss Bella, raising her eyes from her book, when he stopped before her. "Oh! It's you."

"Only I. A fine evening!"

"Is it?" said Bella, looking coldly round.

"I suppose it is, now you mention it. I have not been thinking of the evening."

"So intent upon your book?"

"Ye-e-es," replied Bella, with a drawl of indifference.

"A love-story, Miss Wilfer?"

"Oh dear no, or I shouldn't be reading it. It's more about money than any thing else."

"And does it say that money is better than any thing?"

"Upon my word," returned Bella, "I forget what it says, but you can find out for yourself, if you like, Mr. Rokesmith. I don't want it any more."

The Secretary took the book—she had fluttered the leaves as if it were a fan—and walked beside her.

"I am charged with a message for you, Miss Wilfer."

"Impossible, I think!" said Bella, with another drawl.

"From Mrs. Boffin. She desired me to assure you of the pleasure she has in finding that she will be ready to receive you in another week or two at furthest."

Bella turned her head toward him, with her pretty-insolent eyebrows raised, and her eyelids drooping. As much as to say, "How did you come by the message, pray?"

"I have been waiting for an opportunity of telling you that I am Mr. Boffin's Secretary?"

"I am as wise as ever," said Miss Bella, loftily, "for I don't know what a Secretary is. Not that it signifies."

"Not at all."

A covert glance at her face, as he walked beside her, showed him that she had not expected his ready assent to that proposition.

"Then are you going to be always there, Mr. Rokesmith?" she inquired, as if that would be a drawback.

"Always? No. Very much there? Yes."

"Dear me!" drawled Bella, in a tone of mortification.

"But my position there as Secretary will be very different from yours as guest. You will know little or nothing about me. I shall transact the business: you will transact the pleasure. I shall have my salary to earn; you will have nothing to do but to enjoy and attract."

"Attract, Sir?" said Bella, again with her eyebrows raised, and her eyelids drooping. "I don't understand you."

Without replying on this point, Mr. Rokesmith went on.

"Excuse me; when I first saw you in your black dress—"

("There!" was Miss Bella's mental exclamation. "What did I say to them at home? Every body noticed that ridiculous mourning.")

"When I first saw you in your black dress, I was at a loss to account for that distinction between yourself and your family. I hope it was not impertinent to speculate upon it?"

"I hope not, I am sure," said Miss Bella, haughtily. "But you ought to know best how you speculated upon it."

Mr. Rokesmith inclined his head in a deprecatory manner, and went on.

"Since I have been intrusted with Mr. Boffin's affairs, I have necessarily come to understand the little mystery. I venture to remark that I feel persuaded that much of your loss may be repaired. I speak, of course, merely of wealth, Miss Wilfer. The loss of a perfect stranger, whose worth, or worthlessness, I can not estimate—nor you either—is beside the question. But this excellent gentleman and lady are so full of simplicity, so full of generosity, so inclined toward you, and so desirous to—how shall I express it?—to make amends for their good fortune, that you have only to respond."

As he watched her with another covert look, he saw a certain ambitious triumph in her face which no assumed coldness could conceal.

"As we have been brought under one roof by an accidental combination of circumstances, which oddly extends itself to the new relations before us, I have taken the liberty of saying these few words. You don't consider them intrusive I hope?" said the Secretary, with deference.

"Really, Mr. Rokesmith, I can't say what I consider them," returned the young lady. "They are perfectly new to me, and may be founded altogether on your own imagination."

"You will see."

These same fields were opposite the Wilfer premises. The discreet Mrs. Wilfer now looking out of window and beholding her daughter in conference with her lodger, instantly tied up her head and came out for a casual walk.

"I have been telling Miss Wilfer," said John Rokesmith, as the majestic lady came stalking up, "that I have become, by a curious chance, Mr. Boffin's Secretary or man of business."

"I have not," returned Mrs. Wilfer, waving her gloves in her chronic state of dignity, and vague ill-usage, "the honor of any intimate acquaintance with Mr. Boffin, and it is not for me to congratulate that gentleman on the acquisition he has made."

"A poor one enough," said Rokesmith.

"Pardon me," returned Mrs. Wilfer, "the merits of Mr. Boffin may be highly distinguished—may be more distinguished than the countenance of Mrs. Boffin would imply—but it were the insanity of humility to deem him worthy of a better assistant."

"You are very good. I have also been telling Miss Wilfer that she is expected very shortly at the new residence in town."

"Having tacitly consented," said Mrs. Wilfer, with a grand shrug of her shoulders, and another wave of her gloves, "to my child's acceptance of the proffered attentions of Mrs. Boffin, I interpose no objection."

Here Miss Bella offered the remonstrance: "Don't talk nonsense, ma, please."

"Peace!" said Mrs. Wilfer.

"No, ma, I am not going to be made so absurd. Interposing objections!"

"I say," repeated Mrs. Wilfer, with a vast access of grandeur, "that I am not going to interpose objections. If Mrs. Boffin (to whose countenance no disciple of Lavater could possibly for a single moment subscribe)," with a shiver, "seeks to illuminate her new residence in town with the attractions of a child of mine, I am content that she should be favored by the company of a child of mine."

"You use the word, ma'am, I have myself used," said Rokesmith, with a glance at Bella, "when you speak of Miss Wilfer's attractions there."

"Pardon me," returned Mrs. Wilfer, with dreadful solemnity, "but I had not finished."

"Pray excuse me."

"I was about to say," pursued Mrs. Wilfer, who clearly had not had the faintest idea of saying any thing more: "that when I use the term attractions, I do so with the qualification that I do not mean it in any way whatever."

The excellent lady delivered this luminous elucidation of her views with an air of greatly obliging her hearers and greatly distinguishing herself. Whereat Miss Bella laughed a scornful little laugh and said:

"Quite enough about this, I am sure, on all sides. Have the goodness, Mr. Rokesmith, to give my love to Mrs. Boffin—"

"Pardon me!" cried Mrs. Wilfer. "Compliments."

"Love!" repeated Bella, with a little stamp of her foot.

"No!" said Mrs. Wilfer, monotonously. "Compliments."

("Say Miss Wilfer's love, and Mrs. Wilfer's compliments," the Secretary proposed, as a compromise.)

"And I shall be very glad to come when she is ready for me. The sooner the better."

"One last word, Bella," said Mrs. Wilfer, "before descending to the family apartment. I trust that as a child of mine you will ever be sensible that it will be graceful in you, when associating with Mr. and Mrs. Boffin upon equal terms, to remember that the Secretary, Mr. Rokesmith, as your father's lodger, has a claim on your good word."

The condescension with which Mrs. Wilfer delivered this proclamation of patronage was as wonderful as the swiftness with which the lodger had lost caste in the Secretary. He smiled as the mother retired down stairs; but his face fell as the daughter followed.

"So insolent, so trivial, so capricious, so mercenary, so careless, so hard to touch, so hard to turn!" he said, bitterly.

And added as he went up stairs. "And yet so pretty, so pretty!"

And added presently, as he walked to and fro in his room. "And if she knew!"

She knew that he was shaking the house by his walking to and fro; and she declared it another of the miseries of being poor, that you couldn't get rid of a haunting Secretary, stump—stump—stumping overhead in the dark, like a Ghost.

CHAPTER XVII.

A DISMAL SWAMP.

AND now, in the blooming summer days, behold Mr. and Mrs. Boffin established in the eminently aristocratic family mansion, and behold all manner of crawling, creeping, fluttering, and buzzing creatures, attracted by the gold dust of the Golden Dustman!

Foremost among those leaving cards at the eminently aristocratic door before it is quite painted are the Veneerings: out of breath, one might imagine, from the impetuosity of their rush to the eminently aristocratic steps. One copper-plate Mrs. Veneering, two copper-plate Mr. Veneerings, and a connubial copper-plate Mr. and Mrs. Veneering, requesting the honor of Mr. and Mrs. Boffin's company at dinner with the utmost Analytical solemnities. The enchancing Lady Tippins leaves a card. Twemlow leaves cards. A tall custard-colored phaeton tooling up in a solemn manner leaves four cards, to wit, a couple of Mr. Podsnaps, a Mrs. Podsnap, and a Miss Podsnap. All the world and his wife and daughter leave cards. Sometimes the world's wife has so many daughters that her card reads rather like a Miscellaneous Lot at an Auction; comprising Mrs. Tapkins, Miss Tapkins, Miss Frederica Tapkins, Miss Antonina Tapkins, Miss Malvina Tapkins, and Miss Euphemia Tapkins; at the same time, the same lady leaves the card of Mrs. Henry George Alfred Swoshle, née Tapkins: also, a card, Mrs. Tapkins at Home, Wednesdays, Music, Portland Place.

Miss Bella Wilfer becomes an inmate, for an indefinite period, of the eminently aristocratic dwelling. Mrs. Boffin bears Miss Bella away to her Milliner's and Dress-maker's, and she gets beautifully dressed. The Veneerings find with swift remorse that they have omitted to invite Miss Bella Wilfer. One Mrs. Veneering and one Mr. and Mrs. Veneering requesting that additional honor, instantly do penance in white cardboard on the hall table. Mrs. Tapkins likewise discovers her omission, and with promptitude repairs it; for herself, for Miss Tapkins, for Miss Frederica Tapkins, for Miss Antonina Tapkins, for Miss Malvina Tapkins, and for Miss Euphemia Tapkins. Likewise, for Mrs. Henry George Alfred Swoshle, née Tapkins. Likewise, for Mrs. Tapkins at Home, Wednesdays, Music, Portland Place.

Tradesmen's books hunger, and tradesmen's mouths water, for the gold dust of the Golden Dustman. As Mrs. Boffin and Miss Wilfer drive out, or as Mr. Boffin walks out at his jog-trot pace, the fishmonger pulls off his hat with an air of reverence founded on conviction. His men cleanse their fingers on their woollen aprons before presuming to touch their foreheads to Mr. Boffin or Lady. The gaping salmon and the golden mullet lying on the slab seem to turn up their eyes sidewise, as they would turn up their hands, if they had any, in worshiping admiration. The butcher, though a portly and a prosperous man, doesn't know what to do with himself, so anxious is he to express humility when discovered by the passing Boffins taking the air in a mutton grove. Presents are made to the Boffin servants, and bland strangers with business-cards meeting said servants in the street, offer hypothetical corruption. As, "Supposing I was to be favored with an order from Mr. Boffin, my dear friend, it would be worth my while"—to do a certain thing that I hope might not prove wholly disagreeable to your feelings.

But no one knows so well as the Secretary, who opens and reads the letters, what a set is made at the man marked by a stroke of notoriety. Oh the varieties of dust for ocular use offered in exchange for the gold dust of the Golden Dustman! Fifty-seven churches to be erected with half-crowns, forty-two parsonage houses to be repaired with shillings, seven-and-twenty organs to be built with half-pence, twelve hundred children to be brought up on postage stamps. Not that a half-crown, shilling, half-penny, or postage stamp would be particularly acceptable from Mr. Boffin, but that it is so obvious he is the man to make up the deficiency. And then the charities, my Christian brother! And mostly in difficulties, yet mostly lavish, too, in the expensive articles of print and paper. Large fat private double letter, sealed with ducal coronet. "Nicodemus Boffin, Esquire. My Dear Sir,—Having consented to preside at the forthcoming Annual Dinner of the Family Party Fund, and feeling deeply impressed with the immense usefulness of that noble Institution and the great importance of its being supported by a List of Stewards that shall prove to the public the interest taken in it by popular and distinguished men, I have undertaken to ask you to become a Steward on that occasion. Soliciting your favorable reply before the 14th instant, I am, My Dear Sir, Your faithful Servant, LINSEED. P.S. The Steward's fee is limited to three Guineas." Friendly this, on the part of the Duke of Linseed (and thoughtful in the postscript), only lithographed by the hundred and presenting but a pale individuality of address to Nicodemus Boffin, Esquire, in quite another hand. It takes two noble Earls and a Viscount, combined, to inform Nicodemus Boffin, Esquire, in an equally flattering manner, that an estimable lady in the West of England has offered to present a purse containing twenty pounds, to the Society for Granting Annuities to Unassuming Members of the Middle Classes, if twenty individuals will previously present purses of one hundred pounds each. And those benevolent noblemen very kindly point out that if Nicodemus Boffin, Esquire, should wish to present two or more purses, it will not be inconsistent with the design of the estimable lady in the West of England, provided each purse be coupled with the name of some member of his honored and respected family.

These are the corporate beggars. But there are, besides, the individual beggars; and how does the heart of the Secretary fail him when he has to cope with them! And they must be coped with to some extent, because they all inclose documents (they call their scraps documents; but they are, as to papers deserving the name, what minced veal is to a calf), the non-return of which would be their ruin. That is to say, they are utterly ruined now, but they would be more utterly ruined then. Among these correspondents are several daughters of general officers, long accustomed to every luxury of life (except spelling), who little thought, when their gallant fathers waged war in the Peninsula, that they would ever have to appeal to those whom Providence, in its inscrutable wisdom, has blessed with untold gold, and from among whom they select the name of Nicodemus Boffin, Esquire, for a maiden effort in this wise, understanding that he has such a heart as never was. The Secretary learns, too, that confidence between man and wife would seem to obtain but rarely when virtue is in distress, so numerous are the wives who take up their pens to ask Mr. Boffin for money without the knowledge of their devoted husbands, who would never permit it; while, on the other hand, so numerous are the husbands who take up their pens to ask Mr. Boffin for money without the knowledge of their devoted wives, who would instantly go out of their senses if they had the least suspicion of the circumstance. There are the inspired beggars, too. These were sitting, only yesterday evening, musing over a fragment of candle which must soon go out and leave them in the dark for the rest of their nights, when surely some Angel whispered the name of Nicodemus Boffin, Esquire, to their souls, imparting rays of hope, nay confidence, to which they had long been strangers! Akin to these are the suggestively-befriended beggars. They were partaking of a cold potato and water by the flickering and gloomy light of a lucifer-match, in their lodgings (rent considerably in arrear, and heartless landlady threatening expulsion "like a dog" into the streets), when a gifted friend happening to look in, said, "Write immediately to Nicodemus Boffin, Esquire," and would take no denial. There are the nobly independent beggars too. These, in the days of their abundance, ever regarded gold as dross, and have not yet got over that only impediment in the way of their amassing wealth, but they want no dross from Nicodemus Boffin, Esquire; No, Mr. Boffin; the world may term it pride, paltry pride if you will, but they wouldn't take it if you offered it; a loan, Sir—for fourteen weeks to the day, interest calculated at the rate of five per cent. per annum, to be bestowed upon any charitable institution you may name—is all they want of you, and if you have the meanness to refuse it, count on being despised by these great spirits. There are the beggars of punctual business-habits too. These will make an end of themselves at a quarter to one P.M. on Tuesday, if no Post-office order is in the interim received from Nicodemus Boffin, Esquire; arriving after a quarter to one P.M. on Tuesday, it need not be sent, as they will then (having made an exact memorandum of the heartless circumstances) be "cold in death." There are the beggars on horseback too, in another sense from the sense of the proverb. These are mounted and ready to start on the highway to affluence. The goal is before them, the road is in the best condition, their spurs are on, the steed is willing, but, at the last moment, for want of some special thing—a clock, a violin, an astronomical telescope, an electrifying machine—they must dismount forever, unless they receive its equivalent in money from Nicodemus Boffin, Esquire. Less given to detail are the beggars who make sporting ventures. These, usually to be addressed in reply under initials at a country post-office, inquire in feminine hands, Dare one who can not disclose herself to Nicodemus Boffin, Esquire, but whose name might startle him were it revealed, solicit the immediate advance of two hundred pounds from unexpected riches exercising their noblest privilege in the trust of a common humanity?

In such a Dismal Swamp does the new house stand, and through it does the Secretary daily struggle breast-high. Not to mention all the people alive who have made inventions that won't act, and all the jobbers who job in all the jobberies jobbed; though these may be regarded as the Alligators of the Dismal Swamp, and are always lying by to drag the Golden Dustman under.

But the old house. There are no designs against the Golden Dustman there? There are no fish of the shark tribe in the Bower waters? Perhaps not. Still, Wegg is established there, and would seem, judged by his secret proceedings, to cherish a notion of making a discovery. For, when a man with a wooden leg lies prone on his stomach to peep under bedsteads; and hops up ladders, like some extinct bird, to survey the tops of presses and cupboards; and provides himself an iron rod which he is always poking and prodding into dust-mounds; the probability is that he expects to find something.

THE END OF THE FIRST BOOK.

HOW WE FIGHT AT ATLANTA.

HERE in the trenches before Atlanta, on this 15th day of August, I propose to give you some idea of the actual manner in which we fight. With us the pomp and show of war has become a matter of poetry rather than of fact. We need no gay dress or nodding plumes to inspire a soldier's pride. Practical utility is what we look at in matters of dress and equipment. Look at most of the pictures. Two-thirds of the pictures in books and papers represent the soldiers with enormous knapsacks neatly packed; officers leading the charge in full dress uniform, with their sabres waving in the most approved style. Now this makes a pretty picture; but let me tell you that soldiers don't put on their well-packed knapsacks to double-quick over a half mile of open ground in the hot sun at the pas du charge. Limited transportation soon exhausts an officer's stock of white collars. The most elegant dress uniform will become torn and spotted, and the brightly polished boots will become soiled with mud, when one is reduced to marching in line-of-battle through swamps, thickets, and brier patches, and then sleeping night after night on the bare ground with only heaven's clouds for an over-coat. Know ye, then, ladies all, yonder pretty-looking officer, with his spotless dress, resplendent with gold lace, will present a very different spectacle after a few months of campaigning. Dusty, ragged, and unshaven, his appearance is far more in accordance with his surroundings, far more becoming the earnest fighting man that you really suppose he is, than if he were arrayed as you formerly saw him, or as the pictures represent him to be.

Of course, in a war like this, upon which we all entered with the art yet to learn, the science has been progressive. Each succeeding year has developed new phases, and under such schooling our soldiers are indeed veterans; men whom practice has perfected in all the mysteries of military life. Each soldier knows that where he used to lie upon his arms all the time, in the face of the enemy, only seeking cover from the shape of the ground, he must now make a strong fortification, to enable him to hold his position, and must arrange it to stop pieces of shell from the flank as well as bullets from the front. Had the army been as experienced at Shiloh as it is now, Beauregard would have come up and broken his army to pieces on our fortifications, instead of finding our whole army lying exposed to his attacks on the open field. At Fort Donelson, too, where we had to attack fortifications, we ourselves had no sign of a work upon which we could fall back after each day's repulse; nor did the enemy seem to realize the value of his own works, for instead of quietly waiting the attack, he threw away his army by fighting outside his works.

It is now a principle with us to fight with movable breast-works, to save every man by giving him cover, from which he may resist the tremendous attacks in mass of the enemy. Thus at least we fight in Georgia, in the Atlanta campaign.

Wherever the army moves, either in gaining the enemy's work, or in taking up a new line of attack, the first duty after the halt is to create defensive fortifications—rude, indeed, but effective in enabling us to hold our ground against any force. In forming these field-works every man is to some extent his own engineer. The location of the line is selected by the officers, and each regiment fortifies its own front, each company its own ground.

Generally the situation will not allow of finishing the works at once, for the enemy will probably attack soon after you take position, which is on a commanding hill or some similar point. So you cause a hasty barricade to be constructed. The front rank take all the guns and remain on the line, while the rear rank goes off in double-quick to collect rails, logs, rocks, any thing that can assist in turning a hostile bullet. These they place on the front of the front rank, and in five minutes there is a hasty barricade, bullet-proof and breast-high, along your whole line; not a mere straight work, but one varied with its salients and re-entering angles, taking every advantage of the ground, and cross-firing on every hollow. You can do this after the enemy forms to charge you, while he is feeling you with artillery. Thus it takes just five minutes to prepare for an assault; and you can hold your line against an attack by three times your number—and that, too, with but slight loss to yourself—if your men be veteran soldiers.

It may be that when your barricade is done you have yet time. Shovels and picks are always carried by your men, and to work they go to complete the frail works. A ditch is speedily made on the inside to stand in. The earth is thrown on the outside of the barricade, and the ditch deepened, so that, standing inside, your head will be protected by the parapet. Thus you speedily have a pretty substantial earth-work, with a step inside to stand on when firing, and a ditch to stand in while loading. If you are in the woods, you want to give range to your rifles, and have all the thick undergrowth and small trees cut away for fifty paces in front. By felling these all the same way, the bushy tops all turning outward, and trimming off the smaller twigs and leaves, and tangling the tops together, you have a formidable abattis, through which it shall be next to impossible for a line to advance alone, let alone against the showers of bullets from your men at short range. This done, you can be making any amount of additions to your work as you have time, all tending to make it impregnable. Even after you have pronounced the job finished, your men will fuss and dig and tinker about the works to make them sure protection. They have no notion of taking a position, and then having it taken from them by a sudden assault. They will cut huge logs eighteen inches through, and place them on the parapet to protect the head while they shoot through a space left between the log and the parapet. They have also an ingenious plan for preventing these "head-logs" from being an injury to the service. Experience has taught them that a cannon-ball will sometimes strike one of these huge logs, and throw it off the parapet on to the troops inside. As a preventive skids, or stout poles, are placed at equal distances along the rifle-pits, extending from the parapet across the ditch. The logs being knocked off the top of the breast-work are supposed to roll along these skids, over the heads of the soldiers in the ditch, until they lodge safely on the bank beyond.

The men will also amuse themselves with devising some new entanglement or snare to annoy the advance of the enemy. They drive palisades—stakes set in the ground with their sharpened points directed outward at an angle of forty-five degrees, and so close together that a man can not pass between them. In front of the palisade they place a strong wire so arranged that it can not be seen but will trip all comers. They will then imagine how astounded will be the rebels in charging the works to be suddenly tripped up and to fall forward on the sharp palisades.

Your main works being completed you can rest secure, only putting in an embrasure for a howitzer or two here or there. These howitzers are a fine thing to repel an attack, for they throw nearly a bucketful of small balls at a charge. Your skirmish line has, in the mean time, fortified itself sufficiently for protection, and can hold an attacking column long enough for you to form line in the main works before the enemy can get there.

One reads in the papers of the assaults on earth-works, of the repulses, and yet one does not know what is contained in those words—"Assault repulsed." You make up your mind to assault the enemy's works. You have formed line of battle, with a second and third line behind you for support. You march forth filled with the determination to accomplish the object, yet feeling the magnitude of the undertaking. Two hundred yards brings you to the picket-line, and here the opposition commences. You dash across the space between the two lines, you lose a few men; and the enemy's pickets, after making as much noise as possible, run back to their main works. By this time the enemy are sure you are really coming, and open on you with artillery, besides a pretty heavy fire of musketry. This artillery throws the shell screaming through your ranks, producing more moral than physical effect, or throws shrapnell which, bursting in front, scatter myriads of small bullets around. You commence to lose men rapidly. The ball is opened. "Forward, double-quick!" again; and while the whole line of the enemy open fire from behind their works, your men, mindless of this—mindless of the death intensified, the bullets and the shells, they dash on with wild cheers. The abattis with its tangled intricacy of sharpened branches snares your line. Tripping, falling, rising to fall again, the men struggle through this abattis. You get through this abattis, though the minutes are drawn out interminably, and though in each step are left brave men to pay for the ground. You get through a part of you and still rush on: the firing grows more fierce, the men grow more desperate. Your three lines have been almost reduced to one, and you strike another line of abattis. In this abattis are the palisades, which must be uprooted by force before a man can pass. You stumble, fall, tear your flesh on these stakes, and must stop to pull them up—stop, when every instant is an hour—stop, when you are already gasping for breath; and here open up the masked batteries, pouring the canister into that writhing, struggling, bleeding mass—so close that the flame scorches, that the smoke blinds from those guns. Is it any wonder that your three lines are torn to pieces, and have to give back before the redoubled fire of an enemy as yet uninjured comparatively? And then the slaughter of a retreat there! Oftentimes it is preferable to lie down and take the fire there until night rather than lose all by falling back under such circumstances.

This war has demonstrated that earth-works can be rendered nearly impregnable on either side against direct assault. An attack on fortified lines must cost a fearful price, and should be well weighed whether the cost exceed not the gain. This, then, is what an assault means—a slaughter-pen, a charnel-house, and an army of weeping mothers and sisters at home. It is inevitable. When an assault is successful, it is to be hoped that the public gain may warrant the loss of life requisite. When it is repulsed tenfold is the mourning.

It was a long time before the men could appreciate the value of these field-works. They would grumble and growl, recalling instances without number where the most charming little traps, the most elegant cross-fires, had been prepared with great labor, and had never been attacked. I saw some men most beautifully satisfied as to the necessity for defensive works the other day. On the 22d of July, before Atlanta, while these men were engaged in grumbling over some newly-finished works which the enemy would not charge, Hardee struck the Seventeenth Corps in flank and rear. His furious onset crushed the flank, and the Second Brigade of the Third Division, to which these grumblers belonged, found themselves suddenly forming the unprotected left of the corps and attack from the rear in those very works they grumbled so about building. When this attack was made they jumped the works to the front, or outside, and fought that way. This attack repulsed, they jumped back and repulsed an attack from the outside, or real front. Thus they fought, looking for all the world like a long line of these toy-monkeys you see which jump over the end of a stick. Thus they fought for four long hours, cut off from all commanders, corps, division, and brigade, cut off from ammunition-trains, and only cheered by the noble example of General Giles A. Smith, whose command, broken by the first onset—all except one brigade—had rallied behind the works of the Third Division. Firing to front and rear, and to either flank, they held their works, only changing front by jumping over the parapet as five assaults were made upon them, successively from front, rear, or flank, until the rebel onset was checked long enough to make sure the safety of the immense wagon-trains already saved by the Sixteenth Corps.

The next works of these men I saw, and seeing them, laughed. Experience had taught the utility of fortifications, and they fortified not only the front, but facing the rear and every way, so that they could hold out if surrounded. They were not going to be caught without ammunition either; for each company had its little powder-magazine in a safe place, well stored with ammunition gathered from the battle-field. No grumbling was heard about building the works. All the spare time of the men was devoted to finishing up their pet works, standing off and regarding the effect of each addition with something of the same paternal feeling that an artist exhibits in regarding the power of each master-stroke in finishing his picture.

We hear a great deal about hand-to-hand fighting. Gallant though it would be, and extremely pleasant to the sensation newspapers to have it to record, yet, unfortunately for gatherers of items, it is of very rare occurrence. This year's campaigns have probably seen more of it than any other of the war. When men can kill one another at six hundred yards they generally would prefer to do it at that distance than to come down to two paces. Still as each army grows wiser in military matters the fighting must naturally become closer and more desperate, and those who have the firmest endurance, the greatest self-control, must win. This war is not one between mere military machines as soldiers are in Europe, but of rational, thinking beings, fighting with the highest of motives on our side, and with the belief that theirs is the highest of motives on the part of the enemy. When such men are thrown in deadly personal contact with each other the strife is deadly indeed. On the 22d of July, in that part of the battle to which I have already alluded, it chanced that I saw hand-to-hand fighting in that same Second Brigade afore mentioned. A man was actually well-nigh dismembered, the rebels pulling his feet, to take him prisoner, and our boys pulling his head to save him. Men were bayoneted, knocked down with the butts of muskets, and even fists were used in default of better weapons in that deadly strife. Officers used their dress swords, which they had hitherto considered as mere playthings for the parade, to hack down a troublesome enemy. A rebel colonel, who had laid hold of the colors of the Twentieth Ohio Regiment, was bayoneted by the color-guard, who at the same instant saved the colors of the Seventy-eighth Ohio, their bearer, shot through the heart, having dropped the precious flag among the enemy. Men begged for more cartridges as they would for bread, and made every one count, as the horrible sight in the ditch testified the next morning.

So much for hand-to-hand fighting. While there are thousands of such brave men in the field our country can never go to ruin, and the honor of our flag will be upheld against traitors, enemies, at home or abroad.

In a protracted attack like that on Petersburg or Atlanta, although not actually a siege, still the operations have to be carried on more or less after the principles of one. The works are more solid, more substantial, than mere field-works. The men make their bunks right behind the works so as to be protected from the pieces of shell and bullets. The parapets are made thicker and higher to resist the heavy artillery fire of the enemy, and batteries are erected at commanding points to keep up a constant fire upon the enemy. These batteries are made very strongly, and are often casemated, or roofed with a heavy bomb-proof of logs and earth. It is amusing to watch the operations of these batteries. They are arranged with the most consummate skill, so far as regards position, etc. No sooner does a rebel battery dare to speak than you will hear a volley from all the guns that can see it, and a dozen or more shells of every shape and size will strike exactly in the embrasure of the hostile fort. This practice of concentration of fire renders the enemy exceedingly chary of using his guns unless he thinks he has us at an advantage.

Sharp-shooters play an important part in the operations of our army. Hiding themselves in a good position they soon build a little pit, digging with the bayonet and tin cup, if they can not stand up to use a spade, from which they annoy the enemy most immensely. Their keen eyes readily detect the slightest portion of an enemy exposed, and they generally mark it with a quick bullet. Many a trick is resorted to by them to induce the enemy so to expose himself. Sometimes they will all raise a tremendous shout, and when the enemy bob up to see what is going on they give them a telling volley, and then roll over and kick up their heels with joy. Nothing short of an actual attack in force will dislodge these sharp-shooters; and it is rarely that one of them is killed. They take the same pride in their duty that a hunter does in the chase, and tally their victims in three separate columns—the “certainly,” the “probably,” and the “possibly” killed—thinking no more of it than if it were not men they hunt so diligently. The enemy also have efficient sharp-shooters who climb high trees and with their long-range rifles soon make themselves felt in our camps.

Besides the fighting population of our camps there is a population constitutionally opposed to warfare—cooks, ambulance nurses, stretcher-bearers, shirks, and sometimes surgeons, who all come under the class technically called bummers. These are treated by the fighting men with a sort of cool contempt, no matter whether necessity or inclination keeps them to the rear, and they have a hard time. Frequently the rear of the army is a much more dangerous locality than the front line, for the missiles passing over the front line, must fall somewhere, and often demoralize whole hosts of “bummers,” who build miniature fortifications to live in, and collect together in crowds; for misery loves company. Any favorable ravine thus peopled immediately becomes denominated “Bummer’s Roost.” Here they spend their days in cooking for their nurses, if they are cooks, or attending to their own business, if their object be to escape duty and danger. Among them originate all sorts of marvelous reports of immense success or terrible disaster. They always know just what General Sherman said about the situation at any given time; and from them start many of the wild stories which penetrate the columns of our best papers.

To watch these cooks, freighted with the precious coffee for the men in the trenches, as they go out to the front three times a day, is amusing. From continually dodging the passing shells or stray bullets their forms become bent and stooping. As they approach the line, the men in the trenches commence shouting, “Hey, bummer! Run quick, bummer!” “A man was killed just there, bummer!” With such encouragements the coffee at last reaches its destination, and being distributed among the eager men the bummer is soon at liberty to hurry back to the “Roost.”

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 5th of September. The interest in the military operations of the month centres about four topics: the siege of Petersburg, the operations in the Shenandoah Valley, the siege of Atlanta, and the attack on Mobile.

General Grant resumed operations against Petersburg July 21, by a feint movement north of the James, the object of which was to divert Lee's attention from a formidable assault intended to be made on the fortifications east of Petersburg. For several weeks preparations had been making for this assault, and by means of a ravine within our lines Grant had succeeded in running a mine to a point just in front of Cemetery Hill, the salient of the Confederate fortifications on this side. The feint movement proved a greater success than the assault. General Foster had held an important position at Deep Bottom, across the James from Jones Neck, and protected on his flank by gun-boats. This position was three miles above Malvern Hill.

At this point a pontoon-bridge stretched across the river. On Thursday, July 21, another bridge was thrown across below, at Strawberry Plains, and the next morning a portion of the Nineteenth Corps crossed and held guard on the north side. The movement succeeded in alarming the enemy, and there was for two or three days a sharp skirmishing. On the 26th the Second Corps was marched across, and a considerable force of cavalry under Sheridan and Kautz; and to heighten the effect of his demonstrations in this direction Grant, in full view of the enemy, sent the long wagon-train of the Sixth Corps across. The Second Corps was all on the north side of the James on the morning of the 27th, and immediately advanced across Strawberry Plains against the enemy, who lay behind earth-works half a mile in front. Having traversed this space under a severe fire, a flanking movement was successfully executed, turning the enemy's left. The intrenchments were abandoned, and Miles's brigade, Barlow's division, captured four 20-pound Parrott guns, which were left behind in the embrasures.

That night the Second Corps recrossed the river to co-operate in the assault, which was set for the 30th. On the morning of that day the mine was exploded at forty minutes past four o'clock. The mine was 400 feet in length, with two galleries; it connected with our lines by means of a covered way. It was charged with eight tons of powder, and the explosion was like an earthquake. This was the signal for the assault. The exploding mine had blown up one of the enemy's batteries together with a North Carolina regiment, and had made a gap in the works. Now a thundering cannonade opened from a hundred and fifty Federal guns, and the troops rushed to the assault. During the previous night the line had been formed with the Ninth Corps in the centre, supported on the left by the Fifth, and with the Eighteenth massed in its rear. Ledlie's division, together with the Fourth, both of the Ninth Corps, were selected for the storming party. Ledlie's leading in three lines, each consisting of a brigade, marched up into the crater formed by the explosion. There was here a fatal delay, and when the division at length pushed up the crest of Cemetery Hill they were repulsed. Then the Fourth Division, consisting of colored troops, followed, and were also repulsed. Some of the soldiers tried to hold the crater against the enemy; others quickly made their way to the rear. In killed, wounded, and prisoners, the Federal loss was estimated at between five and six thousand men. General Bartlett and his staff, together with Colonel Wild, were captured in the engagement. August 3 a truce was granted by Lee for the burial of the dead and the care of the wounded. August 6 the enemy exploded a mine in front of the Eighteenth Corps, but no injury was done.

On the 9th an explosion occurred at City Point, which, although accidental, resulted in a loss of a hundred and fifty killed and wounded. The accident occurred at the wharf a little before noon, just as the 11.30 train was starting for the front, and in the following manner: The J. E. Kendrick, loaded with ammunition, was lying at the wharf, with several other barges, and it was in this boat that the explosion took place. The barges near by were destroyed, the wharf was torn up, the large Government warehouse was crushed, the railroad cars shattered, and the buildings on the other side of the railroad were leveled with the ground. The loss of property was nearly two millions.

A fortnight after the unsuccessful assault on Petersburg General Grant moved again. The Second Corps had a few days previously embarked on transports, and on the 12th went down the river a short distance, but returned during the night, and landed again on the north side of the James, at Deep Bottom. At Dutch Gap, near this point, General Butler was engaged in digging a canal, to cut off six or eight miles of travel around an awkward bend of the river, and also to avoid obstructions in the river. This work was impeded by an annoying fire from the enemy on the north side. On the 13th also the Second Corps was reinforced by the Tenth, and the entire command was formed on Foster's right. An attack was made on the enemy's position, resulting in the capture of five hundred prisoners, six cannon, and two mortars. The Confederates retired to a stronger position. This time Grant appeared to be in earnest on the north side, and on the 18th his lines extended from Dutch Gap to White Oak Swamp. While the Confederate line was drawn out to confront this extension of Grant's, the Fifth Corps on the 18th marched to Reams Station, surprised a force of the enemy guarding the Weldon Railroad at that point, and took possession of the road. About noon a portion of Hill's Corps advanced from Petersburg and attacked Warren, but were repulsed. The next day a larger force attacked, and succeeded in flanking the right of Warren's Corps; a large number of men were captured, but the fight was maintained with great tenacity until the Ninth Corps, which had been held in reserve, came up to the support of the Fifth. The enemy was then driven back over the ground which he had gained, and the road was again held by the Federals. Warren's loss in the battle is estimated at five thousand men. The Second Corps recrossed the road Saturday night, and came up to the support of the Fifth and Ninth, who were again attacked on Sunday, the 21st, but succeeded in driving the enemy and capturing a large number of prisoners. The Confederates, having on the 24th left the front of the Fifth and Ninth Corps, reappeared the next day at Ream's Station on the Federal flank and rear, which was protected by only two divisions—the First and Second—of Hancock's Corps. These divisions were engaged in destroying the railroad, and were unexpectedly attacked. Some breast-works had been thrown up at the station, and here the Federals awaited attack, their line taking the form of a crescent, the centre beyond, and the right and left flanks across the railroad. Three assaults were made by the enemy and successfully repulsed. Then followed a desperate charge. The Confederates were mown down by the musketry from the breast-works; but they pushed on, and the right centre giving way the works had to be abandoned by Hancock, who withdrew with his men to a neighboring wood. From this wood he made a successful rally against the enemy's flank, but night coming on terminated the severe conflict. The enemy lost heavily, and Hancock lost between one and two thousand taken prisoners. The position of the Fifth and Ninth Corps on the road remained undisturbed.

In our last Record we brought the operations in the Shenandoah Valley down to July 12, when the Confederates retreated from before Washington across the Potomac. They were pursued by General Averill, who overtook and fought them on the 19th, gaining the victory. The pursuit was continued to Winchester, where Early was reinforced, when Averill, after fighting him on the 23d and 24th, fell back to Harper's Ferry. On the 26th the enemy again occupied Martinsburg. In the battle near Winchester the Federal loss was 1000 men. Colonel Mulligan was among the killed. On Saturday the 30th the Confederate General M'Causland, with a few hundred cavalry, entered Chambersburg, and on the refusal of the citizens to give him five hundred thousand dollars set fire to the town in about fifty places at once. The flight of the citizens from this sudden calamity was attended with great suffering, which was aggravated by the insolence and cruelty of the enemy. The loss of property was nearly four millions of dollars, and more than twenty-five hundred people lost their homes. On the 8th of August General Sheridan was placed in command of the Middle Military Division, superseding General Hunter, his force consisting at that time of the Sixth, Eighth, and Nineteenth Corps, together with Crook's, Averill's, and Kelly's commands. Averill and Kelly had just gained an important success, and Sheridan pushed on after the retreating enemy. On the 10th of August a slight engagement occurred with Early's rear guard. The pursuit was continued to Strasburg. On the 14th Mosby attacked Sheridan's rear at Berryville, and disturbed his communications. This, together with the fact that Early was now strongly reinforced, led Sheridan to fall back; on the 21st his line extended from Berryville to a position on the Martinsburg pike, General Wilson's cavalry holding the advance at Summit Point. This position was on the railroad from Winchester to Harper's Ferry, and seven or eight miles from the latter, near Charlestown. Sheridan was here attacked on the morning of the 26th, and was compelled to fall back to the heights around Halltown.

General Sherman, after the battle of July 22, determined to transfer his army to the west of Atlanta. On the morning of the 28th the Army of the Tennessee was swung around to the right of the entire army. Major-General O. O. Howard succeeded M'Pherson in the command; and on this account, it is said, General Hooker resigned his command of the Twentieth Corps. Howard's three corps now threatened the Macon Road. Logan's corps, the Fifteenth, had the advance, and had just got in position when a corps of Hood's army attacked him furiously with infantry and artillery. The battle, lasting until 5 o'clock P.M., was fought mostly with musketry; the enemy lost heavily, and was repulsed. At first the event seemed likely to prove favorable to the Confederates; indeed, at one time Logan's flank was almost turned; but afterward the tide turned, and the result was decidedly a Federal success. When Hood assumed the command of the Confederate army he had 46,000 men. It is estimated that in the battles of the 20th, 22d, and 28th his losses have amounted to at least half that number. On August 8 General Sherman's line extended from the Chattanooga Railroad to within a mile and a half of the Macon Road, Schofield holding the extreme right. A dispatch from General Sherman, dated twenty-six miles south of Atlanta, on the morning of September 3, states that the army withdrew from about Atlanta on the 30th, and had made a break in the West Point Road, and gained a good position from which to strike the Macon Road, Howard on the right near Jonesboro, Schofield on the left a few miles above at Rough-and-Ready, and Thomas in the centre. The enemy were strongly posted at Jonesboro, but Sherman planted his whole army between Atlanta and this outpost, and an attack made on the latter, September 1, resulted in its capture by General Jeff C. Davis, with 10 guns and 1000 prisoners. The enemy retreated south to another station (Lovejoy's) on the Macon Road, and were followed. In the mean time Hood at Atlanta, finding himself cut off from supplies by Sherman's army, evacuated that important strong-hold, blowing up his magazines. The Twentieth Corps, under General Slocum, immediately took possession. Sherman says that his losses will not exceed 1200 men, and that he has 300 Confederate dead, 250 wounded, and 1500 prisoners.

On the 27th of July Stoneman and M'Cook started on two separate expeditions against the Macon Road, after reaching which it was designed that the two commands should effect a junction. Stoneman passed around Sherman's left near Stone Mountain, and M'Cook around his right, Stoneman met with determined opposition, was surrounded and captured, with a good portion of his command. M'Cook succeeded in striking the road on the 30th, three miles south of Fayetteville, where a dépôt was burned and six miles of the road destroyed. M'Cook had that morning captured a large wagon-train near Fayetteville. He was now 40 miles south of Atlanta. He commenced to return, passing through Newman toward the fords of the Chattahoochee. He was attacked at night after crossing Whitewater Creek, but succeeded in driving back the enemy. At Newman the next morning he was again attacked, and nearly surrounded. He succeeded, however, in cutting his way out with about 1200 men. His loss in killed, wounded, and missing was roughly estimated at about 1000 men. These unfortunate expeditions were soon after followed by a third under Kilpatrick, which succeeded in destroying several miles of the railroad and getting safely back to camp.

By way of reprisal the Confederate General Wheeler, on the 14th of August, with a force estimated variously at between two and five thousand men, attempted the interruption of Sherman's communications by an attack on Dalton, which was defended by Colonel Siebold with four hundred men. General Wheeler demanded the surrender of the place, which Siebold refused. The latter was able to maintain the defense until the arrival of General Steadman with reinforcements on the 15th, when the Confederates were forced to retreat.

On the 21st of August General Forrest, with from 1500 to 2000 cavalry, succeeded in entering Memphis, most probably with the design of capturing Generals Washburne and Hurlburt, and of freeing the inmates of Irving Prison. In these objects they did not succeed. They suffered quite heavily in killed and wounded.

On the 5th of August Admiral Farragut, with fourteen gun-boats and three Monitors, passed between forts Morgan and Gaines into Mobile Bay. The fleet had passed the forts at half past eight o'clock. In passing, the Tecumseh, one of the Monitors, struck a torpedo, and went down with nearly all on board. Captain Craven, commanding the Monitor, went down with her. In the mean time the Confederate fleet, consisting of the ram Tennessee and three gun-boats—the Selma, Morgan, and Gaines—had joined the forts in the attack on Farragut's vessels. The most formidable vessel of the enemy's fleet was the ram Tennessee. The Selma had been taken, with 90 prisoners, but the Morgan and Gaines driven under the shelter of the fort, but the ram still remained uninjured. At Farragut's order the whole fleet attacked the Tennessee, the iron-clads closing upon her and firing their broadsides into her port-holes. In this way Admiral Buchanan, her commander, was wounded, and she surrendered, with 20 officers and 120 men. The casualties on board the fleet amounted to 129 killed and wounded. There are two entrances to the Bay, viz., Swash Channel and Grant's Pass. The former and more eastern of these, between Mobile Point and Dauphin Island, was the one selected by Farragut. It is commanded by Fort Morgan on the right and Gaines on the left. Fort Gaines surrendered on the 8th, with 56 officers and 818 men. Fort Powell, which commanded Grant's Pass, was evacuated. On the 23d Fort Morgan, being invested by General Granger's forces on the land, and at the same time by Farragut's fleet, surrendered with a garrison of 600 prisoners.

August 4, the fifty-five Federal officers held under fire in Charleston were exchanged for those which, as a retaliatory measure, General Foster had ordered to be held under the Confederate fire in the harbor.

A new Confederate privateer, styling herself the Tallahassee, on the 11th August, appeared off New York harbor. The Tallahassee is an iron steamer, with two smoke-stacks, two screws, about two hundred and thirty feet in length, twenty feet beam, and draws about nine feet of water. She is fore and aft schooner rigged; mounts three guns, one small one on the top-gallant fore-castle, a long 32-pounder amidships, and a 24-pounder aft. She carries four waist boats. Her crew consists of about one hundred and twenty persons, including the officers. A great number of vessels, most of them coasting schooners, have been captured by this privateer. Thirteen vessels were dispatched in pursuit by the Navy Department.

The Democratic National Convention met at Chicago on the 29th of August. Though nominally a Convention of the Democratic party, it was intended to represent all who are opposed to the present National Administration. Delegates were present from each of the 23 States of the Union. The Convention was called to order by Mr. August Belmont, who said that "four years of misrule by a sectional, fanatical, and corrupt party had brought our country to the verge of ruin. The past and present are sufficient warnings of the disastrous consequences which would befall us if Mr. Lincoln's re-election should be made possible by our want of patriotism and unity." The dissensions in the last Convention were one of the principal causes which gave the reins of government into the hands of the present Administration, and this Convention was urged not to fall into the same error, but to sacrifice any opinions and convictions the moment they threatened that harmony and unity of action which was indispensable to success. "We are here," said Mr. Belmont, "not as war Democrats nor as peace Democrats, but as citizens of the great republic." Mr. Bigler, formerly Governor of Pennsylvania, and Senator in Congress, was chosen as temporary Chairman. He said, "The termination of Democratic rule in this country was the end of the peaceful relations between the States and the people. The men now in authority, through a feud which they have long maintained with violent and unwise men at the South, because of a blind fanaticism about an institution in some of the States, in relation to which they have no duties to perform and no responsibilities to bear, are utterly incapable of adopting the proper means to rescue our country from its present lamentable condition."

The Convention was permanently organized by appointing as Chairman Hon. Horatio Seymour, the Governor of New York. In his speech upon assuming the chair he inveighed bitterly against the present Administration and the party now in power. "They were," he said, "animated by intolerance and fanaticism, and blinded by an ignorance of the spirit of our institutions, the character of our people, and the condition of our land. Step by step they have marched on to results from which at the onset they would have shrunk with horror; and even now, when war has desolated our land, has laid its heavy burdens upon labor, and when bankruptcy and ruin overhang us, they will not have the Union restored except upon conditions unknown to the Constitution. They will not let the shedding of blood cease even for a little time, to see if Christian charity or the wisdom of statesmanship may not work out a method to save our country. They will not even listen to a proposal for peace which does not offer what this Government has no right to ask. This Administration can not now save the country if it would. It has placed obstacles in its pathway which it can not overcome. It has hampered its own freedom of action by unconstitutionality." The failure of the policy of the Administration, he said, was not due to any want of courage or devotion on the part of our soldiers; they had done all that arms could do; and had wise statesmanship secured the fruits of their victories, there would to-day have been peace in the land. "This Administration," he continued, "can not save the Union. We can. We demand no conditions for the restoration of the Union. We are shackled with no hates, no prejudices, no passions. We wish for fraternal relations with the people of the South. We demand for them what we demand for ourselves, the full recognition of the rights of the States." This speech, of which we have given only a few points, was received with great applause.

The Platform of the Convention was presented on the 30th. It consisted of a series of six resolutions drawn up by a committee appointed for that purpose, consisting of one member from each State, chosen by the respective delegations. Mr. Guthrie, of Kentucky, was Chairman of this committee, and Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, one of its members. We give an abstract of this Platform, quoting textually the two most important resolutions:

(1.) The party will in the future, as in the past, adhere to the Union under the Constitution.

(2.) "Resolved, That this Convention does explicitly declare, as the sense of the American people, that after four years of failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war, during which, under the pretense of a military necessity or war power higher than the Constitution, the Constitution itself has been disregarded in every part, and public liberty and private right alike trodden down, and the material prosperity of the country essentially impaired, justice, humanity, liberty, and the public welfare demand that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities, with a view to an ultimate convention of all the States, or other peaceable means, to the end that, at the earliest practicable moment, peace may be restored on the basis of the federal Union of the States."

(3.) Denounces the interference of the military authority of the United States in elections, declaring that "a repetition of such acts in the approaching election will be held as revolutionary, and resisted with all the means and power under our control."

(4.) "Resolved, That the aim and object of the Democratic party is to preserve the Federal Union and the rights of the States unimpaired, and they hereby declare that they consider the administrative usurpation of extraordinary and dangerous powers not granted by the Constitution, the subversion of the civil by military law in States not in insurrection, the arbitrary military arrest, imprisonment, trial, and sentence of American citizens in States where civil law exists in full force, the suppression of freedom of speech and of the press, the denial of the right of asylum, the open and avowed disregard of State rights, the employment of unusual test-oaths, and the interference with and denial of the right of the people to bear arms, as calculated to prevent a restoration of the Union and the perpetuation of a government deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed."

(5.) Denounces the conduct of the Administration in respect to our prisoners of war.

(6.) Expresses the sympathy of the Democratic party with our soldiers, and promises them, in the event of its attaining power, the care, protection, and kindness which they have so nobly earned.

This Platform was adopted with but four dissenting votes. The Convention then proceeded to the nomination of candidates for President and Vice-President, the following names being proposed: George B. McClellan, of Pennsylvania; Lazarus W. Powell, of Kentucky; Thomas W. Seymour, of Connecticut; Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire; and Horatio Seymour, of New York. Mr. Powell declined, saying, that in the present crisis the candidate of the party should come from a non-slaveholding State. Mr. Harris, of Maryland, in seconding the nomination of Thomas H. Seymour, denounced General M'Clellan as a tyrant who had first stricken down the liberty of Maryland by ordering the arrest of the Legislature. Mr. Long, of Ohio, followed in the same strain. He said that M'Clellan had been the willing instrument of a corrupt and tyrannical Administration, and had gone even further than Lincoln in the perpetration of tyrannical measures. Mr. Morgan, of Ohio, replied, defending General M'Clellan for his arrest of the Maryland Legislature. A conspiracy, he said, had been formed to procure the secession of Maryland; several members of the Legislature were among the conspirators; and M'Clellan took the best measures in his power to thwart the treasonable scheme. Had he not done so he would have been guilty of the vilest treason. A scene of confusion ensued, during which the Convention adjourned.

On the 31st the Convention proceeded to ballot for Candidates. Governor Seymour, of New York, peremptorily refused to allow his name to be used. The vote at first stood 162 for M'Clellan and 64 for all others. Several delegations then changed their votes, and the result was 202½ for George B. M'Clellan, and 23½ for Thomas H. Seymour. Delaware and Maryland voted for Seymour, who also received nearly half the votes of Ohio, Indiana, and Missouri. The remaining eighteen States voted unanimously for M'Clellan, whose nomination, on motion of Mr. Vallandigham, was made unanimous.

For Vice-President the following persons were proposed, who received on the first ballot the number of votes appended to their names: George H. Pendleton, of Ohio, 54½; Daniel W. Voorhees, of Indiana, 13; George W. Cass, of Pennsylvania, 26; James Guthrie, of Kentucky, 65½; Augustus Dodge, of Iowa, 9; James D. Catton, of Illinois, 16; Lazarus W. Powell, of Kentucky, 32½; John S. Phelps, of Missouri, 8. On the second ballot the Chairman of the New York delegation said that this State having cast its 33 votes for Mr. Guthrie against his wish, would now vote for Mr. Pendleton; all the other candidates were then withdrawn, and Mr. Pendleton was unanimously nominated.

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

From Mexico we have accounts of isolated encounters in different quarters; but the general current of intelligence is favorable to the new empire. The Emperor Maximilian has granted an amnesty to all prisoners whose offenses are strictly political; other prisoners sentenced by courts-martial to punishment of more than ten years' hard labor or imprisonment are freed from the excess beyond this. He has also ordered that the French military code shall be adopted in Mexico as far as circumstances permit. The Emperor appears to be endeavoring to maintain a conciliatory policy and establish a constitutional government, and has asked the advice and co-operation of notables of the several States.

EUROPE.

In the British Parliament, on the 25th of July, in reply to an inquiry from Mr. Lindsay whether the Government intended, in concert with the other European powers, to endeavor to bring about a cessation of hostilities in America, Lord Palmerston said that at present he thought there was nothing to be gained by intermeddling. Assurances have been given to the French Government that as soon as the Emperor Maximilian formally notified the European Powers of his having possession of the government Great Britain will recognize him as Emperor of Mexico. The discussion upon the alleged fraudulent enlistment of emigrants to America was continued, and Government was doing all in its power to obviate the evil. The emigration from Ireland had diminished since Government had warned the peasantry of the sufferings which awaited them in America.—Parliament adjourned on the 29th. The Queen's Speech stated that the formalities having all been arranged, the British protectorate over the Ionian Islands had ceased, and these islands had been united with the Kingdom of Greece. The revolt among some of the New Zealand tribes had not been suppressed. The distress arising from the want of cotton had abated. The condition of the revenue had been so favorable that considerable reductions had been made in taxes. The strictest neutrality would be observed between the belligerents in America.—Experiments on guns, shot, and armor are being zealously prosecuted. By the latest results a target of 6 inches of iron and 29½ inches of oak was penetrated by 220-pound steel bolts, and 4½ inches of iron was shown to be no protection against 100-pound steel shot. Shot of chilled cast iron of 100 pounds were sent clear through 4½ inches of solid iron, deep into the wooden backing. It was supposed that with heavier iron shot the backing would also have been penetrated. These chilled iron shot, after passing through the iron armor, break up into fragments of a few ounces, so that they combine the properties of steel shot and of the most explosive shells. These iron shot cost only one-twentieth as much as steel ones.—Three men have been tried, convicted, and fined £150 for procuring men to enlist on board the Confederate steamer Rappahannock.—Orders have been issued that no ships of war belonging to either of the belligerent powers in North America shall be allowed to enter any of the British ports for the purpose of being dismantled and sold.—From a telegram dated London, August 25, we learn that the United States frigate Niagara had captured the privateer Georgia twenty miles off Lisbon, had landed her captain and crew at Dover, and dispatched the vessel to New York. The Georgia at the time of her capture was sailing under the British flag.

The last scene in the Polish insurrection was enacted on the 5th of August by the execution of five of the most prominent leaders. These were Romuald Trangut, the recognized chief of the government; Raphael Krajewski, Joseph Toczyski, Roman Zulinski, and Johann Jeziranski, heads of different departments. Twenty-two men and four women had been sentenced to death by the military tribunals, but the Viceroy commuted the punishment of seventeen of the men and all of the women to banishment in Siberia for longer or shorter periods.

The Danish war has ended. The Danish King, by an agreement signed on the 1st of August, cedes to the King of Prussia and the Emperor of Austria all his rights to the Duchies of Schleswig-Holstein and Lauenburg. In order to simplify the boundary certain exchanges of territory are made, the lines to be settled by a definitive treaty of peace. Provision is made in this agreement for the debt of the kingdom; the Duchies to pay the war expenses of the Allied Powers. Denmark thus loses about one-third of her population.

Editor's Easy Chair.

THE Easy Chair presents its most humble compliments to its friends, and begs to repeat what it has said very often, that it is not its province to decide upon the acceptability of communications for the Magazine. They should be addressed simply to the Editor or to the Publishers, and they will receive the most courteous consideration. If sent to the Easy Chair it merely hands them over to Rhadamanthus Niemand, LL.D., the perfectly accomplished editor; and Dr. Niemand does not regard them with the least increase of favor because they come through the hands of the Easy Chair. Nor is any thing gained in the way of especial recommendation by intrusting them to the Easy Chair, for Dr. Niemand always puts it upon its honor—"Have you read this, and is it good?" is the terrible question of Dr. Niemand. And if the abashed Chair, hoping to save some doubtful, trembling candidate, hesitates in its reply, there comes the final inquiry, "If you were Editor would you accept it?"

Now the Easy Chair, being by nature, and it hopes in practice, an honest piece of furniture, and being thus specially put upon its honor, must answer truthfully, if it is in a position to answer at all: and in the great majority of cases it would be obliged to say, "Since you put the matter in that shape, Dr. Niemand, if I were in your place—which thank Heaven I am not—I should not accept the article." Whereupon the Doctor makes answer, "Since you have read the article, Mr. E. C., and do not think it available, I will decline it. Your unfavorable judgment decides the matter."

But suppose, on the other hand, the Easy Chair can conscientiously say, "I think I should accept this article," it only means that it thinks it among the best that have come into its arms. It can know nothing of the other hundreds that fill the pigeon-holes in the Editor's sanctum. He receives a score where the Chair receives one, and by the simple doctrine of chances it is probable that he has just twenty times as many good ones. Whether the two or three best will be found among the Chair's five or the Editor's hundred, the latter functionary must decide. Thus while the Chair's unfavorable opinion, supposing it given, is decisive against the acceptance of a MS., its favorable opinion is not at all practically decisive in favor of acceptance. The Easy Chair confides in the good nature of its friends, especially as they must see that their interest is not served by the application through it: for R. N. may very possibly accept a paper which E. C. would decline; but he can not accept any article because E. C. thinks it good. The Easy Chair can therefore best serve its friends by not reading the MSS. sent to it; so that when R. N. asks, "Have you read this MS., and would you accept it?" E. C. can answer, "I have not read it, and leave the whole matter to you."

Taking advantage, therefore, of the absence of Dr. Niemand, who is at present rustivating at the Elysian Fields, Hoboken, the Easy Chair ventures upon this loud whisper to its friends: Take or send your manuscripts quietly to the Editor or the Publishers, at their office, not at their houses.

Now that the sage of Brooklyn Heights has become the late and lamented, the weather, and especially his favorite "heated term," has been playing all manner of pranks. In truth, it has been gambling without reason. Seven continuous weeks of heated term without a friendly shower is an ardor more passionate than pleasant. A lurid sun burning in a brassy sky at morning, a mist as of perspiring brass during the day, and a brassy moon setting spectrally at evening are phenomena from which we should probably have been spared could we only have retained E. M., the genial monitor of the weather. But he is gone, and apparently all our clouds and calculations are gone with him. There were many curious-looking people to be seen strolling upon the Battery during the intolerable dryness of the mid-summer. Their eyes were fixed upon the Heights beyond the East River, and could their parched tongues and lips have articulated we should probably have heard them adjuring the weather-clerk to come again as the poet said Queen Guinevere came—

"In a sunlit fall of rain."

But E. M. has gone, and with him all the stability of the seasons.

Yet the great city seemed never so full as when it was hottest. Indeed, if Grant had only closed Nassau and Wall streets at both ends a dozen times in one day he might have filled his wasted ranks with ease, and the work have been accomplished. An indolent Easy Chair rolling along looked in vain for the grass that was to spring between the pavements. Indeed, no steed but Pegasus could be safely fed upon the hay cut this summer in Broadway between the Bowling Green and Union Square. Such streams of life coursing through the hot channels of the city and almost choking them! Such fierce eagerness; such doubt, hope, despair; such a motley crew—boys and girls, men and women, Don Quixote, Hamlet, Squire Western, Fagin, and Isaac of York, jostling, hurrying, muttering, scowling, smiling, grimacing, cursing—all elbowing on to make money, to lose it, stretching out to seize the prize, grinning, and dropping dead. "Dust we are: to dust we must return;" and in sad and ludicrous truth, all hurrying from the grave back again to our precious dust.

So the Easy Chair got upon wheels and rolled off into the Connecticut Valley. The serene pastoral scenery of this region has the kind of completeness and elegance that is always associated with the English landscape. The gentle winding river, the graceful hills, which are mountains by courtesy, the broad luxuriant meadows, the fertile fields, the drooping, generous, single trees and pretty clustering groves, the neat, thrifty villages, the universal luxuriant tranquillity, leave a soft picture in the memory and imagination of which they are never weary.

But the traveler of to-day presently observes an increasing crop in the peaceful valley, which the luckless Puritan farmers of Deerfield were not cultivating when the Indians came whooping down upon them from the hills. Nor did the traveler of twenty years ago observe it. It is a very neat crop, regularly planted and carefully tilled—the most useless and the most profitable crop, for its extent, in the valley. For it is that "good creature" tobacco. As we rumbled and whizzed through the teeming fields the meditative Easy Chair could not but reflect how man, the king, subordinates every thing to the indulgence of a whim, or a trivial or even pernicious habit. Smoking, at least, is a vice which has the full benefit of clergy; nor does the Easy Chair mean to deny the solace of Milton's pipe, or of the weed that Sir Walter Raleigh "drank." Whoever chooses to fight under that dreary old pedant James may do so, and blow out as many pipes as possible. But the interesting fact is, that, after all the moral and sanitary tornadoes that have burst upon the lazy fire that burns at the human mouth, it still burns on, and the most Puritan fields are gradually coming to pay tribute to it. There is unquestionably something pleasantly Catholic in the spectacle of a man seating himself comfortably and reading placidly through the fumes of his tobacco the last tremendous onslaught upon it in the Magazine or the medical journal. With what urbanity the smoker regards Poor Richard's statement that two cigars a day is seventy cents a week—or two dollars and eighty cents a month, which is thirty-six dollars and fifty cents a year; and that for thirty-six dollars and fifty cents a year innumerable and incalculable benefits might be conferred upon the human family—and you, dear Sir, you, with an immortal soul, saved from this beastly, filthy, nasty, disgusting habit, conducive to blindness, paralysis, epilepsy, catalepsy, bad breath, and an early grave. Certainly there never were such admirable and prolonged arguments that ended so absolutely in smoke.

Poor Richard and the moral censor might certainly hope and expect that the remorseless, hydrostatic pressure of the new tax-bills upon tobacco would reduce its use; but alas! it will be found probably merely to have stimulated the domestic growth, and to have changed the foreign supply. There are men still among us who remember when, in their golden youth, the best Havanas could be readily bought for twenty-five dollars a thousand, which, as Poor Richard will at once see, would have allowed two cigars daily and an extra one on Sundays. Such men must be pardoned for thinking that the world has changed for the worse. As the price has risen, however, the result has been not what P. R. would have wished, but the source of supply has been changed. Twenty years ago a cheroot was occasionally smoked by a China trader. It was not a very pleasant smoke; but within a few years the import and supply of Manilla cigars, to replace the Havanas, which the increasing price had rendered more inaccessible, has been enormous. And that the deleterious tobacco supply may not fail, the domestic production has been enormously increased.

It appears that from 1839 to 1849 the domestic tobacco crop decreased more than 19,000,000 pounds; but it increased from 199,752,655 pounds in 1849 to 429,390,771 in 1859; and during the last five years it has been greatly developed in the Northern States. In 1859 Ohio raised more than 25½ millions of pounds; while in the ten years ending with that year New York raised her production from 83,189 to 5,764,582 pounds. Exemplary Massachusetts raised hers from 138,246 to 3,233,198 pounds; and steady old Connecticut, which, despite her virtue, still connives at cakes and ale, swelled her growth from 1,267,624 to 6,000,133 pounds. "It would seem surprising," says Mr. Kennedy in his Preliminary Report on the Eighth Census, "that a crop which is said to impoverish the soil more than any other, and to injure to some extent every one who uses it, should be found so desirable as to increase 106 per cent. in ten years." With excellent gravity the worthy Superintendent then immediately repeats the fact as a solution of the surprise. "But such is the effect of a ready market with remunerative prices." To borrow his own words, it would still seem surprising that there should be a ready market for something that injures every buyer, unless perhaps we reflected that it benefits every seller. Which is probably as lucid a solution of the mystery as we are likely to reach.

Waiting at one of the stations in the valley, the Easy Chair contrived to get over a fence and accost an old man who was snapping off the stalks of the tobacco plant. Complacent patriarch of the poisonous crop, he spoke with the confidence of knowledge.

"Forty or fifty good loads to the acre," said he; "a little well-rotted manure or phosphate in the hill; and be sure to rotate."

The Easy Chair suggested that it had heard the crop might be pushed continuously upon a well-fed soil, like onions.

"I have tried it both ways," quoth the Patriarch, calmly snipping off heads. "Sow it well; choose the best plants; set 'em out carefully: these here were planted out about the 10th of June, and will be ready for cutting at the end of August. I am breaking the heads to let the leaves spread." In the West Indies all but four leaves are sometimes stripped off, when the cultivator is more bent upon quality than quantity.

"And how much will you get to the acre?"

"Wa'al, a ton is a great crop. Fourteen or fifteen or sixteen hundred pounds."

"The price is good now," insinuated the Easy Chair.

A benignant smile slowly overspread the countenance of the Patriarch, who continued to snip and beam, ejaculating that "tubbakker is about as pooty a crop as a man can raise."

"Do you smoke?" blandly inquired the Chair.

"No," replied the Patriarch, sobering, and with the air of a deacon who had been accused of profanity.

As the Easy Chair stumbled back again over the fence, it turned and watched the Patriarch, who somehow seemed to it to be Poor Richard himself. For although it is solemnly conscious of the Superintendent's truth that the pooty crop injures to some extent all who use it, yet Richard loves a penny, and proportionably two.

If you see buildings in the Connecticut Valley which are strange to you, you may be quite sure that they are sweat houses for the tobacco. It is a tradition that the crop impoverishes the soil. But such a tradition would hardly have arisen in a region where the soil was liberally fed and renewed. In the West Indies and our Southern States tobacco is thought to be the cause of so many desolate and abandoned fields. But the slave system of agriculture is always and every where the most expensive and exhaustive, whatever the crop may be.

HERE are some pleasant, thoughtful verses, which the poet calls "Autumn, from a New England point of view:"

Bearing the shining sickle in his hand,

And crowned with chaplets of the nodding wheat,
Autumn, the Reaper, stalks along the land,

With drifts of dead leaves blown about his feet.

The scarlet glories that enrobe the woods;

Witch voices haunting groves of ash and elm;

Inverted skies that float in silent floods;

Make the wide landscape an enchanted realm.

No more is heard the mower's ringing blade,
 No more the blackbird whistles in the sedge;
 No more the crimson-fingered village maid
 Seeks the wild fruitage of the berry hedge.

But from the hills the smiles of Summer die,
 And trailing vapors float in dismal shrouds;
 And swiftly through the blue fields of the sky
 The winds, like shepherds, drive the fleecy clouds.

Now comes the mellow Indian Summer time,
 When wold and woodland, stretching far and fair,
 In panoramic splendor lie sublime,
 And waver in the illuminated air!

November seems with golden June to join,
 And from the morning windows white-embost
 The Fairies of the warm west wind purloin
 The silver pictures of the artist, Frost!

As some sad lover, touched with soft regret,
 Pauses, remembering all his lady's charms,
 Then chides the weakness that can not forget,
 Then turns again to seek her happy arms,

So the weak Year, too foolish and too fond,
 Reverses his slow steps, and backward goes;
 Irresolute to break so sweet a bond,
 And leave unmiss'd the Summer's latest rose!

Caught by unequal gusts the vane on high
 From point to point perpetually swings;
 And like some giant fowl that strives to fly,
 The wind-mill flutters its enormous wings!

In orchards heaped with fruit the beggared trees
 Sigh hoarsely each to each with windy words,
 And toss their bare arms to the fitful breeze,
 Like frantic misers loth to lose their hoards!

The russet fields, resigning to the flail
 Their golden sheaves, are yet not all bereft,
 For here and there, drab-dress'd, the Quaker quail,
 Like gleanings Ruth, secures what man has left.

But more suspicious the marauding crow
 Still eyes the sentry-effigy askance,
 That guards its post through all the storms that blow,
 And spins and swings as in an elfin dance.

By lonely lakes and marshy-bottomed vales
 The water-fowl assemble night by night,
 Till all the covey, warned by colder gales,
 Trails to the south its long loquacious flight,

In countless tribes that blur the harvest moon,
 And make the heavens clamorous as they go;
 Haply if ere they reach some far lagoon
 No sportsman's tube shall lay their leader low.

For now the Pilgrim festival is near,
 When all the varied crop is safely stored,
 Honored Thanksgiving! to New England dear!
 When fowl, or wild or tame, controls the board.

Once more around the old familiar hearth
 The household draws, and tuneful voices ring;
 And annual games, well-worn and rustic mirth,
 Swell high the honors of the Harvest King.

Yet even while we pledge his jovial reign
 Our gayest songs are saddened in their tone;
 For a new ruler, with his boisterous train,
 Usurps the realm and climbs into the throne.

And all too soon the bounty-dropping star
 Dips toward the darkened verge and sinks below;
 While o'er the waste white Winter's clattering car
 Approaches swift, whirled in a cloud of snow!

TENNYSON did not act wisely in changing the title of his new volume from "Idyls of the Hearth" to "Enoch Arden;" for Enoch Arden is an idyl of the hearth, and Tennyson has virtually created that kind of simple, domestic poem of which, in his former volumes, "Dora," "Walking to the Mail,"

"The Gardener's Daughter," "Audley Court," "Edwin Morris," and "The Brook" are memorable and exquisite illustrations.

It is very pleasant to find this impression recorded in the Quarterly Review in 1842; twenty-two years ago, by that friend of Carlyle's whom he calls "the noble Sterling, a radiant child of the empyrean, clad in bright auroral hues in the memory of all that knew him;" and again, "the brilliant, beautiful, and cheerful John Sterling." His name can not be mentioned to one at all familiar with his life and his exquisite biography by Carlyle but the passionate pathos of his own lines musically sighs through the mind:

"Wail for Dedalus! all that is fairest!"

He wrote of Tennyson: "We have now reached that class of poems which stand first on our list, and which we have entitled idyls. We have reserved till now all special mention of them, as holding them the most valuable part of Mr. Tennyson's writings, a real addition to our literature. They have all more or less of the properly idyllic character, though in three or four of them marked with the rapid and suggestive style of the ballad. In all we find some warm feeling, most often love, a clear and faithful eye for visible nature, skillful art and completeness of construction, and a mould of verse which for smoothness and play of melody has seldom been equaled in the language. The heart-felt tenderness, the glow, the gracefulness, the strong sense, the lively painting in many of these compositions, drawn from the heart of our actual English life, set them far above the glittering marvels and musical phantasms of Mr. Tennyson's mythological romances, at first sight the most striking portions of his works. Among the happier specimens of this class two are pre-eminent—"The Gardener's Daughter" and "Dora." These are both of them idyls in the strictest sense of the term, and might rank with the eclogues of Theocritus and Virgil, and with some poems of Goethe, as anecdotes drawn from rustic life and rounded into song. As compared with the antique models we see in them all the gain that Christianity and civilization have brought to the relation of the sexes and to the characters of women."

This is just appreciation, and it is simply and truly expressed. Yet had Sterling lived to read the "Idyls of the King" he would have found the same human heart beating in those "mythological romances" as in "The Gardener's Daughter." At the time Sterling wrote he was confused by a theory that a poet of to-day should choose his subjects from the life of to-day. It is certainly well if he does; but it is not essential that he should, any more than it is a cardinal condition of a true American literature that it shall describe Niagara, the Prairies, or the Indians. It is the letter that killeth. The noblest, truest, and most Christian poem of this time is the Queen Guinevere of the "Idyls." But the scene and the persons are all shadowy and fabulous.

In the new "Idyls of the Hearth," as we hope the poet will yet call them, he touches a more solemn stop than in his previous domestic idyls. But the scope is still the same; it is to show the master springs of tragedy and romance in the homeliest or most familiar conditions of life. It is not without a start of surprise that the reader finds in these most dainty and elegant of verses the same kind of inspiration as in Wordsworth's "Idiot Boy," and "Goody Blake and Harry Gill." Yet in the one case the homeliness of the condition seems to affect the sentiment; while in the other the purity of the feeling refines every form under which it appears.

The fascinating fancy which Hawthorne elaborated under the title "Wakefield," of a man quietly withdrawing from his home and severing himself for many years from his family, yet stealing to the windows in the darkness to see wife and children, and the changes time works in his familiar circle, is reproduced in "Enoch Arden," except that the separation is involuntary, and the unbetrayed looking in upon the changes of years is not a mere psychological diversion but an act of the highest moral heroism. Indeed the tale is profoundly tragical, and like the last idyl of the King is a rare tribute to the master passion of the human heart. It is not the most subtle selfishness, whispers the poet; it is the perfection of self-denial. Xavier de Maistre says that the Fornarina loved her love more than her lover. Not so would Raphael's Madonna have loved. Not so loved Enoch Arden. There is no nobler tale of true love than his.

It is told with that consummate elegance in which Tennyson has no peer. The English language has a burnished beauty in his use of it which is marvelous. In his earlier verses it was too dainty, too conspicuously fastidious, and the words were chosen too much for themselves and their special suggestions and individual melody. But his mastery of them now is manly. It is as striking as Milton's, although entirely different. There are a Miltonic and a Tennysonian blank verse in English literature—is there any other? Could there be, viewed in every aspect, a more perfect piece of literary art, for instance, than the idyl called "The Brook," in the Maud volume? Hear how the bubbling, hastening melody of the stream, melts into the pensive stateliness of the poet's meditation:

"I steal by lawns and grassy plots,
I slide by hazel covers;
I move the sweet forget-me-nots
That grow for happy lovers.

"I slip, I slide, I gloom, I glance,
Among my skimming swallows:
I make the netted sunbeam dance
Against my sandy shallows.

"I murmur under moon and stars
In brambly wildernesses;
I linger by my shingly bars:
I loiter round my cresses;

"And out again I curve and flow,
To join the brimming river,
For men may come and men may go,
But I go on forever.

"Yes, men may come and go, and these are gone,
All gone. My dearest brother Edmund sleeps,
Not by the well-known stream and rustic spire,
But unfamiliar Arno, and the dome
Of Brunelleschi; sleeps in peace; and he,
Poor Philip, of all his lavish waste of words
Remains the lean P. W. on his tomb;
I scraped the lichen from it. Katie walks
By the long wash of Australasian seas
Far off, and holds her head to other stars,
And breathes in converse seasons. All are gone."

There is nothing so fine as this in the new volume, and undoubtedly "The Brook" is the perfection of Tennysonian art. But, on the other hand, there is a manly tragic hold of the heart and imagination in Enoch Arden which certainly indicates no decline of power, if also no new force and direction. The minor poems in the new volume are either poor for Tennyson, or merely curious. The "Experiments" in various metres are all failures as poems, and as experiments they are impertinent. We ask pictures of a painter, not the emptyings of his port-folio; nor do we go to a concert to hear Liszt or Thalberg practice the scales.

Yet this volume, with all the others of Tennyson, are an invaluable study to every literary aspirant and neophyte; for as his poems are the most striking illustrations of the fondness of the literary spirit of the age for the most gorgeous verbiage, so they are the most noble examples of a luxuriant tendency constantly restrained and tempered by the truest taste. He has gained severity and simplicity without losing richness, and force without losing fire. Literature is not the record of thought only—it is thought and the vehicle of thought. Gold is very precious; but gold carved by Benvenuto is priceless.

"A DISAPPOINTED MAN" pleads his case so pathetically that the Easy Chair is sure of gratifying its readers if it listens with them to the argument once more:

"DEAR EASY CHAIR,—Behold me once more at your elbow entreating audience. Many weeks ago I wrote you a letter or two about the sorrows of unappreciated men of letters, who go about, not seeking to devour any body, but somebody to devour—men whose souls and bodies depend in a great measure upon their success with editors. I say nothing of others dependent upon them. I have no pallet to paint, if I had the heart to conceive, the wretchedness, the absolute want of little children, and the tortures of the mothers, when the father's purse is empty and his heart is sad because he hath been turned away—no, not turned—denied admittance to the pages of some magazine or periodical.

"In the August number of your Magazine I have seen a letter from "A Hopeful Man," who has a word to say upon the same subject; and I doubt not but that there are many others, who never will say any thing with pen and ink, who feel grateful for these pleadings in their behalf.

"Be this as it may, I can not but feel, and I have not come to the conclusion rashly, that there is need of reform in this little matter of deciding upon literary contributions. Let me state one case which often occurs; it may illustrate briefly one phase of this vexatious question. We set out, be it remembered, with the supposition that an editor was, or should be, the judge of what was best for his readers, just as a physician knows what pills to give sick people. Now for my illustration: Bombastes edits a magazine, and it obtains a good circulation. It makes money for its proprietors and fame for its editor, when suddenly Bombastes disappears from the scene (dies, if you will, like the heavy father in the play), and another editor comes to wield the sceptre. The subscriptions increase amazingly; the whole land rings with the sagacity, the tact, the judgment, the discrimination of the new editor. How is this? Did not Bombastes suit the popular taste? Did he not select the first-fruits of genius? Ah no; he did the best he could, honest man, but his best was not the best for the proprietors, as the success of the new editor proves. Has the literary excellence of the age suddenly improved? Not at all. The times are contemporaneous, but what Bombastes threw away as quartz the new editor saw contained gold, and he worked his vein to profit.

"Take the list of contributors to any magazine. They are well known to the readers, and the contents of the magazine are simply a reflection of these several individuals; so that some periodicals might not improperly be called, 'Wit, Essays, Flatness, Poems, Turgidity, Romance, and Stupidity, by Brown, Jones, and Company.'

"Sometimes I almost think that rotation in office would be a good plan to put in force with editors. Bear in mind that I am one; but fortunately for my own peace of mind and conscience I am not obliged to sit in judgment upon any tales, poems, or what not, for these are not in the province of my journal. If rotation was proposed, I know very many who would second the motion with the hope of reform in the matter of decisions.

"Badinage aside, however, I admit freely that editors are conscientious, well-meaning men, but there are some abuses that need correction; and it is in the hope of exciting reflection that I have written these letters.

"I have seen one editor (who should have been more consistent because he rose from nothing himself) take up an article, just glance over it, turn page after page, take a birds-eye view of the contents, and in two minutes' time scratch off a line of rejection to the unlucky author, and then lay the MS. away.

"Now if I had not known the contents of the article he was reading I should have thought it was either so horribly written that he couldn't decipher it, or else that it was of the blood-and-thunder style, and plainly unsuitable for his purpose. It was neither. It was a beautiful fairy-tale; and the author feeling hurt at the summary manner in which he was treated took the article to another editor on the same paper and had it accepted at once. This is a fact.

"I might cite many similar instances, which go to prove that carelessness in an editorial room is almost a sin, certainly a moral delinquency, which the offender ought to suffer for—not the contributor.

"All this discussion about editors and their responsibilities has been confined solely to those who sit in judgment upon fiction, or works of sentiment and feeling. Of course in weightier matters of the law, in business life, finance, the laws of commerce, etc., etc., this extreme sensitiveness does not prevail, and if an article of this kind is declined the man of common sense does not feel grieved. He knows nothing of that other wound which is sharper than a serpent's fang. Suppose your little darling child went tottering forth upon the street, and a ruffian should smite him on the cheek—your grief, agony even, would be too deep for utterance, and that is just the feeling a disappointed contributor has.

"I am not so unreasonable or unpractical as to imagine or suppose for an instant that a literary man should never lose his labor. The merchant loses his goods, the mechanic his time. Shall we of the pen eat locusts and wild honey for all time? But a year of losses! an unprofitable season, a bad run of luck, tale after tale sent back, poems rejected, essays declined, when this occurs is a man to blame for being disappointed? I fancy not.

"I must not dilate any more upon this theme, although it is as attractive as a field in June. It is endless. I acknowledge that it is hard to draw the line. We can not all be successful, we can not all have crowns, at least not visible ones; but there may be crowns that the eye sees not which shall sit upon the brows of them who bear pain, mental anguish, and bodily suffering, caused by actual want without a murmur. There is 'no cross without a crown,' and the disappointed contributor has at least the consciousness of having tried to act well his part, and we know that there is where the honor lies.

"Fine grapes grow upon the outside of vines, and noble clusters sun themselves in places where the ravisher's hand soon comes and gathers them, bloom, leaf, tendril, and all. But part the snarled stems and look within the grapery, and you shall see great drooping globes that burst with fatness, in whose hearts the red wine glows and scintillates, and whose emerald pulps have more lusciousness than those which woo the passer so imperiously. The indolent or indifferent searcher never finds these 'hide-aways;' and they hang their appointed time, then drop to the earth, and Nature takes them to her heart once again. Is there not some analogy between the fruit and the unappreciated? We are out of the way; we are unseen of men; few hands come into our solitary hearts and pluck us out to gladden homes; we linger our appointed time, and are heard of no more. But even as the clusters do not grow and ripen in vain, so it may be that we, too, are tried in this way for a just and wise purpose. To some, riches and honor; to others, thistles and the back of the hand. We are not cumberers of the earth. According to our abilities we perform our parts; and the measure of our success, though it may not be what we desire, is perhaps all we have a right to expect. I know in making this admission I am overthrowing all my previous argument; but I prefer to be just and generous rather than to insist that my views are right, and those of every one else wrong.

"Dear Easy Chair, you have always had a tender word for the disappointed contributor. You have doubtless known full well yourself, in your old legs, the pangs of rejection, when some smarter upholstery or more sticky varnish has attracted a passer. Speak us kindly oftener; be genial with us as only you can be; and I am very certain that no matter how many times editors may 'decline us with thanks, and be happy to hear from us again,' we shall feel that in you we have an earnest advocate, a sympathizer, and a friend whose esteem is priceless.

"I am yours with respect,

"A DISAPPOINTED MAN."

Our friend states his case well and strongly; but he complains at bottom that man is fallible, and he urges a plea that is no more admissible in literary labor than in any other. So far as suffering is concerned, the case of the family of a day-laborer who can not get work is as pitiful as that of an author who can not sell his manuscript. It is not a hardship peculiar to authors, but to all men who live by labor. The Easy Chair forgets, and of course its readers have forgotten, whether it has told its correspondent of one of its friends who, having literary ability and aspiration, unfortunately found himself without a cent in his pocket. He could not even buy paper and ink to write, so he walked stoutly about the streets offering himself as a porter, an errand-boy, a Jack-of-all-work, until he happened into a publishing office, where a boy was wanted to write wrappers. "I am the boy," he said, and took hold at a dollar a week, writing wrappers. Character, cheerfulness, cleverness, and the best principle soon made their way, and the writer of wrappers is now in one of the most responsible editorial chairs.

Does not "A Disappointed Man" see that he urges a consideration which would be humiliating to manly pride when he speaks of the starvation of an author as an argument for more favorably considering his article? It is a reason for giving him money and food, but not for accepting his manuscript. Last month we were talking of the same general subject as connected with the criticism of pictures. But it does not seem to us a valid plea. If a painter brings a picture to our correspondent and says, "My children are starving," the Easy Chair is sure that its correspondent would instantly buy the picture. But certainly he would as readily give the money without the picture. His purchase of the picture is an act of charity; it is, in fact, alms-giving. Now surely there is no more celestial virtue than feeding the hungry and clothing the naked; but it is, with equal certainty, great folly to confuse this kind of charity with æsthetic criticism, as some of our friends are inclined to do. Essays, tales, poems, and pictures are not necessarily good because the author or artist may be starving or unhappy; and to obtrude personal misfortune is merely to confuse and destroy a just judgment. Yet if the editor succumbs to his private sympathy he very soon spoils the Magazine and involves its publishers.

Nothing is more common than for an editor to receive a letter in which his correspondent informs him that the inclosed tale is the work of a young woman who has no resource but her pen, who is in very infirm health, and knows not what to do or where to look if her manuscript is refused. Now what has the editor engaged to do? For the money which the buyers of the paper or magazine pay he has engaged to furnish literature that seems to him the best and most appropriate he can find. Has he any moral right to say to the subscribers—"This month I print, not what seems to me the best I can procure, but article No. 1, because the author has weak eyes; article No. 2, because the author has suddenly lost her father and has no means of livelihood; No. 3, because the author's older brother, who was the sole support of the family, has had a paralysis; No. 4, because the author has broken both legs; No. 5, because the author had no other means of sending his son to school for the winter; No. 6—? But at this point the reasonable subscriber may justly interfere with the declaration that he did not subscribe for a charity but for a magazine; and that, while hoping to be faithful to his humane duties, he prefers to select the objects of his relief for himself, and the magazine, therefore, will please to stop.

Does any honest man or woman wish to place a fellow man or woman in such a predicament as this? And yet this is exactly what is done by the extraneous information about personal circumstances. What would such a correspondent as we imagine think if, when she went to buy a loaf of bread, the baker should say, "Please buy this; it is made by a starving man;" and she should find it sour and unwholesome, and utterly unfit for her children? Would she not say, "I will give the starving baker of sour bread a penny, but I can not afford to buy his loaf?" When she returns and writes the letter to the editor, does she forget that her manuscript is merchandise, as the bread is, and that the editor may be willing, or may wish he were able, to send her some money, but can not honorably accept and print her story?

The instances and suppositions our friend "A Disappointed Man" mentions are interesting as showing how fallible men are. But did it need proof? There may be a hundred-fold better editor of this identical Magazine than Rhadamanthus Niemand, LL.D. But where is he? Who is to be the judge of his superiority? So, also, the poem which the Dr. declines with thanks, his coadjutor, Mr. Minos, may accept and applaud. Is any thing more proved than a difference of taste, of judgment? And if the opinion of Mr. Minos be found always coincident with the public taste, leading to a larger circulation of the magazine, while that of Dr. Niemand is always opposed to it, is it not pretty clear that the Dr. will be presently gently removed by the publishers who consult their interests?

HERE is a strain of the old, old song, delicately and sweetly breathed. M, who sends it, asks if it be poetry. It is at least poetic.

ROSEMARY.

Sometime, perchance, when this warm heart is cold,
These trembling fingers drop their treasures all,
And growing fairest from the crumbling mould,
The violets o'er me weave their azure pall;

When life has lost for thee its summer glow,
And in some idle hour old fancies stir
The embers of a flame which long ago
Love kindled for his willing worshiper;

You will recall the features, faded then,
Of one who loved you with such boundless faith
As made the after-dreams of careless men
A mockery of truth, its palest wraith.

Then, if too late repenting, you shall weave
Flowers of remembrance on my grave to cast,
My soul the offering shall with joy receive,
And cancel thence the shadows of the Past.

This little sonnet is in the same key:

FINIS.

That part of life is over, and I write
"Tis finished" on its sealed up pages fair;
Then looking upward through the solemn night,
Aflame with silver, drinking the calm air
More hopefully, I say, with quiet tears,
"The end is yet to be, when some green shore,
Hiding its wealth of summer bliss for me,
Shall bid my pilgrim footsteps rove no more,
And love, whose circle was unfinished here,
Glistens completed in a perfect sphere."

Has M. ever read the poems of Matthew Arnold? They have the same pensive, meditative strain. There is one of them, very little known, but in itself very beautiful, and a manly reply to the feeling of such verses as the preceding. The poem is called "Excuse," and here is part of it:

I, too, have suffered: yet I know
She is not cold, though she seems so:
She is not cold; she is not light;
But our ignoble souls lack might.

* * * * *

Yet, oh! that Fate would let her see
One of some worthier race than we—
One for whose sake she once might prove
How deeply she who scorns can love!

His eyes be like the starry lights;
His voice like sounds of summer nights;
In all his lovely mien let pierce
The magic of the universe.

And she to him will reach her hand,
And gazing in his eyes will stand,
And know her friend, and weep for glee,
And cry, "Long, long I've look'd for thee!"

Then will she weep:—with smiles, till then,
Coldly she mocks the sons of men;
Till then her lovely eyes maintain
Their gay, unwavering, deep disdain.

There is a heroic tone in these verses which is very unusual in modern poetry. The music, too, is subtle and exquisite; and if Matthew Arnold can not stand with the greatest of the subjective English poets, he is certainly among the first of the second class.

Editor's Drawer.

IN the Pennsylvania Legislature, two years ago, there was a member named Charlie Wilson, from one of the northern-tier counties, who considered himself among the great orators of the day, and, when pretty well filled with "Harrisburg water," would get off for the edification of his colleagues some very rich illustrations. Being somewhat interested in a bill before the House, he made what he considered one of his master-speeches, during the delivery of which he used the illustration of "Nero fiddling while Rome was burning." He had scarcely taken his seat when a member tapped him on the shoulder and said,

"Say, Charlie, it wasn't Nero that 'fiddled;' it was Cæsar. You should correct that before it goes on the record."

In an instant he was upon his feet, and exclaimed, "Mr. Speaker—Mr. Speaker—I made a mistake.

It wasn't Nero that 'fiddled' while Rome was burning; it was Julius Caesar!"

Happily for him, the Speaker was so busily engaged that he did not hear him; but some members near heard and enjoyed the joke. Afterward some one told him that he was right in the first place, which resulted in his reading all the ancient history in the State Library during the remainder of the winter, to assure himself as to who it was that "fiddled."

Now and then they have a little fun in Boston:

We have here a few of the first-class set of braggadocios with which nearly all extensive communities are blessed. At one of the private tableau parties given a short time since, there was present a sea-captain who always has something of more importance to relate than any thing that transpires during these slow times. There was to be a representation of the "Greek Slave," which he was very desirous to see, as he had seen the "original" at the World's Fair in London, and he would not on any account miss seeing the same here. When the curtain was raised, imagine his dismay at seeing a first-rate specimen of the Hibernian tribe, with pick-axe on shoulder, hat without rim, trowsers not reaching brogans, coat with one sleeve, waistcoat of fieriest red, plenty of buttons of the brightest, and all the implements of honest industry, ready for his task.

Imagine (as I said before) the effect of the truth vs. fiction brought before the seer of all sights, and the wholesome lesson brought home in so pleasing a manner, and you have a specimen of the style in which we members of the Serious Family enjoy our leisure moments.

THE author (?) of the two following says he sends them for us to use when our private "goak" machine is out of order:

In an inland town of New Hampshire lived, or rather staid, Amos P——, who to general shiftlessness added a strong attachment for hard cider and kindred stimulants and stupefiers. Amos, who was naturally pompous, displayed no little share of it in his cups, and the Academy boys had in consequence nicknamed him the "Superfalia," which title pleased him not a little.

On one occasion, when about two-thirds "over the bay," he reeled into the tavern stable, where a few days before a huge goat had been installed, an animal which Amos had never seen. As he staggered into the door-way the goat, taking his lurching movements as an invitation to hostilities, reared on his hind-legs defiant, menacing. At this moment Amos's eyes fell on the irate Capricorn. He stood for an instant with eyes distended; then sinking on his knees, and extending his hands in an attitude of supplication, in a voice hoarse with terror, he cried, "For Heaven's sake, Mr. Demon, give the Superfalia time to say his prayers!"

THE gun-boat to which I was attached on the Wilmington blockade had for second boatswain's-mate a comical little carrotty-haired Irishman, called Jerry, who would eat more scouse, chew more tobacco, and do more growling than any two men in the ship. Jerry had had no previous experience in his duties, having been rated to the position a day or two after he came aboard; and great was the merriment, fore and aft, at the dismal squeaks he elicited from his boatswain's-whistle, when ordered to call away a boat or pipe "all hands up anchor;" or, in the richest brogue, bawl out, "D'ye hear, there, forre an' aft, the meal-bag will lave to-morrow mornin', an' thur'll be an opporthunity to sind away letthers!"

Jerry, however, was good-natured, and generally bore all the fun at his expense without remonstrance; but on one occasion the laugh was so uproarious against him that, if possible, he would never permit any allusion to the cause of it.

Some men of his watch were at work down in the fore-hold breaking out provisions, when duty on deck required a few more hands. Jerry went to the fore-hatch and sung out,

"Forre-hould, there!"

"Hallo!" came up from the depths.

"How many of yez is there down there?"

"Three of us."

"Come up the half o' yez!"

DR. H—— is one of those genial souls who can tell a good story, and who loves a good joke, even though it is at his own expense. At one time he had employed an Irishman to cut some wood at his door; and it being a very cold day, he invited him into the house to warm him and to drink a glass of cider with him (the Doctor never takes any thing stronger than cider). After Pat had become sufficiently warmed, the Doctor turned him out a glass, which he drank off with great relish. "Pat," asked the Doctor, still holding the pitcher in his hand, "what is better on a cold day like this than a glass of good cider?" "Two of them, sure!" was the ready reply. Perhaps it is hardly necessary to add that Pat got his two glasses.

THIS reaches us from Rochester, New York:

In the town of W——, Oneida County, in this State, resides a wealthy but ignorant and eccentric farmer, named Wilcox. Mr. Billings, from the neighboring city of Utica, called to see him one day on business, and was invited to stay to dinner. The substantial portion of the meal having been discussed, a piece of pie was placed before each person at the table. Taking his fork in hand, Mr. B. essayed to eat according to etiquette, but his proceedings soon attracted the attention of the host, who was industriously shoveling up the contents of his own plate with a knife.

"Mary!" shouted the hospitable farmer, "why don't you bring Mr. Billings a knife? Here he is a pokin' away, a tryin' to eat his pie with a fork!"

ON another occasion he was invited out to dine at the house of one of the "Upper Ten." When the dessert was served a dish of ice-cream was placed before the Representative from "Duress." It was a new dish to him. He tasted it, then beckoned to the waiter, and said to him, audibly,

"That is very good pudding, but did you know it is froze?"

THIS comes from Nova Scotia:

There lived in one of the settlements of this Province an enterprising individual who kept store and supplied the natives with groceries and very poor rum. It was his standing principle, which he took good care to put into practice, that the more water he put in his rum it was the better for himself and the health of his customers. After acquiring a snug fortune, besides a good farm which came into his possession by the dissipation of its owner, he suddenly became convinced that rum selling was a bad business, and rum drinking a bad vice. He therefore sold out and retired to his fine farm, to live on the income of his lawfully-acquired fortune. The former owner of the farm became in a short time a miserable sot. He finally fell seriously ill, and in want of the necessities of life. The ex-liquor-seller, on hearing of his doleful condition, went to see him, and supplied his wants and comforted him the best he could. Among the things he said to him, was that he was very sorry he had ever had any thing to do with bringing him to his present condition by selling him rum. The sick man, in reply, said, "You have not the least occasion in the world to be sorry for all the rum you sold me, but you have reason to be sorry that more than half you gave me for the farm was paid in water. That was cheating. Good liquor is as good as gold; but you gave rain-water for rum, and I don't wonder you feel bad about it."

THIS comes from Ohio:

We had, last winter, as a man-of-all-work, a youthful "American citizen of African descent," named Tom. Tom is something of a genius, in his peculiar way, and though "not very hefty on work," as he expresses it, yet is "some" on witty sayings. Tom prides himself on the purity of his blood. "No mean, mangy wite blood 'bout dis yer chile," Tom is wont to say.

On one occasion Mrs. P——, "the lady of the house," found Tom in the kitchen giving way to a series of b'hoos, accompanied by a copious flood of tears.

"Why, Tom, what is the matter with you?" asked the kind-hearted lady.

To whom Tom replied: "Dey sez my brodder—b'hoo!—hab ben and gone and mar'd a wite woman—b'hoo!"

"I should think you would be glad of it, Tom," rejoined she.

"Wy, missis, I feel jes bad 'bout my brodder marr'in' a wite gal as you'd feel 'f you brodder 'd mar'd a culled lady."

DEAR DRAWER,—Most of your readers in Philadelphia are acquainted with Mr. Moon, the undertaker. The Rev. Dr. D—— relates the following concerning him:

Some time ago, while attending a funeral together, they were passing afoot, at the head of the procession, through one of the avenues of Woodland Cemetery, into which a pig, of tender age and infantile proportions, had accidentally strayed. Observing this, Mr. Moon was evidently ill at ease, as he was anxious that nothing should mar the solemnity of the occasion. With a majestic wave of his hand, and in a tone of the most earnest seriousness, he exclaimed, "Little pig! little pig! get out of the way! Out of the way, little pig! there's a funeral a-comin'!" Such an appeal to the better feelings of the animal had its due effect, and the young porker, with a single melancholy grunt, beat a retreat.

DURING the last winter a "contraband" came into the Federal lines in North Carolina, and was marched up to the officer of the day to give an account of himself, whereupon the following colloquy ensued:

"What's your name?"

"My name's Sam."

"Sam what?"

"No, Sah; not Sam Watt. I'se jist Sam."

"What's your other name?"

"I hasn't got no oder name, Sah. I'se Sam—dat's all."

"What's your master's name?"

"I'se got no massa now; massa runned away—yah! yah! I'se free nigger now."

"Well, what's your father's and mother's name?"

"I'se got none, Sah—neber had none. I'se jist Sam—ain't nobody else."

"Haven't you any brothers and sisters?"

"No, Sah! neber had none. No brudder, no sister, no fader, no mudder, no massa—nothin' but Sam. When you see Sam you see all dere is of us."

THE following (from one of our theological seminaries), though it has its risible side, is really a fine illustration of the tough old Yankee faith in the spirituality of the final resurrection:

A certain deacon in Connecticut was on his death-bed. He had been a man of great influence in the town where he had lived for half a century. But he was a man of unusual modesty in his estimate of himself and his social position. One form of this lowliness developed itself in an unyielding antipathy to ostentation at his funeral, and in the monument which should be erected over his grave. He gave minute directions on the subject, and, among other things, charged his family to see to it that his grave-stone should be of the simplest sort, with no descriptive record of him, and not larger in size than the small stones which had been erected at the graves of three of his nephews who had died in childhood. His friends demurred at this, and reminded him of the incongruity of such a stone for an adult and a man of his position in society. The old man was immovable by any such arguments. His daughter then tried him with a more utilitarian reason, and said, "Father, such a small stone will be likely to be broken down in a few years. The name must be in very small letters, and will be covered over soon with moss, so that nobody will know whose it is." The old saint shook his head with a grim smile of triumph, and replied, "Well, at the Day of Judgment, if Gabriel can't find me without a big stone to tell him where I am he may jist pass on."

HERE is something for the Drawer from Burlington, Iowa:

The Clerk in our post-office heard a tap at the window of the Ladies' Department, when who should he find there but a man by the name of Drake.

"Mr. Drake," said our Clerk, "will you please go to the other side; this department is for the ducks."

CHILDREN will ask queer questions, even in Sunday-school. A teacher says:

I have a class in Sabbath-school. One of the children, a bright little girl about six years of age, I noticed one day looking very intently at another of the teachers, a gentleman with a heavy mustache. After a long and earnest look, she turned to me with,

"Teacher, teacher! has that man got a hair-lip?"

OUR little Charlie, six years of age, affects courage that is really quite admirable while the enemy is remote. His bravery was severely tested during a violent thunder-storm last summer, when, shaking with fear, he buried his head in my lap. A terrible peal burst almost over us, and then paused an instant, as if to gather volume and violence.

In that pause the little head from my lap was uplifted; triumph shone in the flashing black eyes as, with the voice of a conqueror, he shouted,

"That's good! the old Thunder's got hitched!"

A CANADIAN Bishop, well known for his broad Scotch accent as well as his belief that it was not perceptible, was called upon by a brother Scot one day, whom he had not seen for several years. Among other questions asked of him by the Bishop was, "How long have you been in Canada?" "About sax years," was the reply. "Hoot, mon," says the Bishop, "why hae ye na lost your accent, like mysel!"

A CORRESPONDENT in Idaho Territory sends these characteristic stories of the West:

Any one who has visited this section knows the old guide and trapper, James Bridger. He has spent nearly fifty years of his life among the mountains and prairies, and is more at home there than in crowded cities. Some time since he had occasion to visit St. Louis, and becoming by accident separated from his companions he was soon completely bewildered; as he was wholly unacquainted with the names of streets and other localities he was unable to make intelligible inquiries as to the directions, and thought best to wait patiently for something to turn up. "So," he said, "after trying for a long time to find my way out of the cañon, I sat down on a stone, hungry as a wolf. There was plenty to eat in all the ranches, but not a soul asked me to take a bite, and I came near starving before I got out. To the deuce with such people! An 'Injun' is a beast, but he'll share his buffalo meat and stewed dog with you; and I'd a heap rather be among the red skins than with white folks the like o' them I saw in that cañon at St. Louis!"

At one time the Major (for that is Bridger's title, recognized by all who know him), while in charge of his trading-post at Fort Bridger, found the time rather heavy on his hands, and cast about for some source of amusement. He found a German of his party who possessed the rare accomplishment of being able to read intelligibly. He immediately hired the man for thirty dollars per month to read for him. By accident he soon after found a copy of Shakspeare, for which he exchanged a yoke of oxen. The reading commenced, and the old trapper was greatly entertained by the wit and wisdom of the bard. In its order, Richard III. was taken up. As usual, Bridger was listening intently to the colloquies, and considering the incidents of the drama, when they came to the scene of the interview between Richard and Buckingham, at which the former divulges his cruel purpose to murder the infant princes. When Richard openly avows his plot, "Who says that?" inquired the Major. "Richard," answered the reader. "Then hold up! stop reading! stop the whole outfit! Hang a man that would kill babies!" and the old man, pacing the floor overcome with indignation, thrust the book aside, and vowed he'd have no more to do with "such beasts!"

THIS comes from Natchez:

Mr. S——, of Concordia Parish, sent over to Natchez, to Mr. P——, for a good Spanish Jack. Mr. P—— sent the Jack, and also a note, in which he intended to say that he was a No. 1 judge of a jackass, and hence Mr. S—— might be assured that the animal was a good one. But here's what he did say: "Mr. S——, I send you by the colored boy Pompey a good Spanish Jack. I did not leave the selection to an agent, but attended to the matter personally; and as I am a No. 1 jackass, you need have no fears about the animal!"

A FRIENDLY druggist in St. Louis writes:

The Rev. George B—— was an itinerant minister of the Methodist persuasion, and although in the pulpit he was sufficiently grave, and most seriously in earnest in urging the great truths of his high calling, out of it he was full of wit, mirth, and good-fellowship. He was also addicted to hospitality and good cheer; and having abundant means of his own, was not particular in confining his expenses within the narrow limits of his salary. For two years he was stationed at Alton, Illinois, and it was not long before his expensive habits began to give offense to many of his flock, who thought him rather extravagant for a Methodist preacher. Private remonstrances availing nothing, a church meeting was called with as little effect. He told them he would take no more of their money, and that they certainly could not deny him the right to spend his own as he chose. At this time there was no carding-machine in the neighborhood, and happening to find one for sale in a distant town he bought it, and set it in operation in Alton. Shortly afterward a jocular friend meeting him on the street, bantered him upon having fleeced his flock to such an extent as to compel him to start a carding-machine. "Oh," replied he, "if I depended on my flock for fleece, a small pair of hand-cards would be all that I should need!"

I HAVE heard him relate many curious incidents that came under his notice during his itinerancy in the Western wilds. The following I have never seen in print: Once at a camp meeting the preacher was much annoyed by many of his brethren going to sleep—a thing very liable to happen after services having been kept up to a late hour for several nights. While he was reproving some of the sleepers for the second or third time, a half-tipsy man came forward with a handkerchief of apples hanging on his arm, and taking one out made a centre shot on the bald head of a venerable old brother who was dozing in an adjacent seat, at the same time saying to the preacher, "You just go on with your preaching; I'll keep 'em awake!" It is scarcely necessary to say that there was no farther trouble with the sleepers during that sermon.

As druggists seldom appear in the Drawer, perhaps the following may be welcome:

At a drug-store in St. Louis, where whilom I officiated as prescriptionist, an order was brought in by Frank, Dr. L——'s negro servant, for two bottles of citrate of magnesia. This article, to be good, requires to be freshly made, and put up in strong bottles like soda-water, with the corks secured in like manner. It pops and effervesces beautifully when the cork is cut loose, and has a most refreshing taste, but it won't do for a steady drink. It has consequences. Frank waited while I prepared the medicine, which was for the Doctor's own daughter, and when he received it started off with one bottle in each of his coat-tail pockets. Either the agitation caused by the swing of Frank's coat-tail created an unusual pressure, or I had miscalculated the strength of the twine with which I tied in the corks, for before he got outside the door each bottle went off with a report like a musket. Frank jumped as though he had been shot, and turning around toward me, with his eyes dilated like saucers, exclaimed, "My Lard! massa—suppose Miss Eliza had done took dat!" He evidently had but little doubt that she would have been blown into fragments.

DR. JOHN BROWN has just published a little sketch entitled "Jeems the Door-keeper." Jeems, it appears, was door-keeper at the United Presbyterian Church in Broughton Place, Edinburgh, in the days when Dr. Brown's father was minister there, and numerous good sayings of Jeems's are still remembered in the Doctor's family. On one occasion, after a charity sermon, one of the congregation, by accident, put a crown piece into the plate instead of a penny, and, starting back at its white and precious face, asked to have it back, and was answered, "In once, in forever." "A weel, a weel," grunted the unwilling giver, "I'll get credit for it in heaven." "Na, na," said Jeems, "ye'll get credit only for the penny!"

A LADY at Mount Carroll, Illinois, writes to the Drawer:

In spring time it is customary on our prairies to set fire to the straw piles that have been left over from winter. The grass having come they are no longer needed, and the ground must be cleared for plowing. Of a pleasant evening they have a fine effect, dotting the distant horizon like immense camp-fires. The children were looking out of an open window up stairs the other evening when one of these was pointed out. Our three-years-old Annie looked musingly at it for a minute with her great blue eyes, and then exclaimed: "Oh, that's where they're making the sun!"

In New Orleans we have a friend who says:

A Lieutenant in our regiment, a tall, handsome, quiet fellow, speaking of one of the men who had been dishonorably discharged for theft, unblushingly stated that "Private Jones had been examined by a medical board and discharged, having been found so light-fingered that he couldn't pull the trigger."

Again, when on detached service at New Orleans, he said: "At the St. Charles they led me up from story to story, and finally gave me a room so high that they were obliged to leave me a waiter accustomed to the distance to look out of the window for me."

In copying and comparing the laws passed by the last Legislature of Colorado Territory we find the following section in the act regulating marriages. It is too good to be lost:

"Sec. 11. All fines and penalties occurring under the provisions of this act shall be paid into the county treasury, for the use of common schools in which the offense was committed."

THIS is capital from Chattanooga:

In the Fourteenth United States Colored Troops there are quite a number of young officers, members of different churches, who have been accustomed to hold Sabbath evening religious exercises. On last Sunday the Colonel of the regiment was absent, but his quarters were occupied by an acting adjutant and the correspondent of the Cincinnati C—, who are members of the Colonel's mess. The correspondent, I must state, was just recovering from an attack of fever. During the day a friend of the Adjutant arrived from Nashville, and the conversation turned upon a trip to Lookout, but the difficulty was in obtaining horses. The visitor expressed his willingness to ride on a mule; but the Adjutant would not listen to the proposition, and endeavored to prevail upon Mr. D—, the correspondent, to give the visitor his horse and ride the mule. He declined, and the trip was abandoned. At night the Colonel's large quarters, in which the correspondent lay sleeping, was selected for religious exercises. The company of worshipers assembled, and the exercises commenced and progressed without interruption to the sleeping gentleman of the press, whose slumber was broken only by incoherent mutterings. At last, as one of the party was reading the hymn found in the army edition published by the Christian Commission, entitled "Is it I?" the closing line in each verse of which is "Come, let us go," these last words caught the ear of the slumberer, and throwing up his hands he exclaimed: "Going at last, gents? I'll ride the mule!" He was on his feet before he comprehended the situation, made the best of it, and was a listener until the close of the exercises.

HERE is a neat one from the mother of Annie Curtis:

All the bright little ones are not outside of bright "Little Rhody." We have an Annie, two years and nine months old. While holding a colloquy with her a few days since, her mother said, "You're mistaken, Annie." "No, I'm not Mith Taken; I'm Mith Turtith!" was her quick rejoinder.

A CORRESPONDENT in Minnesota writes to the Drawer:

I have a couple of "fax" which occurred in my own practice that, in my opinion, are worth printing, and here they are.

In 1857 the Statutes of California authorized the infliction upon the "Greaser" (native) population, for petty offenses "against the peace and dignity of the State," any number of lashes upon the bare back not exceeding forty.

We had just elected a "Pike" (as we called all Missourians) Justice of the Peace in our town, and he had "qualified according to law," when a complaint was made before him that a certain Greaser had violated the laws of the State by committing the crime of larceny to the amount of seven dollars. The complaint was made on Sunday; the warrant was issued, and defendant arrested, and asked to plead guilty or not guilty the same day. At this stage of the proceedings I was called upon, by friends of the defendant, to conduct the defense; and upon repairing to the court-room found the "Court" about to adjourn until the next day. Being somewhat prejudiced against the whipping law, and having often heard the person then acting as Court express the opinion that no other punishment ought to be inflicted upon "Greasers or Niggers," it occurred to me that I might elude the vengeance of the Court and the barbarism of the law by a little "strategy." Knowing that any sentence the Justice might give on Sunday would be void, my tactics were to wheedle the Court into a trial upon that day—instanter. Accordingly I read to the Court the statute providing that in "all criminal cases the accused shall be entitled to a speedy trial," etc., and construed the word "all" to mean especially cases occurring on Sunday, as in no other imaginable case would that word be necessary.

This was not very brilliant, I admit, but the Court so understood it; and so the trial was had, the defendant found guilty, and sentenced to receive thirty-nine lashes on the bare back, as I had anticipated. Then I arose and moved for an arrest of judgment and new trial (which was then allowed in Justice's courts in that State), upon the ground that the judgment was null, being rendered on Sunday; and in support of the motion read another statute which provided that no public officer should transact any business on the Sabbath, and I threatened to procure a writ of habeas corpus next day from the District Judge unless my motion was sustained.

The ire of the Court was huge. Turning with wrathful visage upon my client and myself, he thundered forth, "So, Mr. R——, you have turned pettifogger; I thought you was a lawyer, and am sorry that I was deceived. But, Sir"—and here he was specially emphatic—"but, Sir, I will have you to know, now and forever, that these infernal thieving Greasers can't escape justice in this court by any such trick! Mr. Constable, you will see the sentence of the Court executed upon the prisoner forthwith!" The Constable demurred, on account of the law. "Very well," said the Court, "I will do it myself." And he did; and probably the lashes were none the lighter on account of my strategy.

After the "thing was did" the Justice called at my residence to "inform me that I might better postpone my habeas corpus until the Greaser's back was well." It is needless to say that I concurred.

THE other "circumstance" occurred in this State, in the District Court for the —th District:

The action was a replevin of a cow, and was tried by a jury, who, after consultation, returned into court, and the Foreman handed up to the Judge this verdict: "We, the jury, find the cow in the plaintiff!"

Without reading the verdict aloud, the Court remarked that "the finding was intelligible, perhaps, but somewhat informal; and asked the Foreman if the verdict was intended to be in favor of the plaintiff?"

The jury, one and all, responded that such was the intention.

"Very well," said the Court; "Mr. Clerk, you may enter a verdict upon the record in proper form, and read it to the jury," at the same time passing the verdict as returned to the Clerk.

The Clerk looked at the verdict, and then whispered to the Judge. After consulting a moment the Clerk resumed his pen and recorded the verdict, and read it to the jury as follows:

"Gentlemen of the jury, hearken and answer. Is this your verdict as the Court has recorded it: In the case of A vs. B, you say that you find the plaintiff in the cow?"

"No, no, Mr. Clerk, that will not do!" interrupted the Court. And again there was a whispered consultation between the two officials; after which the Clerk again resumed his pen, and presently read to the jury as follows:

"Gentlemen of the jury," etc. "In the case of A vs. B, you say that you find the property of the plaintiff in the cow—and so you all say."

"No, no, Mr. Clerk; you misunderstand the direction of the Court," said the Judge. And amidst the "audible smiles" of the spectators and the loud laughter of the crowd outside, the Court and Clerk again consulted. And being sure he was right this time, the Clerk again wrote and read:

"Gentlemen of the jury," etc. "In the case of A vs. B, you say you find the property of the cow in the plaintiff, and so—" But human nature could stand no more! A storm of "applause," in the shape of laughter, shook the court-room, utterly defying the sheriff and deputies, who in vain shouted "Order! order!" in stentorian tones. Pending the hubbub the Court wrote out the verdict properly, and it was duly recorded, and the plaintiff finally got his verdict and his cow.

THE celebrated Thomas F. Marshall being in the bar-room of the Capitol Hotel, at Frankfort, one night, got into an altercation with a young man named William Sneed. Young Sneed, in great excitement, jerked out a pistol, and throwing it upon the counter seized a glass tumbler, saying, "Now, Mr. Marshall, take that pistol, Sir, and I will take this tumbler and fight you, Sir!" Captain Marshall, with one of his peculiar leers, replied to this challenge: "Ah! Billy, I am too smart for you; you can't fool me! We know that you are more expert with the glass than you are with the pistol!"

"AWAY down East" is a town called St. George. In this town lived a man by name of Andrew Jobson. Andrew's reputation was not so good but that it might have been better. Once upon a time he went to Thomaston in his fishing-boat to sell some fish, and was espied by the sheriff. Andrew, seeing the sheriff come on board his boat, supposed him to be a customer for fish, and answered his question with all the confidence imaginable.

"I believe your name is Andrew Jobson," said the sheriff.

"Yes," said Andrew, "my name is Andrew Jobson, the world over, and I don't care who knows it."

"Then," said the sheriff, "you are my prisoner."

"Ah, but stop a moment," said Andrew; "not quite so fast; you have made a slight mistake in your man. It's my brother Ben whose name is Andrew."

JOE FOGLER and Michael Waterbutt were two worthy citizens of St. George. They were not overburdened with that goaheadativeness that characterized the majority of their neighbors; and they were often made butts of, for the wags of St. George to shoot their wit at. On one "town-meeting day," when business dragged slowly along, the young folks, to amuse themselves, nominated Joe and Mike—one for Superintendent of Schools, and the other Inspector of Weights and Measures. It was put to vote and they were elected. Contrary to every one's expectations, they did not "resign the honors," etc. Joe was very ignorant, and all the school-teachers had to be examined by him before they could be qualified to teach in St. George. One day a confident young damsel came to him to be examined as a teacher. Joe gave her a chapter in the Bible to read. She did very well till she came to Nebuchadnezzar.

"That's not right," said Joe.

"What's not right?" said the would-be school-marm.

"That's called Nebox-your-nozer," said Joe; and because she could not see it he would not give her a certificate.

Joe went by the name of "Neboxyournozer" ever after.

MIKE, on his election to the office of Inspector of Weights and Measures, called the next day on the town-officers for the standard weights and measures. They said they had none. He told them he should give them short notice to have them, or he should enter complaints against the town. He went all through the town, and no battered pot or ancient scales would do. They must have new ones. On one of his official visits he was asked to dinner. Mike looked at the table, plentifully decorated with corned beef and cabbage, and coolly told them that "when he was on town business he expected something better for dinner than corned beef and cabbage." At home he never had any thing better than salted porgies. The joke of making Mike Inspector of Weights and Measures cost the town something over $100.

JOHNNY, a youngster of some eleven years, was one day discussing probabilities with his little brother, a six-year-old. "When I am grown up," said Johnny, "I shall be married, and my children will call you 'Uncle Seneca.' And you'll say, 'Come here, my dear, and see what Uncle Seneca's got for you.'"

"Humph!" ejaculates the little one, "I guess I shall have all I can do to take care of my own young ones!"

I SEE in the Magazine for July, says a Wisconsin gentleman, a pretty good anecdote about Colonel B——, late of the Eighteenth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, but I can tell you a better one.

The Colonel, withal, is a lawyer and a politician, and, like many lawyers, writes a very poor hand, so that it is almost impossible for a person not acquainted with it to read it. Once upon a time he wrote to a political chum at Appleton, in which some important plans for an approaching campaign were divulged; but our Appleton friend was unable to read the letter. Finally, after showing it around to all the leading personages of the place, and getting all the aid he could, he was enabled to make out all the letter but one line at the bottom. A few days after receiving the Colonel's letter he was visited by the Colonel at Appleton, and after exchanging the usual salutations, and while surrounded by a bevy of acquaintances, the Appleton friend remarked to the Colonel that he had received the letter, and with the aid of the good folks of Appleton he could read it all but the last line; and producing the letter, remarked to the Colonel that none of them could make out that. "Why," says the Colonel, "that is 'Strictly confidential.'" The Appleton chum stood treat.

A FRIEND in Grovesend, Canada West, writes to the Drawer:

I was engaged in sheep-shearing, an operation which my little nephew, four years old, observed with a great deal of attentive anxiety. At length he eagerly asked:

"Uncle, when I get to be a big man can't I peel sheep too?"

A VERMONTIER sends the two following:

Jack N—— found a "bee tree" in the woods on the York State shore of the Champlain, and making his discovery known to a couple of his friends they loaded their scow with pails to hold the honey, and put across the lake to secure the prize as quickly as possible. But when, after an hour's chopping, they got the tree down, the bees turned out to be the biggest and savagest of hornets, and stung the disturbers of their peace most unmercifully. The bee-hunters beat a hasty retreat, and reached home in a badly-swelled and sorrowful condition. They tried to keep secret the result of their raid into the "enemy's country;" but it leaked out, and one of Jack's neighbors called to quiz him a bit.

"Well, Jack," said he, "did you get much honey?"

"Wa'al, no," Jack answered, rubbing open one of his swelled peepers to get a squint at his inquiring friend, "we didn't git much honey, but we broke up their gol-fired haunt!"

OLD North was helping us in haying, and one day when I was turning the stone for him to grind his scythe we were talking of a neighbor who had been bedridden for years.

"What's the matter ails him?" North asked.

I told him that he had lost the use of his legs, suffered but little pain, and went on to describe his case as well as I could, adding that I believed the doctors were unable to name his disease.

"Well," said North, with a prodigiously wise, self-satisfied air, "I can tell ye what 'tis: he's got dyspepsy in the legs! That's what's the matter."

THE humors of the war come in. An officer in Georgia writes:

One night General —— was out on the line, and observed a light on the mountain opposite. Thinking it was a signal-light of the enemy, he remarked to his artillery officer that a hole could easily be put through it. Whereupon the officer, turning to the corporal in charge of the gun, said:

"Corporal, do you see that light?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Put a hole through it," ordered the captain.

The corporal sighted the gun, and when all was ready he looked up and said:

"Captain, that's the moon."

"Don't care for that," was the captain's ready response; "put a hole through it any how."

HERE is an incident in the career of a Kentucky Colonel of Cavalry which is worthy of mention:

During General Buell's campaign after Bragg, through Kentucky, in the fall of 1862, Colonel T——'s regiment of cavalry was in advance, and being ordered by Major-General Thomas to mount and move forward, he gave the following original command: "Prepare to get on your critters—GIT!" It is needless to say the regiment "got" incontinently.

AND this, from the sea, is fresh:

Captain H——t, for some time in command of the ——, was a little green when he first entered the service. When he took command he, of course, gave the vessel a thorough inspection, examining every thing with the air of one that knew his business. Arriving at last at the magazine, the gunner's mate was showing him the different kinds of ammunition, and, among other things, pointed out the "canister" to him. "How is this?" says he. "I gave the Paymaster three or four lockers for his provisions, and I shall not allow him to put his canned meat in my magazine!" At another time, during an engagement, he ordered the "canister" to be cut to two seconds. Having recently resigned, I suppose he will now make "canister" an especial study.

FROM Nashville we have the following:

At the Provost Marshal's office of the good city of Nashville you enter by one door and make your exit by another. The crowd at the first is often intense, and the press to get next to it, so as to enter with the five or six that are admitted at a time, frequently so energetic that the guard has to charge bayonets to keep from being overwhelmed by the eager applicants. Some time since your correspondent was in just such a crowd, and the enthusiasm to enter becoming rather wild, the guard made a vigorous charge and cleared a considerable space in front of the door. One of the foremost, made thus suddenly to change his base, had a bottle of the "creeter" broken in the pocket of his coat-tail, and it flowed in all its potent fragrance on the floor. "Well," said an old veteran near, "I've seen a good many different sort of presses, but I never seed whisky pressed out of a fellow in that fashion afore!"

ONE of our neighboring stations was occupied a short time since by a colored garrison with a colored Provost Marshal. Not a man in it, from Marshal down, could read or write. Passes were procured by the applicant's writing it out to suit his wishes, and taking it to the "officer commanding," who would then affix his mark at the foot of the right-hand corner. An acquaintance related to me his experience. Having written his pass, and had it properly "countersigned," he comes to dignified Africanus on picket duty. Picket takes the pass upside down, looks at it carefully, and turning to our friend says, "Sar, dis pass won't do. Dat mark ought to should have been on dat corner!" It took some time to convince him that it was properly made, but after conning it over a second time after it was handed him right side up, he agreed to "let dat man pass."

THE humors of the Navy come out in such jokes as these:

Our excellent gun-boat, the We-no-shepokes-slow, had been out of port quite an extended period. Our mess was the owner of some butter, which, following rules and regulations naval, outranked by seniority all other butter that came upon the ship. While admitting its abstract right to do so, we nevertheless voted that it had clearly no right to outrank us to the extent that it did; and consequently various curious chemical processes were detailed, each of which was equal to the task of deceiving us into the belief that the new product would "taste like butter just from the churn." Our caterer, being a man of extensive family experience, had the ear of the mess, and boldly asserted that first washing in diluted chlorid of lime, followed by a cleansing bath of pure water, was an infallible cure. But where should we get the chlorid aforesaid? The doctor was appealed to, who had no chlorid of lime, but had what was just as good—chlorid potassium.

Caterer was not posted on chlorid potassium, but considering the authority good, gave our steward instructions how to manipulate the strong. At dinner-time he brought upon the table two plates in appearance of yellow butter, in reality of beautiful soap.

The imperturbable Ensign H— got the first mouthful, but with a slight grimace swallowed his disgust and the soap. With an anathema on that hollow tooth he passed the dish to our fastidious paymaster with eloquent laudations. Paymaster took the bait unsuspectingly, but without making a sign was taken sea-sick, and "rushed frantically" to the side.

When all that could be were sold and marked, the joke was saddled upon the Doctor and caterer, each of whom accuses the other of immense chemical ignorance to this day.

OUR Irish young lady boarder, or maid-of-all-work, is very knowing. I said to her that I should get some German silver spoons for the kitchen. "Och, and ye hadn't better be gittin' ony o' them kind, for the German washes all out of them, and laves nothin' but the silver."

AN officer in the Eighteenth Missouri mounted infantry sends the two following:

We have a jolly old Captain, who is every thing good and efficient as an officer, a friend, and a gentleman; but he never deemed a close study of the dictionary as essential to getting a living or subduing this wicked rebellion. One hot day the Captain, floating around, sat down under the arbor in front of my tent, and, picking up a late paper, commenced to read aloud the heading of the telegraphic column as follows:—

"Repulse—of—a—sortie—at—Charleston."

Says he:

"Sortie? Sortie? A. Sortie? Cap, have the rebels any general by the name of A. Sortie?"

"Certainly," said I; "I've heard of old Sortie frequently."

"Well, I guess I have," said the Captain, "come to think now; I've heard of his being repulsed very often."

THE Captain is a very obliging gentleman, and not long ago, lying under a tree, after a halt, I was feverish and sick. Seeing the Captain passing in the direction of the Surgeon's tree I asked him to be kind enough to tell the Doctor to send me a strong Seidlitz powder or its equivalent. "Certainly," said the Captain; and going straight to the Doctor's he addressed him thus: "Doctor —, Captain — is very sick, and wants you to send him a Seidlitz powder. Yes, and ef you hain't any, send him some quivalent."

IN Carlisle, Pennsylvania, lives a negro by the name of Jim Black, and who is as black as his name would indicate. Jim owns a cart, and having harness made to fit himself, acts the part of a horse, and does considerable carting for people. Upon one occasion John B. Noble, a butcher, better known as Beefy Noble, employed him to cart a load of beef to market. As he was proceeding with the load along Main Street the cars passed. Imagining himself a horse, he took fright, ran away, upsetting the cart, and turning its contents on the street. After making the circuit of several squares he was stopped, with eyes and nostrils dilated, and snorting in imitation of a horse. It is needless to say that Beefy never again employed him.

THE principal part of the inhabitants of St. George are directly or indirectly engaged in the fishing business. A worthy minister, going about seeking for "a call," came to St. George. In his sermon, speaking of the Saviour, he said, "He had no pride; he treated alike the rich and poor, the high and low; he even condescended to take for companions poor, mean fishermen, the most degraded class of people on the face of the earth." The minister went away from St. George wondering why he got no "call."

THE PROMENADE ROBE is of light stone-colored merino, with mazarine blue taffeta forming the ornament. This is outlined by a narrow black velvet, which has an edging of black lace. The robe is made en soutane, that is, the body and skirt are cut in one piece, without seam at the waist.

The "CIRCULAR" represented above is of black velvet, trimmed with crochet ornaments and fringe, crimped and plain tassels alternating with each other.—Another style of pardessus consists of a "circular," with a gilet front, the circular falling free from the apex of the breast.

A TOUR THROUGH ARIZONA.

[Second Paper.]

PIMO INDIAN GIRLS.

[WAS now on the borders of a region in which the wildest romance was strangely mingled with the most startling realities. Each day of our sojourn at Fort Yuma brought with it some fabulous story of discovery or some tragic narrative of suffering and death. There were vague rumors of silver veins found on the banks of the Colorado of such incredible richness that Washoe was left in the shade ; there were hints of a golden region east of the Rio Verde and north of the Gila which Spaniards, Mexicans, and Americans had been trying to reach for over three centuries, now opening up with all its glittering treasures : credulity was taxed with the marvelous stories of mineral wealth in and beyond the San Francisco mountains. No longer was the narrative of the brave old adventurer, Francis Vasquez de Coronado, to be deemed a mere romance, for truly the Indians "had great store of gold." Their precious bullets were already finding their way down to the Pimo villages and Fort Yuma—a fact that I could not doubt, since I saw many of them myself. Nor was it beyond credit that Friar Marco de Niça found in this region, as early as 1540, "a greater use and more abundance of gold and silver than in Peru"—if but half we now heard was true; and who could doubt it with the evidence of his own eyes? The least imaginative and most incredulous reader of the old Spanish chronicles could not dispute the statement of Antonio de Espejo, that he found in his journey to the Zuñi, in 1583, "rich mines of silver, which, according to the judgment of skillful men, were very plentiful and rich in metal." But far beyond these musty records of early Spanish enterprise were the verbal narratives to be heard every day from men who had explored various portions of the country lying to the north of the Gila, and along the range of the 35th parallel of latitude. At the store of Messrs. Hooper and Hinton, in Arizona City, I saw masses of pure gold as large as the palm of my hand brought in by some of these adventurers, who stated that certain Indians had assured them they knew of places in the mountains where the surface of the ground was covered with the same kind of "heavy yellow stones." Neither threats, nor presents, nor offers of unlimited reward could induce the wily savages to guide the white men to these fabulous regions of wealth. "Why should we?" said they—and with good reason—"you are already taking our country from us fast enough; we will soon have no place of safety left. If we show you where these yellow stones are you will come there in thousands and drive us away and kill us." It was equally in vain the white men offered to buy the gold from them. Whisky, knives, tobacco, blankets—all the Indians craved had no effect. On that point they were immovable. The excitement produced by the information they had given, and the effect of their obduracy in refusing to disclose the locality of the "yellow stones," alarmed them, and they evaded all further importunities by saying they knew nothing about it themselves; only the old men of their tribes had told them these things, and they thought it was all a lie. If the statements gathered up in this way were not corroborated from so many different sources it would be easy to attribute them to a natural proclivity on the part of mankind toward the marvelous in every thing connected with the discovery of the precious metals. But we have this story in various shapes throughout Arizona, not only from different tribes of Indians, but from wholly different races of men, and all tending toward the region north of the Gila and east of the Rio Verde. Felix Aubrey, the famous explorer (killed a few years ago in an affray at Santa Fé), tells us, in his journal of 1853, that he found gold in such abundance along the banks of the Colorado that in some places "it glistened upon the ground." After crossing a branch of the Gila he met some Indians from whom he obtained over fifteen hundred dollars' worth of gold for a few old articles of clothing; and he further mentions that these Indians use gold bullets of different sizes for their guns, and that he saw one of them put four such bullets in his gun to shoot a rabbit. Next day his mule broke down, and an Indian gave him for it a lump of gold weighing a pound and a half less one ounce.

As an offset to these exciting reports, corroborated to a great extent by the masses of virgin ore brought in from time to time, the stories of escape from the barbarous Apaches that inhabit the country, their sagacity, cruelty, and relentless hostility to white men; the thrilling accounts of suffering from scarcity of food and water, and the various perils of life and limb encountered in the rugged mountains and rock-bound cañons were well calculated to moderate the enthusiasm with which we looked forward to our tour and its probable results. Still, hope was ever uppermost, and I doubt if there was one in the party who would have taken less than fifty thousand dollars, cash in hand, for his chances of a fortune, unless it was George, our unhappy driver, who on the occasion of every new proof tending to show the unbounded richness of Arizona, groaned aloud in agony of spirit, as if he thought gold and silver of no consequence whatever compared with the treasures of Mary Jane's affection.

Conspicuous among the mines of which we had glowing accounts was the Moss Lead, near Fort Mojave. This mine was long known to Iretaba, the distinguished Mojave Chief, who, in consideration of friendly services rendered him by Mr. Moss, the first American proprietor (whose name it bears), conducted him to it. Iretaba has reaped his reward in his recent visit to San Francisco and the Atlantic States. There was also the "Apache Chief"—a silver mine, said to be quite equal to any thing in Washoe, though it may be long before the dividends satisfy the stockholders on that point. The town of La Paz was growing into importance. Miners and traders were opening out the placer region to the eastward, and the accounts brought down by stray "pilgrims" were of the most flattering character. Walker's and Weaver's diggings, and the placers on the Hasiampa, were represented to be so rich that fortunes could be made in an incredibly short time, if there was only water enough to "wash the dirt." But lack of water and abundance of marauding Indians were a constant source of trouble to the miners, who somehow were always getting poorer the longer they staid there. The few that I saw come down to Fort Yuma were bronzed, battered, ragged, and hungry; they went into Arizona with an outfit, and were leaving it without any fit at all, unless it might be that mentioned by Shakspeare. If after their experience of the dry diggings they were not fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils, I certainly don't know what possible use they could make of their time in future. Yet the general concurrence of testimony was encouraging. It was beyond question a region rich in the precious metals. Water was the principal desideratum. The season had been unusually dry. It was not so always: the time would come when Heaven would shed some tears of commiseration upon the suffering miners.

New and rich silver veins had been discovered a short distance above Fort Yuma on the Colorado, which were attracting considerable attention. In the vicinity of Castle Dome, twenty-five miles from the river and thirty-five from the Fort, the veins prospected were numerous and extensive, and the ores of a very promising character. I saw some of them myself, and am satisfied they contain a great abundance of lead. No assays had been made that I heard of, but gentlemen who owned in them assured me there was silver in them as well as lead, whether much or little remained to be seen. The main trouble about the Castle Dome district is, that if ever it becomes a valuable mining region, some different arrangement must be made for the supply of water. At present it has to be hauled, or carried on pack animals, a distance of twenty-five miles. The country is one of the roughest ever trodden by the foot of man. I think it must originally have been designed for mountain sheep, which are said to abound in that vicinity. These animals have prodigious horns, upon which they alight when they tumble down the cliffs. How they get up again is difficult to conjecture. My own impression is that they are born there, and are pushed over by other sheep.

Very little work has yet been done in the Castle Dome district, although some hundreds of claims have been prospected, and extensions run upon the most promising. None of them that I heard of have as yet been run in the ground, except on Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

The Eureka, another district of recent discovery, lies on the banks of the Colorado, about thirty miles above Fort Yuma. Considerable attention has been attracted to the silver veins alleged to exist in this district. I saw quantities of the ore, which certainly present some very fine indications of galena. A gentleman presented me with a specimen from one of his mines, containing a piece of pure silver about the size of a marrowfat pea. Whether it was melted out of the rock or into it I have no means of knowing, though my confidence in the integrity of the donor remains unshaken. I believe there is silver in Eureka, and I believe a very good yield will come out of it as soon as the parties who hold the claims sell out to some other parties. At present the great drawback to mining here is, that the owners of feet have no money to expend in extracting their wealth from the ground; and when people who have money desire to invest, the men of feet demand extraordinary sums, because they think claims that attract capital must be of extraordinary value. Offer one of them fifty dollars a foot, and he will refuse a hundred; but let him alone till his beans give out, and he will sell for fifty cents. For this reason, although claims are numbered by the score, and cities containing from one to three houses are springing up all along the banks of the river, very little work has yet been done in the development of the mines. The Guadaloupe and the Rosario, from which some promising ores have been taken, will probably be in successful operation within a few years. It is not improbable that by a proper system of smelting the average of the ores found in the Eureka and Silver district would yield a hundred dollars to the ton. Abundance of mesquit and cotton-wood grows in the valleys and bottoms, and there is water enough in the Colorado River, even at its present low stage, to run several steam-engines.

Is it a matter of surprise that, under the influence of these glowing reports, I begin to look upon Arizona with distended eyes; that an internal conviction possessed me that I was born under a lucky star, however roughly the world had used me up to the present date? All the trials and tribulations of past years; my early experience as a whale-fisher; my public services as an Inspector of Customs, so ungratefully rewarded by a note of three lines; my claim agency at Washoe, and the bankruptcy that resulted from my investments in the Dead-Broke and Sorrowful Countenance, were but the prices paid for that valuable experience which was now about to culminate in discoveries that would electrify the world, and result in an effort on my part to liquidate the public debt? When I walked out, on the plea of exercise, I secretly picked up every conspicuous stone by the way-side, examined it carefully, and thought it contained indications; I burrowed into gravel and sand banks, and carried a hammer in my pocket for the purpose of knocking off croppings; I closely investigated the general configuration of the earth; I entered into negotiations with my friend Poston, the original projector and principal owner of Arizona City, for the purchase of a thousand water-lots. In fine, I laid all my plans with such foresight and sagacity that the result astonishes me. But of that anon.

We remained a week at Fort Yuma, at the expiration of which, all being ready—damages to our ambulance repaired, stores laid in, an escort provided, letters written home, and orders given to forward the Indian goods designed for the Pimos, Maricopas, and Papagoes, as soon as possible—we bade good-by to our hospitable friends at the Fort, and set forth on our journey. Before us, as far as the eye could reach, stretched vast deserts dotted with mesquit, sage, and grease-wood, and distant ranges of mountains rugged and barren, but singularly varied in outline. A glowing, hazy, mystic atmosphere hung over the whole country—according well with the visionary enterprises and daring explorations of the old Spanish adventurers, who, three centuries ago, had journeyed along the banks of the Gila—the river of the Swift Waters.

Little was there now to indicate the grandeur of this wild stream of the desert during seasons of flood. A glaring sand-bottom fringed with cotton-wood and arrow-weed, through which in shallow veins the water coursed, leaving here and there patches of sand as a resting-place for numerous aquatic fowl, whose wild cries disturbed the solitude, formed the chief characteristics of the Gila in January, 1864. A few miles beyond Arizona City we struck off to the right, and for the next ten or fifteen miles traveled on the upper stratum of the Gila bottom, which we found well wooded with mesquit. The roads range any where within two or three miles of the direct route. Every traveler seems to take a road to suit himself, the chief object being to find one that is not cut up by heavy Government wagons. I had a new experience here—apparently smooth roads so full of “chuck-holes” that it was impossible to go a hundred yards without danger of breaking the wheels of our ambulance.

Quail were very abundant as we drew near our first camping-place on the Gila. I killed about two dozen on the wing; that is to say, I was on the wing myself when I shot, but the quail were on the ground. If that does not amount to the same thing I crave pardon of the sporting fraternity. Travelers in Arizona can not afford to waste powder at $2 per pound, and shot at $1, on mere fancy shots. No man belonging to the party was permitted, on pain of the severe displeasure of our commander-in-chief, to kill less than four quail at a shot. I killed three once, and only succeeded in evading the penalty that attached to the offense by boldly asserting my belief that there were only three grains of shot in the gun.

We camped at Gila City, a very pretty place, encircled in the rear by volcanic hills and mountains, and pleasantly overlooking the bend of the river, with its sand-flats, arrow-weeds, and cotton-woods in front. Gold was found in the adjacent hills a few years ago, and a grand furor for the “placers of the Gila” raged throughout the Territory. At one time over a thousand hardy adventurers were prospecting the gulches and cañons in this vicinity. The earth was turned inside out. Rumors of extraordinary discoveries flew on the wings of the wind in every direction. Enterprising men hurried to the spot with barrels of whisky and billiard-tables; Jews came with ready-made clothing and fancy wares; traders crowded in with wagon-loads of pork and beans; and gamblers came with cards and monte-tables. There was every thing in Gila City within a few months but a church and a jail, which were accounted barbarisms by the mass of the population. When the city was built, bar-rooms and billiard-saloons opened, monte-tables established, and all the accommodations necessary for civilized society placed upon a firm basis, the gold placers gave out. In other words, they had never given in any thing of account. There was “pay-dirt” back in the hills, but it didn’t pay to carry it down to the river and wash it out by any ordinary process. Gila City collapsed. In about the space of a week it existed only in the memory of disappointed speculators. At the time of our visit the promising Metropolis of Arizona consisted of three chimneys and a coyote.

The next day we traveled over a series of gravelly deserts, in which we saw for the first time that peculiar and picturesque cactus so characteristic of the country, called by the Indians the petayah, but more generally known as the suaro, and recognized by botanists as the Cereus grandeus. A difference of opinion exists as to whether the petayah is not a distinct species from the suaro; but I never could find any two persons who could agree, after exhausting all their erudition on the subject, upon any point except this—that neither of them knew any thing about it. I am inclined to believe the petayah is the fruit of the suaro, of which the Indians make a kind of molasses by expressing the juice. They also eat it with great avidity during the season of its maturity; and it is a common thing, in traveling along the road, to see these gigantic sentinels of the desert pierced with arrows. The Indians amuse themselves shooting at the fruit, and when one misses his aim and leaves his arrow sticking in the top of the cactus, it is a source of much laughter to his comrades. The ribs or inward fibre of this singular plant become quite hard when dry, and make excellent lances, being light, straight, and tough. It presents a green, ribbed, and thorny exterior, with branches growing out of it toward the top, resembling in general effect a candelabra. Some of them grow as high as 40 or 50 feet; the average is probably from 20 to 30.

At Mission Camp, 14 miles from Gila City, we had a fine view of the Corunnasim Mountain, distant about 10 miles on the north side of the Gila. Mr. Bartlett compares it to a pagoda, and so styles it in the sketch accompanying the description in his book. I think the Spanish name is more appropriate. The peaks bear a strong resemblance to those of a mitred crown, and, seen in the glow of the setting sun, would readily suggest the idea of that gilded emblem of royalty. I made a sketch of it from our camp, embracing a large scope of country bordering on the Gila.

We had a very pleasant time here. Small game was abundant, and we lived in princely style, or rather, I should say, in such style as no prince or potentate in Europe could afford to live without an extraordinary change of climate. For dinner we had quails, ducks, rabbits, frijoles, and that most gorgeous of camp-luxuries, so highly appreciated by our friend Ammi White—good fat pork. We had Chili colorado and onions and eggs, and wound up with preserves and a peach-cobbler. Doctor Jim Berry, our contraband, was in high feather. His face and his top-boots were resplendent with grease and glory. He danced around the fire, stirred the pots, tipped the frying-pans, titillated the gravies, scattered his condiments over the fizzing game, sang snatches of that inspiring ditty, “Oh, Baltimore gals, won’t you go home with me?” and, in fine, was the very perfection of a colored Berry. Jim was a wit, a songster, a gallant gay Lothario, a traveler, and a gentleman—or, at all events, a gentleman’s son. He belonged to the aristocracy of Maryland, and claimed the head of one of the first families as his distinguished progenitor. He said he had brothers who used to go to Congress, but now they were secesh and belonged to the Suvern army. Of course we praised his skill as a cook, which elevated him to the seventh heaven. Flattery was food and raiment to him; without it he would wither and die. “I know I’s a good cook; I know I’s de bess cook in de worl’,” he would say, with genuine satisfaction beaming from his eyes; “I kin make omlit, en fricasee, en pumkin pie, en all kinds o’ sass—I kin; en ef I had de conbeniences I’d make corn pone.”

The mental afflictions of our driver, George, reached their culminating point at this scene of moral and physical enjoyment. Unable to stand the general flow of soul, he retired behind the baggage-wagon and held a private conversation with himself, which ended in such a series of pathetic groans that Dr. Berry, in the fullness of his heart, rushed to the spot and offered him a tin plate filled up with peach-cobbler. “Look-a-here, George,” he said, sympathetically, “sighin’ and groanin’ won’t do it any good. I was wuss in love den dat once, en-nuffin but peach-cobbler would set on my stomach. Eat dis, George, it's very soothing to de pangs ob unrequited affliction!" George took the proffered remedy, but I was unable to perceive any diminution of his lamentations during the night. On the contrary, it was not until I had thrown several clods and both my boots at his head that he ceased to disturb my repose.

The next point of interest on our journey was a volcanic peak, distant fifteen miles from Corunnasim Camp. Some of the escort who had preceded us had already mounted this singular pile of rocks, and could be distinctly seen prospecting for gold. We found here a station at which hay was supplied for the Government teams. Two soldiers had charge of it. Had I not been told that the loose stack of forage near which we camped was hay I should have called it brush-wood. It grows in bunches, and is cut with a hoe. When dry it makes good fire-wood. The animals seemed to relish it, though I should as soon have thought of feeding them on cord-wood. Our camp at Antelope Peak was as pleasant as the most fastidious traveler could desire.

The weather, as usual, was quite delightful—soft, balmy sunshine in the afternoon; clear and frosty at night; and atmospheric tints morning and evening that would enchant an artist, and set a poet to rhyming. Under the inspiration of the occasion I made a sketch, which is at the service of the reader.

Desert mesas and sand-bottoms formed the characteristic features of our journey from this point to Texas Hill and Grinnell's Station. While the Company were encamped at Grinnell's, Poston, White, and myself crossed the Gila, and rode about six miles to the ranch of Martin and Woolsey, situated near the Aqua Calliente. Mr. Woolsey had left, a few days before, with a large quantity of stock for the gold placers. We were hospitably entertained by his partner, Mr. Martin, who is trying the experiment of establishing a farm here by means of irrigation. The soil is excellent, and the prospect is highly encouraging. An abundant supply of water flows from the Aqua Calliente. We had a glorious bath in the springs next morning, which com-excellent mark we made for any prowling Tontos that might be in the vicinity. It was here that the Indians who had in captivity the Oatman girls made their first halt after the massacre of the family. The barren mountains in the rear, and the wild and desert appearance of the surrounding country, accorded well with the impressive narrative of that disaster.

It had been arranged that our party should meet us at Oatman Flat, where we were to camp for the night. We rode for about ten or twelve miles over the mesa, following the tracks made by King Woolsey's wagon, and then struck for the river, thinking we were opposite the Flat. Experience has since taught me that there is no safety in diverging from the main road or trail in Arizona, however circuitous it may appear. We soon found ourselves involved in a labyrinth of thickets and arroyas bordering on the river, through which we struggled for three hours before we could get to the water. When we finally made our way down to the sand-bottom, the oppo-pletely set us up after the dust and grit of the journey. They lie near the point of the hill, about a mile and a half from Martin's. I consider them equal to the baths of Damascus, or any other in the world. The water is of an exquisite temperature, and possesses some very remarkable qualities in softening the skin and soothing the nervous system. A Mr. Belcher lived at this place for four years, surrounded by Apaches. Indeed it was not quite safe now; and I could not but think, as Poston, White, and myself sat bobbing about in the water, what an site side of the river presented a perpendicular wall of rocks which forbade any attempt at an exit; so we had to turn back and struggle through the thickets and arroyas for two hours more, by which time we found ourselves on a mesa covered with round smooth stones, apparently burned and glazed by fire. All around us, as far as sight could reach, the face of the country was a continued sea of dark glazed stones, bounded only in the distance by rugged mountains. Following the road over this dreary waste we at length descended from the mesa, and reached the stretch of sand-bottom opposite Oatman's Flat. In crossing the river, which appeared to be only a few inches deep, our animals sank in a bed of quicksand, and had a fearful struggle before they could gain the opposite bank. As usual, I rode a mule defective in the legs. They were too short by at least twelve inches, and it fell to my lot to be the only member of the party who was thoroughly and effectually ducked. I must say, however, my labors in the quicksand were not wholly lost; for they afforded infinite diversion to my friends Poston and White, who stood on the opposite bank enjoying the picturesque attitudes which I chose to assume while the mule was plunging and struggling to rid himself of his burden. I would take a ducking any time to oblige a couple of disinterested friends, having full faith that they would pull me out at the last extremity.

We found our party encamped in the bottom. Antonio Azul and his interpreter Francisco were in great joy. The Pimo Indians had heard that the white men of San Francisco had put them to death with great ceremony and much rejoicing. Faint rumors had reached the Pimo villages that Antonio and Francisco had been paraded about the city for many weeks, to be tortured by the white squaws; after which, public vengeance being satisfied, their ears were cut off, and their bodies hung up by the heels to a tree, and fires placed under their heads, as a matter of general amusement. Such was the indignation of Antonio's people when they saw his wife and children weeping and wailing for these cruel atrocities—doubtless the invention of some mischievous teamster—that they resolved to take summary vengeance upon some half a dozen Americans who resided at the villages. Mr. White's half-brother, Cyrus Lennan, fortunately received a letter about that time dated at Fort Yuma, stating that Antonio and Francisco were safe, and would be at Oatman's Flat on a certain day. Immediately a delegation of Pimos, headed by Antonio's son, started off to meet them. This was the occasion of the rejoicing. The meeting had just taken place. Antonio and his son had tipped fingers and grunted in token of joy; Francisco had appeared before his astonished friends in the full glory of brass buttons, sashes, feathers, beads, and brilliant yellow cheeks; and now they were all seated around the camp-fire, and the unsophisticated delegation were listening to the wonderful history of the adventures and observations of Antonio Blue-Bottom and his doughty interpreter, Francisco, Knight of the Yellow Cheeks.

A good supper, prepared by the skillful hand of Dr. Jim Berry, amply compensated us for the tribulations of the past two days; and a glorious night's rest on the bosom of our mother earth set us up for any thing that might transpire to tax our energies for some time to come.

Having started our escort and baggage-wagon on the road a small party of us made a visit to the grave of the Oatman Family, whose sad history had been the theme of much conversation in camp since our arrival in this desolate region. A small inclosure near the road, with a board and inscription, marks the spot. The bones of the unfortunate emigrants were gathered up in 1854 by Mr. Poston, and buried here. He carved the inscription with his pen-knife on a piece of board from his wagon.

Although a detailed narrative of the massacre of the family and captivity of the Oatman girls, written by the Rev. R. B. Stratton, was published a few years ago, a brief sketch of their eventful career, for which I am indebted in part to Mr. Stratton's narrative and in part to verbal details furnished me by Mr. Henry Grinnell at Fort Yuma, may derive a new interest from the drawings made by myself on the spot. It will show, at least, as well as any thing I can offer, some of the causes which have so long retarded the progress of Arizona.

Early in January, 1851, Mr. Royse Oatman and his family entered that portion of the New Mexican territory now called Arizona, in company with an emigrant party of which he was a member. Originally the party numbered some eighty or ninety persons, but disagreements had divided them during the journey; Mr. Oatman and his friends took the Cook and Kearney route from the Rio Grande, with a train consisting of eight wagons and some twenty persons. After a series of continued hardships and disasters they reached Tucson entirely destitute of provisions, their stock broken down and most of them unable to proceed. At this point the lands were good, and inducements were offered them to remain a while for the purpose of recruiting. The families of Oatman, Wilder, and Kelley resolved to push on, in the hope of being able soon to reach California, of which they had heard glowing accounts. They were very poorly provided for the journey; but to remain with their large families, under the discouraging prospect of supplies from crops not yet in the ground, seemed to them almost certain to result in starvation. With their jaded teams and a slender stock of provisions they pushed forward across the ninety-mile desert, and arrived about the middle of February at the Pimo villages, where they hoped to procure fresh supplies. It was a bad season for the Pimos. Their grain had nearly given out, and they had little or none to spare. Wilder and Kelley, however, concluded to remain in consequence of some bad accounts of Indian depredations on the road to Fort Yuma. Mr. Oatman saw nothing but utter destitution before him if he tarried among the Pimos, and he was sorely embarrassed what to do. His stock had been reduced to two yoke of cows and one of oxen, and was so jaded after the long journey from the Rio Grande that it was not probable they would hold out much longer. Nearly two hundred miles of a desert country lay between the Pimo villages and Fort Yuma; and beyond the Colorado there was still a terrible desert to pass before they could reach the southern counties of California. While suffering the tortures of anxiety and suspense, with the gloomiest prospect if they remained, a Dr. Lecount, who had extensively explored the Pacific coast, arrived from Fort Yuma, and reported the route safe. He had seen no hostile Indians, and had heard of no recent depredations on the way. Encouraged by this information Mr. Oatman determined to push forward at once for California; and accordingly, on the 11th of March, he set out with such slender outfit of provisions as he could procure. Traveling for seven days under great difficulties, his family on the verge of starvation, his cattle scarcely able to drag the wagon, he was overtaken by Dr. Lecount and a Mexican guide at a point below the Big Bend of the Gila. It was evident from the exhaustion of his team that he would be unable to reach Fort Yuma without assistance; Dr. Lecount agreed to hurry on as fast as possible and send back assistance from the Fort, which was still distant about ninety miles. The first night beyond the Oatman camp an attack was made by a band of Indians upon Lecount and his guide, and their animals stolen. Left on foot, without any means of subsistence, they were compelled to hurry on or starve. The Mexican was sent ahead to procure assistance. It was thirty miles back to the camp of the Oatmans. Lecount saw no alternative but to push on after his guide. He left a card, however, conspicuously fastened to a tree, stating what had occurred, and warning the emigrant party behind to be on the look-out for the Apaches. Although the Oatmans camped at the same spot they failed to see the notice; or, as some suppose, Mr. Oatman saw it and concealed it from his family in order that they might not be uselessly alarmed. On the 18th of March they spent a dreadful night on a little sand island in the Gila River. A terrific storm blew the water up over them: their scanty supply of provisions was damaged, their blankets and clothing wet through, and the starving animals driven nearly frantic with fear. It was a wild and desolate place, many days' journey from any civilized abode. Hitherto Mr. Oatman, naturally a man of sanguine temperament, had borne every disaster and braved every danger cheerfully and without flinching, but the presentiment of some terrible doom seemed to have fallen upon him at this place, and he was seen by some of the family to shed tears while sitting in the wagon. The next day they proceeded but a short way, over a very rough mesa, when the jaded animals utterly refused to move. It was impossible to urge them on with the loaded wagon—their strength was spent, and the faithful creatures seemed ready to lie down and die. By unloading the wagon, and pushing the wheels from time to time, the distressed emigrants succeeded at length in getting upon a narrow flat, bordering on the river, where they halted a while to recruit.

The sketch on the following page represents the upper entrance into this little valley. A curious mesa formation, not uncommon in Arizona, is seen on the right. The dark bluff resembling a colossal tower is the termination of the strata forming the mesa. From the summit, upon which stands, like some giant sentinel, a solitary suaro, the vertical depth to the valley is about two hundred feet. A mile beyond the tower, the lower extremity of the valley or flat, through which the road runs, is abruptly walled in by nearly a similar embankment of natural fortifications, presenting apparently no place of exit. Upon a close inspection, however, a thin yellowish vein is seen winding up the brow of the precipice. This is the road to Fort Yuma; and the summit of the mesa is the scene of a tragedy which will be ever memorable in the history of Arizona.

Crossing an arroya, or dry bed of a creek, near the bottom of the mesa, and passing through some dense thickets of mesquit and ocochilla, the struggling family found themselves at the foot of a rocky bluff more difficult of ascent than any they had yet attempted. Again they unloaded the wagon, and for hours they toiled to get their packs and wagon up the hill. To one who has passed over the road even in its present improved state it seems marvelous that they ever succeeded in making the ascent, weak and dispirited as they were; but success at length crowned their efforts, and they sat down upon the edge of the precipice to rest after their labors. Mr. Oatman was greatly dejected. It was observed by his family that he looked anxiously down the road over which they had passed, and that he never before seemed so utterly despondent. The sun, which had blazed upon them fiercely all day, was now just setting. They were beset by difficulties. Before them lay a vast desert; behind and to the right a wilderness of mountains. It was starvation to stay, and almost inevitable disaster to go forward. Mrs. Oatman, the noble wife and mother, always patient, hopeful, and enduring, busied herself in attending to the wants of her children and in uttering words of encouragement to her husband. He, however, seemed utterly overwhelmed with gloomy forebodings, and continued to look back upon the road till, suddenly, an expression of indescribable horror was observed in his face, and the next moment a band of Indians was seen leisurely approaching along the road. The children perceiving instinctively that their father—to whom they had always been accustomed to look for protection—was agitated by no ordinary emotions, became alarmed; but he succeeded by a strong effort in maintaining an appearance of composure, and told them not to be afraid, that the Indians would not hurt them. It was a favorite theory of his that misconduct on the part of the whites was the cause of all trouble with Indians, and that by treating them generously and kindly they would not prove ungrateful. Strange that one who had lived in frontier countries should so fatally misconstrue the character of that race!

When the Indians came up Mr. Oatman spoke to them kindly in Spanish, and motioned to them to sit down. They sat down, and asked for tobacco and pipes; which he gave them, and they smoked a while in token of friendship. Then they asked for something to eat. Mr. Oatman told them his family were nearly starving—that they had a long journey before them, and could ill spare any portion of their scanty stock. However, he gave them a little bread, and said he was sorry he could not give them more. After this they stood off a little and talked in a low tone, while Oatman set to work to reload the wagon. It was observed that the Indians looked anxiously down the road as if expecting some approaching party. Suddenly, with a terrific yell, they jumped in the air, and dashed with uplifted clubs upon the doomed family. Lorenzo, a boy fourteen years of age, was struck on the head and felled to the earth the first blow. Several of the savages rushed upon Oatman, and he was seen for a moment struggling in their midst, but soon fella mutilated corpse at their feet. Mrs. Oatman pressed her youngest child to her bosom, and struggled with a mother's heroic devotion to save it, shrieking in piercing accents, "Help! help! Oh, for the love of God, will nobody save us!" A few blows of the murderous clubs quickly silenced the poor mother and her babe; and in less than a minute the whole family, save Lorenzo, Olive, and Mary Anne, were lying dead or moaning in their death-struggles upon the ground. Olive, a girl sixteen years of age, and Mary Anne, a frail child of eleven, were dragged aside and held in the iron grasp of two Indians. Lorenzo, the boy, was stunned by the crushing blows which had fallen upon his head, and lay bleeding by the edge of the precipice. In his narrative he states that he soon recovered his consciousness, and distinctly heard the yells of the Apaches, mingled with the shrieks and dying groans of his parents. The savages, seeing him move, rifled his pockets and cast him over the precipice. Upon a careful examination of the spot—as shown to the right of the road in the accompanying sketch—I estimated that he must have fallen twenty feet before he struck the rocky slope of the mesa. That he was not instantly killed or maimed beyond recovery seems miraculous. Strange discordant sounds, he tells us, grated upon his ears, gradually dying away, and then he heard "strains of such sweet music as completely ravished his senses."

Thus he lay till reason became gradually restored, when, with great difficulty, he crept back up the hill. The sight of the dead bodies of his parents, brothers, and sisters, lying scattered about by the broken wagon, mutilated and bloody, was too much for him, and for a while he felt like one laboring under some horrible phantasm. He knew that his sisters Olive and

Mary Anne had been taken captive, and the fate to which they were doomed was even more dreadful to him than the sight of the murdered family. Sick at heart, and faint from loss of blood, he turned away and crept toward the river. A burning thirst consumed him. He thought he was dying. With incredible difficulty he reached the river, where he satisfied his thirst and slept a few hours. — Thus refreshed he resolved upon an attempt to reach the Pimo Villages, which though distant a hundred miles, was the nearest place known to him, when he could hope to procure relief. During the next two days he made his way along the road — sometimes walking, sometimes creeping on his hands and knees, resting every few minutes when he could procure the friendly shelter of a bush; at times delirious, and constantly haunted by the horrible dread that he might again fall into the hands of the Indians. He grew weaker every mile from hunger, thirst, and fever; and, worn down at last, lay down to die. A strange noise aroused him from his stupor. Upon opening his eyes he found himself surrounded by wolves, panting and lapping their tongues for his blood. He shouted as loud as he could, and threw stones at them. The nearest he struck with his hand. Rising again he pushed on, the wolves following closely at his heels. About noon of the second day, as he was passing through a dark cañon, two Pimo Indians, riding on fine American horses, appeared before him, and seeing so strange an object fixed their arrows and raised their bows to shoot. He addressed them in Spanish, telling them he was an American, and begging them not to kill him; upon which they lowered their bows and manifested signs of interest and sympathy. When they learned what had happened they gave him some ash-baked bread and a gourd of water. Then they told him to await their return, and rode away. He staid a little while, but fearful of treachery started on again. Wandering along the road till he came out of the cañon and overlooked the plain, he discerned some moving objects in the distance, which he speedily recognized as two white-covered wagons. He knew they must be Americans. Overcome by emotion he sank to the ground unconscious of all his sufferings. Within an hour or less he was aroused by the voice of Wilder, saying, "My God, Lorenzo! what has happened?" The wagons contained the families of Wilder and Kelley, who had started for Fort Yuma. Next day the unhappy sufferer was safe among the Pimos. The emigrants halted a few days until he gained sufficient strength to join them. He traveled with Wilder and Kelley to Fort Yuma, which they reached after a journey of eight or ten days.

As soon as the Apaches had concluded the massacre of the Oatman family and plundered the wagon of its contents, they fled across the river, taking with them the two captives, Olive and Mary Anne. These unfortunate girls had seen their parents, brothers, and sisters cruelly murdered, and were now dragged away, bare-headed and shoeless, through a rude and desolate wilderness. Ferocious threats and even clubs were used to hurry them along. Their feet were lacerated, and their scanty clothes were torn from their bodies in passing over the rocky mesas and through the dense and thorny thickets. Sometimes the younger sister faltered from sheer lack of strength, but the savage wretches, unmindful of her sufferings, beat her and threatened to dispatch her at once if she lagged behind. She said it was useless to try any more—she might as well die at once. A brutal wretch of the tribe seized her as she sank to the ground, and casting her across his back started off on a trot. Thus they traveled till late in the night, when they halted for a few hours. On the following day they met a rival party of Indians, among whom was one who had lost a brother at the hands of the whites. The strange Indians charged furiously upon the captives, and would have killed them but for the resolute interference of their captors, who were not willing to lose their services. On the third day of their journey, after the most incredible hardships, having traveled over two hundred miles, they came in sight of a cluster of low thatched huts down in a valley. This was the Apache rancheria. The captives were ushered in amidst shouts and songs and wild dancing. For many days the savages indulged in their disgusting revels. The two young girls were placed in the centre of a large circle, and compelled to witness sights so brutal and obscene that they were filled with dismay. They prayed that they might die before they should be subjected to the cruel fate that threatened them. The tribe consisted of about three hundred, and lived in the most abject condition of filth and poverty. From this time, for many months, they lived a life of servitude, working from morning till night for their captors, and subject to the most cruel and brutal treatment. The scantiest pittance of food was allowed them, and that they had to gather themselves. Often they were without food for two days at a time, save such roots and insects as they could secretly devour while gathering supplies for the lazy wretches who held them in bondage. The younger sister, Mary Anne, was of a weakly constitution, and gradually declined under the terrible hardships to which she was subjected. There is a touching pathos in the gentleness and fortitude with which she bore her sufferings. She seldom complained; and it was her custom when alone with her sister to sing hymns, and say she thought God would take pity on them some day and deliver them.

In March, 1852, the tribe with whom they lived was visited by a band of Mojaves, who were in the habit of trading with them, and a bargain was made for their purchase. The Mojaves remained a few days carousing with their friends, and then set out with their prisoners for the Colorado. A dreary journey of two hundred miles over a desert and mountainous country, during which they suffered hardships surpassing any thing they had hitherto endured, brought them to the village of the Mojaves, where they were received with dancing, shouting, and jeering. The crops on the Colorado were short, and here again they suffered all the horrors of gradual starvation. Even some of the Indians died from insufficiency of food to sustain life. The gentle child, Mary Anne, worn down by the fatigues of the trip and want of nourishment, wasted away gradually till it was apparent to Olive she was dying. The sisters one evening sat hand in hand. Mary Anne sang one of the favorite hymns she had been taught by her mother. Then gazing with steadfast and loving eyes in her sister's face she said, "I have been a great deal of trouble to you, Olive. You will miss me for a while, but you will not have to work so hard when I am gone." The Indians gathered around in mysterious wonder. But the dying girl saw them not. A smile of ineffable happiness beamed upon her features. Peacefully she sank to rest in her sister's arms. Olive was left to bear the burden of life alone.

It is the custom of these Indians to burn their dead. Preparations were made for this ceremony in the present case; but the wife of the chief, pitying the distress of the surviving girl, prevailed upon him by much entreaty to let Olive bury the body according to the custom of her people. A grave was dug in a little patch of ground which had been cultivated by the sisters. They had often worked together in this little garden, and talked of their happy home before misfortune had come upon the family. All that was mortal of the gentle captive-girl was here consigned to the earth. Olive was thenceforth without friend or companion.

During these dreary years the brother, Lorenzo; had vainly striven to procure the rescue of his sisters. Of course no aid was furnished by the military authorities at Fort Yuma. The only person there who took any interest in the matter was Mr. Henry Grinnell, a private citizen, who from 1853 up to the date of their rescue never ceased to exert his energies to that end. And here a singular coincidence occurs. While the Grinnell expeditions, organized through the generosity of a merchant-prince—Mr. Grinnell, of New York—were prosecuting their search at the Arctic Circle for Sir John Franklin, an erratic nephew of the same Grinnell, who from love of adventure had wandered into the wilds of Arizona, was nobly devoting his energies to the rescue of two emigrant girls who had fallen into the hands of the Apaches. If there is nothing in blood, surely great hearts run in families; for here was one, without means, doing as much for the cause of humanity as the other with all the resources of fortune.

Through the services of Francisco, a Yuma Indian, the purchase of Olive from the Mojaves was effected by Mr. Grinnell, in February, 1856. She was brought down to a place on the Colorado at an appointed time. Here Mr. Grinnell met her. She was sitting on the ground, as he described the scene to me, with her face covered by her hands. So completely was she disguised by long exposure to the sun, by paint, tatooing, and costume, that he could not believe she was a white woman. When he spoke to her she made no answer, but cried and kept her face covered. It was not for several days after her arrival at Fort Yuma that she could utter more than a few broken words of English. Subsequently she met her brother, and was taken by him to his residence near Los Angeles. After that they lived a while in Oregon. I believe they now reside in Rochester, New York.

Between Grinnell's and Oatman Flat is the former overland mail-station called Burke's, of which nothing remains but a small hacqual on the bank of the river, occupied at present by two soldiers who have charge of the Government hay. The route taken by myself and friends on the opposite side of the Gila compelled us to leave Burke's considerably to the right, which I greatly regretted, as I was desirous of seeing an Apache chief whose body, I was informed, dangled from a tree within a few miles of the station. Subsequently in passing down the Gila, I had an opportunity of gratifying my curiosity. I was traveling without an escort, in company of Mr. Allen, a trader from Tucson, and having seen what we supposed to be fresh Apache tracks on the main road, it was deemed prudent to make a short cut through the bottom in order to reach the station as soon as possible. On the way, near the point of a sand-hill to the left, Mr. Allen directed my attention to an open space fringed with brush-wood and mesquit, in which a sharp fight had taken place two years before between a party of three Americans, one of whom was King Woolsey, and about fifteen or twenty Apaches. Mr. Woolsey, who has since become quite famous in Arizona as an Indian fighter, had contracted to supply the Government with hay, and was returning from the grass range with his loaded wagon and two hired hands, entirely unsuspecting of danger. They had but one gun with them, which by good luck rather than precaution was charged with buck-shot. In emerging from the bushes, where the road approaches the point of the sand-hill, a terrific yell burst upon them, and in a moment the Apaches sprang up from their ambush and charged upon them like so many devils incarnate. Woolsey said: "Hold the mules, boys, and give me the gun!" which they did with great coolness. The Indians wheeled about and dodged, but kept shooting their arrows with such fearful dexterity that Woolsey thought it advisable to give them a load of buckshot. The distance was too great, and no damage was done. At this the savages renewed their diabolical yells; closer and closer they crowded, the brave little handful of whites standing coolly by the wagon and mules, ready to sell their lives as dearly as possible. The leader of the Apaches, a warrior of gigantic stature and hideous features, rushed forward brandishing his war-club, and called upon his men to follow. Woolsey waited until the chief had approached within twenty paces, when he discharged the other barrel of his gun. Down tumbled the yelling savage, with a hole through his head. In the panic and confusion that followed, it was deemed advisable, as there was no more ammunition, to cut loose the mules and retire to the station. Here they procured additional force and armed themselves. Returning as soon as possible to the scene of the conflict, they found that the cowardly wretches who had attempted to murder them had fled, not even taking time to destroy the wagon. The chief lay just where he had fallen, stiff and stark, as peaceable an Indian as one could wish to meet of a summer's afternoon. It is a curious fact that the Apaches never remove their dead. A superstition seems to prevail among them on this point; and I have been told that they will not approach a spot upon which one of their comrades has been slain.

Woolsey and his party determined to make a conspicuous mark of the dead chief, from which marauding Indians might take warning. They dragged it to the nearest mesquit tree and hung it up by the neck, leaving the feet to dangle about a yard from the ground. This affair took place something more than two years ago.

On a pleasant sunshiny afternoon in March I stood by the tree and gazed with strange feelings upon the dead Apache. The body was dried and shrunken, and of a parchment color. One of the feet and both hands had been cut off or torn away by the coyotes. The head was thrown back, and the eye sockets glared in the sun. A horrible grin seemed fixed upon the mouth, and when a slight breeze gave motion to the body I was startled at the ghastly but life-like expression of the face as it slowly turned and stared at the bright blue sky. Arrows were sticking all over the breast and abdomen; doubtless tokens of barbarous hatred left by some passing Pimo or Maricopa. The sketch which I succeeded in making is so characteristic of life and adventure in Arizona that I must be pardoned for introducing it.

Six miles beyond Oatman's Flat we reached a pile of rocks, jutting out of the desert plain like an island, which, upon a near approach, we found to be the celebrated Pedras Pintadas. We camped a while to examine the inscriptions, and make some sketches. There seems to be a mystery about these painted rocks which yet remains to be solved. Antonio, our Pimo Chief, said the inscriptions were made a great many centuries ago, in the time of the Montezumas, and this seems to be the general tradition of the Indians. I could not believe, however, upon a close examination, that they were of so ancient a date. The figures are rudely impressed upon the rocks with stone and painted over; some of them being apparently of recent date.

Mr. Poston's opinion is—and I am disposed to coincide with him—that these paintings are the records of treaties made at different times between the Indians of the Gila and those of the Colorado.

From this point of our journey till we passed through the cañon above the Big Bend of the Gila nothing of special interest occurred.

At the Maricopa Wells, the scene of a great battle, fought in 1857 in front of the station-house, between the Pimos and Maricopas on one side, and the Yumas on the other, was pointed out to me. Of seventy-five Yumas who had attempted, in connection with the Hualpais and Mojaves, to overthrow the Pimos and Maricopas, but three lived to tell the tale of their disaster. Their allies deserted them in the hour of extremity, and the bones of seventy-two Yuma warriors still moulder on the plain. Mr. R. W. Laine, now an express messenger for Wells, Fargo, and Co., saw the fight and gave me a most thrilling account of it.

A few miles beyond the Maricopa village, on a rocky hill to the right of the road, our attention was attracted by a spectacle at once startling and characteristic of the country through which we were traveling. Looming up on the side of the hill, in bold outline against the sky, stood a rude cross upon which hung the dried body of an Apache, crucified about two years ago by the Maricopas. The legs and arms were fastened with cords, and the head hung forward, showing a few tufts of long hair still swinging about the face. It was a strange and ghastly sight. The Maricopas do not profess the Christian faith, but this much they had learned from the missionaries who had attempted their conversion, that crucifixion was a species of torture practiced by the whites. As it was a novel mode of punishment to them, the probability is they adopted it as a warning to their enemies not to come in that neighborhood again.

An hour more and we were snugly lodged at the mill and trading establishment of our friend Ammi White near the Casa Blanca. Crowds of Indians from the neighboring villages came in to welcome us; and for several days there was no end to the shaking of hands and complimentary speeches that signalized the arrival of the Superintendent and his party. I vow the labors through which I went on that occasion surpassed all the fatigues of the journey; and if Mr. Dole does not give me full credit for my sufferings in his report to Congress, I shall always consider him deficient in gratitude. As for Poston, he lost ten pounds of flesh; and the only reason I was more fortunate was that I had none to lose, being by this time as dry as a mummy.

In the old Spanish records of the expeditions made to the Gila River, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, special reference is made to the Pimo, or, as the Spaniards called them, Pimas Indians. As far back as 1539 Friar Marco de Niça encountered, during his famous expedition to the north of the Gila, a tribe whom he designated the Pintados, from the fact that they painted their faces. These were probably the Papagoes, who are of the same nation as the Pimos and speak the same language. In the seventeenth century Father Kino explored the country of the Coco-Maricopas south of the Gila, and also gives an account of the Pimos, with whom they now live in juxtaposition. Savedra, an excellent authority respecting the Indian races of Sonora, having spent much time among them, says the Pimos, Maricopas, Cuchans, and Mojaves are all "Indians of Montezuma:" in proof of which he refers to one custom common to all—that of cropping their hair across their foreheads, leaving the back part to fall its full length behind. This statement is corroborated by the Pimos of the present day, who proudly boast of their descent from the Montezumas. The most interesting fact in the history of these people is, that as far back as the records extend they lived, as they do to this day, by cultivating the earth; showing a direct affinity with the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico. Alarcon, who visited the great valley of the Colorado in 1540, mentions that it was cultivated to a considerable extent by tribes having a fixed residence and permanent abodes. Unlike the Apaches and the mountain tribes to the north, who live a wandering and predatory life, the Pimos have always manifested a friendly disposition toward the whites, and seem much devoted to the peaceful pursuits of agriculture and stock-raising.

PIMO VARSOMA.

In consideration of their industry and their amicable conduct toward Americans, the Government of the United States, in 1859, caused a reservation to be set apart for them, embracing all the lands which they had in cultivation at the period of the acquisition of Arizona. The survey was made by Colonel A. B. Gray, and embraced 100 square leagues of arable land, most of it susceptible of irrigation. The length of the reservation is about twenty-five miles—breadth, four; and the River Gila runs through it from one end to the other. Three large acequias take their head near the upper boundary; one on the south side of the river two miles below Sacatone, and the other on the north side. These, with their various branches, comprise nearly five hundred miles of well-defined acequias, and extend over a tract of land eighteen miles in length. We have authentic history in proof of the fact that for three hundred years the same land has been under cultivation, producing two crops a year without manure or renewal of any kind; yet it continues as productive as ever. It is probable the deposits left by the water are of a fertilizing nature. The return in wheat is twenty-five fold. The season of wheat-planting is December and January. Tobacco and cotton, which flourish with remarkable luxuriance, are planted when the mesquit leaves put forth—generally about the 1st of March. The summer rains commence about the 25th of June, by which time the wheat harvest is over, and corn is then planted in the same ground; also pumpkins, melons, and other vegetable products requiring great heat and moisture. Considering the rude system of agriculture pursued by these people, and the indolence of their young men, who seldom do any thing but ride about and gamble, it is remarkable what crops they have produced on this reservation.

The number of Pimo villages is 10; Maricopas, 2; separate inclosures, 1000; total population, 6000. In 1858, the first year of the Overland Mail Line, the surplus crop of wheat was 100,000 pounds, which was purchased by the Company; also a large quantity of beans called taperis, and a vast quantity of pumpkins, squashes, and melons. In 1859 Mr. St. John was sent among them as a Special Agent with a supply of seeds and some agricultural implements. That year they sold 250,000 pounds of wheat and a large supply of melons, pumpkins, and beans. In 1860 they sold 400,000 pounds of wheat—all the Mail Company would purchase. They had more, and furnished the Government and private teamsters all that was necessary for transportation from Fort Yuma to Tucson. Beyond this they had no market, except for about 40,000 pounds of wheat which Mr. White purchased for the supply of Fort Breckinridge. In 1861 they sold to Mr. White 300,000 pounds of wheat, 50,000 pounds of corn, 20,000 pounds of beans, and a large amount of dried and fresh pumpkins, which was all intended for the supply of the California column. The greater part of this crop was destroyed or given back to the Indians by the Texans under the guerrilla Hunter, who arrived at the Pimo villages that year, robbed Mr. White of his property, and took him prisoner in their flight to the Rio Grande. The Pimos sold, during the same year, 600 chickens and a large amount of other stuff, showing a gradual increase of production under the encouragement of an increased demand. In 1862 they sold to the Government over a million pounds of wheat, included in which was a portion of the previous year's crop, returned to them by the Texans. They furnished pinole, chickens, green pease, green corn, pumpkins, and melons for the entire California column, subsisting nearly a thousand men for many months. In 1863 they furnished the Government with 600,000 pounds of wheat, and disposed of about 100,000 pounds made into flour and sold to miners and traders. Their crop was smaller than usual, owing to the breakage of their main acequia at a critical period of the season, and in January, 1864, they were nearly out of wheat, but still had a good supply of other products.

It will thus be seen that the Pimos are not a race to be despised. They have always proved themselves good warriors, and have been uniformly successful in resisting the incursions of the Apaches. Their villages have afforded the only protection ever given to American citizens in Arizona. If it were not for the Pimos and Maricopas it would now be impossible to travel from Fort Yuma to Tucson.

Many of the customs which prevail among this interesting people might profitably be introduced into our judiciary system. As administrators upon the estates of deceased members of their tribe they are especially worthy of imitation. No wrangling about wills, no jealousy among relations, no grabbing of effects by avaricious lawyers disturb the exit of the dying man. Peacefully and without worldly concern he shuffles off the mortal coil, satisfied that all will be well when he is buried. His property is fairly and equitably distributed among his people. If he be a chief, and possessed of fields and corn and cattle, his death is a windfall to the community. The villagers are summoned to his burial. Over his grave they hold a grand festival. The women weep and the men howl, and they go into a profound mourning of tar. Soon the cattle are driven up and slaughtered, and every body, heavily-laden with sorrow, loads his squaw with beef, and feasts for many days. All the effects of the deceased become common property: his grain is distributed; his fields shared out to those who need land; his chickens and dogs divided up among the tribe; and his widow is offered by public proclamation to any man who desires a wife. If she be an able-bodied woman, capable of doing much work, she is generally consoled within a few days by another husband, though custom allows her to howl for the last until the conventional demands of grief are satisfied. Marrying a wife with a tar-covered face having its inconveniences, the new husband is also permitted to wear tar, which doubtless has a tendency to cement the union. The bow and arrows, blankets, beads, paints, jews-harps, and other personal effects of the deceased are buried with him. The body is placed in a sitting posture, with the face toward the sun; over the grave sticks and stones are placed; and thus he sleeps the sleep that knows no waking till the day of resurrection.

At the Pimo villages Mr. Poston and myself organized a party consisting of Captain Gorham, Lieutenant Arnold, and thirty of the California Volunteers, with ourselves, under the guidance of Mr. Cyrus Lennan, a resident trader, to visit the Casas Grandas, situated about twenty miles above, near the Gila. The first night we spent at the Sacatone Station, from which the Tucson road diverges across the ninety-mile desert. Following the banks of the river next morning through dense groves of mesquit, keeping in view, a little to the left, a peculiar conical peak, mesquit groves, and in about half an hour's ride from the river reached the famous Casas Grandas of the Gila. Mr. Bartlett has given so correct and elaborate a description of these wonderful ruins that I shall merely, for the information of the general reader, refer to a few points of prominent interest.

The remains of three large edifices are distinctly visible, one of which is in a remarkable state of preservation, considering its great antiquity and the material of which its walls are composed. This grand old relic of an age and people of which we have no other than traditionary accounts looms up over the desert in bold relief as the traveler approaches, filling the mind with a strange perplexity as to the past. What race dwelt here? by what people were these crumbling walls put together? how did they live? and where are they gone? were questions that we were reluctant to believe must forever remain unanswered; and yet modern research has not to this day approached a solution of the mystery. The earliest account we have of the Casas Grandas of the Gila is that of Mangi, who visited them in company with Father Kino in 1694. He speaks of the main ruin as a great edifice, with the principal room in the middle four stories high, and the walls two yards thick, and composed of strong mortar and clay; which forms a prominent land-mark, we traveled some eight or ten miles, till we struck the remains of an ancient acequia, very large and clearly defined. This was evidently the main artery of a series of acequias, by which a large tract of river-bottom was irrigated in ancient times. That villages and farms extended over a vast area of valley land in this vicinity was evident from the quantity of broken pottery and indications of cultivation we found on all sides. Mesquit-trees, apparently falling into decay from age, now stand in the bed of the main acequia. Diverging to the right when within a few miles of White's ranch, we struck out through the

and also mentions the existence of twelve other ruins in the vicinity. Only three of these are now seen above the surface of the ground, although there are evidence of many more in detached mounds which abound in the neighborhood. The probability is that the main building, which at present forms the most prominent object in view, was the nucleus of an extensive city. From the account given by Father Pedro Font of his visit to this region during his journey from Orcasitas, in Sonora, to Monterey, California, in 1775, '6, and '7, it appears that he found the Casas Grandas very much in their present condition. The Indians, he states, had a tradition among them that these Great Houses were built five hundred years ago.

Each group of ruins stands upon a slight eminence distant from the other a few hundred feet. The tower or central part of the principal building is about forty feet high, and there were originally four stories in the main body of the building, as well as we could judge by the holes in the walls, in which are still seen the ends of the round poles, or rafters, which supported the floors. Several of these that we took out are some five or six inches in diameter, and seem to be composed of a species of cedar. The ends show very plainly marks of the blunt instrument with which they were cut—probably a stone hatchet. It is evident the use of iron was unknown to the people who originally dwelt here. Mr. Lennan informed us that during a previous visit he had made some slight excavations in the ground, and found a number of bone awls; and other instruments of flint, stone, and bone have also been discovered, of which we had accounts from Mr. White.

The walls of the Casa Granda are composed of a concrete of mud and gravel, very hard, and capable of long enduring the wear and tear of the seasons in this equable climate. The upper portion has been somewhat washed and furrowed by the rains, and the base is worn away to such a depth as to threaten the permanency of the whole fabric, from which one may judge of its antiquity. This concrete, or adobe, was cast in large blocks, several feet square, presenting originally, no doubt, a smooth flat surface; but the outside has been affected by the changes of the seasons. The inner surface is as smooth and hard as the finest plastered room. At the time of Mr. Bartlett's visit there were traces of rude paintings and hieroglyphics to be seen on the interior walls; but these have been either so defaced as not now to be perceptible, or washed away by heavy rains. I saw no hieroglyphics in the building except the names of some Texan adventurers and California Volunteers, scribbled with a piece of charcoal. Rude sketches of Jeff Davis hung by the neck and President Lincoln fleeing from the vengeance of the Chivalry indicated rather forcibly that we were not beyond the reach of sectional prejudices. One name was especially worthy of note—that of Paul Weaver, 1833, a famous trapper and pioneer, whose history is closely identified with that of Arizona.

THE PAINTED ROCKS ON THE GILA.

THE PAINTINGS ON THE ROCKS.

The outer dimensions are fifty feet north and south, and forty feet east and west; the thickness of the walls at the base four feet. I made a sketch and ground plan of the building, both of which differ from any that I have seen published.

We spent half a day very pleasantly in exploring these interesting ruins, and took our departure for the camp on the Gila late in the evening, well laden with curiosities. Every member of the party had his fragment of pottery and specimen of adobe and plaster.

The next day we returned to the Sacatone and prepared for our journey across the desert. Little did I think, in parting from our kind friend Mr. Lennan, who had interested himself to make our visit to the Casa Granda both agreeable and profitable, that we were destined never more to meet in this world. A brief narrative of his subsequent adventures and death will afford the reader a better idea of the present condition of Arizona than any thing I can say in the way of description.

About the middle of January twenty-eight head of stock were stolen from the corral of Messrs. Peoples and Dye, on the Antelope ranch, twelve miles north of Weaversville; at Granite Creek sixteen head were taken; and King Woolsey lost thirty-three head of cattle from the Aqua Frio ranch, thirty miles southeast of Fort Whipple. The miners in the vicinity had also lost many animals, and were almost destitute of transportation. A company was organized under the command of King Woolsey to follow the trail of the missing stock, and, if possible, punish the depredators, who were supposed to be Pinal Apaches. Twenty-eight men, well-armed and equipped, set out on this expedition. Following the trail from the Hasiampa to the Aqua Frio they crossed twelve miles above the Frog Tanks, thence to the mouth of Black Cañon, which they followed down to the San Francisco River, striking it at the head of the lower valley. All this time they were on the trail of the stolen stock, but had not as yet seen any Indians. When out sixteen days from the Hasiampa they fell short of provisions, so that it became necessary to divide the company and send a small party down to the Pimo villages for fresh supplies. On the return of this party they all started up the Salinas from its junction with the Rio Verde or San Francisco. At that point they were joined by a party of fourteen Maricopas, under the chief Juan Chivaria, headed by our friend Cyrus Lennan, who had volunteered to join the expedition. Stock had been stolen at the Maricopa Wells from Mr. Rogers who was hauling up the Indian goods; also from the Maricopas. Lennan had generously offered his aid to recover the animals. As it subsequently appeared this stock was stolen by Mr. Rogers's vaquero. I saw two of the mules myself in Tucson. The Indians, however, were killed on general principles, and the recovery of the stolen animals did them no good in this world or the next. Another American named Fisher accompanied the expedition. All joined and traveled a day and night through Endless Cañon; scaled it, and traveled for thirty-five miles on the ridge, when they descended into a small valley surrounded by mountains. There was no outlet to the valley, and no way of getting into it other than the way the company entered. They were still on the trail of the missing animals; stopped at what is now called Bloody Tanks, and having traveled all night without eating, they built up a fire for the first time in daylight and set about cooking their morning repast. As soon as the fire blazed up some Indians answered it by building another on the top of a high mountain to the east. Not long after the Indians discovered themselves, and advancing toward the camp began waving their guns, yelling, and making other hostile demonstrations as if bantering the white men to come up and fight them. King Woolsey sent up Tonto Jack, an interpreter, to learn what they had to say, and at the same time to tell them it was not the wish of his party to fight them; that he wanted them to come down and he would give them some pinole. As a reason for this invitation it is alleged that nobody could tell whether the Indians were friends or enemies. Mr. Dye states that when they came close enough to talk they were very bold in their manner, and said, tauntingly: "We are your enemies; we have stolen your horses and cattle; we have killed you whenever we could; and will continue to kill you whenever we meet you. If you are not squaws, come on and fight us." After a long talk, and the profession of peaceful intentions on the part of Woolsey and his command, the Indians were finally persuaded to come into camp. Most of them laid down their arms outside as directed; a few secreted their bows and arrows under their serapas; and while they were talking others, coming in one by one, brought the remaining arms along with them, till some thirty or thirty-five were gathered in camp. Woolsey told them, after some talk, that he would give them a passport, informing all Americans that they were good people, and requesting that they should be treated as friends, with which, he said, they would be all right hereafter; nobody would molest them. Par-a-muck-a, the chief, came up, and waving his hand with a haughty air, ordered Woolsey to smooth a place on the sand for him to sit upon; that he was a great chief, and didn't choose to sit on the rocks while talking. Woolsey, suppressing his indignation, calmly folded up a red blanket and offered it to the chief. Par-a-muck-a sullenly accepted the gift, and spreading it upon the ground sat down. These were the preliminaries of an Arizonian "treaty." Then Woolsey called up eight of the Maricopas and stationed them on his left, informing them that they should assist in signing the document. The white men were drawn up on the right, and were instructed to be "on hand." These movements created a good deal of suspicion. The strange Indians were evidently uneasy. For a moment there was a deathlike silence. Suddenly Woolsey drew his pistol, leveled it, and shot Per-a-muck-a dead on the spot. This was the signal for the signing of the treaty. Simultaneously the whole party commenced firing upon the Indians, slaughtering them right and left. Lennan stood in advance of the Maricopas, and was warned by Woolsey to make sure of a lame Indian with a lance, who was eying him suspiciously. "I'll look out for him," was Lennan's reply; and the slaughter became general. Those of the Indians who were not shot down instantly fought with desperation, retreating a little way and then turning back. Some of them kept running, and shot their arrows as they ran. The fight, if such it could be called, lasted seven or eight minutes. Lennan had incautiously closed upon and shot an Indian near him, forgetting the lame one against whom he had been cautioned, who the next moment ran him through the body with his lance. Dye coming up killed this Indian. Lennan fell back on the ground, exclaiming, "I am killed!" He lived only a few minutes. The lance passed directly through his breast, cutting a portion of his heart. The only other person wounded was Tonto Jack, who was shot in the neck with an arrow. Juan Chivaria, the Maricopa chief, fought with great courage, and did good service. These were found to be Tonto and Pinal Apaches. Four of them were recognized as Pinals, belonging to the tribe of Mangus Colorado. Twenty Tontos and four Pinals lay dead upon the ground. Others were seen running off with the blood streaming from their wounds, and it is supposed some of them died. Of the whole number that came into the council it is estimated that not over five or six escaped. During the fight there were more Indians seen on the hills; but they were afraid to come down. The scene of this massacre has been appropriately named the "Bloody Tanks."

Mr. Lennan's body was wrapped up in a blanket and packed on his own saddle-mule as far down as the junction of the Salinas and Rio Verde. It was found impossible to carry it any farther, and his companions dug a grave and buried it near a cotton-wood tree, upon which they cut his name and the day of the month. A brush-fire was made over the grave to destroy the traces and keep the Indians from finding the body. The Maricopas then left, and those of the party who belonged north returned to the Hasiampa.

Mr. Lennan was a young man of kindly and genial manners, much beloved by all who knew him. His death derived a sad interest to me from the fact that he had shown great hospitality to us during our sojourn at the Pimo villages, and subsequently had been our guide and companion to the Casas Grandas. I was most favorably impressed by his good-nature and friendly interest in the objects of our tour, and felt that we, as well as our fellow-traveler Ammi White, had suffered a personal loss.

AT HOME.

SMOKE-SHROUDED was the shell-plowed field,

Charge followed charge through fire and flame,
Once more our stubborn line of steel

Stood as the dark squares onward came.
Our Colonel, faint and smitten sore,

Spurned down the gusts of leaden rain,
"Close up, dear boys, our Flag before
Has never called in vain!"

His voice filled up the thin ranks torn,
Twin cheers and volleys rent the vale,
Our standard-bearer, pressing on,
Fell in the answering hail.

A stripling caught his dear bequest,
Straight to their midst he hewed his way,
Flung out our banner o'er their crest,
And held a score at bay.

Loud rang behind our tribute roar,
Fast in his steps our rifles pressed,
And reached him staining with his gore
The standard on his breast.

As soft we raised him—for the day
Was won—his white lips flecked with foam,
Faint murmured as he strove to pray,
"O! will they hear of this at Home!"

A CRUISE ON THE "SASSACUS."

THE COLLISION.

THE most inexplicable interruption of plan and changes of destination attended the outset of the career of the United States steamer S—. An instance of this, and the only one of sufficient interest to merit record, resulted in her participation in a week of events most interesting and exciting.

These have been jotted down, for though three years of blockade may have rendered them not unusual, yet their minutiae seem rarely to find access to the public eye.

On the morning of the 3d of December, '63, the S— left Washington, bound for New Orleans, having an iron-clad in tow. Farewells had been spoken, and the departure was looked upon as the beginning of a long cruise. There were the usual regrets and longing glances cast backward toward the receding city; and neither the beauty of the weather nor a bracing, invigorating breeze, could wholly dispel anxiety as to the uncertain future. Toward evening the clouds began to gather, and an increasing mistiness of the atmosphere gave indications of a storm. When darkness settled down, however, it had become clearer, and the full moon gave a dim outline to shore and water, distinct enough to preclude the necessity for anchoring. We were sitting after supper canvassing our prospects, and arguing upon various subjects—among other things, what a fine time we should have if, by accident, we should run ashore and the iron-clad run into us.

Various experiences were given to show the ease with which such a monster could go completely through a wooden ship, the great momentum, etc., and an argument was even started as to how far she would probably get into the ward-room before we could get out; as to the depth of water, too, the width of the river, and various interesting concomitants of escape from a sinking ship; when suddenly, as if a thunder-bolt had struck, there came a crash, a heavy lurch, a shiver of the whole ship—and, quicker than words can describe it, away went chairs, plates, and table, and every one vanished through the door and up the ladder. Yet not every one either, for a ward-room boy, simultaneously with the noise and concussion, had tumbled against a stanchion, and, in spite of the emergency and apparently imminent peril, it was most laughable to see his horror-stricken, despairing countenance, as, with eyes turned upward, round and white as saucers, and knees knocking together, he ejaculated, "Oh! we're gone!" On deck all was at first black as Erebus. There was running hither and thither; cries for help from the water; flashing of lanterns and loud shouts of command. The fact that we were still afloat was at once apparent, but the probabilities of remaining so were a question. The lights of the iron-clad showed her to be on our quarter, and not in contact with us; but a black object, like a phantom-ship, under full sail, was slowly drifting astern, and by the glimmer of lights on her deck all doubts as to the nature at least of our disaster began to resolve. Something or other had plainly run into us, and it was not our friend the iron-clad. As soon as the crash of collision was heard her engines had been stopped, her helm put hard aport, and she had sheered off, almost grazing our quarter. A boat was instantly lowered in answer to the cry for help which had appeared to come from the water, as well as to render assistance, if need be, to the other colliding ship. In this boat, with the sailing-master, went the surgeon, to look out for those who might perchance be wounded. Meantime, by the aid of half a dozen lights and considerable trouble, an approximate idea of our own injury was arrived at.

The ship had struck the S— forward of the wheel-house on the port side, and carried away nearly the whole of it, as well as apparently a part of the wheel itself. But more, and worse than all, five or six men were missing. The pumps were sounded as soon as possible, with the result of assuring us that the ship's hull was uninjured; not an inch of water was making. As quiet was now restored, the first thought perhaps to many was the natural one, after the discussion of the early part of the evening—"This is the end of this cruise, at any rate!" The next, and more humane one, was of anxiety for our poor fellows who must have been lost overboard.

As one boat's crew was away, the names and even the number of the missing ones could not at once be ascertained; and the return of the absent boat was awaited with deep interest.

Upon boarding the other vessel, which had soon drifted out of sight in the darkness, she was found to be the W—, a brig out of Boston, with lumber, bound for Washington. Her captain was found in a state of great nervous trepidation, either from imminent danger of going down—as he at once said his ship was leaking—or from anticipation of being severely handled for running into a man-of-war. Whatever may have been the cause, he shook as with an ague. We soon had reason, however, to form a good opinion of him; for though having but few men, and knowing his own ship to be badly injured, perhaps sinking, he had instantly lowered his boat as the same cry we had heard reached his ears, and had succeeded in picking up two of our missing men.

These two had been found together, both wounded by the wheel, which had struck them as they fell—one, who could swim, heroically holding up his companion, who could not, till assistance should arrive. The injury received by the brig was rather severe, and amounted to having a hole stove through her port bow, about ten feet in length by three or four in breadth, smashing several bunks, and rather unceremoniously dislodging their occupants. In this nice little aperture were stowed about a dozen square feet of our iron sheathing and a good part of our wheel and wheel-house. Farther aft than this were a few other evidences of collision of a similar nature as well as torn rigging, dislodged lumber, etc. The captain and mate, upon going below with our officers, surveyed the major opening through which the outside darkness was visible with rueful countenances, but of course denied any fault in the matter on their part, and even talked of damages of another nature to be recovered by a court. The result of the investigation and inquiry was a conviction that the brig had been recklessly steered across the S—'s hawse under a mistaken idea as to distance, and suddenly, when too late, the helm had been put hard down. She was found to be not leaking badly, and was therefore left with no misgivings as to her sinking. The two wounded and half-drowned men were properly cared for and taken back to the S—. The other missing men were never found or heard of, and must have been killed outright by our powerful wheels.

It was impossible of course for us now to proceed, and a report was made of the extent of our injury to the commander of the iron-clad. As it happened a commodore was on board, who gave orders for us to return to Washington, and took the responsibility of proceeding in the iron-clad without escort to Fortress Monroe.

Upon that accident depended the events to be narrated, for the circumstances of war wait for no repairs, and another ship supplied our place at New Orleans. Weeks passed, and with completion of repairs came most agreeable orders for a cruise, on what is called the outer blockade, a sort of independent search for blockade-runners, any where between two or more defined points. In the latter part of January we joined the North Atlantic Squadron, and at Norfolk completed such preparations as were necessary for the cruise, such as sending down topmasts and crows' nests, and lightening ship to some extent of superfluous ammunition.

With the most pleasing confidence in the unsurpassed speed of the S—it will surely not be wondered at that every day's delay seemed most irksome. We were anxious to try her to advantage behind the swiftest of the blockade-breakers, and when upon leaving Norfolk she tried a run of fifteen or twenty miles for the benefit of the admiral, and accomplished the distance at the rate of fourteen and a half knots an hour, the eagerness for active service increased.

On the morning of the 28th we steamed seaward. Does any one whose days are filled with the anxieties of business or the allurements of pleasure ever wonder how the hours pass on a cruiser, where the monotony of the most routine of all routines reigns for days together? The most unimportant and trivial subjects excite debate, the most worn and threadbare remarks on more than threadbare past events spice the meals and fill up the chinks. The past experience of most of our officers afforded vivid examples of such a life, and though instead of an inside blockade we were to try now for the first time an outside and freer one, yet we could not but anticipate a good deal more of the same sort of monotony.

Yet we were destined to most agreeable disappointment. Scarcely were twenty-four hours passed ere a sail was made and we gave chase. There was no black smoke to mark her as a blockade-runner, but all sails were to be overhauled without distinction. It proved to be merely a schooner heavily laden but having correct papers.

Another and another were chased with the same result, then a steam transport filled with our own soldiers, and the next day several craft of various description. But on the morning of the third day out, having arrived upon the appointed cruising ground, a thin curl of dark smoke was descried upon the horizon.

Down went the helm, around came the ship's prow. Four bells!* and we were off for the anticipated prize. The wind blew freshly, dead ahead, and the white-capped waves tossed their spray over our bows, but so low were we in the water that it hindered us but little. An hour passed and yet another, and the wheel-houses and upper deck of the chase were above the horizon. The distance between us, at first about twelve miles, had now decreased by three, but a thin mist filled the atmosphere and was slowly settling upon the whole sea. Speculations as to whether the chase were a prize or one of our own steamers had been all along rife, but her actions began to convince us. Evidently a swift steamer, the foam under her paddle-wheels, which could plainly be seen by a glass, as well as the increased volume of smoke from her fires, evidenced a desire to escape. Interest increased, and repeatedly were glasses leveled to measure the advantage we were gaining. Impatience at the settling fog began to add fears that she might be hidden before we could overtake her. While the interest was the warmest and impatience most irritating, and the fog becoming more and more dense, some part of our machinery began to heat and the wheels to move more slowly. It was most provoking. Oil was useless, and constant streams of cold water would barely allow a moderate rate of speed. Fortunately a change of course on the part of the chase, by altering the effect of the waves upon us, relieved the strain upon the heating parts, and again we were under full headway. Still gaining slowly but steadily upon it, the dim mass ahead loomed up to us through the fog.

* Ahead fast—to the engineers.

THE CHASE THROUGH THE FOG.

A heavier bank than usual had accumulated upon her port side, and suddenly changing her course full three points, she plunged into it out of sight. This manœuvre seemed to settle all doubts as to her loyalty, but to increase those of her capture.

Still we kept the same course, reasoning, as it proved correctly, that once in the fog she would resume her original course, and trust to our having changed when she did. In less than five minutes the fog thinned, and there she was, still ahead, though a little on our port bow, but nearer.

It was estimated that now hardly three miles were between us, and at half past two o'clock in the afternoon a 100-pounder Parrott rifle was trained on her, and a shot fell just outside the foam of her wheels. Not a signal was shown, nor a sign of slackening speed returned, and in ten minutes the order was given, "Fire to hit." Another shot was fired, and anxiously we watched it, a little black speck in the air, as, splendidly in line, it struck apparently into her quarter. Colors were now flown from her peak, but the mist was too thick to enable us to read them, and still she kept her speed. Another shot and another whistled after her, and a flash from one of her stern guns sent back reply. Interest had now become excitement; every pound of steam was crowded on to urge us forward. The gong sounded to quarters. Our whole battery was cleared for action, and every preparation made for the fight.

Was it the Alabama or Florida? What a chance for distinction to overtake and capture one of those noted pirates! The distance now rapidly diminished, and firing ceased; not a sound save the plashing wheels and rushing waters broke the stillness. Eagerness for the fight yet anxiety as to its result filled every heart. We were prepared for no disappointment aside from those of battle; and when we neared and could distinguish every part of the chase, and read the numbers still flying at her peak, and comparing their interpretation with the appearance of the ship, be convinced that it was indeed one of our own steamers, imagination can alone conceive the change in the mind of all from excitement to indignation.

It would be as impolitic as useless to add more: we turned about and steamed again for our station. Weeks afterward we heard from those who were on board that steamer that the reasons for her not having come to after the first fire were considerably at variance. One story was that we were taken for a new Anglo-Rebel ram that was expected; another, that the captain was in great haste.

BLOCKADE-RUNNER "WILD DAYRELL" ASHORE.

Whatever may have been the reason it resulted in drawing the S— from her station, so that on her return, at about dawn of day, another but thicker and blacker smoke was in sight, in toward the shore, about off Stump Inlet. Not only this, but a long, low hull, with raking masts and smoke-stack, lay below the smoke full in sight. Swiftly, like a hawk on its prey, the S— sped toward her. Scarcely six miles away, clearly visible as she was to us, almost, indeed, within range of our guns, yet she tried to escape. Too close, however, in-shore, under which her pilot had attempted to crawl along in the dusk past the innermost blockaders, she struck, and even then the utmost efforts were quickly made to save her. A kedge was led out from her quarter, bales on bales of goods were thrown overboard with almost incredible rapidity, but they had miscalculated our speed and draught. Ere more than the first effort could be made we were within range, and a shot whistled over their heads. Helter-skelter ran every one for the boats, and leaving every thing as it stood, with the engines still moving, they fled precipitately. A narrow creek led inland, and with all dispatch they pulled up into it and disappeared. One or two shots from a rifled howitzer were fired ahead of the flying boats; but no heed was given, and so short was the time ere a bend in the creek had hidden them from view that a more effective and telling reminder could not be sent. The surf dashed against her sides and at times completely washed her decks. Clouds of smoke and steam poured from her, mingling with the spray. It seemed certain that the rebels must have set her on fire, great as was their haste. Quick were the willing hands that lowered our boats almost before the anchor touched the bottom, but it was a perilous task to attempt through such a line of surf to pull boats never built or intended for the work. The wind was blowing freshly, and every moment seemed to increase the swell and break of the waves around and over the stranded ship. Nor was this all. Even were the ship itself not on fire, we knew full well that every inflammable substance had been thrown under her boilers to increase her steam, and the clouds arising from her looked ominous.

Every moment increased the probability of her blowing up, especially as the blockade-runners have an unpleasant habit of fastening down the safety-valves and putting on the blowers at the moment of abandoning the ship. Every instant was precious, and without a moment's hesitation at the danger of surf or steam, the boats were away and rolling among the breakers ere the last shot fired over the retreating rebels fell in the water beyond them.

Bravely the boats passed the first breakers, and soon tossing against the prize, one and another scrambled from them up the ship's side. The first thought and attention was given to the engines and boilers. The safety-valve was found so securely fastened that the most vigorous efforts failed to relieve it. One may only imagine the sensations of those who were thus so in very contact with destruction, uncertain whether one, two, or three minutes might not end all in one complete and terrible explosion. While ready hands were thus busy above the boilers, others below were hauling the furious fires or drenching them with water. The peril was imminent beyond expression. Again and again did the brave men apply themselves to the resisting valve till day, though only measured by seconds, was more than reckless. Yet soon success rewarded exertion, and a scream of escaping steam relieved the tremendous pressure that had been accumulating.

The ship was not on fire, though it was evidently no fault of her former crew; for matches, signal-lights, and all sorts of inflammable materials hastily piled together, but more hastily abandoned, declared their intention. Yet, after all, fire would have given little trouble, for almost every part of the ship from keel to pilot-house was of iron. She was in most filthy condition. Paint had long since given place to whitewash, and whitewash to the effects of wind and rain. Heavy cases of goods from firms in New York, and of shoes marked as from Lynn, Massachusetts, were lying about the deck, or lifted half upon the rail in the attempt so hurriedly made to lighten ship. In the hold bales of dry goods were still swinging from the whips; while in the cabin all sorts of articles of toilet or apparel, hastily emptied trunks and valises, bottles and glasses, were strewn about the floor. Her log-book showed her to be the Wild Dayrell, of whose speed and successful trips to the Confederacy the public had often heard.

She was three days out of Nassau, and several times before had been chased by our cruisers, but had proved too fast for them.

Her lading was merchandise of every description, bushels of oranges and barrels of liquor.

The kedge, before spoken of as led out from her quarter, was found to have had a strong but light cable attached, and led to the shaft around which the motion of the engine had tightly wound it. All danger from fire or steam disposed of, attention was turned to continuing the laudable exertions of her former occupants. The tide seemed unfortunately to be falling; for though the surf was still as heavy, yet bare hill-ocks of sand began to appear in dangerous proximity to the S— herself. To get ashore would have been almost to insure destruction; for every one knew that in twenty-four hours the rebels would have soldiers or a battery down upon the beach; and while they might at first prove little more than an annoyance, proper exertions for getting again afloat would be seriously interfered with. Prudently, therefore, the S— retired a little further from the shoals, and again anchored to await the return tide. Meantime a strong hawser was made ready and men set to the task of lightening the prize, beginning with the coal which almost filled her bunkers. Most unfortunately, as is well known, a strong penchant exists in a Jack Tar for whisky, and, as is also pretty generally known, he usually manages to get it by hook or crook if ever placed in its vicinity; the utmost vigilance, moreover, is hardly ever able to avert such an issue. There was no exception in this case. The most trusty men were sent below to stave in every barrel, jug, and jar of intoxicating liquor, and guards were stationed over them; but the men seemed to get drunk from the fumes, and as the guards were also soon drunk, it is fair to suppose they were drunk from sympathy.

THE CABIN OF THE "WILD DAYRELL."

The coal came up slowly. Those who hauled on the end of the rope somehow always worked under the lee of a bulk-head or wheel-house, and there seemed a tendency of the whole line toward the same point; so that the aftermost man gave place at almost every second pull, and came up to the head of the line. In fact, the strong smell of whisky soon began to direct unmistakable suspicion toward the vicinity, and, in a word, so many men were getting under the influence of liquor that the officers were obliged to get them into the boats and abandon work.

With the rise of the tide another boat put off from the S—, with a hawser. It was safely carried through the breakers and made fast to the bow of the prize.

Meantime, as might have been expected, one of the return boats, with her hilarious crew, in attempting to pass the surf was nearly capsized and grounded, tumbling about half a dozen men overboard. This cold bath was most beneficial; they were so far sobered as very sensibly to stay overboard and lay hold of the boat and haul it into deeper water.

When all was ready on the ships, and the tide nearly at its height, both engines were started, the hawser tautened, the prize yielded slowly, very slowly—stopped again, then stuck fast, one long, strong pull and snap! the cable parted in the hawse-hole.

The transfer of a cable under such circumstances is no easy matter, nor is it one of a few moments, and ere another could be made ready the tide was falling. Nothing could therefore be done save to wait another tide, and meantime renewed efforts were made to get the coal out. After the precaution taken to destroy all liquors the work was expected to proceed more successfully.

The wind increased in freshness as dusk began to close around, and it required considerable nerve to look calmly upon the shoals so near us and hear their sullen roar, beating as they were upon an enemy's coast. Yet every thing was kept in readiness for getting underway if the wind should increase too dangerously. All boats were recalled, and no one remained upon the prize. The work on board of her had proceeded more successfully than before, and nearly all the coal had been thrown overboard. About midnight the hawser was again tautened, and though only the stars furnished their feeble light, the S— was tasked her utmost to haul that ship from the strand. Again the hawser broke and the effort was given up. Lights now appeared on the shore, and back among the trees several could be seen moving hither and thither. Morning would probably bring the rebels upon us, and it was almost regretted that the steamer had not been at once destroyed. Morning brought no change, however, save that the Wild Dayrell was two hundred feet farther on the beach. As the weather was clear and beautiful, and no special necessity apparent for leaving, a third trial was resolved upon.

In accordance with this determination boats and crews were made ready as before, when another actor appeared in the drama. A sail was made out approaching from the direction of the Wilmington fleet.

It proved to be the F— man-of-war. She came up, and anchored.

Assistance was volunteered, and almost at the same moment four boats loaded with men and officers put off from her for the prize. The men from the S— were already hard at work hoisting coal, tumbling heavy barrels, etc., over the side, guards being as before stationed over all goods of value, the cabin, and its stores. Without any ceremony, or so much as "by your leave," all orders were broken down, and like freebooters the new-comers began lightening ship in a very different manner from the first design. Had the commander of the stranger not made his appearance on the scene at this moment blood would have followed.

Fighting is too nearly allied to displeasure in a sailor's mind to allow much of an interval between a word and a blow, and even the presence of the commanding officer hardly restored order.

He, being senior to the captain of the S—, gave orders to desist from work, as it was now apparent upon sounding about her that she never would float again. Orders were also added to save whatever provisions were needed by the crews of either vessel, but to take provisions only.

In about two hours goods apparently most bulky had entirely melted away. However comprehensive the word "provisions" may be the large proportion of articles which thus disappeared could hardly be included.

It was most fortunate that not a demijohn of liquor remained after the destruction of the morning, or authority, and even force, would have been of no avail to control so many.

As it was, however, all went along pretty smoothly for nearly half an hour, till suddenly the sharp crack of rifles, and the whiz of a score of bullets overhead, hurried every body in preparation for the destruction. The blue lights and matches were this time more effectually piled together, and every part of the ship insured for complete and simultaneous combustion.

Then came the gauntlet of a quarter of a mile along the beach, from which the firing was now pretty constant. The wind was blowing directly on shore, and as nothing but muskets had yet been fired at us the sound seemed not to have reached the S—. The bullets whistled overhead, into the boat's sides, among the oars, and through hats and coats, but not a man had yet fallen. Sturdily the men lay to the oars till the boat fairly flew. It seemed utterly impossible to reach the ship without the loss of many men, and in spite of the peril of the situation we could not but feel a sort of contempt for such poor marksmen. But now they have seen from the ship the little curls of smoke out of the bushes, and an admonition to the rebels to retire is hurled from the hurricane deck—one, two, three howitzer shells burst over or in the infested shelter; and now not a marksman can be seen along the shore. The curling tongues of flame that now shot out from the decks of the Wild Dayrell showed that the torch had been faithfully applied; clouds of lurid smoke poured from the holds, and enveloped the whole of her light masts, sails, and rigging.

To insure complete ruin of her engines, and to preclude the remote possibility of her ever serving again either her owners or the rebels, both the S— and F— took position, and shot after shot was fired through the iron hull. Bursting shells soon tore immense holes in bows and stern, or threw masses of shattered deck and cargo high into the air.

In three hours the anticipated prize lay upon the beach a complete wreck.

Ere the night came again we were off for our outer station; but hours after dark the red light from the still smouldering fire marked to us the spot we had left.

Subsequently we learned that the F—, having lain at anchor until the following morning, was attacked from the shore by the rebels, who had brought down a light battery.

Several holes through various parts of the ship, and several killed and wounded, attested their superior skill over the misnamed sharpshooters who had fired upon the boats. It was now the sixth day out, and though at starting the prospect of finding any blockade-runners seemed limited, yet the whole time, thus far, had been filled with the excitement of chase. Every one was willing, therefore, to prophesy that not another one would be seen for a month, and it seemed very probable.

By dawn of day our cruising ground was reached, and with its earliest glimmer "Sail, ho!" was shouted from the mast-head.

A thin, black smoke just dimmed the verge of the horizon, and again four bells started the S— in pursuit.

Rapidly at first, because not yet ourselves discovered, we gained upon the stranger, till just as the hull was becoming dimly visible, she seemed to spy us, and for an hour not a rod appeared to have as yet been gained by the pursuer.

The smoke became thicker and blacker, and had her name been written in gigantic letters upon the cloud it could not have rendered more certain the character of the chase. The sea was smooth as a mill-pond, and only a gentle wind blew over its unruffled surface.

It was splendid weather for speed, and pursuer and pursued made the very most of it. Mile after mile, hour after hour, the chase kept on. The same difficulty with heating machinery occurred as before, and the same means were tried to obviate it.

More and more distinct grew the stranger, though scarcely a mile an hour diminished the distance between us. The white foam could be faintly distinguished under her paddle-wheels at the end of the sixth hour, but gradually, as if to run for some port, she had changed her course shoreward, and unless greater speed could be attained might yet escape or be stranded and destroyed. Every fire was cleaned, and every pound of steam that the boilers would bear was crowded on. We were now moving at the rate of sixteen miles an hour. The smoke-stack was gradually turning brown from the heat, and flakes of paint peeled off and fell upon the deck. So intensely hot did it become that one could not stand within six feet of it, and men were stationed with hose and buckets of water in order to quench the first appearance of flame in the deck through which it passed. Bales of goods began to float past us. They were lightening ship. "Land, ho!" came from the mast-head look-out, and far away a low dark border to the horizon could be seen with a glass. Oh for ten miles more sea-room or another revolution of our wheels! Yet, after all, she will be overtaken ere she can reach the shore; for the distance is now barely three miles between us, and there are yet twelve miles to run. There was no time for a mathematical calculation as to how likely a steamer gaining on another scarcely two miles an hour, and both moving at such speed, would be to overtake her in a run of twelve miles; there seemed no time for any thing in the excitement of the chase, though the very minutes appeared hours. The shore grew bolder and plainly visible even without a glass.

The 100-pounder rifle could carry a message, and it was called in requisition for the purpose. A shell was fired. It rose high in the air, and, like a speck, could be seen on its course till a little puff of smoke took its place directly over the flying vessel. No notice was taken save apparently to hasten her flight. Another followed, and another swept her decks; but the running hither and yon of the excited crew and the cool indifference of the man at her wheel were the only results.

It was now evident that she would succeed in stranding, and most probably be set on fire. The water was shoaling rapidly, and the leadsmen's song changed at every cast of the lead, till "by the mark five" had become "deep four," and it was time to slacken speed. Another cast of the lead, and "by the mark three" gave new cause for anxiety. "Stop her!" "Back her!" were the orders of almost the same breath; but the cast still gave three fathoms.

The chase struck hard and strong ahead of us, going at full speed. Simultaneous with the shock her boats, full of men, touched the breakers, and one capsized. Without regard for the men struggling in the water, the other boats pulled swiftly through the surf and up one of the numerous inlets which cut the coast, and across which, fortunately for them, the ship had stranded. The S—'s boats, fully manned and armed, were also in the water ere the last man had left the prize's decks. Yet before the intervening space could be crossed the catastrophe we had feared was come about. A dozen streams of smoke were beginning to creep lazily upward from different parts of the ship, and every moment increased in volume. She was on fire. The former experience with the safety-valve of the Wild Dayrell rendered a similar hazardous exposure more to be dreaded; especially since a tremendous pressure of steam was evidenced by the almost incredible velocity of her revolving wheels, as well as the complete absence of any appearance of steam above decks. Yet not a moment was given to hesitation. As the first boat touched the ship's side officers and men jumped aboard. Meantime another boat had put off from the S— to rescue, if possible, those who were still struggling among the breakers.

The utmost exertions, and a venturing close upon the reef although the boat was most unsuited to any such work, were unsuccessful in rescuing more than one man.

He, who proved to have been the purser of the ship, was found clinging to the capsized boat, and had the additional advantage of a life-preserver round his body. Sick and almost dead from exhaustion and swallowing so much salt-water, he was hauled on board the S— and reserved for future use. Arrived on the deck of the burning steamer the first thought and effort was directed toward the engine-room, and in a moment more the escaping steam relieved all anxiety from that quarter. The next and perhaps simultaneous one was for the fire. Tarpaulins were covered over every hatch, and the ship's buckets, quickly found, were soon employed to pour a constant stream of water upon them. This was not enough, the blackness of the smoke, and the strong odor of turpentine, showed that it was no ordinary fire raging below. A small fire-engine was sent from the S—, and for several minutes the progress of the workers was viewed with deep interest. The smoke seemed to grow still blacker, and red tongues of flame came at intervals from the crevices to mingle with it. Every moment increased the peril, for traces of ammunition on deck showed what might be the character of the cargo below, and the thought that a single spark in the magazine might at any instant blow ship and men to atoms made the blood run cold. This increase of flame, however, was but the last flaring of the candle, and very soon scarcely a trace of smoke or fire rose from the deck. The water was rising every moment, and the most sanguine hopes were entertained of getting the ship again afloat. A hawser was led from the S— to her, and the short interval before high-tide was filled up with soundings and preparation for a long strong pull. The steamer proved to be the Nutfield, perfectly new, and, as her papers showed, laden with arms and stores for the Confederate Government. She had been chased the day before, and escaped only to find herself at night in the very midst of the inside blockaders off Wilmington. Eluding these and again putting straight to sea, daylight had brought her within range of our watchful look-outs, and the result was before us. In a short time various points in the deck were found to be getting hot, and an ominous hollow sound under the footsteps indicated the activity of the flames below. Holes were cut where the deck was hottest, and streams of water poured down with the little fire-engine before mentioned. In the cabin of the prize, which was most luxuriantly furnished, stood the breakfast-table hastily abandoned. A lavish expenditure of turpentine had soaked every thing both of food and furniture, but the fire had fortunately failed to take, and nothing appeared injured. The same profusion of wearing apparel was strewn about the cabin as on the Wild Dayrell, and the same evidence of hasty abandonment were visible in the state-rooms. It was, however, now high-tide, and inspection of cabin and cargo was changed for active exertion to save the ship.

The engines of both steamers were started, the cable tautened, the prize moved, and a cheer was given as she seemed to be afloat, but the wind, which had increased, was rapidly forcing the S— over upon a neighboring shoal, and with a terrible shock she struck.

Quick as lightning the cable was cut, and just in time the powerful wheels launched the ship ahead upon the swell, and once more in deeper water. It was over, and every one breathed freer. There was no alternative now but to wait once more for the tide, and fill the interval by lightening the beached ship of part of her cargo. Cases of muskets, rifles, and swords were passed up from the after hold, where alone the fire had been entirely quelled, and being too valuable to be thrown overboard were transferred to the hold of the S—. About forty cases had been started before night came, so that upon the midnight tide hopes were entertained that she might be made to float. Another hawser was stretched before dusk, and every thing made ready, but fortune seemed against us. The tide rose, the engines were started, the cable tautened, strained, and broke. It was provoking; but it was determined on the following day to endeavor at least to save part of the most valuable cargo. In accordance with this plan men were set to work at daylight. Cases of needles, hardware of every sort, saddles, bridles, gun-tackles, machinery in order and out of order, writing paper in bales upon bales, dry goods, and fancy articles, were piled in one solid mass from upper deck to kelson.

CABIN OF THE "NUTFIELD."

It was found advisable to save the arms in preference to all else; and while the work was going on various were the exclamations of congratulation at having within three days stranded two swift blockade-runners, and not a few that the F—, which had interfered before, must now be far away, when lo! a steamer rapidly approached. It was she! Consternation and anxiety lest the former scenes should be repeated rendered the instant order from the S— to burn the prize a most agreeable one. It seemed a hard fate for a ship so beautiful in model and finish, built and equipped, as she evidently had been, at an utter disregard of all expense; yet the necessity for her destruction was apparent, and every preparation was hastily made.

The bodies of the drowned men lay upon the shore close by the ship, in which they had perhaps most hopefully set out from home; and one, just on the edge of the surf, lay with white face exposed to the burning sun, and his hands were folded across his breast as if in sleep. The sight was a sad one, but other scenes soon called away all unpleasant reflections. Every body was now in the boats, and the fires from every part of the ill-fated ship were again springing forth.

The new-comer once more took position with the S—, and opened fire of shot and shell; and soon, warped by heat and riddled with shot, the iron hull of the blockade-runner lay before us a shapeless wreck. One of the poor fellows lying upon the beach was discovered to be still alive, and occasionally raised himself weakly upon his arm and waved his handkerchief for help. He lay upon the outline of surf, and at times the icy water would break completely over him. What could be done? Not a boat in our possession would pass and repass the rolling breakers to the spot in safety, and to capsize was merely to leave our own men in the same pitiable condition. He was too weak to cling to a line, and no plan for his relief was deemed prudent, even though the only alternative was to leave him to die. The experience with the Wild Day-rell warned against delay; and even without it, the sudden appearance at this juncture of a troop of rebels upon a distant road, casting up clouds of dust as they dashed along, decided the apparently dreadful alternative to be as justifiable as necessary.

Leaving the F— still at anchor, once more was the S—'s prow turned seaward.

The prisoner we had taken stated that, in the case of the Nutfield, owners and crew had been most sanguine of making many a successful trip, and that her cargo was valued at half a million of dollars. During her flight from the S— several rifled guns and tons of lead had been thrown overboard, as well as the cases that had floated past us. Our prisoner, too, showed pretty conclusively by his conversation that his sympathies were with our enemies, and gratitude for saving his life seemed to be the last and least of all his thoughts. Opportunity soon occurred of transferring him to a prison on shore, for a few days virtually ended the cruise on the outer blockade. Upon returning to Beaufort for coal orders were found awaiting us to the Sounds of North Carolina, and, as the event proved, to battle.

ON THE WAY TO THE DIAMOND MINES.

I.

CAPTAIN JEAN was rightfully the hero of adventures, for he ran away to sea at the age of seven years. Having suffered some chastisement at the hands of his mother, a warm-hearted, violent-tempered woman, for the commission of a misdemeanor—he had fallen down a well, or something of the kind—he fled with sobs to the first retreat that offered, and there, having cried himself to sleep with anger and grief, awoke hours afterward, heavily rocking on deep water, to find, in the midst of singular sensations, that he had unconsciously secured a passage on board the good ship Last of her Line, bound from Lubec to New Orleans, and thence to Liverpool and Canton.

When the captain of the ship came to throw himself on his bed for a few hours' rest something peculiar caught his eye, and directly afterward the light of his swinging lamp revealed to him a little curly-headed cherub or imp cuddled among his royal blankets, and now sound asleep again. The captain's first salutation was a round oath; and he put out his big brown paw to sweep the vermin away, when he bethought him how things might be, and that here some mother's lost darling was hidden farther and farther away by the hourly flight of wind and wave, while she vainly searched the night for him; and in his warm inmost heart he remembered just such another at home, crying in his sleep at that moment, perhaps, for the father who had that day sailed away from him while he watched his mast sink slowly down over the edge of the sea. So he summoned his servant, had a little bed rigged for the uninvited guest, made out from him what he could of place and parentage, gave him a posset, and, when they two were alone again, abandoning dignity, even so far forgot himself into fatherhood as to sing the little waif asleep.

Next day the sailors greeted the unexpected passenger with acclamation. They were superstitious; he was a good omen. An angel found asleep on the captain's pillow could bode only fair winds and sunny skies and all genial prosperities of voyage. They adopted him forthwith for their own, each one emulatory of the other in the matter of his education, till between them all he mastered the arts of reading, writing, and tobacco, and became as native to the ropes as any spider. Thus, as after one or two voyages the captain's family joined him in foreign ports, and the Last of her Line did not return to Lubec, he gradually received promotion, mounting from ship's monkey to cabin-boy, from cabin-boy to seaman, and so on till at last, after many fluctuations of years and fortunes, at the age of twenty-one he ranked as second officer of a fine brig that ran regular South American trips for the owners, and the hands of which did a little irregular business for themselves. For Captain Jean (so he had been called ever since he, with one companion, had navigated into harbor the old Last of her Line, when master and mates had alike forsaken her as a worthless wreck)—for Captain Jean, brought up at sea, seldom long enough on shore to comprehend or like the sensation of solid earth beneath his heel, knew little of landsmen's laws and cared less—they never gave him salvage for the old Last of her Line—and, in the simplicity of a truly honest heart at core, never understood the sin of smuggling. So, many articles admitted otherwise into Brazilian ports only under onerous duties, were surreptitiously supplied by the hands of the brig Buffer, who realized a pretty profit from their various contraband transactions.

But when Captain Jean had arrived at this point of worldly success, and found himself first mate of the brig Buffer, it occurred to him one day to visit the little town of Lubeck, whence he had heard he derived his origin, and of which he preserved very vague recollection. He had a curiosity, moreover, to discover from what sort of stock he had sprung. His last reminiscence was of a tall, red-haired woman, who, snatching him out of a spring, had first half-smothered him with kisses, and then smartly applied a tingling rod, in order that he might learn to beware of fresh water till the latest day he lived. His first discovery was when he skirted the edge of the ancient grave-yard upon his way, his eye caught sight of a mossy and tiny stone, erected, as it said, in memory of Jean, and where he paused to read his own name, by which he judged that he had been given up for dead and gone years ago. The next thing that he found was a gray-haired dame, a tinge of gold yet gleaming in the silver of the locks, who sat knitting in the sun, and only gave a sudden startled glance at his tread and the towering of his broad, tall frame beside her, as if the sound of the first had reminded her of something far back in her lost youth. She looked up at him again a moment; then she looked down perplexed; then she took out her great silver-bowed spectacles, adjusted them, and surveyed once more, from top to toe, this accommodating stranger, who so quietly received her inspection. Something troubled her; she shook her head.

"No, no," said she; "I buried Jean."

"You had a son called Jean, then?" asked the stalwart intruder.

"Ay, lad, I had him," said she. And then, at the sound of his voice, at the light of his eye, at the touch of his sleeve, this way and that, the fibres of her heart pulled, all the mother-instinct beset her, she looked at him wistfully, and rose and fell upon his neck and wept.

This pleased Captain Jean mightily. He regarded women as a mysterious and reverend order of beings—not human, like men, but a kind of awful fay, dwelling in an inner circle, and governed by a different law. Such of them as haunted the ports were but diabolical simulacres, had nothing to do with women in the abstract—women in the abstract, who were multiplex and manifold marvels of emotion, and to whom, by this sign, he was glad to see his mother belong.

He spent that day and many succeeding ones in recounting to her his experiences, and in listening, in return, to the recital of her quiet years of home-life. She put before him her best old china, of whose impossible butterflies and birds and blossoms he seemed to have dimmest remembrances; opened for his delectation her precious jars of long-since candied sweetmeats; laid him in her lavender-scented sheets; informed the neighbors with jubilation that this her son was dead and is alive again, was lost and is found; with a smack of her old vixenish vitality uprooted the little grave-stone, as if she had got the better of Fate in the matter, and meant that Fate should know it; and finally and every day had Cicely prepare the nicest viands in the nicest way of which her old French cookery had imparted the love to the little maid; for the mother was of foreign extraction, though born on the shores of the Province of Maine, upon this side of the Atlantic.

And Jean lingered and enjoyed it all, and planted and weeded in his mother's garden, and sat on the wharves every sunset looking out to sea and fishing for flounders, and, by-and-by, taking his personal bearings, found himself more attached to this fine old lady than he had ever been to any thing in the course of his life, excepting the old Last of her Line.

But I doubt if, after all, this simple filial attachment was the entire cause of his letting the brig Buffer make a trip without him. He might, it is true, have staid at home just and merely for his mother; but Cicely made it doubly sure. For Jean was a young man unacquainted with maidens. He studied the adopted daughter of the house as a novelty; watched her come and go with the happy smile on her face; saw her rise glad-hearted, fresh as a rose, with dew-bright eyes, in the morning; bade her good-night while a little pensive grace hung in languid fashion about her in the evening. Here was somebody his mother had reared; consequently she must be like his mother, worthy and sterling. Not pretty?—to him she was beautiful. Only commonly good?—to him she was an angel. All at once Jean surprised himself walking airily like some nightly wayfarer under an unexpected sunrise; but the sun was in his heart, a strange, rare, beautiful feeling there wrapping him in an atmosphere of joy and buoyancy, and leaving him in love. Now, for a week or two, it was fresh, fragrant dawn with him, till by-and-by a deepening, widening emotion came, as if day verged on noon, and Jean experienced a dim sensation which another person than he would have interpreted as meaning the necessity that existed for something reciprocal in this affair, unless love were a most one-sided thing indeed.

But Jean did not even know that it was love. His mother found it out for him.

"Jean, I am jealous," said she.

"Jealous, mother?" answered Jean, opening wide his shining blue eyes.

"Yes. When you first came home it was me you watched, me you followed, me you waited on, me you talked to. Now—"

"Well, mother—now?"

"Now it is Cicely."

"Cicely!"

"And I am only the old woman."

"Fie! fie! for shame! But is it so? Well, she is a pretty thing to watch, to follow—is she not now, mother?"

"Pretty is that pretty does. And Cicely 'll find any man in a good wife. I'll not deny that."

"Wife!"

"Yes, wife! What else are you making great eyes at her for?"

"George! I must be an idiot. I never thought of that," said Jean, a long breath lifting his shoulders and a shiver racing all over him.

"So much the better for you," said the sententious old lady.

But the thought was dealing havoc with Jean. He was trembling like a leaf. Cicely his wife. Heaven while he was yet alive. Freehold in an angel. In her smile by day and in her heart by night. "Oh no, no, mother!" cried he. "That can never be. Cicely will never look upon the likes of me."

And at that the mother fired.

"I should like to know why not?" she exclaimed. "Who is there better for her to look at? Who is she to play the upstart? What right has the girl to hold herself above my boy? Be still with your nonsense or I'll put her on her knees before you. Cicely indeed! Why, I all but took her out of the street!"

"Mother!"

"Well, well; I don't go to say 'twas her fault. Squire Andersgelt cheated her father and mother out of what they had; and of course the child couldn't hinder their dying, she was only a baby. But it was a great shame of them."

"You have got reason on your side."

"Now but wasn't it of them?"

"A rascal can get to the windward of any one."

"I wish he hadn't taken so much wind out of my sails then as he went, or I'd speak plainer of him."

"I don't know how you could, old lady. But what's he done to you?"

"Don't you know? Why, he has a mortgage on the place!"

"This place?"

"What other?"

"For how much?"

"Well, there I rather got the windward of him. For more than it's worth!"

"Takes a rogue to deal with rogues—eh?"

"Why shouldn't I? He has a good two thousand of Cicely's, you see now, her father's and mother's, that she'll never touch the first cent of."

"Well, mother, we must raise that mortgage. That will make it all fair."

"I wish you could. To tell you the truth—the real truth," said the old lady, bending over to Jean's chair with animated gesture, for she hardly knew which side of the question she was on, "he pesters Cicely's life out. He's—he's—in love with her."

"The presuming scoundrel! The daring wretch!"

"Hush! hush! how loud you talk. And I can't see what for now—she's a plain little thing though she's trig. She's a sight too good for him, and that's the naked truth!"

"By—"

"Hush, I say! And now I'll tell you, Jean. In about a year, in seven or eight months, the time of the mortgage expires. And he can foreclose. And he's said something about it—ye's, he has! And he's given me to understand that, if Cicely 'll marry him, he'll make it all over to her to do with just as she's the mind. And of course then I can live on in my little house and garden till the end of my days. 'Twon't be long. But I don't want to die in the work-house," said the old lady, beginning to cry.

"Belay there! Who's going to die in a work-house? Who does that while their son has hands? Don't you let me hear any more of that. I'll pay this mortgage, I say, if I have to take it out of the fellow's hide afterward!"

"But I don't think Cicely 'd mind now."

"Mind which? Marrying or hiding?"

"Pshaw! She was quite agreeable—that is to say, she used to cry some—but girls are always crying—and she didn't positively say no till you came home"—Jean's face brightened—"and now the Squire's been here a half-dozen times, and the minute she hears his dog bark she just ups and goes to bed."

"And what does Andersgelt say to that?"

"He shakes his cane at me!" sobbed the old lady.

"Andersgelt is a good-looking man, isn't he?" asked Jean, dubiously.

"Yes—for them that likes your black beauties."

"Rich?"

"Yes, oh yes."

Jean's voice fell as his heart did.

"Respected?" he asked.

"Well, he isn't a professor. But he's regular at morning service; he goes to prayer-meeting, and he spends with a free hand for the missions, and the ministers, and the Jews."

"Young still?"

"Just in his prime, you might say. A little past forty."

"Handsome house?"

"And every thing like a palace in it."

"Little stingy about such sort of things?"

"Not he. Sets a good table. And he'll dress his wife, if he ever gets her, like a countess—no mistake.”

“Why don’t Cicely have him?” asked Jean, savagely.

“Because—because”—quavered and sobbed the old lady, “I think it’s—because she loves you!”

Jean’s chair spun over on the turf behind him, he had caught his mother in his arms and was kissing her face in every seam and wrinkle.

“Yes, yes,” said she, with half a laugh in the midst of her tears, when he released her. “It’s all very well. But I’d have you to know that you’re not kissing me.”

“Who then, pray?”

“You’re kissing Cicely.”

“I!” And while Jean was amazed at his mother’s audacity, he had a silent, sidelong gleam of an idea that if he were kissing Cicely the kisses would taste very different.

“Now, mother, don’t you fret,” said he. “I’ll pay this man his money if there’s any friend in New York or any gold in Brazil. Be at ease on that. And if I shouldn’t, you and Cicely could be happy in some other home of your own son’s making; couldn’t you, mother?”

“Yes,” said she, doubtfully. “Yes, I suppose I could. But I don’t want to be. I was born in this house. I was married in it. You were born in it. He died in it. I want to die in it too.”

“So you shall; so you shall. There, now, let your heart rest. He sha’n’t have the house, and he sha’n’t have Cicely.”

“I don’t know—”

“Not if what you tell me is true.”

“Do you suppose I’d tell you any thing else?” she cried, with anger as ready as ever. “Did I ever speak falsely? The mortgage—”

“I mean about her—about me—that—it seems like taking the name of the Lord in vain to say it, though I never minded doing that much, to be sure. I mean if it’s true, as you told me, that Cicely loves me, mother,” said Jean, humbly.

“Oh! oh! oh!” suddenly burst forth behind them both; and there stood Cicely on the step, with what could be seen of her face around her hands that were covering it, now as red as roses and now as pale as snow.

“She’s going to faint!” cried Jean.

“If she dares!” cried the old lady, comforted by Jean’s assurance respecting the payment of her debt, and yielding like any woman to the natural course of a true love affair.

But Cicely’s hands had dropped from her face, and though she was now the color of death her eyes were flashing with a maidenly indignation even while she reeled and caught at the door-post. For all that she would have fallen—for surprise, and anger, and shame, and battling hope made every drop of blood surge back upon her heart—had not Jean sprang and caught her to himself, and held her there with a strange, sacred feeling of awe, close, close against his breast. And here it occurred to the mother, well pleased in spite of herself, that the adage declaring discretion to be the better part of valor was applicable to the present situation, and she hobbled into the house as fast as her feet and her cane could carry her. Yet this was not so fast but that, glancing over her shoulder—how could she help it?—she saw Jean give one long look up into the deepening twilight sky, then bend his face upon the face beneath it, while for a moment Cicely held away with averted head and repulsing hand, and then in sudden vehemence, blushing damask, smiling sunshine, she flung her arm about his neck and met his lips herself.

It was a lonely place where the cottage stood; nothing but fields between it and the harbor stretched, and seldom any rash observer loitered there. Night had fallen now; there was neither moon nor star, but a soft haze over all the sky. The two stood together, leaning half on the gate at the end of the garden, half upon each other. They said little; for it was with them the fullness of that ecstasy that needs no words; now and then lips met in long, silent kisses. His arms were wrapped about her; she could hear his great heart beat. Cicely was appeased, blessed, resting; she had never dared believe such joy in store for her, a little maid with the comeliness of youth—no other. Jean, in his own consciousness, seemed to stand far nearer to something high and holy than ever before; such a sacred significance had his rapture that he would have thought only an archangel up in the clear blue heaven could suffer such transport of deep and holy bliss. Every time he bent and kissed his promised bride a thrill coursed through him. He thanked God all the time from the inmost hollows of his heart, first for making her at all, and then for giving her to him. As they stood thus, peaceful and brimmed with gladness, a rustling sound broke on their ears; it was a dog brushing through the herbs and grasses; then, reaching the gate, he began to bay. Suddenly warned, Cicely would have turned for flight; but on the instant all of Jean’s enravishment flowed into a bristling defiance. He caught her closer, held her firmer, and awaited his rival. A few heavy, plunging heartbeats; still his arms surrounded her, and her head lay against his breast. Then a form took shape out of the semi-darkness, and Andersgelt stood before them. About them the trees were shaking down fragrance, the wind was lightly wandering, the fire-flies were dancing in errant gleams. He surveyed them, and took the scene in surely. His black, angry eyes burned upon Jean, who returned their glance with blue lightnings. Then he raised his hand in a vindictive gesture of menace, and whistling to his dog returned into the obscurity out of which he came.

The lovers went back to the door-side bench beside the rose-trellised porch. The old mother had been long asleep. They sat there in the soft hazy summer night, making no plans, murmuring only now and then, thoughtless of the future, contented to the utmost with each other and the present. And when the clock from within told them it was no longer night but morning, they parted only to meet again after sunrise, and wonder, as conscious gaze met gaze, if the night had been a dream.

These weeks passed to them like a dream indeed. In their course a pleasant change came over Cicely, one not unusual under similar circumstances; there was a new brightness on her hair, a new bloom on her face, a soft lustre all about her skin, a color and illumination to her glance; smiles perpetually came and went upon her lips like bees making honey there, as Jean told her. Love, it seemed, was turning her into something positively pretty. When Squire Andersgelt saw her passing in those days he used to set his teeth and go home and look triumphantly at the date of the mortgage, as if to make assurance trebly sure. He knew that a prodigal improvident sailor could by no possibility have saved money enough to meet that; and once gone to sea again, and the thing foreclosed, why, Cicely should soon choose between himself for husband or the work-house for home to her adopted mother. He justified his scheme to himself by no other logic than that he chose it; that he had sought her before Jean ever saw her; that he would make her care for him; and that the evil would be in it if he could not provide more happiness for a girl of Cicely's intelligence than could that scape-grace with all his arts. As for poor Jean, his arts, so called, were comprised in his warm heart, his honest tongue, his ready hand, his robust beauty, like that of some young Viking, with the tan upon his cheek, the snow upon his brow, and the blue eyes shining from under the mass of yellow locks. It is true Cicely was a girl of intelligence, and had received the customary school education of the place; and also true that she contained more theoretical knowledge in her little finger, as they say, than Jean did in his whole hand: but the fact had its curious counterbalances, for if Cicely knew that brandy came from Bordeaux, Jean knew that washing-day came there but once in six months; if by any effort of imagination she could associate dates and palm-leaf fans, Jean could remember how he had climbed the tree and plucked the date; if she knew that Columbus discovered America, Jean had trodden on the spot where first he set his foot; if she knew that earthquakes sometimes swallowed cities, Jean had himself, he could tell her, been swallowed by one and ejected as a bad morsel; if she knew the world was a globe, Jean had proved it by sailing round it. His practical experience stood him in better stead than all the little she had ever learned from books might be expected to do for her. They were more meetly matched in that regard than Squire Andersgelt believed. And as all the knowledge in the world is not to be weighed evenly with one pure feeling, Jean stood for Cicely the king of men, and to him she wore a halo. He saw her moving about her daily tasks, and however trivial and commonplace they were she seemed to give a glory to the work. He did not dream of downright marriage yet; he must deserve her first; it might have been too daring; he must make a nest fit for his bird; the mortgage must be paid; and then! He shut his eyes at that point as at something too dazzling to contemplate. So their future remained unexplored; they were pledged to each other, that was enough. And in this state word reached them that the brig Buffer awaited her mate. In the mean time when the day for the payment of the mortgage's interest arrived, and Jean had seen Cicely and his mother counting out the proceeds of the garden and of their needles, he had swept it all back into the drawer again, telling them to keep it for next time and idle a little now, after which he paid the sum himself, assuring his mother that when he reached New York he should find friends there that would arrange it all. Thus when the hour of parting arrived he had no funds in reserve for his proposed journey by coach—it was long ere the diabolical days of railroads—and consequently was forced to ship before the mast for the trip in a little schooner. Foul weather followed, they were obliged to beat off the coast, and the passage that should have taken ten days absorbed a month. This would have mattered little to Jean, for in parting with Cicely such assurance of her devotion had been impressed upon him that it was like sacramental meat strengthening his spirit, and giving him a perpetual treasure of happy reflection; but what made it matter to him was that when they reached New York at last he found the old Captain of the forsaken Last of her Line, on whom he had relied to purchase the mortgage of his mother's house, had taken advantage of the delay to slip his cable, as they phrased it, and be off for the unknown shore. This of itself was a grief to Jean, but, added to the condition of affairs, became too much. Still there was one other person who, he knew, would help him. It was too late that night, he would see him in the morning before the brig Buffer sailed. He went on board of the Buffer to sleep, with this understanding; and as had happened to him once before, in the morning he found himself out of sight of land, for a wind had sprung up in the night, and, mate or no mate, the Captain of the Buffer meant to take advantage of it, ignorant that Captain Jean had come on board.

In vain Jean swore and gnashed his teeth, there he was, and there he was to stay. What would, what should Cicely and his mother think? Captain Jean was at sea under new considerations; with such anchor on shore he would scarcely be any more the reckless thing he had been. What could they think of him? Forty days must elapse before a syllable could reach them. All his cheerful lightness went by the board; he threw safety to the winds; became ready for desperate deeds; and was in just the mood, as they made Brazilian headlands, that the Captain, who had a heavy contraband venture of his own on board, desired to see him.

II.

They had finished their business in the port of entry, discharged their cargo, received their freight, taken their papers, and now stood out to sea only to make the shore a little further to the north, under cover of the darkness and at their old rendezvous.

The proper signals had been given, the customary ones returned, Captain Jean and another put off in a yawl to make all right on land. That was speedily done: and swiftly and silently the boats came out to the brig's side to be laden, and swiftly and silently with muffled oars made off again into the darkness; while to expedite matters, in his burning impatience for home, Captain Jean himself became the master of one boat-load, and went on shore to settle and to receive the various moneys due on what would have proved, upon his return, a very profitable affair to all hands but himself, who happened to have no risk in it. This would occasion necessarily a fine economy of time in mutual courtesies in the banquet and the drinking-bout which ordinarily took place on board the brig Buffer, and would now be dispensed with altogether.

Jean and his two companions steered the boat into the shallow cove, and far within the tidal cave in whose upper recesses the smugglers bestowed their hoards. Then they unloaded the boat, and, hitching it below, went up to finish the business with the principals, who were no languid natives, but shrewd and subtle Portuguese.

The account had been rendered, the money passed, cigars exchanged with congratulations, a few remarks on the necessities and the time of the next voyage, and regrets that they had missed seeing el Senhor Capitan Jean on the last one, and with two stout bags of doubloons inside his jacket, Captain Jean and his companions turned to go.

They had traversed half the slippery way downward when suddenly a strange sound smote their ears—the click of arms; the damp walls gave it dull broken echoes; the water, the cave, the shore, the whole region seemed to be alive with it.

“Ha!” cried Captain Jean, “are they playing us false up there? But they are black-hearted rascals enough for it. I’ve been thinking, boys, that this is the last time I’ll help cheat Don Pedro of a real. There’s plenty of sweeter work to do.”

“There it is again!” said one of his companions.

“The sound is from below!” a horrible whisper came sliding down to tell them.

The next instant a bengola light like a bale-fire shed its terrific illumination through each remotest crevice of the place, and they saw the panic-stricken malefactors crouching above them, a line of soldiery standing firm below—and a sonorous voice bade them surrender in the name of the law.

Jean’s blood was up. He snatched at his pistols, meaning to die hard; they were useless; in both the charge had been dampened. He awaited them then in his gigantic strength; he threw the first two that approached him over his shoulder and into the shallow sea; a moment more, and he was surrounded, overpowered, pinioned. The two soldiers had floundered to shore again; half the smugglers had thrown themselves into the water, and noiselessly glided away into the darkness and depth; only the three above were taken, and only Jean and his mates, the three below. Then stepping in file, the six were marshaled down to the water’s brink again, then up the path of thickets and through a kind of prickly chaparral, and out upon a highway. Here the officer in charge, a ruffianly sort of fellow, ordered a halt, and informed them, perhaps to cheer the weary road ahead, that, taken in the act of such an offense against the empire, there was but one punishment: and they began their march that night to perpetual imprisonment in the Diamond Mines.

“Henceforth,” said the officer, “you have forfeited all civil rights, and are the slaves of his Imperial Majesty.”

“Never!” said Captain Jean, in his lingua franca, that passed current every where. “Never while alive!”

The officer laughed. “We now,” said he, “take our way to the mountain region and the Diamond Mines.”

The Diamond Mines! Young slaves already decrepit, stooping over the shrunken river-beds, sifting interminable sands; victims of “veta” and malaria; distorted, maimed, branded, lashed, writhing; withered with pestilential fevers; suffering every indignity, pain, and misery, and sorrow—all that, with Death for the jailer, and no freedom till he turned the key. Jean nodded to the chief smuggler, with whom he was chained, and said in low, impressive tones, “Into those Diamond Mines I do not go alive.”

The answer came from an unexpected quarter. It was a smart stroke of the commanding officer’s riding lash along his face. Jean turned, gave the man one great glare out of his blue eyes that should have made him tremble. In his code in that regard there was but a single article: Blood for a blow. The officer, however, only laughed again, struck all their irons to make sure that they were sound, mounted his mule, the other soldiers did the same, the chained prisoners marched between, and they took up their way indeed to the mountain region and the Diamond Mines.

All that night they marched, and still after sunrise, until the hot hours of approaching noon; then they had reached a government station, were brought under shelter, and allowed food and rest. In the cool of the day they were commanded again to take the road.

At first Captain Jean refused to lift a foot; he remained there recumbent, and of course in sullen despair. Threats and oaths proving futile, the officer renewed the blow of the night before with the stinging knot of his whip. It brought no more effect to Jean’s fixed face than the alighting of a fly would have done. Then the enemy bethought himself of a master-stroke; neither chivalrous nor humane himself, he had yet heard of such things in others. He straightway had the lash applied to the bare back of Jean's companions, till, finding it possible to endure their cries no longer, Jean sprang to his feet and precipitately led the way. The officer signaled his satisfaction by affording Jean himself the final flirt of his thong across the eyes; but upon him this time Captain Jean did not waste the fire of a glance; he had his plans matured and under way, and he meant that either himself or the officer should reach the Diamond Mines a dead man or not at all. He had eaten nothing since they started; but the Indians at the station had privately sold him a quantity of those coca leaves that they chew to support their strength, and which, unlike other stimulants, give great supplies of nervous energy without impairing any vital function. On this, as barely as it should be possible, he intended to live till he should have lost sufficient flesh to slip his palm through the handcuffs.

At that moment officer and escort alike should give their last look at the midnight sky in terror.

The road that they now pursued branched aside from the highway and followed a seldom-trodden trail, intersected by brawling torrents and mangrove thickets hard to traverse, leading now along the verge of sheer precipices, and now descending into the reeking depths of the luxuriant wilderness. If Jean had been a member of some daring adventure, the superb scenes would have made his brain expand with delight; as it was, he constantly felt lying against his heart, like a rasping shirt of thorns, that letter of his mother's which had been sent after him, reaching Rio Janeiro the night he left, telling that the little sum saved to meet the coming quarter-day and other expenses had that very night been stolen from them, they could not say by whom; and upon informing Squire Andersgelt of the same he had smiled and renewed his proposals to Cicely, and averring that when quarter-day came it was plain no fate could save them, and unless he hastened how could she tell what would happen! And Jean remembered with desperation how penniless he was even if he were free—and here he was a slave! Thus this little fact of New England life blotted out for Jean all the color and resplendence of the tropic glade, all the bold beauty of the porphyritic mountain-side. Close beside them, as they tramped, a river of whirling foam poured its white column from the lofty ledge above, and fell into a ravine whose depth was dark with a blackness that sunbeam never pierced; they crossed the abyss on a bridge of slender chains woven together with strips of hide, and only broad enough for their feet; over them waved and lightly balanced a canopy of blossoms where the wandering wild vines had laced together the tops of the gigantic trees on either side in an arabesque of dazzling hue, raining down a ravishing fragrance; under them the mist of the torrent rose in smoke, and dropped down again into the unfathomable shadow. As they swayed to and fro on this filament between heaven and hell, even the doomed slaves held their breath till the solid earth should seize their steps again. As for Jean, he felt of his handcuffs with a victor's smile; he was scarcely any longer a man, but fast becoming kindred to the savage things that by night they heard horribly howling in the shades. Then, the bridge crossed, they wound up and down once more, till at last, dismissing the mules, they took to canoes and embarked on one of the shallow frothing river-courses—a maze of silver rapids and emerald glooms threading the heart of an enormous forest. Opaque here with the shadows of state-ly araucarias an arrow's flight in height; bewilderingly splendid there, where the dark dragon and cashew trees were tangled in vivid meshes of the sumptuous orchids, in magnificent trumpet and passion-flowers, each one festal, a freak of color and sunlight, a bursting star of penetrating powdery perfume, that made drunken all the heavy air about them; and in another place all again becoming soft and soothing to the eye, where the palm groves swung their lofty boughs in clear spaces, or where close down to the water's edge crowded the monstrous ferns, feathering at giddy heights their delicate sprays of fairest green against a sky of such clear brilliancy that to breathe its air seemed like living in the heart of some pure and vast jewel. Far in retreating hollows they could see the giant fig wreathed with the blooms of the white vanilla, that sent its softly-bitter sweetness floating languidly to find the river-course; or a sudden cluster of cacti, like living flames, wasted their wealth of startling color on the deadly coral snake that hissed at their feet, or fed with their beauty the melancholy song of the Alma perdidida that by night sighed through the spaces of the wood, what time the alligator, in his bronze plate-armor, lifted his terrible leer from the waters. By day the chattering monkeys tossed down the savage fruits to them as they passed; the birds fluttered among the sprays like flakes of colored fire; the great anaconda twined himself from stem to stem, his scaly sides glistening in azure and vermil and gold; they surprised flocks of rosy flamingoes fishing at the mouths of the affluent brooks; insects that were atoms of gossamer and light skimmed about them, they parted vast fleets of the papillon bleu hovering down the stream in the tide of air just over the current, and shedding back the morning radiance from their wide wings of filmy sapphire and silver and beryl; or others came in clouds about their heads, winged, as it were, with broadest petals of the pale wild rose. By night the garnet-star lighted their path—above them the great Magellanic cloud wheeled upon the ghostly shimmer of its way, the Southern Cross hung out of heaven its pendent mass of gorgeous jewelry; while below, the green beetle flickered in the swamps, they divined the little serpent thrusting up its head like a hood crusted with gems, and the very leaves in the breeze scintillated with a phosphorescent fire. Surrounded by such glory, Jean almost forgot to curse.

By landing, and bearing the boat from below the score of cataracts to the smooth water above, by poling their way through rushing rapids, by rowing almost constantly against the current, by catching in their sail whatever breezes chanced to blow, they had at last gone as far as it was possible to go by water; and the escort, more weary than the slave, hailed the rugged foot-path once more that found them within but two days' hill-side march of the Diamond Mines.

They encamped that night on the edge of the forest, sheltered from a sudden storm by a natural abatis of colossal fallen trunks, out of whose interstices and round whose roughness the rarest, gayest, and most pungent flowers and fungi grew and rioted. Behind them the forest abruptly terminated with sudden tropical transition, having carried its luxuriance to the splendid end; below them a valley stretched, and on one side the hill rose a jagged mass of rock up and around which to-morrow they were to wind. As they laid the fire together in the lowering shadow, a little light moving far up the heights gleamed upon them; it descended gradually, and ere long they could distinguish the form that bore it—a miner stepping slowly down with a cup, like those earthen things found embedded in the Roman Campagna, out of which the flame issued at one end, while it was suspended by a bending iron rod from the front of his cap. He carried a packet of ore upon his back, yet in spite of it held himself erect in a certain lofty nobility, and with his strange color and stranger outline made a picturesque vision against the darkening sky. He was probably a half-breed, once condemned to death for some early bloodshed, and pardoned under the condition of perpetually carrying the ore and jewels from station to station: his stately gait and noble mien required no other witness to prove how trust-worthy a bearer. The dark thickened overhead, the air grew full of intensely suffocating heat, and suddenly a straight shaft of fire shot from the sky to meet the tiny flame of the cup, and the figure stepping statelily from jag to jag fell with the bolt and lay lifeless within a stone's-throw of the forest party, while all the welkin rang with the thunder-peal. Jean and even the Portuguese were struck to stone. Not so their masters. The officer uttered a contemptuous sentence; it mattered to him no more than the falling of a mountain mule; before another bolt could have found the time to gather he had his men unstrap the packet of ore and put it with their own affairs; he himself took from the dead miner's neck the little pouch full of its oitavas of diamonds and slung it about his own. Then a few blossom-strewn boughs covered the carrier's form from sight till to-morrow the vultures came. The whole incident had not required the quarter of an hour, and had no more effect upon the soldiers and their leaders than the plunge of a stricken hawk.

It was twilight when the storm broke, but made blackest night in an instant by the downright rivers of rain; yet fiercely as the rain fell no drop reached them, for the woven mat of the forest roof was impenetrable. Now and then a blending flash showed the great plain lying below them, in stretch on stretch of broken shadow netted with glancing streams; showed the silver fall of the torrent of rain; showed the awful outlines of the wild beasts leaping past them, terrified shades, into the shelter of the woods and thickets. All the time the rattle of the thunder was followed by the low, long, muffled roar of the jaguar, the yell of the forest cat, and the shrill scream of the golden macaws in concert.

It was past midnight when the retiring tempest suffered them to sleep; and then the fire of fragrant cascarilla bark and ponderous iron-wood heaped high, the sentry sat on guard, and the others, well worn and weary, stretched themselves straight as the dead ore-carrier beside them, and forgot fatigues and woes alike in dreams.

All but Jean.

He could slip his hands through the handcuffs.

At last he was free. But not free unless his companions were; and not free while one of these men lived to follow on the track. He chewed his coca leaf and lay awake, and furtively eyed the sentry by the fire. He wondered then how strong he was—if this arm had any vigor, if this wrist had any nerve, if there could be any quailing in his spirit. And while the clouds parted and fled away over the valley, and on a jetty sky a slender waning moon lay with such clear-cut edges that she seemed like a beveled topaz in relief, Jean never let his fatal gaze evade the nodding sentry.

Nodding, starting, sinking, fallen—lost at last into profoundest slumber.

Then Jean's hands were loose. In a twinkling his links of chain undone. He would not unbind his companions yet, their hands were not as sure, their stroke as steady, they had neither the fire nor the hate that burned and corroded his soul. Stealthy as a panther he crept to the fallen embers and drew thence a great brand of the iron-wood. Now swift execution and not a tremor. A blow that let no groan follow it; another; the round was swift and deadly, but one remained. Over that man only he paused; he wanted all the evil in him, all the venom, all the rancor, to count when his arm fell. Over that man only he paused—paused till conscious sleep withdrew its veil from torpid sense and the sleeper had lifted his startled head—paused till in the light of the dying fire and the wasting moon he should see and know the gaunt demon glaring above him; and then blood had wiped out the blow.

Jean waked and freed the others. He was a man again. "Come," said he, "perhaps they are stunned. Perhaps they are dead. In either case let us fly." And hastily making such preparation as was indispensable they retraced their way to the stream, and with bounding exultation Jean felt the citavas of diamonds hard against his heart, and making his mother's letter softness itself. Not one moment did Jean tremble over his deed. It had been his life or theirs. He had been reared unchristianly, almost as a barbarian. In his apprehension, not law, but he himself, held the scales, and in such balance his freedom outweighed all their paltry beings. Gentle-hearted, sparing wasp and fly, he would never know a shiver of remorse for this dark night's work; it had been the act of self-defense; he had smitten nothing but reptiles. And then, if he had so much as paused to think of it, it might have seemed to him that even Nature herself set her seal of work well done upon the deed, when morning broke over them, and they staid to snatch some food in the garden of a long-deserted hacienda, which the wilderness had hastened to restore to itself with all the arts and strategies of most tumultuous vines and maddest efflorescence. It was the moment on the verge of sunrise; delicate pearl tints sheathed the atmosphere, and over them a golden breath diffused, while the whole heaven seemed nothing but one fresh, deep, and enormous perfume. The soft dark greenery glittered yet from the wet wings of the storm, the orange-trees hung their boughs of heavy snow, and scattered odorous dew upon the aloes underneath them, that, all starred and diamonded, blossomed as if in some old mage's realm every minute concluded for them the century. Out of the dripping thickets great creamy flowers looked in bland amaze, and shook themselves into a mist now and then as their stems grew too heavy to hold their shining weight; the pomegranate-trees, lifting themselves out of the clinging lushness of bush and brier, fanned their tawny flames with new lustre; the old heliotrope shrubs impregnated the rain-globes on their clusters of deepest, tenderest purple with most passionate, most intoxicating sweetness; and off from every leaf, every thorn, and every spike ran rillets of crystal and fragrance, till the scale of odors, as of colors, was complete. While they gazed it was morning; and the risen sun put forth one long spear and touched into life a miracle that had almost the power of effacing for them forever all memory of the dark and horror-filled night. It was an aged and lofty mimosa standing in an open space, and from each of its branches the wild aërides had slung their brilliant blossoms; and all along its rugged trunk daring lianas had climbed and bloomed, and climbed again and knotted themselves in a glory of petal and nectary, and every one was dashed with dew and laden with spice. Parroquets sat in the boughs, insects flirted about the flowers, in the nooks of the lianas humming-birds had built their nests; and over all some gigantic spider had ambitiously woven his immense web, and from the airiest tip to the lowest root the sheet of gossamer, threaded and beaded with moisture, hung quivering there, imprisoning in one vast net the tree, the blooms, and the humming-birds that, floating, glancing, flashing, like living jewels and winged flowers themselves, were each a fantastic blaze, by turns, of chatoyant sapphire, emerald, and almondine. Every time a bird stirred, a flower fell, or a sigh of wind stirred through the heavy branches, the old mimosa shivered and trembled all along each sensitive leaf and fibre, and shook its beautiful burden into a sparkle of flying prisms and splendors. Then a flaw rustled all the garden, a light puff of wind came, turned up the edges of the shining veil, slowly stripped the tree, set free the darting humming-birds, and with half the gauzy insects tangled in it, and its shimmer strewn with brilliant petals, bore the gossamer lightly up and away like a vision into the sky.

And having watched the dazzle disappear, Jean drew a long breath and clutched the pouch upon his heart; and his associates, alternately shouldering the packet of ore, which they considered to be indemnifyingly theirs, they all plunged once again into the tortuous ways of the forest—ready to meet fever, famine, fatigue, and death, to lose or find the coast, the cave, and the brig Buffer, but never to become slaves for life toiling in equinoctial river-beds.

III.

While Jean had thus been wading through tropical sins and sights and sufferings, blistered with heats and tortured with stings, affairs had gone on in the little town of Lubec much as his mother had warned him.

Cicely grew sad and pale thinking of him, pining for him. The mother fretted and fevered herself—still no word, no whisper. Was he, after all, like any thistledown-hearted sailor lad, with a wife in every port? Perhaps he never meant to come back again. Whether he were in New York, or in Brazil, or in the deep sea itself, they did not know; but in an inspiration his mother had sent her letter after him, yet vainly waited for reply. Ah well, she had buried him once, she used to say; now let them bury him again. And as mail after mail came in, and came in empty for them, time brought round Squire Andersgelt's quarter-day.

Leave is light, says the old proverb; but Squire Andersgelt found Cicely's leave, at any rate, a heavy task to obtain. She had repulsed him as coolly and civilly as it was possible to repulse one who would take no repulse. There was something about this fresh, good little maiden that had bewitched the man—so innocent, and simple, and sweet, his own negation of such qualities demanded her; the oftener he saw her the more determined he became to win her, fair means or foul; the more surely he detected her anxiety and sorrow, the more surely he felt himself capable of giving her happiness enough to satisfy any woman; and such was the nature of his passion that her very grief made his gladness. Cicely used to wonder at the creature's pertinacity, for she said to herself in the glass every day that she was actually ugly now. Her eye was almost bereft of its brightness through so much watching and weeping, her step had no longer any elasticity, and all her pretty girlish color had fled with peace. She was forever on the stretch of expectation, and did nothing but start and tremble. It is a sad thing for one to sit at home in ignorance and suspense; it sucks the life out of the heart, and slackens the very fibres with which one holds to being. Cicely felt fainter and sadder, and more desolate every day. Moreover, all this was to be concealed from Jean's mother, who must be made cheerful with reflected cheerfulness; and the old lady, well deceived, grew buoyant with hope as Cicely grew heavy with doubt. Poor Cicely! the very sunshine turned into shadow for her; she believed now that she was going to die, and was thankful for it; for if Jean were already dead she should find him so; but if he had forsaken her, what better could she do than die! In either case life was misery, and in the eternal sleep was rest.

She was in this mood when one day Squire Andersgelt came to present his case for the last time. She sat in the doorway of the little porch—the door at the back of the entry which ran through the house set open for the draft, for it was a sultry Indian summer day—and listened to what he must needs utter, while he leaned against the trellis of the porch and pleaded. Within she could hear the voice of the old lady, who had been a second mother to Cicely, singing as she could one part of an antique fuguing tune—a weak, thin, tremulous voice that had a ghost of sweetness haunting it like a smell of pressed roses in some long-unopened book—singing the beautiful, bounding, old-fashioned tune, and giving to the quaint flexures and trills, where breath is lost in breath, an indescribable effect as she quavered:

"Come, my beloved, haste away,
Cut short the hours of thy delay;
Fly like a youthful hart or roe
Over the hills where spices grow!"

And to Cicely's memory came the echoes of another tune as wild with the soul's sorrow as this one was with the soul's desire; and her own voice almost broke into its burden:

"As on some lonely building-top
The sparrow tells its moan,
Far from the tents of joy and hope
I sit and grieve alone."

But she was not alone; for, whatever gentle sound came from within, without the strong, sturdy tones of Squire Andersgelt made a strange contrast. To-morrow it was in his power to foreclose the mortgage, to turn both her adopted mother and herself into the street. For herself, what would she care? But for the other one—the sweet old soul whose fires had long since burned out, and who sat softly singing there in her trust that Providence would not forsake her—for her it was too much.

"If I am, as you say, Sir," said Cicely, faintly, and with no little hesitation, "so dear to you, why are you willing to occasion my distress? Be generous to me, and let us live here still, and pay you rent as we have always paid you interest; it will be for such a very little while. For she is old; and as for me, you see that I am dying."

"Dying? dying?" cried Andersgelt. "Never! That is the very reason why. If you stay here you will die; it is a moping place; you can pine yourself into the grave, so infernally alone. But look a moment: in my house the scene is new, it is light, it is cheery; you shall not know sorrow; I will prevent unhappiness; I will worship you, Cicely, far more as your husband than as your lover even, and I will spend my life in making yours content. Only come! And as for her, your mother, she can stay here if she prefers; or let her come with you; she shall still be mistress there as here; she shall be my mother as well as yours; the house shall be hers; she shall have sunshine, and plenty, and rest; her last hours shall be her best; we will both of us smooth her way, and when she leaves us feel her blessing staying after. Think of it, Cicely! Consent and come."

The picture was pleasant. Self-martyrdom, self-abnegation is the delight of some existences. There would be charms in the consent. Cicely yielded to the magnetism of the man for a single instant, and did think of it. And why not? If she could secure such peace, such ease, and such affection for her mother, why should she reject it? and that by a sacrifice of so brief duration? For she was convinced that with this weight dragging down her heart it could not even beat much longer. Yet the sacrifice was sacrilege. She bowed her head in her hands, and such scalding tears gushed through the fingers as might have melted a less selfish man.

Suddenly there stole over her as she sat a delicious change. Perhaps, in the effort of abandonment, the idea flitted through her brain she had died, and this was the first touch of heaven. A sense of peace penetrated her heart; her tears ceased flowing; a long sigh slowly bore away the power of sobbing further; a pang of long-foreign delight thrilled her. "It is coming," thought she then. "I shall not have to suffer any more." The man's selfishness was infectious. She forgot about Jean's mother. Then something caused her slowly to turn her head. Jean himself stood there behind her, his two hands resting on the two ends of the back of her chair. Perhaps it was they that made her feel that moment as if two wings were growing on her shoulders. She sprang past him into the house with a strength and vigor she had not dreamed of again possessing. She could not let Squire Andersgelt see how glad she was to meet this her true lover.

Then Jean stepped out upon the flat doorstone, opened the stout purse he wore at his belt, and showed its rolls of Spanish dollars and doubloons. "To-morrow, Sir," said he, standing on no ceremony, "your mortgage will be raised, for we retain the right of redemption. And now begone!"

Inside the doors that evening, with Cicely resting in his arms, Jean told her enough of his adventure for her to guess the rest. She was wiser than many would have been, and did not suffer a breath of horror to repel her. She knew the sidelong savage law of one half his nature, and saw that by his code his deed was right. It was not that half, however, that she loved. Singularly now she thought no more of dying, and only dedicated all her future strength and life to the winning of his will to gentler and loftier law—to the teaching of that love whose beginning perhaps he had scarcely heard, and whose first and last is included in the one mandate of the Golden Rule. And how can you do unto others as you would have them do to you—how can you love your neighbor as yourself, until you have loved God better than yourself?

So the mortgage was paid; and the mother was to sing her old fuguing tunes in peace till with his feet beautiful upon the mountains the Beloved should indeed come across the hills and take her home.

As for Captain Jean, when he had sent to the brig Buffer the two bags of doubloons that belonged there, he applied the rest of his wealth to the purchase of a vessel that entirely pleased his fancy, for he could no more live upon dry land than a nautilus. When the wind blew hard and rumbled down the chimney, and not a plank or rafter trembled, Captain Jean felt sure the house itself was about to founder, and became possessed of an entirely new emotion, which he could call nothing but fear, and in very desperation he declared he must needs take to blue water or remain a coward for life. Cicely meanwhile had succeeded in her work to the point that, though with his rude logic he still reasoned that his liberty being his own he had the right to set his own price upon it, and for the time that it had been taken from him he considered so many oitavas of diamonds as fair equivalence, yet, since she was so earnest, so soon as he had doubled them, and that would be in a half dozen voyages, there should be returned to the imperial Don Pedro all that to which Captain Jean had helped himself. And there she contentedly acquiesced, still carrying on her works subterranously till victory should crown them openly. And this was all the easier for her to do, since, sailing his own ship, Captain Jean had the consent of no owners to ask, and took his wife with him out of every port he sailed: simmering over the sea to Spain, loitering in Ionian waters, or flying before the tropical winds in rich passages from island to island of the treasured South Sea Archipelagoes. Yet always, whether they wintered among the vines of Madeira or the palms of Trinidad, there was one little summer haven to which they constantly returned; and by-and-by, when death had taken the old mother, out of the storms of his great hearty grief it was Cicely's hand that steered Captain Jean into a holier haven.

MY SOLDIER.

UPON a hard-won battle-field,
Whose recent blood-stains shock the skies,
By hasty burial half-concealed,
With death in his dear eyes,
My soldier lies.

Oh, thought more sharp than bayonet-thrust—
Of blood-drops on his silken hair,
Of his white forehead in the dust,
Of his last gasping prayer,
And I not there!

I know, while his warm life escaped,
And his blue eyes closed shudderingly,
His heart's last fluttering pulses shaped
One yearning wish for me—
Oh agony!

For I, in cruel ignorance,
While yet his last sigh pained the air,
I trifled—sung or laughed, perchance,
With roses in my hair,
All unaware.

In dreams I see him fall again,
Where cannons roar and guidons wave—
Then wake to hear the lonesome rain,
Weeping the fallen brave,
Drip on his grave.

Since treason sought our country's heart,
Ah, fairer body never yet
From nobler soul was torn apart;
No braver blood has wet
Her coronet.

No spirit more intense and fine
Strives where her starry banners wave;
No gentler face, beloved, than thine
Sleeps in a soldier's grave—
No heart more brave.

And though his mound I may not trace,
Or weep above his buried head,
The grateful spring shall find the place,
And with her blossoms spread
His quiet bed.

The soul I loved is still alive,
The name I loved is Freedom's boast;
I clasp these helpful truths, and strive
To feel, though great the cost,
Nothing is lost;

Since all of him that erst was dear
Is safe; his life was nobly spent,
And it is well. Oh, draw Thou near,
Light my bewilderment,
Make me content!

EXPLORING THE MAGALLOWAY.

ONE morning Brown and I, after a night spent in a hayloft, sat down to a breakfast which set at unblushing defiance every rule sanctioned by approved usage. The scene of the repast was a log-house, at the source of the Connecticut. Hard by, breaking from its parent lake, tossing, foaming, and fuming, the Yankee river made its start in life in a spirit of lawless riot which held forth indifferent promise of the prosperous respectability of its later course.

The house consisted of one large room below, and a loft above. It was built of logs squared with the axe, calked with clay and moss, and well begrimed with smoke. There was a cavernous fire-place of unhewn stone, and a hearth of the same material, as picturesque in its ridges and depressions as one of the papier-maché models of Switzerland for the use of schools. In one corner the water of a natural spring was led, by a wooden pipe, into a large wooden trough, whence it escaped by a waste-pipe at the farther end; in another corner was a spinning-wheel, in another a bed; and in the fourth an accumulation of shabby children, the eldest boy making a trap for chipmunks, and the eldest girl rocking the baby's cradle. Of the table and the table-cloth perhaps the less said the better. They sustained a repast of which a pudding-dish filled with salt pork, and a milk-pan piled with dough-nuts, formed the more conspicuous features; while a green cheese, a dish of cucumbers, and two raspberry pies supplied a finish to the entertainment. The host and proprietor, Mr. Lewis Gookin, sat at the board in one of those garments which Garibaldi has made classic—a muscular, thick-set man, with a swarthy face and a knowing eye, while the hostess, lank, wiry, and energetic, vibrated between the fire-place, the table, and the family group in the corner, now cuffing the ears of a contumacious infant with the same unimpassioned vigor with which she tossed the dough-nuts in the frying-pan, and now turning toward the guests with the hospitable inquiry, "Wouldn't yer like nothin' more?" As for the latter, the guests, they were a pair of Sophomores on their vacation travels.

What peculiar attraction they could discover in three log-houses and a saw-mill, which then formed, and perhaps form to this day, the settlement of Lake Connecticut, it might not be easy to explain. But the settlement of Lake Connecticut was to them but the jumping-off place whence they proposed to dive into a remoter world of mystery.

Northward, beyond the lake, ridge above ridge in hazy distance, rose the high mountains which form the Canadian boundary, savage, pathless, unfrequented—because there is nothing to be got by going there: in short, a howling wilderness. As respects game, its promise was far from brilliant. A possible deer, a not impossible moose, a faint chance of a bear, a racoon, a Canada porcupine, or a sneaking "bob-cat," were but a lean and meagre offset for hard work, hard sleep, and hard fare. These advantages, too, might be enjoyed elsewhere in large measure, at the price of no hardship whatever, and no other labor than paddling a birch canoe or lifting it over a portage. Superior barbarism, superior solitude, and the potent charm of the unknown, may possibly seem to a censorious criticism not wholly adequate to lure well-regulated minds along a path of such manifold and varied discomfort. But De gustibus non, etc.

Mr. Gookin, though he had never seen the regions in question, had willingly sold his services to the expedition. Being long-armed, brawny, and skillful with the axe, he promised to be a useful though not an interesting auxiliary. In refinement he rivaled a New York alderman. Every Saturday he got his newspaper at the cost of a five-miles' walk to the post-office; and thus illumined, felt himself prepared to debate the knottiest points of polity, theology, or war. The most preposterous and instructive feature of his character was his ancestral pride. He claimed descent, not from his namesake of colonial fame, but from the liberal Dudley, him in whose pocket was found after death that generous appeal,

"Let men of God in court and churches watch
'Gainst all that do a toleration hatch."

A galaxy of Indian fighters and revolutionary heroes enhanced his hereditary glories, so that he might well regard his employers as tinsel upstarts, conscious that in himself, the unwashed Gookin, reposed the type of a true noblesse.

Breakfast over, the expedition set forth. Gookin threw over his back a bag well packed with the needful, shouldered his axe, and, with no sign of farewell to wife or children, led the way at a sharp pace through the burned stumps of his potato field. We followed in his wake with gun, blanket, and knapsack. A two-hours' tramp along a bridle-path, through woods and swamps, brought us to the western edge of the second of the three lakes from which the Connecticut takes its rise. Here, to the profound contentment of one of the party, no trace of a clearing or cabin was visible, and woods, water, and rocks had it all their own way.

The point was now to get across the lake. To this end Mr. Gookin collected the trunks of dead pines, cut them into lengths, and shoved them into the water, where Brown and I lashed them together with grape-vines. This aquatic toil exercised a depressing influence on the mind of my comrade. His visage lengthened as it proceeded, and when—the raft finished at last—the fire was kindled, the kettle slung, and we sat down cross-legged around it to dine, it was evident that doubts and misgivings were preying upon his spirit. At length he spoke. The tenor of his words filled me with anxiety, and I hastened to draw him aside behind the neighboring bushes, lest, by a show of dissension between the commanders, authority should suffer. Here, with some emphasis, he expressed himself to this effect—that he didn't see the use of going any further; that he'd be hanged if he saw the sense of tramping up and down through a beastly wilderness just because it was a wilderness; that it wasn't every body that had the tastes of a Pottawatomie redskin; and that, for his part, he generally went in for a faint touch of civilization.

Against these somewhat reasonable positions it was urged that a wider diffusion of Pottawatomie tastes was the grand desideratum of a bookish age; that if all Harvard College were emptied once a year into the backwoods, it would be well for their bodies and their immortal souls; that to retreat from any enterprise once begun was a disgrace which no lapse of time could wipe off; that if he wished to secede, he was free to do so, since coercion would by no means be attempted, but that, besides the ineffaceable ignominy of such procedure, he would have to take the back track alone.

Brown yielded to this reasoning, and unity of counsels was restored; yet the interests of the expedition, it was but too apparent, required that he should find himself as soon as possible in a position where advance was easier than retreat.

All being ready, we embarked, poled over the shallows, and, when off soundings, took to our paddles. The shore receded, the world of waters was around us; often, indeed, up to our ankles, for our raft was none too buoyant. In an hour or more we neared the eastern side, where the shore was fringed with matted alders after a fashion which made it impossible to say where water ended and solid earth begun. Thus it happened that, laboring with an inconsiderate zeal to effect a landing, Gookin plunged to his waist, to his own unutterable ire and the delight of Brown, who had begun to regard him with an intense aversion.

The party being reunited on the firm land, and Gookin having sufficiently stamped, sworn, and shaken himself, we set our course northeast by a compass, and began our march. It led us up a mountain, densely wooded, like all the rest. Around us was an innumerable host of trunks, straight and crooked, smooth with youth, or bepatched with the mosses and lichens of rugged old age; erect in pristine vigor, or staggering for support against their neighbors; knotted and gnarled, infected with goitres and tumors, warts and hideous fungi; or dribbling pitch and turpentine from frost-rent crevices and the stumps of wind-amputated limbs. Their dead comrades, in every stage of dissolution and every variety of posture, cumbered the earth below, overgrown with a vile mesh-work of vines and creepers, scrub oaks and scrub savins, matted juniper and trailing winter-green. Looking upward, we could enjoy at intervals a hand's breadth of sky between the leaves, and the surrounding circle of vision varied from three yards to fifteen. Now and then there was a "wind-fall"—a disgusting feature of forest scenery, owing its origin to the passage of a whirlwind, sweeping down the trees and piling them in masses. One of them, in a hollow place, where a gorge opened from the mountain, presented an aspect singularly unpleasing. It was of old date, for the forest had grown up around and over it. Some of the trees had their heels in the air, some their heads, some were prostrate and sprawling, and the rest pitched together at every angle which the tyrannical caprice of the tornado had ordained. All were more or less rotten, according to their nature and position. Some were a mass of pulp, delicately coated over with a sleek green moss, which, pressed with the finger, oozed water like a sponge. Others, less perishable, or lifted higher from the earth, still showed fight against the elements, and scores of red cedars in particular bristled out of every part of the pile in an execrable chevaux-de-frise.

From its extent and the nature of the ground it was hard to get round it, so we essayed to scramble through. Brown reached the top, where a faithless log squelched beneath his foot, and let him in. A spasm convulsed his visage as the thought flashed upon him that he was about to bring up on the hairy back of some bear, catamount, or wolf domiciled below. Finding a more eligible resting-place, his agitation subsided, and without trying to extricate himself, he sat, half buried among sticks and branches, singing with a sardonic humor which did him honor:

"Oh, happy am I!
From care I am free!
Oh, why are not all
Contented like me?"

Having cleared the windfall and passed the crest of the mountain we began our descent on the other side. Now and then a partridge would rustle off among the underbrush, and as he stopped to look back we knocked off his head with a rifle-ball. At length, as the forest grew dusky, we found ourselves in a deep valley between the mountain we had crossed and a much higher ridge, which we reserved for the next day.

Here we found a brook, if brook it could be called, half buried as it was under fallen trees and the moss-grown decay of the forest, tinkling faintly from its lurking-places, or sleeping, black and lustrous, in deep pools among the rocks. A few yards of level ground not far off offered a tolerable camping-place. Gookin took to his axe, and soon came staggering in with load after load of logs till he had gathered a heap large enough to supply a well-ordered family for a month. We, on our part, attacked with our knives the spruce-trees which in every stage of growth, from infancy to age, sprang in profusion from the crevices of the neighboring rocks, clasping them with their rugged roots, like the inexorable gripe of a drowning man. We cut the soft green boughs and laid them on the ground, each overlapping its neighbor, the larger below, the smaller and softer above. This was the bed, and a knapsack served for pillow.

Darkness closed fast in this deep and shadowed spot, but the flaring camp-fire took the place of daylight. A row of partridges, spitted on upright sticks, roasted before it; a mess of minute trout, jerked by Brown from the pools of the little brook, hissed in the frying-pan; and solid bread, with tea of singular flavor—both from Mrs. Gookin's larder—completed the repast. Long before it was over a thick blackness had settled on the forest. As we sat cross-legged before the embers Brown pointed to a ghastly white object towering in the outer gloom like a tatterdemalion ghost, whose ragged drapery flapped about him in the breeze. It was an old "canoe birch" tree, dead and dry, its top shivered by wind or lightning, and its bark hanging in tattered sheets. "Let's touch her off," suggested Gookin, and held a fire-brand to the tree. Quick as lightning there leaped up a spire of crackling flame, vivid as the blaze of a bonfire. Within the circle of the fierce illumination the jagged points of the rocks, the shaggy masses of the hemlocks and the firs, skeletons of dead trees, misshapen boughs, contorted roots, like knotted reptiles, stood forth in a fiery distinctness that made the outer caverns of darkness more portentous and suggestive.

It was but a momentary blaze, and the shadows again gathered about us. Gookin threw a fresh log or two on our fire, stirred it with a long pole, scooped a live coal into the well-crammed bowl of his pipe, wrapped himself in an old horse-blanket, and lay down on his bed of spruce. Claspings his horny fingers behind his head to relieve the asperities of the log which formed his pillow, and thrusting toward the embers a pair of cowhide boots whose tawny hues betrayed a life-long estrangement from the blacking bottle, he began, between puffs of pungent smoke, to enliven the night with anecdote and jest. He spoke of the Gookins of old renown; of one who, having enlisted as a ranger under the redoubted Major Rogers, was captured in the discharge of his military duties, and grilled by the Indians at Crown Point, and of another who slew a gigantic Englishman at Concord fight. There was one of his race to whom his thoughts recurred with an especial pride and tenderness, a certain Mrs. Jemima Home, who was, he averred, the most beautiful woman New England ever knew, and who, dwelling in a log-cabin in the township of Number Four, was, during the old French war, surprised by Indians and ruthlessly carried off. Arrived in Canada, her charms wrought with such vehemence on the ardent mind of a young French officer that he went stark mad, and would fain have drowned himself. Once more restored to home and friends, it became her lot, through the casualties of frontier life and her own redundant graces, several times to undergo a change of name, and a troubled life reposed at last in calm union with Mr. Amos Tute. Of her uncounted progeny the last sleeps in Brattleborough church-yard beneath these mournful lines:

"Here lyes, cut down like unripe fruit,
The son of Mr. Amos Tute."

And in good truth the tablet is there.

From such reminiscences Mr. Gookin passed to humbler themes. He spoke of the moose, the bear, the wild-cat, and the wolverine. He told how, on a frosty night, a yell from his wife waked him in time to see the green eyes of a tassel-eared lynx looking in at the window. He recounted the misfortunes of his neighbor Bill Henderson, who, setting a trap for a bear, caught his own cow. He himself had had a thrilling adventure with a bear, briefly touched upon as follows:

"One night I was out in the back lot looking arter some marten traps, and I see a big bear down in the holler. Well, it started me and made me kind o' sally back. 'Well,' says I, 'it ain't nothin' but a black stump,' says I. So I goes up close to it, and, no mistake, it was a stump!"

With such discourse Mr. Gookin beguiled the hours till the music of his voice gave place to deeper sounds. Brown, too, bundled in his blue Mackinaw blanket, lay unconscious as a mummy. I listened for a while to the hooting of a distant owl, and watched the sparks, which, streaming from the glowing embers, wandered like troops of fire-flies against the dusky sky till sight grew dim, and I joined my oblivious comrades.

At sunrise we were journeying again through the damp and misty woods, and in an hour or two, by dint of walking and climbing, reached the top of the mountain. Here, however, we were still buxied in the forest, and saw nothing but our usual very limited prospect of trees alive and dead, erect and prostrate. High above the rest one old pine reared its rustling top aloft, and against it a tall spruce, dead and blanched by the elements, had been blown in such a manner as to form with its numerous side branches a tolerable ladder. Up this I proceeded to climb, and as I mounted above the level of surrounding boughs, glimpses began to open of the stern world around—dim swells of distant forest, shaggy mountain tops, the gleam and flash of falling waters; till at length, shadowy and vast, the savage panorama lay revealed. North and south, east and west, stretched a virgin wilderness, no trace of human dwelling or sign of human toil. Far westward, bosomed in woods, Lake Connecticut glimmered like pallid silver. Circling toward the south a range of rugged mountains sank with sheer descent upon a gorge so deep and densely wooded that, though the nature of the ground showed it to be the channel of a water-course, no glimpse of the buried stream was visible. I observed the lay of the land, took the points of the compass, and descended.

At the foot of the mountain we found ourselves in a forest of pitch-pine. The ground was soft and slippery with the carpet of dry threadlike leaves which covered it, and as the day was hot, the breathless air was clogged with the odors of the oozing turpentine. Next came a tract overgrown with dwarf savins. As we pushed and fought our way through, the prickly branches switched our faces in a fashion singularly provocative of ire, goading Brown to madness, and drawing strange oaths from the more philosophic Gookin. We lost each other in these execrable thickets; and when at last I had struggled through I saw before me a screen of young maple saplings, the green transparency of whose leaves betokened an opening beyond. Issuing from the cover I stood on a sheet of sun-scorched rock, where the crisp mosses crackled under the foot. Before me rose wooded heights basking in the sun, but a deep gulf intervened, and, advancing a few steps, I stood on the edge of a precipice, whence, looking down, I saw a riotous stream curveting in wrath, and lashing its headstrong way among rocks and boulders. I fired my rifle as a signal to Brown and Gookin. The whip-like report leaped in tingling reverberation from rock to rock and died in a discontented growl. To while the time I loosened a piece of rock and pushed it from the brink. It dashed rattling down the face of the cliff, gave rude thumps to the stunted firs rooted in the clefts, startled two crows from a dead tree below, sent them flapping and cawing down the gorge, and broke at last with a crash on a rock at the bottom. Brown and Gookin presently appeared, the former by no means in the sunniest of his moods. The announcement that one grand object of our toils was reached—that the expedition had at length arrived at the head waters of the Magalloway, kindled no responsive enthusiasm. And when he learned that our future path lay along the channel of this uproarious torrent his disgust found vent in muttered expletives. In fact, as we looked down on it, it promised no especial facilities as a thoroughfare.

The point was now to reach it. A parachute might have effected the object, but we were unprovided with such convenience. After some search and scrambling, however, we found a place at a little distance, where, clinging to trees and bushes, we got down without difficulty. Here an auspicious change came over the spirit of Brown. The stream, tumbling over ledges, whirling in pebbly basins, or lurking, sullen and dark, under the brows of projecting rocks, was eminently suggestive of trout. Brown hastened to cut a slender birch sapling; and having extemporized a fishing-rod we beheld him leaping, with earnest visage, from rock to rock, twitching a prize from each cascade and pool, and stringing them on a hooked switch. Meanwhile we made our bivouac on a flat boulder, encircled by the seething water. The dry drift-wood which had lodged against it supplied our fire, and here, cross-legged around it, shaded by the birches that edged the rocks above us, we smoked our pipes in placid contentment. Next, strapping on our knapsacks, we began a new stage of our journeyings. Sometimes it was jumping, sometimes it was wading, sometimes climbing, sometimes swinging by the hands, sometimes balancing with outstretched arms over a fallen trunk which bridged a chasm. Sometimes the stream loitered gloomily among rocks darkened by sombre hemlocks; sometimes it sparkled over sunny ledges. Every where the forest, its verdant legions thronging hill and hollow, shaking their leafy plumes from the verge of crags, swarming like desperate climbers up the face of precipices, making lodgment in the chinks of protruding rocks, wedging them asunder, and again clamping them together with the gripe of embracing roots. As we descended brooks large and small joined the main channel, some tumbling in sheeted falls, some gliding, silent and black, from beneath masses of moss-grown logs and caverns of matted verdure. The country, too, became less rugged; and thus our torrent was presently resolved into a stream of fair proportion and decorous mien. As evening approached, however, listening in the stillness of the woods, we heard the plunge of a distant waterfall, indicating a relapse into old habits of riot, and following the sound, we saw the stream dashing at one bold leap into a basin of rock. On its brink we made our camp; and here, in a short time, we caught trout enough—the smallest a foot long—to feast a dozen men.

In the morning, the council-fire being kindled, we deliberated as to our future course. Brown was for getting to the settlements—he didn't care how—the quickest way was the best. Gookin opined that we had better pursue our journey on a raft. I was for making a bark canoe. The fact that none of us knew how was declared an insufficient objection. Gookin sought out a suitable spruce-tree, for there were no birches large enough, and, baring his brawny arms, contemplated his victim for a while, walking round it and whistling gently. Then, bracing himself to his work, the woods rang to his rapid and deadly strokes, while with each effort Mr. Gookin jerked upward from his chest a guttural sound singularly unpleasant.

The spruce-tree fell with a crash, and Gookin proceeded to hew off some fourteen feet of the lower part of the trunk. Next with his axe he carefully split the bark lengthwise. Then with wedges we pried off the pliant covering, which peeled readily, the sap being in full motion; till at length the log lay exposed in white and glistening nudity, and the great roll of bark lay whole and sound beside it. Now we cut tall straight saplings of the white ash, split them with the axe, trimmed them with our knives, lashed them together at the ends, braced them apart with cross-bars, and fortified them with numerous ribs of the same tough and pliant wood. For our lashings we used the fibrous slivers of the ash—the same of which the Indians make baskets—and the slender roots of the spruce, ripped in abundance from the surrounding soil. The frame made, we proceeded to lap the bark over it, the smooth side outward, sewing it firmly with spruce roots thrust through holes made with a sharpened stick. At either end we closed the crevices with melted spruce-gum, and fortified the bottom with double sheets of bark resting on the ribs within. Our work was done! Had an Indian seen it he would have killed himself with laughing. We gazed upon it with pride; yet our pride was dashed with secret misgivings.

Another encampment by the waterfall, and at daybreak we prepared to embark. Tenderly, and with parental care, the canoe was placed upon the water. Cautiously we took our places, and, kneeling on the green and yielding bark, gently plied our paddles. She swam like a duck. Not an egg-shell of water came in at her seams. Our eyes met in mutual congratulation. As we glided down the placid windings of the stream—now in sunlight, now in the shadow of the woods—flocks of wild ducks winged their splashing flight across the surface, and dived under the alders which fringed the shore. It was a short-lived prosperity. A leaping and curveting of water in front gave warning of a neighboring rapid. Down we slid, each holding his breath in fear, not for ourselves—for the water was hardly deep enough to drown a rabbit—but for the frail bark which bore us and our fortunes. Five-minutes passed, and another rapid appeared. “Steady!—keep her head down stream! Look out there!—What the deuce!” Quick as lightning the canoe was ripped open, a flood of water poured in, and she swamped instantly. The sharp point of a rock, lurking invisibly at an inch below the surface, had caught her bows and cut an open gash, about four feet long, through the bark. We seized our luggage and waded laughing to the shore, while the wreck of the canoe, rolling over and over, went down the rapid.

An hour’s plodding through the woods and we came to a basin of dull waters, set deep among the forests. Here the stream we had been tracing is joined by a larger stream, and the result is a river usually navigable for boats. On a knoll overlooking the basin was the deserted hunting-camp of some strolling Indian, as appeared by the fish-spears, broken paddles, and vessels of birch bark scattered about the place. Thus far Fortune had smiled on us. Now her aspect changed, for clouds rose from the east, and rain began to patter steadily among the dry leaves. Had we lent ear to the dictates of a considerate philosophy and an enlightened woodcraft—had we built a shanty of poles well roofed with bark and carpeted with evergreen—we might, with the help of patience, cheerfulness, and tobacco, have weathered a week’s storm in comfort and content. We, however, were neither philosophers nor Leatherstockings, but a brace of restless collegians; and go ahead though the heavens fall must still be the word. So we addressed ourselves to making a raft. Gookin, strong as an ox, dragged the timber from the woods and launched it in a cove beside the deserted camp. We tore down the wild grape-vines from the neighboring thickets, and wading to our waists lashed the logs together, while the river circulated about us with a refreshing coolness, and the rain hid the surrounding woods like a gray curtain.

All being ready we pushed off, each armed with a long setting-pole. Slowly we drifted down the current, till a quicker movement and an ugly tossing told us of an approaching rapid. There was a grating sound, an awkward thump, a spouting of water between the logs, and all was smooth again. Once more the tossing began, and again we entered the troubled waters. There was a rushing and a surging; then a heavy shock, which laid Gookin sprawling on the raft and nearly flung Brown into the river. “Shove her off!” roared Gookin, recovering his legs and pushing with his pole till he was black in the face. She would not budge; she was wedged fast on a sunken rock. The water broke over her; a grape-vine snapped; the logs groaned and struggled under us. All was up with her. She was going to pieces, and we must abandon the wreck. The fir-trees on shore were dimly visible through the rain, with the river tumbling between, not more than three feet deep, but full of rocks and swift as a mill-race. Hooking our arms together and bracing ourselves with our setting-poles, we began our progress. Once or twice the current nearly took us off our legs; but, climbing over boulders and plunging through gullies, we reached land at last.

Here, to a melancholic temperament, the prospect was not cheering. The black trunks of the trees trickled with water, and every bough hung dank and dripping. The rain still pelted down, while under foot was a compound of black oozing mud, spongy leaves, and the pulp of rotten wood. From such material it behooved us, bedrenched as we were, to provide our night’s lodging. To this end we rolled together five or six large logs, and covered them with sheets of bark, peeled, with the help of our hatchets, from the neighboring trees. This was our bed. Over it, at the height of three or four feet, we made a sloping canopy of bark, supported by a frame-work of poles; and in front, after many failures, we contrived to build an enormous fire.

While Brown and I thus busied ourselves the unwearied Gookin was looking for a white pine, and by good luck found one to his liking close at hand. Forthwith he assailed it with his axe. The chips flew from his strokes like fragments of an exploding shell; a wound yawned in the huge trunk; a groan, a crash, a hideous tearing of branches, a shock that shook the forest, and the regal tree lay prostrate. The next step was to hew a “dug-out,” or wooden canoe, from the massive trunk; and that day Gookin deserved, if he did not win, the honors of champion axeman of New England. All the afternoon the woods echoed with his blows; and long after night set in, lighted by a bonfire of pitch-pine, he still labored at his task. But toil must find rest at last, and we all presently betook ourselves to our luxurious repose. The deluge had ceased, and the rain came down with a quiet pertinacity that promised long endurance, trickling and dropping among the innumerable leaves after a singularly weird and rueful fashion.

"You call this pleasure, I suppose!" said Brown, lying down with a countenance of ineffectual disgust.

He was reminded that it was but an ordinary contingency of forest journeying.

"The forest be hanged!" retorted Mr. Brown; "and if ever I catch myself in such a scrape again I wish I may be shot!"

In reply it was freely admitted that, owing to a deficiency in extent and remoteness, the forests of New England were no longer capable of affording any high degree of enjoyment; and a hope was expressed that he would be prevailed upon to make one of a party in the next summer to explore the country about the sources of the Missouri and the Saskatchewan.

Brown's ire at this suggestion surpassed his powers of language. He responded with a growl, muffled himself in his wet blanket, and fell asleep. Gookin now rose and went to the fire to throw on a score of logs, and prepare, in a tin coffee-pot, a fresh supply of the delicate tea which his wife had contributed, and which, for our better encouragement, we laced with a little cognac. This done he returned to his couch, bringing his coffee-pot with him. Gookin did not lack brains; and, but for obstinacy, coarseness, self-sufficiency, arrogance, an unwavering eye for the main chance, and a few other trivial drawbacks, he might have been a good fellow. His potations developed the full extent of his colloquial powers, and he discoursed with an unflagging volubility on heavy questions of state craft and the manners and customs of the settlement of Lake Connecticut, the mistaken policy of the Administration and the insufficient profits of the lumber business, the prospects of the Presidential election and the coquetry of Polly Foster, the patriotism of Washington, the beauties of his Farewell Address, and the unjustifiable course pursued by Bill Henderson in a transaction concerning a pig. Thus the hours stole on, till midnight would have struck had there been a clock in the neighborhood, when, at length, content with each other, and at peace with all the world, Mr. Gookin and I resigned ourselves to sleep.

Before daybreak Gookin was at work again. In an hour the canoe, which looked like a magnified horse-trough, was finished. We dragged it down to the water, shoved it in, and embarked in a drizzle which would have drenched us if we had not been drenched already. Gookin sat astern, Brown amidships, and I took the forward paddle. Now and then, as we went down a rapid, we got an ugly thump against a rock; but our ill-favored craft would have stood the butt of a battering-ram. Brown was disconsolate, nay, sulky. He paddled languidly, and when exhorted to work with a will flung his paddle down, muffled himself in his spongy blanket, and declared that he who had got him into the scrape might get him out again. Mr. Gookin, who belonged to the Democratic party, and in whose cranium the organs of reverence were invisible, did not disguise the feelings which these demonstrations inspired, and while working away at his paddle gave utterance, from time to time, to various general observations touching laziness, effeminacy, want of pluck, and the like, bearing forcibly on the case before him. This was far from ameliorating the mood of Brown, to whose many grievances was added the circumstance that we had nothing to eat except half a pint of rice, which we kept for final emergencies. As for game, nothing more respectable than a musk-rat ventured out that day. Thus, from early morning till five o'clock in the afternoon, we pushed our way down the lifeless Magalloway, now gliding between dribbling forests, now twisting like a snake through an expanse of saturated meadows. The weather remained an alternation of rain and drizzle, drizzle and rain. At length, as we judged, we neared the end of our voyage, the point where the river breaks suddenly into a series of obstreperous rapids two miles in length. Here, should we chance to be drawn in, canoe and voyagers would be smashed in an instant, and our exploration closed in a manner the most unsatisfactory. So we kept a wary look-out ahead for the first symptoms of the commotion, but nothing met our eyes but the same lazy sheets of leaden water. We knew that from the head of the rapids a portage road used by lumbermen descended to a cluster of rude houses and farms on the river three miles below—the last outpost of Yankee civilization—and this haven we hoped to reach before night.

"Here we be at last," exclaimed Gookin, pointing with his paddle toward the left bank. "There's the road; don't you see it? Wake up, Mr. Brown; you're coming to housen."

On the shore appeared a narrow clearing notched out of the forest. On one side was a small log-hut, or shed, tumbling in ruins, and opposite appeared the opening of the road, or path, descried by Mr. Gookin. No sign of the rapids was to be seen, but we heard, or thought we heard, them plunging in the distance. We landed, braced on our knapsacks, and, as there was no time to lose, set off at a "dog-trot" down the road. The soaked and dropping boughs met overhead, and the way was beset with stumps, rocks, and knotted roots. Misgivings soon assailed us, for the road diverged from the river and descended into a dark swamp. Presently, to our disgust, it forked into two branches. We chose the larger one. Soon after this divided into three. Again we chose the largest, and pushed on, with muttered execrations. It was clear that our road was no path to the settlements, but a sledge-track cut by lumbermen to haul timber from the swamp; and accordingly it split at last into five or six scarcely perceptible foot-paths, wandering off into the depths of the matted labyrinth. Resolved to see the adventure out, we followed one of them, pressing aside the heavy pine boughs which showered us with their watery contents. Gookin was ahead; I was close behind. Suddenly he vanished. At the next instant I was plunged after him into a mixture of cold water, leaves, branches, and floating logs. It was a deep run, the drain of the swamp, hidden under brushwood and fallen trees. Scrambling out in all haste, I turned to aid the submerged Gookin, when I beheld his visage, contorted with rage, issuing like a Triton from the deeps, and glaring about for an object on which to wreak his ire. Instead of choosing the party who had pitched upon his back and nearly drowned him, he turned upon the wretched Brown, who was about fifteen yards behind, and charged him, with violent anathema, with having caused his misfortune. Thus assailed, Brown plucked up a spirit, retorted abuse with menace, and threatened the offender with the butt of his gun. The undaunted Gookin flung down his axe, advanced three paces, doubled his horny fists, and squared himself for battle. And now the arches of that gloomy wood might or might not have echoed the din of conflict had it not been suggested to the combatants that the bottom of a swamp was a spot ill chosen for the settlement of their difference, and that if we wished to reach a shelter that night we had better be quick about it. Gookin listened to reason, shouldered his axe again, and led the way with seven-league strides back to the logger's hut.

The distance was about three miles. When we reached the place it was nearly dark and raining hard. Half of the hut was tumbling in ruins, the other half was in tolerable condition. We had friction-matches in water-proof cases. Gookin split open a pine log, and with the dry slivers from within we kindled a fire against the most dilapidated wall of our hostelry. The logs were well soaked with rain; but as soon as they were dry it was clear that the whole would be in a blaze. Against such a contingency we provided the trunk of a young tree for battering down the wall, and a pile of saturated branches to whip out the fire. This done, we all fell asleep, involved in a steam-bath of an influence singularly soothing and soporific. Soon the suffocating heat waked us, and we beheld the side of the hut in a light flame. Escaping through an opening we had cut for the purpose, we knocked down the burning wall, put out the fire, and having rekindled it under safer auspices fell asleep again.

In the morning we saw the sun blazing over the forest and sparkling in the drops hanging from every leaf. Mists were rolling from the river and clouds melting from the sky. With appetites whetted by twenty-four hours of abstinence, we breakfasted on our half pint of rice, and once more embarked in our floating horse-trough. Half an hour more and we saw the white rapids leaping and tumbling in the sun, found the true road to the settlement, landed, sent the canoe down stream with an ignominious kick, and saw her sucked in among the riotous surges. At nine o'clock, from the edge of the forest, we looked down on the settlement of the Magalloway, and beheld that classic stream, embellished with the homes of a hard-headed yeomanry, winding amidst meadows rich with the corn and vine—that is, maize and pumpkins—and shadowed by the mountain to which aboriginal vagabonds have left the graceful name of Asesquoss.

Thus did we close in triumph our grand exploration of the Magalloway.

THE REAL COST.

"IT is very hard," cried Miss Farthingale's ghost, with some asperity, "and quite an unusual proceeding! People, as a rule, have some sort of consideration shown them in such cases; a warrant of death, as you may say, served on them, a death-bed scene, weeping friends, something like decency and propriety."

"But if you would have disease of the heart," suggested Mercury, blandly. (For be it known that the old story of Mercury conducting the ghosts of the dead to the lower regions is true after all; and the messenger of the gods was taking the ghost of Miss Farthingale to the Styx.)

"I don't believe it," snapped the lady, in a sudden passion. "You will never convince me that I am dead."

"Oh, Madam! upon my honor! you are as dead—as—as that American President who let his rascally Secretary of War send the guns off South; I forget the name—I had a few drops of Lethe this morning—an excellent tonic, but makes one oblivious for an hour or so; but pray be convinced: don't you hear the disturbance they are making about what was once you on the chair yonder? They are sending now for a physician. Much good may he do you!"

"It is very uncomfortable," sighed Miss Farthingale, as she floated out at window.

Every one (that is, every one of any consequence) knows the Farthingale mansion on —th Street, near —th Avenue; and will recollect that —th Street, after the peculiar fashion of such cross streets, falls into a rapid decadence as it recedes from that magic precinct: hence Mercury and Miss Farthingale found on their route brown stone dwindling into brick, brick growing shabby, rusty, reckless, dingy, giving way then altogether to tumble-down, staring, wooden buildings, about whose doors played or screamed, as the case might be, woeful little toddlers, in whose dirt and squalor and sickliness it was hard to find any of the tender grace of childhood—a wretched neighborhood, at which Miss Farthingale gave a little shudder of disgust.

"Shocking! Good Mercury, why do we come this way? It would have been so much more agreeable down the—"

"But we have yet to verify your accounts."

"Accounts! I have none. Papa settles all my bills!"

"You mistake," rejoined the god, severely.

"Every man or woman has in life an account current with the justice of which you hear so much and see so little; and, according to its tenor, dies solvent or insolvent. This is yours; tolerably correct, I think, you will find it. We are very exact about our book-keeping, only with us matters often take a different look from that they wear on earth. The little transactions sealed and forgotten by you, sometimes in our sight, stretch through your lives into eternity, in an infinite series of consequences; so that even your morning's shopping, Miss Farthingale, set down on that last page at which you are looking, may prove of consequence. Stop here, if you please."

"Here" signified the third landing of a black and broken staircase in one of the staring wooden houses. A woman in rusty black was going in at a little door, and Mercury and Miss Farthingale flitted in behind her. In the room were two children, not indeed squalid and clamorous like those without, but silent and hungry-eyed; and on the wretched bed a wan, wrinkled face looked eagerly up from the pillow.

The woman in black sat down with a hopeless, weary air.

"I've heard," she said, sullenly, in answer to the anxious looks that met her, "that God cares for all; but seems to me He has forgotten us—guess we are left out, since there's neither bite nor sup for us. This whole blessed day I've framped looking for work, and there's just none to be got—to give out, that is. I reckon women oughtn't to have families. I might have got a job on a Singer's machine, if you and the children, mother, could shift for yourselves and live on air while I was learning to work; or, if I was alone, I could learn fluting, or take a turn at hoop-skirts, or cigar-making; but there ain't no calculation made for women with bed-ridden mothers and a couple or so of babies: guess they ain't no business to live; and as for all the talk about soldiers and soldiers' families, that's trash, and so I told them. Says I, I am a soldier's wife; my husband died for his country, as you call it; he did his duty like a man, and fell fighting with the foremost. We were well enough till he turned soldier. He always kept us comfortable; and now I'm left with a poor old mother that can't stir or help herself, and two children, the oldest going on four year; and, for the pension—it's a help, is eight dollars a month, if I can get any one to leave at home while I go (and many's the time and many's the one that spends a whole day there waiting in the crowd); but it won't keep a family of four; try it, if you don't believe it. I want work; so does hundreds more—soldiers' wives like me, widows like me—that you might stay snug at home; and they only ask for something to do at home, because of the children that they can't take with them or leave behind them; and I tell you, mother, there ain't work for such. I see ladies to-day—real ladies, good ladies, that is working day and night, too, for poor souls like us—I mean them down there in Chambers Street that are trying to do something for the working women; and when they heard what I wanted they looked sorrowful like, and said they were doing their best, but such a few bodies seemed to take thought for the poor mothers like me, that must work and must keep at home, and they couldn't help me nuther; and here I am, beat out and clean discouraged."

"Dear me!" fluttered Miss Farthingale. "What a peculiar person!"

"But what makes me worst of all," went on the woman, quite unconscious of her airy audience, "and to feel ugly and like hating my kind, is when I see some of them grand ladies figured out in their silks, sweeping along the streets, or stepping out of their carriages, holding up their skirts as if mine might hurt them, as some did yesterday; acting as if there wasn't any sorrow in the world. They've a right to their money, and to live soft and lie easy—I don't begrudge them; but when coal's double about, and bread as hard to come by as the truth, and poor folks like us can't so much as see meat and sugar and tea and butter, and our husbands and sons and brothers low in their graves, fighting for them too—and can't help us—to see them for whom it would be so easy never once taking thought how we fare, it stirs my blood, I own. Some on 'em's good to us, God bless 'em for that! but there's blood on them laces, and dying groans in the rattling of them silks."

"Molly!" cried the voice from the bed, "nay, Molly, them's hard words. Don't go on like that."

"I tell you there is," persisted the woman, "and if them's hard words so much the worse, for it's the truth; and what's more there's treason in it too. I heard the men talking it over only t'other night at the place there—Simpson's, I mean—and they said how it was even in the papers, that the gold went out of the country for their silks and their jewels, and that sent the rags they call money now lower yet, and meat and drink and fire higher yet, till poor folks soon would have to quit living; and all this went agen the Government, though my head's such a muddle I don't just see how, but they made it out clear enough; and while our poor fellows freeze, and scorch, and groan, and die, for every blow our brave boys strike for the country the fine ladies strike two against it; and for all that they say the like was never seen of their dressing and flying about, and that they all seem mad together."

"Some of that's talk, mayhap," persisted the voice from the bed. "Poor folk will have their grumble, Molly."

"Tell you, then, what I seen myself only yesterday," persisted the woman—"a lady buying a shawl, a flimsy cobweb thing, fit to keep out neither wind nor rain, to be laid away in a drawer the best of the time, and she paid three hundred dollars for it. I saw her. I saw the bill, for I stood and watched her; three hundred dollars! Why, that would make us, and the woman up stairs with her baby, and the two lame women—one of 'em's down now with rheumatiz, and the Lord help her, for it's hard enough when they are both lively—and the old woman with the little grandchild, and a dozen others, snug and happy: think of it all going for that cobweb! She was a pretty young lady, delicate like; but she looked ugly to me. I said to myself, that thing ain't yours; you've no business with it. You go to your church and hear that all men and women are your brothers and sisters, and you let your brothers and sisters starve that you may go fine. You make flags for our soldiers, and throw them flowers, and do worse than the rebels with your extravagance; and thinks I, grand as you are, it's a heavy debt you'll owe to justice, if there be such a thing."

Involuntarily Miss Farthingale glanced down at the slip in her hand, on which figured item: Lace shawl, three hundred dollars.

There came just then a tap at the door, and entered a lean figure in a scimped, ill-fitting, faded gown, and a wonderful cap, clearly made of shreds of muslin, for which odds and ends of embroidery tacked thereto apologized in vain. She carried a little black steaming tea-pot and some slices of bread and butter.

"I knew you'd been out all day, Miss Clemens," was her half deprecating salutation, "and that grandmother can't stir about much, so I run down with a little of my dinner. Take a cup of tea now; it will set you up nicely."

But the woman by the table folded her arms and shook her head.

"Much obliged, and it's kind of you, Miss Lucy; but I'm stronger and younger nor you be, and if I can't work I won't eat the little you've got."

"If a body ever heard the like of that!" cried Miss Lucy, pouring a cup of tea and taking it to the bed; "here, grandmother, you take a taste now or I'll get down-hearted, and I s'pose the babies can have some if they like," holding out the bread to the hungry-eyed children, who seized it ravenously. "Why, what would become of poor folks if they didn't lend a hand to each other!"

"Certain, the rich folk wouldn't trouble about us," muttered the other, bitterly.

Miss Lucy, who had been beating up the pillows for the sick woman, stopped and turned about.

"Well, I don't just think that, Miss Clemens; rich folk do look after poor ones a heap; but you see there's such a lot of us, and it's different to pinch along from day to day, and only to see and hear about it; and when they do undertake to help, why ten times out of the dozen they gives to the wrong ones, and then get sick of the whole on it; and the benevolent societies is fairly run down, and they go asking for money too, and folks that don't look into it can't help thinking charity's like a sieve; and then they don't think. When a lady buys a fan and pays five dollars for it, why she knows, to be sure, that she could get just as good for coolness for a dollar and a half, or for that matter for the half, and that off in some dirty back streets where she has never been are hungry, ragged people; but she don't know as we do, Miss Clemens, that up stairs that poor woman is dyin' with consumption, and not a pillow to her head, only the bare wooden settle; and her little baby worse off nor some little half-starved kitten, and that three dollars and a half or less would give 'em what they haven't had for weeks—a decent meal and a fire; and another lady gets a dress just to look pretty and fresh, and the trimming costs more than we can earn in a month; but—don't you see?—what the eyes don't see the heart don't feel; though if the good Lord only would open their eyes! if they could know just once what it was to feel hungry, let alone the rest—that cravin', cravin', all the time! And do you know when I has it, I am such a fool I make it ten times worse, for I keep on thinkin' and hankerin' after all the nice things that ever I ate, though I try not, and mayhap I get to fancyin' how good a bit of meat would taste, and how I could broil it so easy on the coals, and what a little it would cost, till my mouth waters fairly. Come now, Miss Clemens, you eat a bit, and the next time I do a piece of work that don't suit and don't get paid, why it will be your turn."

Miss Farthingale looked at the hungry family ravenously devouring the bread, and measuring its scantiness with dismayed and famished looks, and then at the items on her account:

Three handkerchiefs	$18
Comb	15
Ten yards chenille fringe.....	20
Cloak	92
Lace barbe	10

"If one could but draw a check!" she said to herself.

"Ah!" answered Mercury, as he flitted out at the window, "if post-mortem checks were but possible, there would be founded the greatest charity ever known; but it is with you, Madam, as with millions before you—too late. Your account is closed."

Miss Farthingale followed in silence (she was engaged in an unusual and delicate operation—thinking) till he stopped just over a desolate barren of sand, half hidden by raw fog, through which she could dimly see rude sheds, in which were huddled gaunt, ragged, woeful-looking men. In virtue of her ghostship she was insensible to atmospherical changes, but the demeanor of the men proved that it was cold—bitterly so. Some were plainly frozen; some walked and ran about to restore circulation to stiffening toes and fingers; some huddled together, trying to gain warmth from the contact of their miserable bodies—all of them, worn almost to skeletons, tottering, haggard with want and despair. In one corner a group of the miserable wretches were struggling for something with a famished ferocity horrible to witness in human beings. Miss Farthingale looked and recoiled in disgust. The prize for which they were contending was a large rat. From another quarter she heard a sound of talking, and saw a number of the unfortunate men, not yet so utterly transformed by extreme misery—newer arrivals perhaps—sadly talking over their miseries.

"The worst of all," one was saying, "or it seems worst to me, is that so many of our folks forget us. I always thought women faithful, tender-hearted creatures, and that they'd stick by us at all events. And jest look at the rebel women here! Do you remember that plantation, Davis, where all the pictures were on the walls, and the vases and flagree gimcracks that ain't no good standin' round, but not a carpet or a curtain in the house? All gone for soldiers' blankets. And the girls, real ladies, brought up to do nothing, working away on them coarse army things, and wearing their calicoes—grit to the back-bone—ready, I do believe, to cut off their hair to make ropes of, like some women that I once read of, if there had been any call for them. And look at ours! Why, the papers say there never was seen any thing like their extravagance and their giddiness. We starve, and they dance; we freeze, and they flash out in diamonds and silks, till even the press takes it up, and tells them they are crippling the Government, and, for very shame's sake, not to dance over graves. For our poor families, God knows what comes of them. I set it down first for rebel bosh till I saw it with my own eyes in a Northern paper that the Colonel sent down. I wonder how they think we like to hear about their doings, and have the rebels throw it in our teeth that even our women don't care for us!"

Miss Farthingale tossed her head.

"At this rate one had best join the Sisters of Charity at once. Probably these gentlemen" (with contemptuous emphasis) "would be satisfied if all the women went about doing disagreeable things in those hideous bonnets."

Mercury shrugged his shoulders and spread his wings for further flight. The lady followed sulkily, but started in genuine astonishment with her first glance at the inmates of the long, cheerless room in which she found herself. She had discovered there familiar faces; her cousin Harry (a Federal captain), and some half a dozen young men whom she had known in her lifetime, and who for some months back had been held prisoners in the Libby. Captain Harry, newspaper in hand, was declaiming angrily:

"The lovely Miss M. F——e, of —th Street. That is my cousin Mollie Farthingale. 'Her diamonds were valued at twenty-five thousand dollars, and she—' The devil take it! paragraphs like that are worse than being mewed up here on half-rations and treated like dogs. Sounds like 'the loved ones at home, watching and praying for our return,' don't it? Pleasant stuff that for a fellow's meditations, lying in a wooden bunk without a blanket, or on a damp floor, trying to fancy that the home people haven't forgotten him after all. No wonder the 'rebs' are willing to lend us a paper like that. It takes the pluck out of a man sooner than their slow torture. One might stick it through, thinking that some one cared, but to be forgotten before you are dead—"

"Well, we aren't sure of that last," put in a cheery voice.

"No, but it looks curiously like it; no doubt many good souls do think and toil for us, and our Government is true to us; but it cuts deep to think of the women, for I believe prison makes one soft. You get to know the value of kind looks and soft words, and to long so for home and women's faces, and then to hear of them, gay and careless, not as ever, but à l'outrance—madly, deliriously—strikes coldly on a prisoner's heart. If Molly Farthingale, or any of these gay girls had one thought for us, for the country, for any thing but the whirl they call pleasure, could we find them quoted in such—"

Here Mercury was attracted by a sniff from Miss Farthingale, whom indignation had hitherto kept speechless.

Abuse like that was very ungentlemanly and undeserved. Men made a mighty hue and cry about their poor little ribbons and laces, but what of their horses, and their horrid wines and cigars? and she was only a poor little girl, and knew nothing about their dreadful politics; and what had her lace shawl to do with the currency, she should like to know? and how could she know about vulgar people that talked loud, and used bad grammar? and was it her fault if they were starving? and wasn't this a free country? she would like Mr. Mercury to tell her that; and if so, hadn't she a right to buy diamonds if she liked, and how could any body ever have any thing nice if they only bought just what they needed? and what were pretty things for, if it was wrong to buy them?

There always would be poor people. It was an institution of God, and she didn't think it right to meddle with it; and as for the soldiers, she was as sorry for them as any body, and she had made, oh! quantities of havelocks, and scraped lint to an unlimited extent; but what would they have? If all the girls went into mourning and cried all day long, that wouldn't melt the Richmond officials; and how did their Redovas interfere with their comfort? For her part she thought it selfish of Cousin Harry, and for the men on Belle Isle, they were positively impertinent; and why should she have an account with justice? She thought it was only wicked old male people that needed that sort of book-keeping, and that girls and women had nothing to do with such dreadful things.

In short, Miss Farthingale had hysterics, and Mercury finding reasoning in vain, god as he was, had no other resource than to hustle her into Charon's boat, and send her across the Styx as fast as possible.

THE DECLINE OF TRAGEDY.

A DISTINGUISHED German writer said of the ancient Greek Comedy, that it was "the child of the greatest energy and enjoyment of life"—the primitive pleasure of a natural people, unvexed by the exactions of courts, and safe in the possession of life, person, and estate. The essence of Comedy is a ludicrous collision of differing minds, manners, and events. As society advances to a higher stage of civilization satire parts with its simple good-nature, and becomes the instrument of personal ambitions and enmities, which naturally seek the stage as the most convenient and public field for their exhibition, as well as the safest, since it is not easy to make a personal quarrel out of that which has given pleasure to the whole town. Nothing could be more cruel than the exhibition of Dryden's foibles and affectations in "The Rehearsal;" yet every body laughed except the old and decayed poet, who could only say pathetically how much he felt the indignity to his white hairs and his long service in the field of letters. One relishes extremely Dr. Johnson's purchase of a stout oaken stick when he heard that Sam Foote intended to bring him on the stage; nor do we think that we could have blamed Cumberland if he had resented Sheridan's attack upon him in "The Critic" in the same practical manner. Dr. Swift used to say that he liked Tom, Dick, and Harry in particular, although he detested mankind in general; and in Comedy the reverse of the proposition is or should be true, and while we laugh at mankind in general, we have no right to exhibit Tom, Dick, and Harry for our own entertainment and emolument. There is no harm in displaying the virtues of any individual, and not much in delineating his sufferings, if it be done with a delicate and honorable hand; but there is something discreditable in making merriment out of any body's personal deformities, or mental eccentricities, or private weaknesses. Great genius may sustain great skill in such a work; but when in inferior hands, as it usually is, it becomes merely impish depravity. We laugh with the mimic—but we seldom respect him.

Tragedy is always more earnest than Comedy, and is therefore less inclined to mean and disreputable resources. There is a dignity in all human sorrow which abashes the insolent and sneering observer; and puts a little flesh, if only for a moment, into the most obdurate heart. For the mysterious vicissitudes of life and death, of prosperity and adversity, of pride and of penitence, of human weakness and of an avenging Nemesis, which darken the tragic stage—what are they but the counterfeit presentment of every man's experience in this world of sorrow and of failure?—of real agony and intolerable bereavement?—of bitter self-reproach and the gnawings of a violated conscience? Why does the whole pit cry at the maudlin and mouthing rhetoric of Kotzebue's "Stranger?" Why do we dilate with sympathetic emotions at the horrors of some cheap French melodrama, while the heroine coughs herself out of this vale of tears? Why do we go weeping to our beds, the dupes of a simulated suicide, and wonder why there is not more poetical justice in this world, or, at least, in the theatre? Why but because there is so little poetic justice and rounded success in the life of any one of us. Why but because we feel that there is something infinitely mournful in this selfish strife between man and his brother; in this failure of the virtuous and triumph of the vile; in the struggle which Right must maintain down to the last hour of the world's existence against pitiless and treacherous and domineering Wrong.

As a consequence of the natural elevation of Tragedy, there will always be a tendency upon the stage to pretentious and superfluous declamation. Perhaps those who have ridiculed this have been too apt to forget how difficult it must be for a performer, however anxious not to overstep the modesty of nature, to remain perfectly self-possessed, and to keep his tone and manner down to those of ordinary social intercourse. Habit is omnipotent; and the many amusing anecdotes of Mrs. Siddons—how she "stabbed the potatoes" at a dinner-table, and frightened a mercer out of his senses by asking him, in her deepest tragedy tones, if his goods would wash—seem not unnatural when told of the finest Lady Macbeth in our theatrical history. But it must be remembered that the utterance of the tragic stage does not pretend to be that of everyday life; and it is certainly better for an actress to be a little over-energetic upon the stage than to mince through her murders, and herself die with a genteel simper. But there is a ranting upon the boards which is compensated for by no intelligible purpose nor well-considered plan—which has not even the merit of lofty declamation—which is mere hissing and roaring set off by unmeaning strides and gesticulation—which is furious without force, and energetic without taste or judgment; from which may the Tragic Muse deliver pit, box, and gallery! We have seen the comic actresses ridicule this exceedingly droll exaggeration of an exaggeration, and we have wondered that the lesson was lost upon their tragic sisters. But it was. Nay, even the merry ladies themselves, whenever the manager blundered into giving them a tragic part, would go through the same performance with a seriousness equally amusing.

All these spasmodic shoutings and antics bear about the same relation to true tragic vehemence which the best tavern-sign bears to a portrait by Sir Joshua Reynolds. Tragedy should excite either terror or pity; but these unhappy performers inspire only the last—for themselves, and not for the characters which they personate! This kind of acting is purely traditional. It comes down to us from a time when, to make a tragedy, William Hayley directed the writer to Take a virgin from Asia, from Afric, or Greece,

At least a king's daughter, or Emperor's niece.
Take a hero, though buried some ten years before,
But with life enough in him to rattle and roar.

Take a horrid old brute who deserves to be racked
And call him a tyrant ten times in each act!

What makes the matter more ridiculous is that, although we have discarded plays of this description, we still retain the style of acting which was well adapted to them. We do not bully and bluster in the right characters, nor yet in the right places. Poor old Bajazet and Tamerlane have long since gone to their account—Eudocia, Eumenes, and Artamon are no more; yet we still cling to the top-lofty style of declamation, although we have but the tamest text to declaim.

There is no form of literature which has shown such a persistent and dogged determination to die out as English Tragedy. It arose almost at once and in great vigor; its culmination was illustrious and immortal; and then began that slow decay which no intellectual activity has been powerful enough to arrest. The superb tragedians of the age of Elizabeth were succeeded by a far inferior but still vigorous class of writers. These were followed by the frigid and French declaimers of the age of Anne; and after these, so far as the theatre is concerned, there is literally nobody worth mentioning for the purposes of this discussion. Many tragedies have been written, and some of them have been produced, during the latter period, but they have had small effect, and have made no mark upon the literary history of the time. This meagre and mortifying penury crept upon us during a period when the Germans were actually creating a dramatic literature—when we were making a contemptible figure in no other department of letters—when several of the greatest English actors were in the full flush of their fame; and when the mechanical resources of the theatre were probably unrivaled in sumptuousness and ingenuity. Facts like these present a curious and perplexing problem. We can only venture upon a few suggestions.

English Tragedy arose at a period eminently fitted for its development. The traditions of chivalry were yet held in lively remembrance, nor had its institutions entirely disappeared. The discovery of far-off lands, full of a wealth and magnificence which until then had been deemed the mere fables of the poets, had quickened the imagination of the country; the throne was beloved by the people, and the people were beloved by the throne; the brilliancy of the court was the pride of the peasant, and the prosperity of the peasant was the pride of the court; the learning and the poetry of Italy had been engrafted upon English letters to quicken and inform them—to rescue them from ruggedness and pedantry, and to add incalculably to their raw material for poetic production; the Reformation had done its work of emancipating the intellect from monkish restraints and superstitious timidity; while the stage itself, heretofore rude and barbarous, was becoming a place of scenic splendors and of mechanical appliances at once ingenious, impressive, and convenient.

Yet this was but the gilded and welcome morning of following a long night of barbarism and violence, in which courts were full of wicked intrigue, of crimes which follow guilty love or eager ambition, of tortuous diplomacy and hard-handed violence. To an English audience of that period there was a simple truthfulness and probability in tragedy of which we can know nothing. It had all really happened but yesterday, and it might all really happen again tomorrow. It is easy to see how this gave verisimilitude to production, and quickness to representation. The romantic had not ceased to be impossible.

It is with far other feelings that we witness the representation even of the plays of Shakespeare. We may be touched, but we do not tremble; we may be affected but we do not believe; and whoever, like Partridge, in "Tom Jones," should allow himself to be cheated into a momentary confidence in the reality of the scene would unquestionably be thought a very ridiculous and simple-minded person, below the meanest of the minor "gods" in intelligence. Dramatic history is full of instances of the way in which audiences have been affected by the naturalness of acting. In ancient times, we are told, there was one actor who was put to death by the populace because he played the part of a murderer so admirably. Lord Byron fainted at Kean's last scene in Sir Giles Overreach. Our actors are safe from such fatal accidents, and nobody faints now at the theatre except by reason of improper ventilation. But cold-bloodedness is not all. We lack something besides that simple credulity which makes the theatre so delightful to children; we have lost something of the old appreciation of the heroic and the magnanimous when presented under ideal forms. New epics have apparently, and perhaps fortunately, become impossible. Are new tragedies—we mean tragedies which can be played, and which people will go to see—equally impossible? We will not read twenty-four books in decasyllabics, and our poets therefore wisely refrain from their manufacture; but are we still, in this locomotive age, in too much haste to listen to five acts of terror and pity without yawning? Perhaps not if the five acts possess any possible human, divine, or even infernal interest. But five acts for the mere sake of five acts is more than we can endure. We do not hiss, for hissing is a forgotten art; but we stay severely away from the theatre. As Voltaire said of theatrical composition in general: "Tous les genres sont bons hors le genre ennuyeux." So we take refuge in farces; we fly to short and smart melodramas; we give ourselves up to the fiddles and señoritas of the Academy; we frequent the horse-riding, and go where the rapid banjo calls.

It is curious to consider the English tragedies written during the last half century, and to observe from the very lists of the dramatis personæ how these inspired writers, whatever the ardors of composition, have always had their old, tattered, weak-kneed, mouldy lay-figures before them, dressed up for the nonce in armor, in toga, or in Oriental robe and turban. Antonio, Alhaora, Alvar, Brutus, Duke Alphonso, Virginius, Cæsar—all manner of Roman, Grecian, Italian, Moorish gentlemen, long since dead, and entitled to sleep quietly in their graves! You go to the theatre to see a new tragedy, and behold upon the bills—

SCENE—Padua.

The reader need not be told what the costume of Miss White will be, nor what oaths Mr. Wilkins will swear, nor how both will use the old English of James Sheridan Knowles, nor how unlike any body who ever lived in Padua Mrs. Greene will be. If you are an ordinary human being you go out early in the action; but if you are a newspaper reporter you remain for your sins, and count the gapes in the boxes, or mark the dying struggles of Wilkins with a sense of relief.

And are we to go on thus forever? with the eternal Pedro and the everlasting Padua? Why, Beaumont and Fletcher had a Bianca; Webster had a Ferdinand; Massinger had an Angelo; Mr. Knowles had all the Italian names ever heard of. It has been "Scene—Milan," or "Scene—Padua," or "Scene—Verona," for three hundred years. Do you wonder that the poor people weary of the old scenes, old plots, old language, old Elizabethan slip-slop, old trunk hose, old slashed doublets, and fall back upon Women's Conventions, or Panoramas, or Tom Thumb, or Chemical Lectures, for entertainment?—that they desert the dear old rusty legitimate drama, and rush in regiments, glass in hand, to see Miss Cruikshank dance at the Opera? We, who in struggling for bread, butter, and beer, have had more of Pedro and Bianca than should have been equitably allotted to one poor devil, certainly prefer Miss Cruikshank (who is nature, with a little cotton padding) to the legitimate drama of modern construction; for we regard her, as she smirks at us, standing upon one toe in a glory of white gauze and lead, and the very best rouge, as by far the most legitimate of the two. People can hardly be said, nowadays, to go to the theatre to see what they like, but they will not go to see that which they like least. They prefer Miss Cruikshank, always fresh and smiling from the hands of her dresser, to the everlasting Pedros in their old red breeches and rosetted shoes.

Campbell somewhere remarks that the best English plays have been written by actors, and suggests, as a remedy for the admitted decay of the drama, that the gentlemen of the theatre go to work again. We would strongly urge this view upon Messrs. Wilkins, Smith, Jones, and Brown, and politely beg of them to pay their devotions to the Muse, did we have any hope of a successful experiment. We suppose that they would be ready enough, for they have no misgivings of their ability to do any thing; but we will not be an accomplice in the dramatic crimes which these gentlemen would be sure to commit. For do you suppose that these men, who have been gasconading about in togas and tunics for so many years, could give us any thing but an uncommonly musty repetition of Pedro and Bianca?—that they could do any more than echo the long and strident lines with which their mouths and our ears have so long been filled?—that they could present to us more than the threadbare heroes and traditional heroines, and the dear, old familiar scenes?—the plays writ after a model, to be mouthed in the regulation manner?—plays full of lines which would come into the world with their backs broken, and the blotches of bad grammar all over them? We should, for all our pains, only add to that mountainous mass of intolerable dramas which already crowds the repertoires of the theatres. We beg Messrs. Wilkins and Co. to stick to their togas, wig-boxes, and rouge-pots, and to leave the pens and ink alone.

What, then, is to be suggested? Have we no tragic resources? Has the world become so absolutely happy and serene that poor Tragedy must die in dead earnest amidst the laughter of Comedy and the senseless roar of Farce—leaving her bowl to be turned into a kitchen utensil, and her dagger into a toasting fork?—her last tear shed, her last murder done, her last stride taken, and her last death-rattle executed? There is no crime, then, left to be painted?—no palpitating heart to be portrayed?—no sweet nature out of tune to be delineated?—no clinging affection repulsed to be presented?—no dark and dilating passion to thrill and tremble in her lofty speech? All the world, then, lies in measureless content upon couches of pleasure, or jigs it in a jolly round through Elysian meadows! Why, the perfectionist must have been busier than we supposed! The Millennium must have come upon us without the proper preliminary phenomena! Happy world, that has no material left in it for a tragedy! It is to be all giggle and make giggle hereafter!

Alas! this poor age, if it did but know it, if it could but see it and use it, has material enough for hundreds of tragedies, and to spare. With all our advances, and maugre our complacency, and in spite of our prettiest reforms, we have not yet escaped the doom imposed upon the sons of men! Still disappointment dogs endeavor, and death is beforehand with success in setting his seal upon the sturdiest enterprise; still we sow for others' reaping, and win laurels for others' wearing; still hunger gnaws at the hearts of the needy, and whispers to them of well-rewarded crime; still the great problems of human existence vex the minds of melancholy and wayward men to madness! The midnight streets are full of the forlorn and wretched; the bells still toll, and the clods sound their farewell upon the lid of the coffin—and yet we go shambling and blindly blundering back to the past for the sources of tragedy! Are we such wretched and dry-brained pedants that we are afraid to write of the things which are about us—jibing us, squeaking and gibbering at us, mocking our lofty complacency—while we fill up our five acts with mummies from the pyramids and skeleton maskers from the Middle Ages? Was there ever such a pitiable delusion? The world is shaking with the struggle of man for freedom, and kings are tumbling from their thrones in an epilepsy of apprehension, and we must go back to early centuries for terror! It is full of desolation and despair, and we must fly to Greece for tragic pity!

We are not great sticklers for dramatic forms, nor indeed for forms of any kind after they have outlived their meaning and necessity. We should certainly prefer three good acts to five bad ones, honest prose to Elizabethan verse, and a total confusion of time, place, and action to a rigid adherence, at the expense of earnestness, to the rules of the rhetorician. We care little for the unities if they bring only stately dullness. The tendency of scholarly men to stand fast by the maxims of their predecessors would have left the old English drama pretty nearly below contempt, if there had not been other writers who followed the dictates of their own untrammelled judgment, and wrote according to laws of their own enactment. Sincerity of purpose of itself often insures skill in construction, and the genius of Shakspeare gave law to the greatest of his contemporaries. Coleridge, in an admirable passage, points out that the supposed irregularity of the Great Dramatist was “a mere dream of pedantry that arraigned the eagle, because he had not the dimensions of the swan.” If we have dramatic writing with a purpose, its forms will sufficiently and artistically and naturally take care of themselves.

We have, indeed, much to unlearn. Theatres are the conservatories of habit, and one generation of actors goes mimicking another until tone and gesture become traditional, and nothing but a revolution can rescue us from meaningless conventionalities. Writers follow the example of the actors, and strive to accommodate themselves to laws which are supposed to be irrevocable. No art can be subjected to fetters like these and live; for if art continue to exist it must be by its inherent force and originality, and its adaptation to contemporary thought and feeling.

Soame Jenyns, in a clever but forgotten poem, has the following:

“So rude at first the Tragic Muse appear'd,
Her voice alone by rustic rabble heard,
Where twisting trees a cooling arbor made.
The pleased spectators sat beneath the shade;
The homely stage with rushes green was strew'd,
And in a cart the strolling actors rode;

Till time at length improv'd the great design,
And bade the scenes with painted landscapes shine.
Then art did all the bright machines dispose,
And theatres of Parian marble rose!
Then mimic thunder shook the canvas sky,
And Gods descended from their towers on high.”

These smooth verses sufficiently designate the limits of dramatic simplicity and dramatic civilization. Between them lie the epochs of a variously advanced refinement, but at every period the stage is found the representative of present human culture and belief. Thus, during a time of monkish superstition we have the Miracle Plays, the Mysteries, the Lent Plays in Spain. The Father turns Adam out of doors with the anathema: “Get out of my house, you scoundrel!” Adam goes begging, and can find no home. The Four Seasons give him a spade and plow, but nothing to eat. Reason tells him to go to law with his father, which he does. Mercy pleads his cause; and the Father settles upon him bread, wine, lamb, and oil—each of which gifts is symbolic and significant, the oil representing extreme unction. Many of these dramas were much more literal; but the populace saw in them only the expression of their own unquestioning faith, and they gazed upon these rude and simple shows with a feeling of confidence and awe which we in these skeptical days find it hard to comprehend. But for such a time and such an audience no drama could be more strictly legitimate. Between such an exhibition and the exquisite comedy of Molière there is a wide difference, but in the veracity with which each appealed to the knowledge and tastes of the company they are the same. If the Parisian managers had persisted in giving “Adam and Eve” to the Parisian audiences, their course would have been not a whit less absurd than that of modern managers, who imagine that what was fit for London two hundred years ago is just the thing for New York in this present Anno Domini. Until we get a drama legitimate because it is contemporary, the theatre will be of far less service to morals, and certainly of far less interest than the menagerie or the wax-work.

But in these, as in all other matters of literature and art, we feel that we must wait the operation of natural causes, and that undue haste will be of little value. It is unquestionably a matter for regret, not that we can not extemporize a modern school of Tragedy which shall meet the actual wants and tastes of the time, but that we so resolutely endeavor to avail ourselves of so much which has become to this age hollow sham and unmeaning phantasmagoria. It is still more a matter of regret that no one should have the courage to grapple with the vast fund of material which society presents, and to make an honest endeavor at least to give to it a practical form. But for this, too, we must wait, especially grateful that we are not taxed to support it. The last in these times would be indeed a crowning misery.

LOST! .

I HEAR it in the dark and silent night,
Borne on the houseless wind, that one word, Lost!
Like the despairing cry of some poor soul
Whose helmless bark, shipwrecked and tempest-tost,
Floats on to where the angry breakers roar,
And dash against the beetling crags which stand
Like hoary giants, and along the shore
The cruel rocks reach out beyond the land.

It comes to me from regions where the wind
Blows keen o'er trackless fields of ice and snow,
Where the Aurora beams upon the night,
The long, long winter night, which passes slow
Into the long, long day; and towering high,
The toppling icebergs lift their jagged forms,
Swaying against each other; and the sky
Is pregnant with the weight of Polar storms.

It comes to me from off the desert's waste,
Where the dry sands, hot with the sun's fierce rays,
Stretch on and on through weary miles away;
The vulture on the prostrate camel preys;
The stolid sphinx looms hideous and tall;
In vain the eye searches for sign of bloom;
Down to the ground the cunning Arabs fall,
And o'er them sweeps the deadly, dread simoom.

It comes to me upon the raging storm,
The thunder utters it from out the cloud:
I see through half-shut eyes the fated ship,
And hear the angry breakers roaring loud;
I see mute hands uplifted to the skies,
As on the rocks the struggling ship is tost;
I hear amid the crash heart-piercing cries,
And wind and waves together answer Lost!

I hear it as I walk the city's streets
From haunts of vice where Satan holds his reign;
On strains of wild, delirious music borne,
In whose mad tones there sounds a wail of pain.
I see it stamped on faces in the crowd
In characters which all may read aright;
Sure as the sunset lining on the cloud
Foretells the certain coming of the night.

Oh, swelling heart which throbs within my breast,
What hast thou lost from out thine early years?
Why dost thou grieve when others are so gay—
What means these pent-up floods of bitter tears?
And in low tones the sad heart makes reply:
"I once held hopes I prized above all cost;
They were my treasures in the years gone by,
I grieve because I know that these are lost!"

AN UNFORTUNATE PRINCESS.

ON a certain March evening in the year of Our Lord 1751, Frederick Prince of Wales, son of George the Second and father of George the Third, died at his house in Leicester-fields, in the arms of Desnoyers, a French dancing-master who had been called in to soothe the last tremendous moments of the royal spendthrift with the twang of his favorite violin. On the 13th of the June following his widow gave birth to a baby princess, known to history as Caroline Matilda, the beautiful, imprudent, and unfortunate Queen of Denmark, about whose guilt or innocence there has been almost as much controversy as about that of Mary Stuart, and with as little likelihood of ever coming to a distinct and certain conclusion. The Princess of Wales was a stern-mannered, though in reality a loving and careful mother; still, so stern that once, when the little Duke of Gloucester was sitting deep in melancholy thought, and she asked him sharply what he was thinking of, he was able to answer, "I was thinking that if ever I have a son I will not make him as unhappy as you make me."

Caroline Matilda, it is to be supposed, bore her share with the rest; but we hear nothing of her life until the fatal year arrived when, at the age of fifteen, she found herself first the betrothed, and then the wife, of a fair-haired, under-sized, gay-tempered, handsome, dissolute young scamp of seventeen, Christian the Seventh, King of Denmark. "Diminutive as if he came out of a kernel in the fairy tales," with, adds Walpole, in another place, "the sublime strut of his grandfather (or a cock sparrow)."

The young queen was in her fresh girlhood; fair almost to a marvel, with light flaxen hair, shining like silver and of luxuriant growth, large, clear, bright, blue eyes, full red lips—the under one rich and pouting—small teeth white and even, and of a temper as bright and sweet as her face: lovely and fascinating enough surely to have made her lover for life the young profligate who kissed her publicly at Roeskilde when they met—perhaps moved for the moment by the sight of her girlish beauty—but who soon taught her what was the real worthlessness of his kisses, and of what infinite power of subdivision the instinct which it pleased his royal majesty to call love was capable. For the marriage feast was scarcely cold when Christian found "Milady," or "Katherine of the Pretty Feet"—about whose life the less said the better—a companion more congenial to his taste than the young English princess, whose soul was as pure as her face was fair. And not only "Milady," but all the roués and demireps to be met with in Copenhagen, to the scandal of decent people and the destruction of public morals.

Caroline Matilda found her Danish crown more thickly set with thorns than roses. Young as she was, and so sadly needing careful guidance, she had not a friend in her new home to direct or uphold her. Juliana Maria, the King's step-mother, had always been his declared enemy (even, so Christian believed, to his attempted destruction), because of her own son Frederick, who would come to the throne could the crown prince, as he was then, be destroyed; so that she was the poor young Queen's enemy too, ex-officio if not by personal dislike, and laid snares and digged pitfalls whenever and wherever she could; the old grandmother, Sophia Magdalena, was kind enough, but even she cared more for power than for the right, and had spent her life in trying to keep her personal influence paramount in Danish politics; and the Princess Charlotte Amelia, the King's aunt—who seems to have been about the best of the set—lived only for religious practices and charities, keeping as far out of the reach of her royal nephew as she could, having been his favorite butt and the object of his rudest practical jokes time out of mind.

The final cause of her withdrawal from the palace was "a fright she received through the King's first page crawling into the dining-room on all fours, disguised as a savage."

So Caroline Matilda was absolutely unfriended, save by the Grand Mistress of her household, Frau von Plessen; and she, though a virtuous woman and so far desirable in a court where even common propriety was at a discount, was a harsh-tempered, domineering old-maidish kind of person, who made bad worse by injudicious advice, and by never being able to understand that sometimes it is better to drive with a slack rein and a silken lash than with tight ropes and a leathern thong. Influenced by this clever lady, Caroline Matilda put on an air of forbidding coldness to her husband (perhaps it was not much trouble to do that), with the idea, so common among women, and so mistaken, that the best way to secure a husband's vagrant affections is to deny or conceal their own. In this case, however, it was not so much concealment as confession, for the young Queen had no great fondness for her royal spouse; as, indeed, how could she have? Unless neglect, debauchery, and open infidelity were qualities calculated to win the love and esteem of a girl-wife virtuously educated. Nevertheless, she nursed him assiduously when he had the scarlet-fever; and when he recovered, he went back to his street-rows, his mistresses, his low pot-house riots, his assaults on the watch, and all the other disgraceful doings which made him the disgust and the talk of Europe.

The royal favorite in chief at this time was Count Conrad von Holck, lately appointed Court Marshal, but acting as a kind of private Master of Ceremonies to the monarch, arranging all the court balls and fêtes: also helping him in pleasures less innocent. He it was who accompanied Christian to and from Milady's house, "during which street riots were but too frequent;" who shared in all his vices, and who organized many a nocturnal orgy during the brilliant luncheons which he was in the habit of giving at Blaagaard, a kind of castellated pleasure-house, just outside the north gate. And even when the Queen gave birth to a son—the future Frederick the Sixth—and all Denmark went mad with joy; always excepting the queen-dowager, Juliana Maria, whose son was thus doubly barred; even then, Christian and his favorite continued their excesses, and made the whole town ring with the echo of their misdeeds. Christian was seen one day in broad daylight returning from “Milady’s” in a state of intoxication, the people pursuing him with hootings and insults to his own palace-gates; in a word, the private and public annals of King, court, and favorite were of the worst kind. At last, however, the ministers arrested Katherine of the Pretty Feet, and put her in prison, after her royal lover had bought her a hotel and created her a baroness.

And now Christian and his court set out on their travels; taking with them, as surgeon and physician in ordinary, John Frederick Struensee, hitherto physician of Altona, and of the lordship of Pinneberg. And first the King of Denmark came here to visit the King of England. But “Farmer George” was not especially eager to favor his brother-in-law; so little eager, indeed, that when Christian came to Dover, he found no royal carriages waiting for him, and had to come to town in hackney-carriages. Even when he got to town, “by another mistake,” says Walpole, “King George happened to go to Richmond about an hour before King Christian arrived in London. An hour is exceedingly long, and the distance to Richmond still longer; so with all the dispatch which could possibly be made, King George did not get to his capital till next day at noon. Then, as the road from his closet in St. James’s to the King of Denmark’s apartments on the other side of the palace is about thirty miles (which posterity, having no conception of the prodigious extent and magnificence of St. James’s, will never believe), it was half an hour after three before his Danish Majesty’s cousin could go and return to let him know that his good brother and ally was leaving the palace (in which they both were) to receive him at the Queen’s palace, which you know is about a million of snails’ paces from St. James’s. Notwithstanding these difficulties and unavoidable delays, Woden, Thor, Frigga, and all the gods that watch over the kings of the north, did bring these two invincible monarchs to each other’s embraces, about half an hour after four on the same evening.”

Christian’s life in London was bad enough; but it was even worse in Paris, and the queen was carefully informed of all that would most pain and disquiet her, it being the policy of that nest of intriguers, of which Juliana Maria was the chief, to keep the young couple as far sundered in both life and love as was possible. It was not to be wondered at if she was cold and disdainful and full of wrath and bitterness, when her seampish husband came home after his seven months’ tour, and if she resented Count Holck’s familiarities and impertinences, and even added the new physician, Struensee, to her black list, as one of the tribe of her enemies. She soon learned a different lesson, poor girl! Well for her if she had never done so.

But indeed Struensee’s policy was at the first quite puzzling enough to mislead her. He wished to reconcile king and queen, he said, and yet he enticed Frau von Gabel into a web of circumstances, compromising in appearance and fatal in the end. This Frau von Gabel was a high-minded, noble-hearted woman, almost a republican in her political creed, and therefore unable to live at court; but, whether royalist or republican, patriot before all. The king had made certain advances to her in times gone by, which it is scarcely necessary to say were repulsed; but now Struensee took up the dropped loops, and, assuring Frau von Gabel that the king was in every way reformed, and that he did really need her ennobling influence to keep him in the right way, urged her to admit his visits again—she, the Egeria to his Numa. Frau von Gabel consented; but soon found that all this talk of Christian’s great improvement was mere moonshine; he was as bad as ever, and a little more mad; and the character of Egeria was soon sought to be brought down to a lower level and to baser purposes. When she found this out, and deception was no longer possible, the poor lady died of grief; and the strange intrigue about which no satisfactory theory as to why it was, and to what use, came to an end. She died, hating Struensee: whom the queen hated too, for his share in the plot.

At that time, then, there was no love between the doctor and the queen; but soon after this the crown prince—her little baby—had the small-pox, and old enmities were forgotten in the new conditions of help and trust thus set up between them. Ever after this illness Caroline Matilda admitted Struensee into her intimate friendship; and so began the drama which ended in a cruel and a bloody tragedy. She was imprudent to an almost insane extent; she drove out alone with the handsome young doctor, walked with him alone, rode with him alone; at the court balls she danced chiefly with him, and suffered him to address her in a tone of temper and command, to say the least of it, astounding. These follies, and more to the back of them, got the young queen much ill-will, and caused many a biting comparison to be instituted between her and Mary Stuart, with Struensee for Rizzio. Together with her character, whether rightfully or wrongfully, the queen began to lose something of her sweet English modesty, and to play unwomanly pranks in public quite as damaging as vices. She hunted daily, bestriding her horse in man fashion, and dressed as a man in “a dove-colored beaver hat with a deep gold band and tassels, a long scarlet coat faced with gold all round, a buff gold-laced waistcoat, frilled shirt, man’s neckerchief, and buckskin small-clothes and spurs.” She looked splendidly when mounted and dashing through the woods, but when she dismounted the charm was to a great degree dispelled, for she appeared shorter than she really was; the shape of her knees betrayed her sex, and her belt seemed to cut her in two." At other times, when dressed like a woman, she was one of the most beautiful women of her time.

Struensee's political power was as great as his personal influence. The whole power of the state seemed to be vested in him: the queen being his tool, the king his victim, and the country his mere foot-stool whereby he might mount to supreme honor. All Europe began to talk. Then the talk got so loud that the Princess of Wales, Caroline Matilda's mother, made a long and toilsome journey northward, which, whatever the political motives assigned, seemed to have for its motive simply to see her daughter, and to remonstrate with her on her folly. Not that she herself came into court with clean hands; for the position of Lord Bute in her royal household had long been a favorite subject for scandal and satire. The meeting took place after some delay, and the mother's resolute removal of certain obstacles thrown in the way by Caroline Matilda; but no good was done. The king and queen came attended only by Struensee and Warnstedt, the favorite page, who were seated in the carriage with them; and when the Princess of Wales spoke to her daughter in English, she pretended not to understand her—she had forgotten the language! In fact, she showed herself as wayward and unmanageable as a naughty child who can not be reasoned with and who will not be controlled. Letters and envoys from both mother and brother (George III.) were received in the same manner; and thus the last drags sought to be put upon the downward course were knocked aside, and the royal lady's repute went on toward destruction.

What was it which, at about this time, made her write with a diamond on the window-pane at Frederiksborg, "Oh keep me innocent, make others great?" Conscience? Sorrow for past, or fear of future, sins? Or was it simply dissimulation, and the endeavor to deceive eyes whose sharpness of vision was, she well knew, spying out her weak places and gauging her misdoings? For we can not for a moment accept Sir Lascelles Wraxall's theory, and account her innocent in her relations with Struensee; every incident related and every induction to be drawn, point but to one thing; and whatever the political basis, whatever the greater worth of the Dano-Germanic alliance against that of the Russian, and the zeal of the physician-minister for his own ideas and his own views of statecraft, the question between the man and woman remains the same for both and all concerned. Unhappily for the half-mad, half-bad king, who, when Struensee dismissed honest old Bernstorff, had not a friend left. Given up to Struensee and the queen, he was now simply a puppet and a prisoner, with two black children—a boy and a girl—for his only companions, and Enevold Brandt, whom he hated, for his valet, chamberlain, pedagogue, and master—Enevold Brandt, whom Holck had exiled and Struensee restored. In truth, Christian's condition was pitiable enough. Grant that he was mad, still the manner of life to which his wife and the minister doomed him was infamous. No one paid him the smallest respect, and once an impudent page even drove him into a corner, saying, "Mad Rex, make me a groom of the chamber." He was compelled to make personal appointments of men specially distasteful to him; and on one occasion, in revenge for having been made to sign an appointment as chamberlain for a man he hated, he made one of his stove-heaters a chamberlain; again, another time, he gave out that his dog Gourmand was a "Conference Councilor," and proposed his health, which the rest were obliged to acknowledge as de rigueur. This was to express his disgust at certain fault-finding and scolding which he had to submit to in council, showing that, as barking was the rule of the day there, Gourmand could bark as well as any of them, and so was quite as efficient a conference councilor. His chief amusement was smashing china and beheading the garden statues: in which odd play Moranti, his black boy, assisted him. For a change he would roll on the ground with the boy, biting and scratching him, or would fling papers, furniture, books, glass ornaments, any thing he could find, over the balcony down into the court-yard: once wishing to fling the boy and dog Gourmand after the rest. In public he was treated with contempt by his keeper, Brandt, who in private bit and beat him—he said by the king's own desire; and, indeed, the whole treatment of this unhappy wretch, during the reign of Struensee, was as damaging to the queen's repute as it was disgraceful and degrading.

The queen, influenced by Struensee, who, however, was loyally well intentioned in this, brought up her son on the wildest principles of "hardening"—a kill or cure system indeed for a delicate child. His food was of the simplest and poorest kind, and what we should call innutritious, and always cold; he had a cold bath twice or thrice a day; he was kept in a cold room without a fire, dressed lightly in thin silk, and went about barefoot, although he was a delicate baby of not quite three years old. His playmate and companion was a little fellow of his own age, called "little Karl," the natural son of a surgeon, who was allowed to fight with him and master him if he could, no one being suffered to assist or prevent. The queen was so severe with him, that when the attendants wanted to frighten him into good behavior, they used to threaten to take him to his mother, which generally succeeded. Struensee's coadjutor, the physician Berger, got a few of the more extreme rules relaxed; and, owing to his representations, this royal baby was allowed to wear shoes and stockings, to be rather more warmly clad, to have his rice boiled in broth instead of water, to have meat soup for dinner twice a week, and to have his room slightly warmed in the morning.

And now popular feeling began to take a very decided tone, and the ministry knew that the evil hour which has to come to all misdoers was drawing near. The queen and the favorite dared not show themselves in public; the guards were doubled at the palace, and various unusual precautions were taken; the most abominable satires and caricatures were printed and circulated, or stuck or scrawled on the walls, half in jest and half in earnest; the queen and the ministers would speculate on their future lives, and what they should do when the crash came, and they were forced to fly—they foresaw nothing worse; and all this while the indignation of the people and the anger of the European courts became louder and deeper, and of more ominous intensity and fierceness. Anonymous letters were sent to Brandt, advising him to put himself out of danger by ranging himself on the king's side, and against the minister; and he and Struensee had misunderstandings, even to the extent of the former proposing a kind of coup d'état to Falckenskjold, one of the Government, beginning and ending in the arrest of Struensee, and the transfer of the queen to himself; and then the great plot was arranged, headed by Juliana Maria and Prince Frederick her son, the king's half-brother.

The favorite's treatment of this young man had been most impolite. Insulted, neglected, irritated, his rank and near relationship with the king ignored or remembered only to fix a deeper sting, no wonder that he put himself at the head of a party determined to rid the country of a group of adventurers who had lost their heads when they had gained the top round of the ladder, and whose so-called reforms were neither popular nor understood, besides being nullified by the poison of the scandals attached to them. When a forged document was shown to Juliana Maria (at least, Sir Lascelles Wraxall says it was forged), wherein it was set forth how that the king was to be forced to abdicate, and how that the queen was to be declared regent with Struensee as protector—meaning, as it was argued to her, that the king and crown prince were to be murdered, Struensee married to the queen, and his children by her set on the throne—she felt that no time was to be lost, and that either she and hers must fall, or they. Means were not wanting, nor agents, nor adherents; they never are wanting when a tumult is contemplated, and good pickings are to be had out of a ruined palace; and the right time came with the rest. After a certain masked ball, where the queen had been most remarkably gay and most strikingly beautiful, and where, by the strange falling to pieces of a certain supper, all things were marvelously facilitated, the plot came to its culmination. The ex-queen, her son, and some others (Guldberg, Rantzau, Eickstedt, Köller, and the ex-valet Jessen), entered the king's bedroom at dead of night, where they first nearly frightened him to death, and then got him to sign orders for the arrest of Struensee, Brandt, Falckenskjold, the queen, and others of minor moment. One by one those named were arrested and secured; and so was broken up in a few moments the coalition which had changed the whole face of Danish politics and the whole current of Danish society for two years.

Struensee, never a brave man, though so daring in political action, first fainted, then took to swearing horribly, and then gave way to abject despair. Brandt was philosophical, and even gay. Falckenskjold was calm and critical. But the poor young queen was impassioned and terrified, full of wrath and fear and desperation and anguish: now struggling with the soldiers whom Rantzau had with him to secure her; now trying to hurl herself from the open window, shrieking wildly for Struensee and the king; finally borne away to the fortress of Kronborg, ruined and disgraced forever. Young, lovely, with a good and noble nature that had been at first outraged and afterward misguided, we can not but pity her. Truly she had sinned in her degree; but she had been sinned against more grievously, and her wrong-doing had been retaliation rather than aggression. For, as was said before, we can not accept Sir Lascelles Wraxall's theory of her innocence, though her failings may be tenderly excused for the sake of the evils she had undergone.

The end soon came. Struensee, pressed and threatened, confessed to his liaison with the queen, circumstantially detailed; and when the queen was shown his confession, and told that if she denied it he would be tortured, she signed it in attestation of its truth, and so signed away her good fame forever. He was executed, with certain barbarous circumstances disgraceful to the time and people: having first seen his colleague Brandt decapitated and disemboweled before his face; Falckenskjold was sentenced to be confined on the rock of Munkholm for life. Caroline Matilda was removed from Kronborg to the castle of Aalborg, where she was kept a prisoner until released at the instance of England. Thence, she went to Celle, or Zell, the old residence of the former Dukes of Lüneburg, where she lived happily enough, much beloved by all who knew her, and cheered by the frequent presence of her sister, the Princess of Brunswick. Her only grief was the loss of her children, especially of the little girl—whose legitimacy, by-the-by, came under grave suspicion; but the king had formally acknowledged her at her birth. Here she saw Mr. Wraxall, the grandfather of her present apologist, then a young man, "just her own age," and who seems to have been greatly struck by her beauty, and interested in her fortunes. He describes her as very beautiful, though too fat; like her brother George the Third in feature, but harmonized and softened; charitable, gay, sweet-tempered, and discreet—all that the wronged princess should be.

Mr. Wraxall entered into the plot for her release, which had as its object the arrest of Juliana Maria and Prince Frederick, and the king's published order for her return to Copenhagen.

It is impossible to guess what new historic complications might have arisen had she not, in the midst of this under-current, died on the 11th of May, 1775, wanting less than three months of her twenty-fourth year. Of course people said she died of poison, that wide and convenient vagueness; but in truth it was of scarlet-fever, taking a typhoid character, and easy to be accounted for. One of her young pages had just died of this disease, and she, very foolishly, went into the room where the coffin was, and looked at the dead body. The sight haunted her, and the disease found her out, carrying her off in a very few days. When dying, she wrote to George the Third, solemnly protesting her innocence of all with which she had been charged; and also to M. Roques, the pastor of the French Protestant church at Zell, she said the same: "I was never faithless to my husband." So, at least, it is reported. Whether Sir Lascelles Wraxall's chivalrous theory respecting the unhappy princess be correct or not, the memoir has high merits, not only as a historical but as a literary production. Some of the details of court life are extremely curious.

MY REFUGEES.

DR. JOYCE came in while I was giving the Captain his dinner. It was not his hour for visiting my ward, so I put down my gruelspoon and looked up to see what was the matter.

"Can't you come out and see to this arrival?" he asked, stopping a few feet in front of me, with his finger on Tom's pulse, his hand filled with lemonade for Dick, and his eyes on Harry, so economical of his time was our little Doctor. In fact, I do not think that since I came to the hospital I had succeeded in gaining his undivided attention for a single full minute in working hours. I regarded this as an insult at first; but discovering at length how much he depended on these fragmentary notes which he took of his patients, I had learned to hide my diminished head, and consider myself once for all a lesser light in his presence. But there is a natural perversity about me, which in spite of such discipline "still lived." It was with an instinct for which I do not hold myself at all accountable that I turned away from him with as professional an air as I could assume, and began choking the gruel down the poor Captain's throat, as if the safety of the army depended on its descent therein, while I asked, in my most business-like tones,

"What is it?"

"Three—a man already gone with typhoid, wife, and a child—refugees."

"Hum! well?"

"I want you to get hold of the woman and feed her up: she's a mere shadow."

"And the man?"

Dr. Joyce looked round the ward; so did I. I had one empty bed. A little pale-faced boy had left it only yesterday, and gone—well to a better rest, I trust; for I found a tiny Testament in his hand when I folded it with the other. It was open, and his finger was on a prayer—one of the old, old prayers which are always new, that his mother had marked for him. I had a fancy for the poor, home-sick fellow, and had looked at his empty bed with something of that feeling with which one goes into the twilight of a room a friend has left dark forever. I shrank from the thought of seeing a stranger there so soon; a very foolish fancy for a hospital nurse, of course, but some of these boys had become friends indeed in the long months I had cared for them. Besides this, I had as much work on hand as it seemed to me I could well attend to without a little larger allowance of strength than usually falls to the lot of womankind, nurses not excepted. There was Mrs. Cruppins had four or five empty beds, though she was the last person I should want to go to, to be nursed through a fever; and there was Miss Graves, she could take three more as well as not, even if she did go about her work like a martyr, and turn her ward into a church-vault, with her funereal face and her melancholy and interesting way of sighing over the men. What if the Doctor did prefer, and very naturally, to call on me? there was a limit to all things. So when I looked at him I was going to own up to my hidden depravity, and say that No. 2 didn't want the new-comer.

The Doctor is a discreet man, and can read the signs of the weather. He gave me a generous half of one of his professional glances, and remarked quietly to a curious young sergeant in the corner who had employed the time of my meditation in asking a volley of questions,

"Yes, half-starved, but thinks only of her husband and child; the infant is more dead than alive."

Something rose in my throat and choked me.

"What a heathen!"

"Who? I or the typhoid?"

"Neither of you," I responded, curtly; "bring him in here."

The Doctor went away with the least bit of a smile twitching the corners of his mouth. I felt too humble just then to take any notice of it, so I meekly returned to the Captain and his gruel, gave him his powders, tucked him up for a nap, and when Dr. Joyce came back I was ready for him.

A number of these refugees had dropped into our hospital since I had been there, for two-thirds of the poor creatures are fit for nothing but a sick-bed by the time they reach Nashville, and I supposed I knew what to expect. But the sight I saw struck me dumb. Two shrunk-en, ghost-like figures, their clothes in tatters, covered with mire and blood, their faces so gaunt that, looking at them, a chill crept over me, as if I looked on Death.

But this was not a time to grow nervous. I roused myself with a start, and touched the man's hand to see if it were flesh and blood. In reply to my words of welcome he thanked me in a feeble sort of way, putting his hand uncertainly to his forehead, like one of failing memory, and leaning heavily against the door. He evidently needed prompt attention, for the fever was far advanced. While the Doctor led him to the bed I had time to notice his short, thick-set figure, the shaggy hair falling about his low forehead, and the eyes that still showed honest and kindly, though they were deep-sunken and burned with fever; the scar of an old gun-wound in his neck, and his hands coarse and brown with labor. Before this war had made him what he was, he had evidently been of the poor of the earth. God's poor, were they? May we have mercy on all such!

He was far too weak to answer questions. I left him sitting wearily on the side of the bed for the Doctor to undress, and turned back to the woman. She was standing where I had left her, with her baby in her arms, her eyes following every motion of her husband's.

"Come," I said, "into my room, and I'll see what I can do for you."

"And him?" pointing toward the bed.

"You shall come back and see him."

She followed me slowly, hushing the wail of her half-starved child, but saying nothing to me. Indeed, she seemed to have hardly life enough left to speak. In an incredibly short time she and the child were washed and dressed in sundry garments of my own, which, though they could not be said to fit in the most perfect manner conceivable, especially on the baby, had at least the advantage of being clean. After they were fed and rested, I had for the first time a critical look at the woman. Slight, and worn, as the Doctor said, to a shadow; stooping shoulders, consumptive chest, and large, work-worn hands; a very pale face, one of the palest I ever saw except in death, with thin, dark hair lying against her temples, where I could see the great purple veins, and eyes which had once been bright black, but now were dulled and sunken. Out of them, when they were raised to mine, came a look so dumb with suffering, so dark with utter hopelessness, that I could not bear to meet it. It never changed. She smiled at me when I brought her baby fresh milk from the kitchen, or tended the little thing while she ate herself; she thanked me; her thin, quavering voice grown quite sweet with gratitude, but the dreariness of that steady look never varied by so much as a momentary gleam of light or softness. It reminded me of a picture I have somewhere seen, to which the artist had given the rather indefinite title of "Desolate;" but which, nevertheless, was a spirited thing, and had staid by me—the figure of a woman in relief against a stormy sky; around her a desert beach strewn with wrecks; her hair blown darkly about her face, and her eyes turned to the waste of waters: a lonely sea-bird startled from the cliffs, dipping into the foam of a chilly, green wave at her feet, and behind the purple line of water that bounded her vision the setting of a blood-red sun.

Perhaps you smile at my fancy. I think the woman herself might have done so had she known it. Certainly she would not have comprehended it. She sat, quietly rocking her baby, her hands folded over its little fingers, her eyes on its face.

"You have had a hard journey?" I questioned, gently.

"Yes."

"Was it very long?"

"Yes."

She looked at me then a moment without speaking. I understood her.

"You do not wish to talk about it now," I said. "I will not trouble you with any questions."

"Thank you."

She recommenced her low lullaby, and while I stood watching her somebody knocked at the door. It was Tim, the errand-boy. He delivered his message after his usual fashion, balancing himself first on one foot, then on the other, regarding me meanwhile with half-closed eyes, and giving his bushy head a series of little nods with an air of authority peculiarly pleasing.

"Davy Brown's heart's broke for his dinner, an' the sargint says his bandages 's come off, an' he wants you double-quick; an' Pat Mullins he's ben howlin' over his arm this hour."

Being serenely conscious that I had been absent but twenty minutes I answered his innuendo only by a withering look, closed the door softly, for my ideas of babies being rather vague I was not prepared to state whether the creaking of a latch would start one of those infantile choruses I live in such constant terror of or not, so I thought it best to be on the safe side. The hopeful Tim whistled on before me down the stairs, and I went back to my work, with my heart for the first time deserting my boys, and wandering to my room and its pale-faced occupant.

It was a busy afternoon. Brown must have his dinner, the howling of Pat the indefatigable must be stopped, and I must go back to the sergeant's arm. A solitary rebel in the corner took an hour of my time for his bandages and ablutions, spinning it out with remonstrances and complaints so many, and various, and profane, that I felt a strong desire to pull the sheet up over his head, tie it down at the four corners of the bed, and leave him there to struggle and stifle and swear at his own sweet will. There was a favorite drummer-boy, too, whose eyes asked mutely for help—a little patient fellow whom I had taken into my heart from the first day he came to me. I always had to time myself when I was caring for him, for fear I should be accused of partiality. Then some one had been awake all the night before, and must be read into a nap; and then there were letters to be written, and medicines to mix and choke down innumerable throats, and windows to open and windows to shut, and business with the matron, and messages to the doctor, and then at last suppers to get, and supper to eat.

My refugee had found her way down again to her husband. He was tossing now on his bed, delirious with the fever. There was little to do for him, however, and I saw she was neither a fussy nor an ignorant nurse, but sat quite still with one arm around her baby who slept, and the other attending to the sick man's every want; so I let her be. There was a bit of a room next mine, which had belonged to a nurse who was off duty, and home last week with slow fever. I obtained the promise of this for her, and when, at half past ten o'clock, I dragged myself up stairs, jaded and cross enough, I found her there. I saw her through the open door with the light of my dim lamp falling full on her bent figure and white face. She looked up at me, silently, her great dark eyes followed all my motions about the room. It gave me a nameless, uncomfortable feeling that made me turn and look over my shoulder, when I went into the closet, or a dark corner. I began to have serious fears as to the practicability of sleep that night, with nothing but an unbarred door between me and this ghost of a woman. In fact, I may as well acknowledge that I am naturally of a romantic turn of mind, and had anticipated the recital of her adventures in various forms; as, for example, whether she might be a spy, or a Southern aristocrat in disguise, and I believe I even speculated upon the possibility of a chalked negro.

But when I turned again, and saw how wearily she leaned her head upon her hand, how crushed and hopeless was the pressure of her lips, I forgot every thing but my pity. I went up and touched the hand which lay upon the baby's hair, and said: "I am so sorry for you!"

She quivered under my touch, and looked up at me, her lips working beseechingly. Then, I don't know how it was, but she began to talk, and I listened; I forgot that I was tired and sleepy; my romantic fancies dissolved like the dew. I forgot that she was ignorant and poor. I only knew that she suffered, and sat quite still to hear her story.

The woman's name was Mary—Mary Rand. I liked the name for her. Do you remember some one's saying—Tennyson, I think—of Mary the mourner at Bethany, that her "eyes were homes of silent prayer?" I thought of this often. Such a cry went up to God out of her mute look. I thought it must ring through heaven. I never heard from the lips of any preacher such a prayer.

She had lived in the southern part of the State. Her husband had done a small fishing business on one of the inferior rivers, getting but a scanty living for a wife and five little ones, though a more honest one than many of his kind to whom the South closes the avenues of useful labor. I could see the home in a picture while she talked. A house with broken roof and low doorway, half hidden under the great forest trees, which stretched out such giant branches over it, and cradled it so quietly all summer long; the little river that wound among the trees, over which the sunlight slanted and the wind swept like a merry song; the tidy rooms within the house, this stricken mother then so cheery about her work, turning such smiling eyes toward the river which bore her husband's boat, or such reverent eyes up to the sky which showed so blue and still through the vines about the doorway, taking into her heart such happy thoughts of God in the silence of this home. He had given her; the children romping in the forest, or grouped about the door with the light on their chubby brown faces and tangled curls, or watching the river turn into molten gold when the sun set, and they waited for the father to come home from work, wading into the water to crowd in his boat for a sail of a few strokes length; then clinging to him up the path, and into the house, where supper stood waiting, and the mother too. An humble meal, and very poor the lowly home, but none the less dear for that. There was sunlight and love enough in it, as there must have always been under the sound of this woman's voice.

The man had been loyal from the first of the war. This, I suspected, was owing to the wife. She had picked up a little learning somewhere—enough to spell out her Bible; it was partly this, but more a certain crude refinement that asserted her superiority. Something there was in this woman's soul which spoke like a voice out of the darkness of all the circumstance which hemmed her in, and let you see how pure a soul it was, and what it might have been if God had given it light to grow in.

So, of course, she knew her country at once.

"I wasn't goin' to hev Stephen settin up agin the kentry," she said; "and by'n-by he see it as I did, fur he's an honest man in his 'pinions is Stephen, an' he used ter set the childern a hoorayin' fur the flag ter see which on 'em could holler the loudest."

Of course a harmless, ignorant fisherman, loving his country in the solitude of a forest, could not be left long undiscovered and unpunished in this chivalric Southern land.

"They found him out at last," she said. "A whole pack on 'em went at him every time he went to town with fish, and they didn't give him no peace; but he never caved in to 'em—not a mite, an' the more they worried him the more he sot up fur the Guv'nment; an' at last it come—what we'd ben livin' in fear on a long spell. It was one dark night—I remember how the wind was howlin' like among the trees—an' we heerd on a sudden a yellin' like a pack o' hounds outside the door, an' it bust open, an' some officers was there, an' a gang o' drunken men behind 'em. I knew to once what it meant.

"Stephen," says I, "they've drafted yer." He looked so like a tiger they durstn't touch him. His gun was in the corner, and I see him lookin' at it, so I knew as well as ef he'd telled me what ter do; but the officers, they'd spied it out, an' one on 'em he held me so I couldn't move, an' t'others panted their pistils on Stephen an' tuk him off; he couldn't help it no way. It made me wild-like. I got away from the man as held me with a great leap, an' got the gun. They was jest out o' the door then, but I could ha' hit 'em. Stephen turned round an' see me, and says he :

" 'Don't, fur God's sake, Mary—they'll murder both on us!' An' then I couldn't see his face fur the dark, an' I knew he was gone. I fell down by the gun all in a heap on the floor; the childern was cryin' an' kissin' of me, an' tuggin' at my dress, but I never took no notice on 'em. I heerd the men howlin' outside, but I never moved. All to once there was a great red light out the winder, an' I heerd wood cracklin' an' smelt smoke in the bedroom, an' I knew they'd fired the house. I ketched up the childern—two in my arms, an' one on my shoulders, an' two pullin' at my skirt—an' run out o' the door. It seemed as ef a pack o' wild beasts was out thar in the burnin' light. They chased me a ways, till I got to whar the woods was thick an' dark as pitch; an' at last I found they was gone, an' I dropped down in a thicket like as ef I was dead, hidin' the childern under my dress. They might ha' murdered us all. There was wus things than that done up the river last week. By'n-by, as nobody come, I durst look round. I heerd the shoutin' a good ways off, an' I see a great light on the sky, an' knew the house was blazin' up. After a time it went out, an' the hollerin' was fainter, goin' back ter town. Then 'twas still, only the branches creaked, an' I heerd the wind blowin' over the river. The woods was dead black, an' I looked up to the sky, an' there wasn't a star to be seen, an' the great dew dropped down like rain. I huddled the childern up to me to keep 'em warm ef I could, an' the little things cried 'emsels ter sleep. They was very heavy, an' cramped my arms till they was stiff, but I didn't mind; an' it grew very cold, but I never thought on't. I only looked up whar the sky was dark, an' all night long I was prayin' fur my husband.

"When mornin' come we hid in the darkest place we could find, an' staid thar till the sun was jest over our heads. But nobody come after us; so I crawled round an' found some berries an' a brook fur the childern ter drink out of, an' I had two little ginger-cakes in my pocket, an' we lived on them all day.

"The next day it were jest the same. I never darin' ter go back, an' the childern cryin' fur someat ter eat. When night come I were too faint to move, fur all I found I giv to them. I had dropped down on the moss, an' was givin' up ter die thar, when all to once I heerd a noise in the bushes, and I says, 'O God! tuk care on the childern.' 'Yes,' says somebody close by; 'He's sent me ter tuk care on 'em;' and I jumped up with a great scream, fur there was Stephen alive, an' huggin' and kissin' of me an' the childern, an' givin' us a loaf o' bread he'd found nigh the old place as he crep' along in the thicket ter get a look at the heap o' ashes that was left. An' he telled us how he'd runned from the fellar as ketched him, an' we'd hide in the woods, an' all go North together, whar none on 'em couldn't touch us.

"An' I jes' put both my arms round his neck, an' I says, 'Stephen, God's giv me you back, an' I doan't ask no more. I guess He'll tuk care on us, an' we'll go.' I used ter read how He loved folks as was in trouble; I used ter believe it—maybe I was wrong, maybe not. I doan't know."

She stopped a moment, some strange, dark glitter creeping into her eyes. After that they changed only to grow more stony; and her voice, as she went on with her story, was cold and hard.

"So we tuk up with the woods for a home, an' 'twere all the home we hed fur three months. We dursn't go anigh the railroads, an' we traveled mostly whar the forest was loneliest, an' the swamps a-plenty. Thar was cold nights too, when the wind cut into us, an' the damp seemed ter choke us like; an' thar was rainy nights, when we crep' under the bushes, and Stephen he allers tuk off his coat ter cover the rest on us, an' thar were no stoppin' of him no way. An' I'd wake up a-cryin' in my dream, an' see his face while he slep' lookin' so white with the cold, an' the childern shiverin' all night; an' I'd lay an' cry an' cry, and the rain cried along with me on the leaves, but it never stopped fur all that. Sometimes we found a shed or a barn whar folks let us sleep, an' sometimes when thar warn't no rebel sojers anigh the place they'd let us in the house.

"But the starvin' come the wust. Folks give us meals sometime, ef we durst go out into the road ter hunt up a house. Then, agin, they cussed us, an' shet the door 'cause we was 'derved Yankees,' yer know. Thar was a few as give us a basketful o' victuals, and it lasted fur a long spell. When we couldn't get nothin', Stephen, he shot rabbits an' birds, an' we picked berries, an' ketched fish; fur he wouldn't never steal, that man wouldn't, ef he was ter die fur it. But there was days when we hadn't nothin', an' the childern cried an' teased fur food, an' I only jes' sot an' looked at 'em, an' hadn't nothin' ter give 'em, only ter hold 'em in my arms, an' tell 'em ter fold their little hands an' say, 'Our Father.' The poor innocents stopped cryin' allers, 'cause they thought He'd throw 'em down bread from heaven. In course He did give us someat mostly, or we'd all a ben under the grass; but He didn't send enough ter keep the childern. Four on 'em is dead. He didn't leave one big enough ter call me mother, or kiss me with its little comfortin' ways; there's nobody left but the baby. I doan't know why she stood it, when the rest couldn't. P'r'aps because I kep' it under my shawl mostly, an' it were the warmest of all on us.

"Jack went fust—that was his father's boy. He tuk fever in them marshes, an' kinder wasted afore we knew it. I went out ter hunt up some supper one night, an' left the boy with Stephen. After I'd ben a little ways I come back ter say good-by—I didn't know what fur, only I couldn't help it. He was lyin' in his father's arms, an' he says: 'When you come back with some supper sing me ter sleep, mother.' So I says, 'Yes, Jackey,' an' I leaned over ter kiss him. 'Good-by, mother,' says he, an' he put up his little white lips. An' all the way I heerd it—'Good-by, mother.' It were like as ef the trees kep' tellin' it, an' the birds singin' it in their nests, an' the great blow o' wind that had come up, cryin' it over an' over. I put my hands up to my ears not ter hear it, an' I runned out o' the woods ter get away from it; for we must hev some supper, an' it were safer fur me ter go than Stephen—folks didn't notice a woman so much. I found a bit of a house anigh the woods as give me some bread an' a pail o' milk—they was Union folks; an' I was happy-like, fur Jackey would like the milk, yer know. All the way back I was thinkin' as how his eyes would laugh at the sight on't—pretty eyes they was, Miss, like his father's, blue an' bright like. Thar was a great white moon come up afore I got thar; an' I see how the light was down in the holler whar I'd left him like a sheet dropped on the bushes. Pretty soon I see 'em all—the childern standin' round all in a heap, an' Stephen settin' on the ground with his face in his hat. My heart kinder stood still all to once, but I walked along. Stephen he see me, an' got up, an' come up ter me. He didn't say nothin'; but only jes' tuk my hands an' led me to whar somethin' lay black an' still under a tree. An' I looked down an' I called out 'Jackey! Jackey!' but he didn't make no answer, an' I touched his little face, an' all to once I knew he was dead. I threw down the milk an' bread I'd brought so fur for him, an' I tuk his poor head in my lap, an' held tight hold uv his little cold hands. I hadn't ben thar, yer see, an' it come hard ter hev him die without his mother. I promised ter sing him ter sleep, an' now I were too late—he couldn't hear me. The moon was very white, and I heerd the childern sobbin' an' Stephen were callin' uv me an' kissin' uv me, but I couldn't answer him nohow, an' I couldn't cry. I doan't know much how the night went. I sat an' watched the little shaders from the leaves comin' an' goin' on the boy's forehead, an' thought how they kissed it like, an' how he wouldn't never feel me kissin' him agin. He were sech a pretty boy, yer know, an' I never were thar to see him die, an' I never sung that little song.

"'Twarn't only a week along from this when Stephen he got took. He went fur victuals an' didn't come home. We waited fur him all day an' he didn't come, an' we slep' all night alone under the trees waitin' fur him. But when mornin' come an' no Stephen, I knew ter once what it meant, and I war right. Somebody as knew him tracked him an' ketched him in a yard whar he was beggin' our breakfast. The folks was rebels an' guv him up easy. They tuk him along—two officers thar was—an' got a good piece with him; but they hadn't no han'cuffs an' was weakly plantation gentlemen. So he broke away. He knocked one on 'em down an' tuk his gun an' runned. T'other fellar he fired an' hit Stephen in the neck; but Stephen is a firs'-rate shot an' the fellar dropped down. I doan't know whether he war hurt bad, but he never chased him any. Stephen crawled back pretty nigh us, an' 'twas the second day I heerd him groanin' in the bushes. He was lyin' thar all covered with blood when I come up. We got him down in a big swamp, an' thar we hid fur a long spell. We hed mostly warm nights while he were sick, an' no rain ter speak on; but the damp was like pison fur us all to be a breathin' on. I nussed him all I could, 'twarn't much in sech a place, an' I used ter crawl out every night ter find food fur to-morrer.

"'Twarn't fur as we'd gone after he'd got so's to be movin' afore the twins took sick. They didn't stan' it long, an' it were better fur 'em, poor things! When I see 'em both pinin' ter once, their little hands so poor an' white, an' heerd 'em moanin' in my arms, I were slow believin' of it. I thought it were enough to be lonely fur Jackey all the nights an' days—to be missin' of him every year, an' be cryin' fur the pretty boy he'd ha' growed ter be. I never thought I'd lose no more—I never thought on't. It come ter me one night when the childern hed ben sinkin' nigh most the afternoon. We hed stopped with 'em by a little brook whar the bushes was thick an' warm. On a sudden Stephen he called out, 'Mary,' says he, 'they're goin' ter see Jackey.' I looked up into his eyes an' I says, 'Stephen, it'll kill me.' He put his hands up ter his face an' I heerd him choke like. 'Mary,' says he, 'I can't comfort yer.' I never see him so afore. Thar hadn't never ben a time when he didn't cheer me up an' kiss me ef any thin' vexed me—I hadn't never borne the least uv a trouble alon' sence we was married. So I knew how it cut inter his heart to hev the childern took, an' how selfish it war in me ter forget he loved 'em jes' the same as I did. I shet my lips then an' never said another word.

"So we sat down ter see 'em die. The sun was settin' like a great red ball over the thicket. I remember how I looked round an' see a sparrow as crep' into her nest under the grass. The little ones was chirpin' at her, an' she was answerin' of 'em. I couldn't bear ter hear 'em no way. I thought how God was makin' a little wuthless bird happy, an' hed forgot me, an' 'was takin' all my little ones away. I wouldn't never hev 'em in my nest ter sing tu like she. I see every thing about me that night. I remember a great white rock an' sand-bank over in the field standin' out agin' the sun, an' how I thought the brook looked like blood, fur the light were so red on't. I see 'em all—I see 'em over an' over, an' yet I doan't think I tuk my eyes off the childern.

"Stephen tuk Katie, an' I held the boy, an' we sot tergeth by the brook an' see the night comin'. We never said nothin' to each other, it wouldn't do no good. Ef I'd spoke once I should ha' cried out, so I should ha' worried the little dying things. I heerd Stephen prayin' to himself over Katie—a sort uv whisperin' prayer, as ef he didn't hardly know he was sayin' uv it; but I didn't say none. I never spoke ter God all night—I ders'ent; I might ha' cursed Him.

"Dick went fust. Katie she held out till nigh mornin', but I jes' sot with the boy stone-cold on my knee, an' never telled Stephen. I see him bendin' over the little thing in his arms, his face lookin' so white, even in the dark, an' I heerd him prayin', 'O God! leave one on 'em—leave one 'em—doan't take 'em both!' I couldn't ha' telled him no way. Katie wore past speakin' then; but I could jes' see her little face from whar I sat. Dick's hands was close in mine—I hadn't never let go sence they growed cold. I see after a while a bit of light shinin' in the brook, an' I knew the stars was out. But I never looked up at the sky. He was thar as had taken away my childern. He was so fur up. I thought He never cared. Ef He'd forgot me 'twarn't no use fur me ter be lookin' at His sky an' sayin' over His prayers. So I sat an' see the shinin' in the brook an' the two little white faces. I heerd Mattie hushin' the baby ter sleep whar I'd left her under the bushes. The little thing crep' up once an' put her warm fingers on my face an' kissed me.

"I heerd Katie moanin', an' I see Stephen holdin' uv her all night. When the fust mornin' light come in through the trees we turned an' looked at one another, an' they was both dead. We made 'em two little graves by the brook an' buried 'em thar. Then we tuk hold uv hands an' kneeled down on the moss, an' Stephen he prayed sech a prayer as I never heerd afore. It made me look up ter the sky fur the fust time an' see how blue it was, an' how bright the trees was in the sun, an' think how they'd be blue an' bright over the little cold things, jes' the same when we was gone, an' how we'd leave 'em all alone so fur behind us. Then I cried—oh, how I did cry! I hadn't cried afore fur weeks—I got so frozen like—an' I hain't dropped a tear sence.

"So we got up an' stepped over the brook, lookin' back ter say 'good-by' to the little graves, an' went on with Mattie an' the baby. We come ter safer travelin' soon, an' found a house by the road as tuk us in an' hid us up garret fur a spell. They was good to us, God bless 'em! an' guv us enough to eat; but all the nussin' an' warm fires was too late fur Mattie. They made a bed fur her up in the loft, an' when the poor little white thing put her arms around me and cried ter go to sleep, 'cause she was so cold an' tired, I knew to once what it meant. 'Twarn't only one sort o' sleep as would do her good, so I telled she might, tryin' ter smile an' say as how God would guv her a nice nap. I see her shet her eyes, an' I crossed her little hands, an' I telled God thar warn't nothin' left but Stephen an' the baby, an' ef He was goin' ter tuk 'em He'd better do it now while they had a roof to die under. But Stephen p'inted ter the little dead thing on the bed, an' asked me ef I'd get to whar she was, sayin' sech things ter Him as had tuk her away from sorrer an' sufferin', an' made her a little angel to hum with Him forever. So he put the baby in my arms an' made me say a prayer over after him—he were allers the best on us both, Stephen were. It was I as learned him ter read the Bible, but I didn't never remember it like he. He tuk it all to once inter his heart, an' did what it telled him fur himself an' me too. I keep a doubtin' an' a doubtin', but Stephen he takes it all, Miss, jes' like a little child. Well, then we cut off some uv Mattie's yeller curls, an' he laid 'em in my Bible, so when I wanted ter kiss 'em I had ter kiss it too, yer see, and read the promise which telled me as how I'd never be forsook.

"After that we found we was suspected of bein' thar, an' the folks couldn't keep us no longer; so we was off agin—us three alone. Then we come across some Union sojers as tuk us up here in the cars, an' a chaplain as paid our fare, an' so we come here this mornin', Miss. Stephen he's clean beat out; but ef God hain't forgot all about us, an' he gets well an' strong, we'll go ter work an' get an honest home. I doan't know as I can ever call it home, an' all them little things as was playin' round the old place by the river lyin' cold an' stiff in the swamps."

Just then her baby wakened and began to laugh and coo at her in its pretty way, putting up its tiny hands to play about her face. There was something so warm and tender and full of life in the touch; I saw the chill melt out of her eyes; I saw her lips quiver. I am not ashamed to tell you what I did. I just went up to her, put both my arms around her neck, and her head on my shoulder, and began to cry. After a while I found that she was crying too. I knew that was a mercy to her; so I laid her down on the bed, and knelt down and said over some little short prayer, to which she seemed to listen. Then I put her baby in her arms, thinking it could comfort her best, shut the door softly, and went out.

Stephen Rand grew very sick. Dr. Joyce began to come away from his bedside looking quite grave. Whatever the wife saw in his face she did not comprehend, or else for some reason her own did not reflect it. Every day, early and late, morning and night, she was beside him, silent as a shadow, her patient face never turned from his.

The men began to watch for her as she came in each morning. Sometimes they would pass her baby round from cot to cot for a plaything, or they would send some cheery message to her in their hearty, soldier fashion, seeming pleased at her grateful smile. But as the days went on, and they saw how the fever was burning in her husband's eye and cheek, and caught snatch-es of the consultations the Doctor and I had over him out in the entry, I noticed how often they hushed their noisy jokes and laughter when they looked over to the man's corner, and how many anxious inquiries for our refugees met me every morning.

It puzzled me at first to see how entirely Nature seemed to have confused her rules in the hearts of these two. The man clinging to her, resting so in her strength and love, yet fancying still in his delirium that he was again her protector in the dangers of their forest life; taking with such a childlike trust the truths from the Bible she had taught him to understand, giving them back to her with a faith as pure as a woman's; yet withal a brave man, no coward in principle, no craven in danger.

And for the wife, her face, as I had first seen it, told what she was. What we mean by the innate religion of a woman was with her dimmed or missing. There are natures which must feel every wave, and tide, and current that pulses about them—which must try the lowest deep before they can anchor. Once bedded, the waters from very depth are still: the sea, however stormy, can not shake that which is sure and steadfast. Far beyond them, in shallow waves, some little craft will have anchored in the sunlight, and we who watch that other tossing in the surge, and hear the cry which calls from deep unto deep, perhaps turn away unpitying. For, we say, there seems a fairer haven, and they would not enter it.

With just enough intellect to stagger her faith, not enough to root it, the intensity of the life this woman had led had not yet worked out its own fulfillment. Looking a few steps onward to what was before her I trembled for her. What chance was God giving her? Would He not bring the soothing of a little rest into her weary days?

I used to wonder as I looked up often at her from my work, and saw how quietly she sat, "the same loved, tireless watcher," how her husband's eyes followed hers, and his voice called her, how they clung to one another—these two from whom God had taken all else but the knowledge of what they were each to each—I used to wonder how she could bear it to have him go.

Out of those busy days I have saved many pleasant pictures of her as she sat fanning the hot air about the bed, watching for all little cares for her husband, hushing her baby, or perhaps bowing her head, her lips moving as if in prayer. And I thought what it would be when for such tender offices no voice would call to her.

Once, I remember, I was busy over the Captain not far from her, and I saw her turn suddenly in answer to her husband's call.

"Mary, whar's the baby?"

"Here, Stephen."

She held up the little thing so that he could see it, her eyes on him, and not on the child. He put up his thin hand and touched its face.

"It's all we've got left, Mary, ain't it?"

"Hush, Stephen man! Yer too sick ter think on't now."

"No. I allers think when I'm awake the rest is better off. I like ter think who's tuk 'em."

"I doan't;" in a quick, sharp tone.

"Mary! Mary! yer must. Yer might tempt Him ter do wus things."

She made no answer, but I could see her thin lips compress suddenly, and I marked how the purple veins were swelling on her forehead.

Her husband passed his hand over the baby's puny face, and then looked up at her.

"Mary, ef I should be took—"

She stopped him with a low, sharp cry, and caught both his hands in hers.

"Stephen, yer won't," she said.

A bit of sunlight had fallen across the bed and touched the three, dropping off from her dark hair and her deep-set, glowing eyes, down on the sunken face upon the pillow, and then on the little child, who saw it with a bubbling laugh, and put up its hands to catch the golden motes that floated past.

She caught at it quickly, as if it were a promise.

"Yer've ben dreamin', Stephen," she said, with a nervous laugh. "The sun's come ter wake yer. Why, man, yer most well. I haven't seen yer luk so natural-like sence you was sick."

She bent over with a long look into her husband's eyes, and pressed her lips to his. She did not notice that a cloud had dimmed the warm light which was there but a moment before, and that the face which it had for the instant touched with a glow of health was pallid again in the gray of the dull afternoon.

That was some strange contradiction in her nature—this woman with the desolate eyes and frozen voice—which, while it accepted all life as without hope, for the graves which had closed above it, yet was so blind to the fact that she stood on the brink of another. Clinging so tenaciously to the one love yet left to her—feeling so sure that God could not take away her husband—who could wake her from her dream? Not I, surely. I watched her as the slow days passed—the morning sun, the twilight, the night that fell with such heavy shadows on the hospital floor—finding her alike with that steady look in her eyes and that firm hand which betokened as yet no shade of fear or doubt.

Sometimes I thought a glimpse of what was coming darkened before her for a moment. There was one day when her husband had been in wild delirium all night, and the morning had found him in a state of half stupor. She had stood long beside him, watching his almost lifeless face in silence. I came up, at last, and begged her to go down into the yard with me for a few moments for a breath of fresh air.

She turned with the quick movement of one in wonder at my question.

"I can't."

"But you will be sick yourself if you breathe nothing but this hospital air. The Doctor will look after your husband; and Tim, you know, calls me if I am needed."

"I can't."

"But if he is worse, and you can not then do any thing for him—"

She caught up her baby, stooped and kissed her husband's forehead, then followed me without a word. I led her out into the sunlight, and having some little nicety to cook for one of my boys I left her, and went into the kitchen. I could see her through the windows, pacing back and forth under the two or three stunted trees that grew by the fence, her eyes on the ground, the bit of blue sky above her head, and the fresh morning all about her. All about her—not shrinking from her dark, uncheerful figure and bloodless face, but touching them softly like a blessing. Back and forth—to and fro—I thought how soon she would walk back and forth, and to and fro alone in a desert world.

In a few moments I went out to get the other half of my breath of air. It was a little yard, but filled just then with drying clothes, drying pans, Irish maids, and maids of color.

A pretty mulatto girl stood coquetting with her lover over the fence. A swarm of little children were playing in the street—black and white alike; indeed, one was hardly distinguishable from the other, for they were all massed in the ditch, deep in the mysteries of "mud-pies." I noticed, in fact, that Young Africa had decidedly the advantage as regarded skill in their culinary operations; and as for strength of lung and fist, my little white brethren came off second best. For which I pitied the young gentlemen, and began mentally to reconsider the question whether I was an abolitionist. They did not form an unpleasant picture, however, with the light on their merry faces and gay dress; and the sound of their happy laughter rang like a bell on the morning air. Close beside me, too, on the steps, a little coal-black baby, belonging to one of our wash-women, lay cooing in the sun, making sundry demonstrations with its hands and feet, as if it fought with a whole race of imaginary slaveholders. I saw Mary Rand stoop to kiss it as she walked, looking at its chubby face and then at the puny little one she held nestled under her shawl. She stopped, too, with a long look at the group of children in the street, her eyes shaded with her hand so I could not see them. Then turning, as she resumed her walk, to watch the happy lovers at the fence. Yet she looked upon them all with the apathy with which we recall some bright dream. It was but a dream; we wake and it is gone. Seeking for it, we find only the silence of the night. So we sleep no longer, but wait for the daybreak. Well for us if it comes. But if He who said "Let there be light!" revokes His decree and the darkness lingers—then, also, it is well.

Presently the noon hour struck, and the father of the pugilistic baby on the steps came home from work, stopping a moment to come in and take up the little thing. The mother came out to meet him.

"Hi, Dan! it am an awfu' heat for ye to work, dis yere!"

"Hot enuff," replied Dan; "ye look beat out, little woman."

He stooped, with one arm still around the baby, and put the other about her neck to kiss her. The woman returned the kiss boisterously, but none the less lovingly for that, and looked up into his face with a hearty, happy laugh. Then they walked away, and down the street together. It was a little thing; but do you not know that the smallest knives are keenest? I turned toward the quiet figure which had been pacing back and forth. It was quiet no longer. She looked up at me quickly, her whole face quivering. Then she wrung her hands tightly across her forehead, hurried past me, and into the house.

We had some busy days after this. There were two deaths and a fresh relay of wounded, among whom were a number of rebel prisoners—whom I sent, by-the-way, to Mrs. Cruppins. I acquit myself of all unholy self-indulgence in this arrangement. I felt that I was serving my country in sending her enemies to the most uncomfortable place I had at command.

After the first gloom caused by the two empty beds and the sight of fresh suffering had passed away, the boys rallied from it into such a programme of jokes and laughter as quite filled the day. I began to think they had forgotten their sympathy with our refugees, and was musing upon the fickleness of human nature while I sat one morning in a meditative attitude before the kitchen fire, my sleeves rolled up, my eyes fixed reflectively upon a basin of arrow-root, and blessed with the consciousness that my face was slowly but surely turning to "celestial rosy red" over the coals. While thus occupied I neglected the warning of a familiar whistle, and was paid for it by hearing a suppressed snicker behind the door, and feeling the gaze of two very small gray eyes fastened upon me through the crack.

"Cool weather, ain't it?"

The remark was supposed to be addressed to some invisible infant whom I could hear crawling opportunely about in the same mysterious corner. The infant assented by a scream which set every one of my nerves on edge.

"Maybe we'd like our picter took," rejoined the Invisible.

Again the infant assented as before. The assent was followed by the same results. I buckled on my armor at this. I took off my arrow-root with a jerk, called indiscriminately on the various maids of the tub and ironing-board about me to go to the rescue of the musical child, repressed a strong desire to throw my steaming gruel at the eyes behind the crack, and marched up to the offender.

"Tim," I said, sternly, "is this you?"

"That's allers ben my 'pinion, Miss."

"What do you wish?"

"Dr. Jyce sent fur you, post haste."

My desire concerning the arrow-root this time got so far under way of fulfillment that I saved it and my dignity only by a sudden pull, and the lucky Tim escaped with a few drops on his hand. Enough, however, was perhaps as good as a feast, for he grew suddenly dumb, and followed me meekly up the stairs, eying the while his reddened finger with a thoughtful aspect which gave me the greatest satisfaction.

The Doctor met me with a grave face.

"Well?" I said, stopping short.

"Stephen Rand—he can't last through the night, unless there is some change I see no reason to expect."

"Who'll tell her?"

"You must."

"Dr. Joyce," said I, "I'm no coward, and I never disobey orders; but I wish you'd find me a few moments to go away and cry first."

"Why—why, really," said this good man, whom I puzzled every day by my feminine developments, "I don't see how you can be spared just now. There's the man who came last night waiting for a fresh bandage; and Jones, and—I don't see how there's time just at present."

Of course there wasn't. I knew that very well. I must face duty if it put me in the front and held me under the guns.

I found the boys quite sober as I passed along finishing all most pressing work, and prolonging it, I am afraid, rather more than was necessary; for which I expect you will combat my assertion that I was not a coward.

"So he's going at last!" the Captain said, with a sorrowful glance into the corner. "I—I call that hard, poor thing!"

The sergeant called softly as I went by,

"Have you told her? If it was my wife—if I was you, I'd rather be under fire than have it to do!"

"I say, mum"—and Pat, the warm-hearted, was tugging at my sleeve with his one arm—"I say, how long'll he hold out?"

"Till night."

"May the Houly Vargin an' all the Saints have marcy on her!" he ejaculated, fervently. "She's sech a poor young critter, shure!"

But the thing that most unmanned me, more than all the anxious questions that met me from each bed as I passed along—the messages from Jones and Brown, or the condescending sympathy of the rebel—was the entreaty of my little drummer-boy, who had lain in agony with his wound for many weeks, and was himself marked with the touch of that unerring finger that no human care or love can parry: an orphan child, to whom now I alone was a mother, and so it was that even to look at him as he turned his patient face so mutely on the pillow brought the quick tears. Putting up his hand into mine he said, softly,

"Is the Chaplain here?"

The Chaplain was sick that morning, and so I told him.

"Who'll pray for that man?"

"My boy, he isn't afraid to die; he needs no chaplain."

"But his wife; she has such a white, white face!"

I was silent. I could not tell him how she needed prayer—purer, better prayers than mine could be.

"I remember how mother felt when father died," he said, and spoke no more then, but turned his face quietly away. I saw that he folded his hands, and I heard the echo of a whisper on his lips.

I went up at last to Mary Rand and touched her shoulder.

"I want to see you a moment," I said.

She turned with a look of surprise, stooped a moment to touch her husband's forehead with her hand, then rose and followed me.

We sat down under a large entry window, quietly. I remember how the garish sunlight played about her worn face, and how the wind blew in gusts up the stairs and through the deserted passage.

"I have something to tell you," I began. But there I stopped, held fast by the look in her eyes. Dark, yet filled with the depths of some glowing light; transfixed like one who asks the question on which hangs an eternity. I caught her hand quickly and held it in both of mine. I could not speak. She understood the answer.

"I know"—speaking slowly in a voice that froze me—"I know what yer've come ter say. How long'll they give him?"

"The Doctor says the crisis must come to-night."

"To-night." She repeated the word slowly, like one whose memory is becoming treacherous. "To-night. Ef there's a God in heaven I hope He'll remember He's takin' all I've got left—all I've got left."

Her hand lay like ice in mine. She did not hear my words; she did not feel my touch which tried to detain her. She rose and walked slowly back, with uncertain step, as if she walked in the dark.

I found her when I came back in her old seat, in the same attitude of quiet watching, with the same unfaltering look, a shade paler, the lines about her mouth sharper, but her voice, when she spoke to her husband, clear and low in its love; and there was no cry or sobbing that might disturb his last few hours. That was in the morning. Once she left him, to go to the kitchen and feed her baby, but that was all. The broad noon-light struck at last in flakes of gold upon the floor. I brought up a little dinner, and tried gently to make her eat. She only shook her head, pushing it away. Through all the hot afternoon she did not seem to move her eyes from her husband's face. He was tossing on the bed in frenzy, calling for her, catching at her hand, but still he did not recognize her.

Her baby slept quietly on her arm. She did not seem to know it, holding it mechanically. Toward evening it wakened and cried. She paid no heed to it. I went up and took the child gently from her. Her arm remained in the same position as before. I could hear her quick, sharp breathing; but she did not look at me nor speak. I took the little thing away and found a negro girl to care for it, wondering as I went, and felt the clinging hands about my neck, whether its warm touch could ever comfort her, and if God would not in mercy take them both.

The evening came at last. The boys were very quiet, and we sat watching through the windows the gorgeous hues of purple and gold that were in the sky. The great warm sun dropped at length behind the hills. The twilight began to creep in at the windows and fall heavily on the hospital floor. It wrapped her figure where she sat, one white, thin hand fanning her husband, the other lying clenched in her lap, her head bent toward the bed to listen to his ravings. Once, when he had called her name many times, I saw her drop the fan quickly and, creeping up, lay her head upon his arm with a long wail.

"Oh, Stephen, it's me! it's yer wife, Stephen! I hain't never left yer. Ef yer'd only kiss me once!"

Perhaps he understood her, for he put up the hand he held to his hot lips. She put her arm about his neck and kissed him once—twice—almost fiercely. Then she buried her face in the clothes. I could just hear her stifled cry, "Oh, my God! my God! my God!" three times—a cry that made me tremble. The evening wore away. Stephen Rand lay panting and weaker now as the night came on.

I sat watching the forms about his bed and the flickering of the newly-lighted lamps above the faces of my boys. Now and then some one called me, and I went silently to meet their wants. Often I could hear a groan from some sufferer, or the Captain's cough, but nearer and more distinctly Stephen Rand's labored breathing, and his wife's low voice soothing his delirium. Once the little drummer called faintly for some water. I went up to give it to him. He smiled as I left him, looking over to the corner.

"I haven't forgotten her," he said. So he turned away, and once more folded his hands.

I came back and sat down again. I could do nothing for him. His wife jealously watched for every care which now remained. I watched her face, wondering who would dare to comfort her when the morning came.

Presently her husband grew more quiet, and fell at last into an uneasy slumber, fitful and restless at first, but gradually he became quite still. The Doctor, with his finger on the pulse, looked, I thought, surprised.

Was it stupor, or rest? was it death, or life? The woman's eyes asked him mutely, but he could not tell her.

The light fell full upon her where she was crouched on the floor by the bed, her hands in her husband's. Her thin hair had fallen down about her neck; her face, with its drawn lips and hueless cheeks, looked more like death than the one on which she gazed. A soft, natural heat seemed to color that at last, and he stirred in his sleep. The Doctor passed his hand over the man's forehead, and I was sure his face brightened.

"Speak to him," he said to the wife.

She bent over, with her hair falling about her face so I could not see it.

"Stephen!"

He opened his eyes, and smiled faintly.

"Whar are ye, Mary?"

"Here, Stephen! I've tuk yer hand."

"Yes. I thought I'd got ter go away, Mary. God's guv me back ter ye!"

He was quite himself now—weak as an infant, his voice scarcely above a whisper, but natural in its tone; and the hand which his wife held had grown soft and moist.

She clasped it tightly, holding it up against her breast, and dropped her face upon the pillow by his, her hair falling over them both. Her whole slight frame was quivering. No one could see her face. Through the moments that passed before she spoke her husband touched her hair caressingly, and smiled. At last it came—a little, low cry, like a penitent child.

"Oh, Stephen! He's guv yer back, an' I won't never say hard things on Him agin! I thought—I thought, oh, my husband! I thought He'd tuk yer, an' left me all alone!"

I heard the sergeant's sobs from the other end of the room; the boys who had sat up in bed, holding their breath to listen, lay down again and turned their faces to the wall; the Doctor choked; and as for me I ran out of the room, locked myself in up stairs, and cried like a baby for fifteen minutes.

When I went to the drummer-boy a while after and touched his forehead I started at the chill. His hands were still folded as when he sought from the orphan's God a blessing for this humbled, grateful woman; and even while he asked he stood face to face. She was a stranger, but he took her in—in to his pure child's heart!

Who can tell what agencies that prayer set at work? Who knows what she owed to the boy lying so still and with such a smile before her?

THE CROW-CHILD.

MIDWAY between a certain blue lake and a deep forest there once stood a cottage called by its owner "The Rookery."

The forest shut out the sunlight and scowled upon the ground, breaking with shadows every ray that fell, until only a few little pieces lay scattered about. But the broad lake invited all the rays to come and rest upon her, so that sometimes she shone from shore to shore, and the sun winked and blinked above her as though dazzled by his own reflection.

The cottage, which was very small, had sunny windows and dark windows. Only from the roof could you see the mountains beyond, where the light crept up in the morning and down in the evening, turning all the brooks into silver as it passed.

But something brighter than sunshine used often to look from the cottage into the forest; and something even more gloomy than shadows often glowered from its windows upon the sunny lake. One was the face of little Ruky Lynn; and the other was his sister's, when she felt angry or ill-tempered.

They were orphans, Cora and Ruky, living alone in the cottage with an old uncle. Cora—or "Cor," as Ruky pronounced it—was nearly sixteen years old, but her brother had seen the forest turn yellow only four times. She was, therefore, almost mother and sister in one. The little fellow was her companion night and day. Together they ate and slept, and—when Cora was not at work in the cottage—together they rambled in the wood, or floated in their little skiff upon the lake.

Ruky had such deep eyes that Cora said they reminded her of two dark nights with a single star in each; and his hair was so glossy black it made his cheeks look even rosier than they were. He had funny motions, too—delighted in hopping about like a bird; and, young as he was, often managed to mount high up in a low-branching tree near the cottage, though he could not always get down again. Sometimes, when perched almost out of sight, he screamed, "Cor! Cor! come, take me down!" his sister would answer, as she ran out laughing, "Yes, little Crow! I'm coming, I'm coming!"

Perhaps it was because he reminded her of a crow that Cora often called him her birdie. She was generally kind, except when a cross fit came upon her. Then she would scold and grumble at him until he would steal from the cottage door, and, jumping lightly from the door-step, seek the shelter of his tree.

Once perched safely among its branches he knew she would finish her work, forget her ill-humor, and be quite ready, when he cried "Cor! Cor!" to come out laughing, "Yes, little Crow! I'm coming, I'm coming!"

No one could help loving Ruky, with his quick, affectionate ways; and it seemed that Ruky, in turn, could not help loving every person and thing around him. He loved his silent old uncle, the bright lake, the cool forest, and even his little china cup with red berries painted upon it. But more than all Ruky loved his golden-haired sister, and the great dog, who would plunge into the lake at the mere pointing of his chubby little finger.

Nep and Ruky talked often together, and though one used barks and the other words, there was a perfect understanding between them. Woe to the straggler that dared to cross Nep's path, and woe to the bird or rabbit that ventured too near!—those great teeth snapped at their prey without even the warning of a growl. But Ruky could safely pull Nep's ears or his tail, or climb his great shaggy back, or even snatch away the untasted bone. Still, as I said before, every one loved the child; so, of course, Nep was no exception.

One day Ruky's "Cor! Cor!" had sounded oftener than usual. His rosy face had bent saucily to kiss Cora's upturned forehead, as she raised her arms to lift him from the tree; but the sparkle in his dark eye had seemed to kindle so much mischief in him that his sister's patience became fairly exhausted.

"Has Cor nothing to do but to wait upon you," she cried, "and nothing to listen to but your noise and your racket? You shall go to bed early to-day, and then I shall have some peace."

"No, no, Cor. Please let Ruky wait till the stars come. Ruky be good."

"Hush! Ruky is bad. He shall have a big whipping when uncle comes back from town."

Nep growled.

"Ha, ha!" laughed Ruky, jerking his head saucily from side to side, "Nep says 'No!'"

Nep was shut out of the cottage for his pains, and poor Ruky was undressed and sent supperless to bed.

He could not sleep, for his eyelids were scalded with tears, and his plaintive "Cor, Cor!" had reached his sister's ears in vain. She never once looked up from those gleaming knitting-needles, nor even gave him his good-night kiss.

It grew late. The uncle did not return. At last Cora, sulky and weary, locked the cottage door, blew out her candle, and lay down beside her brother.

The poor little fellow tried to win a forgiving word, but she was too ill-natured to grant it. In vain he whispered, "Cor, Cor;" he even touched her hand over and over again with his lips, hoping she would turn toward him, and, with a loving kiss, murmur as usual,

"Good-night, little birdie."

Instead of this she jerked her arm angrily away, saying,

"Oh, stop your pecking and go to sleep! I wish you were a crow in earnest, and then I should have some peace."

After this Ruky was silent. His heart drooped within him as he wondered what this "peace" was that his sister wished for so often, and why he must go away before it could come to her.

Soon Cora, who had rejoiced in the sudden calm, heard a strange fluttering. In an instant she saw by the starlight a dark object wheel once or twice in the air above her, then dart suddenly through the open window.

Astonished that Ruky had not either shouted with delight at the strange visitor, or else clung to her neck in fear, she turned to see if he had fallen asleep.

No wonder that she started up horror-stricken—Ruky was not there!

His empty place was still warm—perhaps he had slid softly from the bed. With trembling haste she lit the candle, and peered in every corner. The boy was not to be found!

Then those fearful words rang in her ears—
"I wish you were a crow in earnest!"

Cora rushed to the door, and looked out into the still night.

"Ruky! Ruky!" she screamed.

There was a slight stir in the low-growing tree.

"Ruky, darling, come back!"

"Caw, caw!" answered a harsh voice from the tree. Something black seemed to spin out of it, then in great sweeping circles sailed upward, until finally it settled upon a lofty tree in the forest.

"Caw, caw!" it screamed, fiercely.

The girl shuddered, but, with outstretched arms, cried out,

"Oh, Ruky, if it is you, come back to poor Cor!"

"Caw, caw!" mocked hundreds of voices as a shadow like a thunder-cloud rose in the air. It was an immense flock of crows. She could distinguish them plainly in the starlight, circling higher and higher, then lower and lower, until, screaming "caw, caw!" they sailed far off into the night.

"Answer me, Ruky!" she cried.

Nep growled, the forest trees whispered busily together, and the lake, twinkling with stars, sang a lullaby as it lifted its weary little waves upon the shore: there was no other sound.

It seemed that daylight would never come; but at last the trees turned slowly from black to green, and the lake put out its stars one by one and waited for the sunshine.

Cora, who had been wandering restlessly in every direction, now went weeping into the cottage. "Poor boy!" she sobbed; "he had no supper." Then she scattered bread crumbs near the doorway, hoping that Ruky would come for them; but only a few timid little songsters hovered about, and, while Cora wept, picked up the food daintily, as though it burned their bills.

When she reached forth her hand, though there were no crows among them, and called "Ruky!" they were frightened away in an instant.

Next she went to the steep-roofed barn, and bringing out an apronful of grain, scattered it all around his favorite tree. Before long, to her great joy, a flock of crows came by. They spied the grain, and were soon busily picking it up with their short feathery bills. One even came near the mound where she sat. Unable to restrain herself longer, she knelt down, with an imploring cry:

"Oh, Ruky, is this you?"

Instantly the entire flock set up an angry "caw," and surrounding the crow who was hopping closer and closer to Cora, hurried him off, until they all looked like mere specks against the summer sky.

Every day, rainy or shiny, she scattered the grain, trembling with dread lest Nep should leap among the hungry crows and perhaps kill her own birdie first. But Nep knew better; he never stirred when the noisy crowd settled around the cottage, except once, when one of them lit upon his back. Then he started up, wagging his tail, and barked with uproarious delight. The crow flew off with a frightened "caw," and did not venture near him again.

Poor Cora felt sure that this could be no other than Ruky. Oh, if she only could have caught him then! Perhaps with kisses and prayers she might have won him back to Ruky's shape; but now the chance was lost.

There were none to help her; for the nearest neighbor dwelt miles away, and her uncle had not yet returned.

After a while she remembered the little cup, and filling it with grain stood it upon a grassy mound. When the crows came they fought and struggled for its contents, with many an angry cry. One of them made no effort to seize the grain. He seemed contented to peck at the berries painted upon its sides as he hopped joyfully around it again and again.

Nep lay very quiet. Only the tip of his tail twitched with an eager, wistful motion. But Cora sprang joyfully toward the bird.

"It is Ruky!" she cried, striving to catch it.

Alas! the cup lay shattered beneath her hand, as, with a taunting "caw, caw," the crow joined its fellows and flew away.

Soon nearly the entire flock alighted upon a distant border of the lake.

Some foul carrion lay there, washed on shore by a recent storm.

The crows greedily hovered about it, and by many a sweep and pounce showed their delight.

"Oh, if Ruky should be among them!" cried Cora; and the thought pierced her heart.

Next gunners came. They did not care for the crows; but Cora trembled night and day. She could hear the sharp ring of fowling-pieces in the forest, and shuddered whenever Nep, pricking up his ears, darted with an angry howl in the direction of the sound.

Time flew by. The leaves seemed to flash into bright colors and fall off almost in a day. Frost and snow came. Still the uncle had not returned, or, if he had, she did not know it. Her brain was bewildered. She knew not whether she ate or slept. Only the terrible firing reached her ears, or that living black cloud came and went with its ceaseless "caw."

At last, during a night of wind and storm, it seemed to Cora that she must go forth and seek her poor bird. "Perhaps he is freezing—dying!" she cried, springing from the bed and casting a long mantle over her night-dress. In a moment she was trudging barefooted through the snow. It was so deep she could scarcely walk, and the sleet was driving into her face; still she kept on, though her numbed feet seemed scarcely to belong to her. All the way she was praying in her heart and promising never, never to be passionate again if she could only find her birdie—not Ruky the boy, but whatever he might be—she was willing to accept her punishment. Soon a faint cry reached her ear. With eager haste she peered into every fold of the drifted snow. A black object caught her eye. It was a poor, storm-beaten crow lying there benumbed and stiff.

Sure that it was Ruky she folded it closely to her bosom and plodded back to the cottage. The fire cast a rosy light on its glossy wing as she entered, but the poor thing did not stir. Softly stroking and warming it she wrapped the frozen bird in soft flannel and breathed into its open mouth. Soon to her great relief it revived and even swallowed a few grains of wheat.

Cold and weary she cast herself upon the bed, still folding the bird to her heart. "It is all I ask," she sobbed, "I dare not pray for more."

Suddenly she felt a peculiar stirring. The crow seemed to grow larger. Then, in the dim light, she felt its feathers pressing tenderly against her cheek. Next, something soft and warm wound itself tenderly about her neck; and she heard a sweet voice saying,

"Don't cry, Cor, I'll be good."

She started up. It was indeed her own darling! The starlight had faded away. Lighting her candle she looked at the clock. It was just two hours since those cruel words had fallen from her lips!

Sobbing, she asked,

"Have I been asleep, Ruky, dear?"

"I don't know, Cor. Do people cry when they're asleep?"

"Sometimes, Ruky," clasping him very close.

"Then you have been asleep. But, Cor, please don't let uncle whip Ruky."

"No, no, my birdie—I mean my brother. Good-night, darling!"

"Good-night!"

WOMAN'S PROFESSION DISHONORED.

THE delicate constitution and failing health of young girls, the sickness and sufferings of mothers and housekeepers, the miserable quality of domestic service, the stinted wages of seamstresses, the despair of thousands who vainly strive for an honest living, and the awful increase of those who live by vice, are more and more pressing on public attention.

What is the cause of all this? The chief cause is, that woman is not trained for her profession, while that profession is socially disgraced.

Women are not trained to be housekeepers, nor to be wives, nor to be mothers, nor to be nurses of young children, nor to be nurses of the sick, nor to be seamstresses, nor to be domestics.

And yet what trade or profession of men involves more difficult and complicated duties than that of a housekeeper? Where is skill and science more needed than in the selection, cooking, and economy of food? What wisdom and self-control are needed to perform all the duties of a wife! What can demand more practical science and skill than the care of infants and young children? What profession of man requires more knowledge and wisdom than the training of the human mind at its most impressible period? Where are science and skill more needed than in woman's post as nurse of the sick? And where is trained handicraft more important than in making, mending, and preserving the clothing of a family?

And yet where is the endowment and where is the institution that has for its aim the practical training of woman for any one of these departments of her sacred profession?

When parents are poor, the daughters are forced into considerable practical training for future duties, though many a mother toils to the loss of health that her daughters may have all their time for study and school.

In the more wealthy classes the young girl is subjected to a constant stimulus of the brain, involving certain debility of nerves and muscles. Books in the nursery—books in the parlor—books in the school-room surround her. Her body is deformed by pernicious dress, her stomach weakened by confectionery and bad food. She sleeps late in the morning, lives more by lamps and gas than sunlight, breathing bad air in close rooms or a crowded school. A round of scientific study and fashionable accomplishments alternate, while her ambition is stimulated to excel in any thing rather than her proper business.

School is succeeded by a round of pleasurable excitement till marriage is secured, and then—perhaps in one short year—the untrained novice is plunged into all the complicated duties of wife, mother, and housekeeper, aided only by domestics as ignorant and untrained as herself.

What would a watch-maker be called who should set up his son in the trade when he had never put together a watch, furnishing only journeymen and apprentices as ignorant as his son? If in addition to this the boy's right hand were paralyzed, he would be no more unfit for his business than are most young girls of the wealthy classes, when starting in their profession at marriage.

Then, on the other hand, women who do not marry, especially in the more wealthy class, have no profession or business, and are as ill-provided as men would be, were all their trades and professions ended, and nothing left but the desultory pursuits of most single women who do not earn their living. A few such can create some new sphere as authors, artists, or philanthropists. But the great majority live such aimless lives as men would do were all their professions ended.

Almost every method that can be devised to make woman's work vulgar, and disagreeable, and disgraceful has been employed, till now the word "lady" signifies a woman that never has done any of the proper work of a woman.

Dark and dirty kitchens, mean and filthy dress, ignorant and vulgar associates, inconvenient arrangements, poor utensils, hard and dirty work, and ignorant and unreasonable housekeepers—these are the attractions offered to young girls to tempt them to one of the most important departments of their future profession.

The care of infants and young children is made scarcely less repulsive and oppressive, and usually is given to the young or the ignorant. Thus the training of young children at the most impressive age, the providing of healthful food, and suitable clothing, and of most of home comforts are turned off to the vulgar and the ignorant. A woman of position and education who should attempt to earn her living in any of these departments of woman's proper business would be regarded with pity or disgust, and be rewarded only with penurious wages and social disgrace.

Meantime, while woman's proper business is thus disgraced and avoided, all the excitements of praise, honor, competition, and emolument are given to book-learning and accomplishments. The little girl who used to be rewarded at school for sewing neatly, and praised when she had made a whole shirt for her father, now is rewarded and praised only for geography, grammar, and arithmetic. The young woman in the next higher school goes on to geometry, algebra, and Latin, and winds up, if able to afford it, with French, music, and drawing. Twenty other branches are added to these, not one of them including any practical training for any one of woman's distinctive duties.

The result is, that in the wealthy classes a woman no more thinks of earning her living in her true and proper profession than her brothers do of securing theirs by burglary or piracy.

This feeling in the more wealthy classes descends to those less favored by fortune. Though forced by lack of means to some degree of training for woman's business, the daughters of respectable farmers and mechanics never look forward to earning a living in their proper business, except as the last and most disgraceful resort of poverty. They will go into hot and unhealthy shops and mills, and even into fields with men and boys, rather than to doing woman's work in a private family. Not that, take the year around, they can make so much more money, but to avoid the tyranny and social disgrace of living as a servant in kitchen, with all the discomforts connected with that position. Few except the negro and the poorer German and Irish will occupy the place which brings to respectable and educated women social disgrace and the petty tyranny of inexperienced and untrained housekeepers, who know neither how to perform their own duties nor how to teach incompetent helpers to perform theirs.

Of that great body of women who must earn their living, and yet can not find employment, nine-tenths of them would gain at least tolerable wages were they properly trained to any kind of woman's work. But those who have attempted to aid seamstresses say that all efforts fail because women are not taught either to cut and fit or even to do plain sewing properly. Neither are they trained for any other woman's work. Afraid of the disgrace of servitude, they throng to our great cities to perish in vice or on wages that will not keep soul and body together.

The following extract from Madame Demorest's Mirror of Fashion gives the views of a practical woman in a position that makes her a competent judge:

"It has been the great curse of American women that work—work for a living—was considered dishonorable, and only to be resorted to in cases of the direst necessity. Even then it must be cloaked and hooded, and disguised in all sorts of ways; and, if discovered, apologized for, as if a crime had been committed, instead of an honorable effort made to obtain a livelihood.

"It is this absurd prejudice against labor which makes girls eager to rush into matrimony with the first man who makes them an offer, be he who or what he may, which precipitates them, without reflection or thought of consequences, into unions so unhappy that their whole after-lives are spent in unavailing repentance and remorse. It is this which fills our streets with the wretched daughters of shame, which desolates happy homes, and if it does not urge to crime, does to pitiful meanness, humiliating subterfuge, and constant effort to seem to be what they are not.

"Thus it happens that in no department of business can competent women be found to fulfill the duties as required. Only the extremest necessity will induce them, as we have said, to obtain employment, and then, ignorant though they may be, they imagine themselves conferring a favor, and expect wages that can only be paid to the most experienced persons.

"Any business by which a livelihood can be obtained requires industry and application, as well as some natural ability, before it can be mastered, but this is rarely thought of by girls or women who seek employment. They will apply for positions of the duties of which they are totally ignorant, vaguely supposing that they shall learn somehow, and quite satisfied if they succeed in getting their pay. Many young women, indeed, make a merit of never having been 'obliged to work;' evidently supposing that the mistress of a large establishment will consider herself honored by the possibility of adding to her corps so distinguished a person, and offer increased pay in consequence.

"Feeling no respect for their calling, and determined to escape from it at the first opportunity, girls rarely acquire that proficiency which is only the result and reward of devotion to and honest pride in any profession.

"Where such cases occur, and of course they are to be found occasionally, they are sure of appreciation and substantial encouragement, especially if united to integrity of purpose.

"Take a large dress-making establishment, and imagine how much more profitable a dozen swift, competent, well-paid hands will be than twice the number of slow, ignorant, ill-paid ones, whose work has to be carefully prepared, and half taken out, and who can not be relied upon for any thing but their blunders."

The system of our public schools, especially in large towns and cities, is tending to the destruction of female health, as also to this degradation of woman's profession. A recent writer in a leading Boston paper thus describes what is true all over the nation:

"Our school system supposes that the human being from the age of five to fifteen has nothing to do but to acquire by memory the results of the study of the world for some hundred centuries. The system gives no fit place for physical exercise, for personal observation of nature, or for practical experience in the humblest details of human life. The girl, properly educated in the system of our public schools, when at the crown of its operation at the Normal Schools, has only one hour a week for herself. All the rest of her time is devoted to the studies of the school, and to the minimum of exercise by which life can be preserved through the school's ordeals.

"But we shall be told that some girls of the lower classes in our grammar-schools are taught a little sewing in spite of a system which defies memory. We are aware that a pretended concession to good sense is made in this direction by the employment of a few teachers for a few hours a week. We are aware also, however, that the 'experiment,' as it is always called, is frowned on as grossly exceptional by nine out of ten of the authorities; that only the smallest girls avail themselves of it; that no material for work is provided, and that the results are indefinitely small. It answers as so much additional recess, for which we are duly thankful, and for little or nothing more.

"We shall be told again that, when the hours of school are over, study is over; that, in the girls' schools, the rules forbid study at home. To which we reply, that we never meet a company of school girls in the streets but they are lugging more school books than ought to answer the whole purpose of their school-training; and that every head of a family knows that the school regulation must be systematically disobeyed.

"It is evident that careful parents, who care more for the health of their children than for their laurels, more and more regularly attempt to withdraw them from the public schools.

"When do we find any skillful physician intrusting his daughters even to the best public schools? Yet there is virtually no choice. The private schools are worked at as high a pressure. Their teachers are intelligent enough to regret it, as are their fellow-laborers who work for the public, but that vitiated public sentiment or public indifference which mistakes book-learning for wisdom, drives them up to the overwork which, with very few exceptions, is the vice of our whole system.

"On the other hand, we constantly hear of children withdrawn where the direction of the physician is the reason assigned. The strain on the whole system is so severe, just at the period of life when the physical functions should be gaining strength, that a medal or a diploma is rightly considered poor pay for epilepsy, for dyspepsia, for typhoid fever, or for pulmonary disease.

"The boys, as has been intimated, take this thing a good deal into their own hands. But girls can not 'go into water,' can not play cricket on the Common, can not form drill clubs; and yet, though the earlier development of women makes it specially necessary that we should relieve them earlier than boys from school, by a sort of fatality we pile upon them a mass of additional sciences which the boys by some good fortune escape from. At fourteen most of the boys throw the whole thing up. Their wages are worth something to their parents, or they themselves decline to have any thing more to do with the schools. Some years are left them, therefore, to renew or to create physical vigor before the age of growth is over.

"The girls at the same age are at the most critical period of life. The body is growing most rapidly; its functions are undergoing the most critical changes; its organs are adapting themselves to the necessities of womanhood; and yet at that precise period it is that we say that the rest of the body may look out for itself, but that what we care for is brain, and nothing but brain. The blood shall feed the brain with such nutrition as it can give, and all the rest of the system may go. Still we will not give appetite enough to endow the blood tolerably; for we will not give air or exercise enough to create a healthy appetite. We will have girls who can explain to us the binomial theorem; who can tell us how many metaphors there are in the 'Bugle Song,' and how many metacarpal bones they have. If they can do this it is no matter, we say, whether their metacarpal bones can sustain the weight of a pail of water, or whether they themselves are ever fresh enough or free enough to have written for themselves a 'Bugle Song.'

"Now this becomes a serious matter when, as a generation passes, we find that half our young men are exempt from bearing arms by physical weakness, and that half our young women, in what was once the prime of life, are confirmed invalids. It is a serious matter when, for the class which graduates this year at the Normal School, we find that there is another class, as large, of those who have dropped out by the way, unable to bear the high pressure of the Grammar schools and of the Normal. Such facts of themselves show that the practice is as disastrous as the system is absurd."

The results of boarding-schools, as they have been made known to the writer, would make a still more mournful impression. Especially so in those great brick establishments where one, two, and three hundred young girls, at the most critical period of life, are congregated to be put under the extremest intellectual excitement, without parental care to watch and regulate.

God made woman so that her health and comfort are best promoted by doing the work she is appointed to perform. The tending of children, the house-work of a family, duly combined with its sedentary pursuits, all tend to strengthen and develop those central muscles of the body that hold its most important organs in their place.

But most young girls grow up without those tonic exercises of the arms, chest, and trunk, either at home or at school. Instead of this, a weight of clothing that ought to be held by the shoulders encircles the lower part of the body, impeding action in the most important sustaining muscles, and debilitating also by the heat, drawing the blood from other portions. Then the central part of the body is compressed by tight dress pressing the central organs on to those below, bringing them into a condition similar to a finger when bound with a tight string, thus inflaming or debilitating all the lower organs. Then the brain is excited by constant intellectual stimulus, absorbing to itself and the nerves an over-exciting excess of nourishment, and robbing the muscles of their normal portion.

Deformed and weakened, the young girl is then sent to those great boarding establishments, where the muscles of the lower limbs and spine are overworked by the stairs of three and four stories; thus again drawing nutriment from the central organs. And when, under all this, the system begins to fail, then some scheme of Calisthenics comes, in many instances, to add to the mischief by unscientific and indiscriminate application. If most of those institutions were labeled aright, they would read, "Hospitals for the Destruction of Female Health."

If the public only knew all that medical men and women could narrate, especially those who conduct health establishments frequented by women and young girls, a cry of horror would go up more agonized than the wail over sons slaughtered on the battle-field. For while the sons are sacrificed for liberty and country in honorable martyrdom, the daughters are led as lambs to a more dreadful and disgraceful slaughter, or to a lingering fate far worse than death. The truth on this subject can not be spoken—can not be written—for it is too dreadful and disgraceful to be tolerated in expression.

The census tells us that before the war there were in Massachusetts 37,000 more women than men, in Connecticut 8000, in New Hampshire 7000, in New York 11,000. To these must be added the mournful multitudes of wives and betrothed maidens widowed by the war, and a large increase from this cause of the relative female population all over the nation.

What is to become of this multitude of women who can not have homes of their own, while it is disgraceful to do the healthful work that should bring them as honored and well-paid helpers into the homes of others?

These questions are now assuming a shape in which the women of this nation will be called upon to take some practical action. There are plans being devised and discussed that aim to remedy the evils here set forth.

[ALICE B. HAVEN (known to the reading world as "Cousin Alice") sleeps her last sleep in the pretty rural cemetery at Rye. A beautiful marble cross is her monument, and upon the base of it is inscribed, after her name and age, the following text as suggestive of the spirit of her life:

"Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ." The following lines were written after a first visit to her grave.]

I SAW her asleep for the last,
Close-clasped in her pale hands a cross;
Her praying and weeping were past,
But we stood in tears for our loss.

The chaplets lay white on her brow,
And lilies lay white on her breast;
Her shroud was as pure as the snow,
But the cross her true beauty expressed.

Life's burdens to bear for the faint,
Life's sorrows to share with the sad,
This sweet service made her a saint,
And each rough cross still made her glad.

What else for a sign might be set—
Her wood-cloistered grave to reveal,
Than the cross she is honoring yet—
Though no more its weight she can feel?

The cross at her grave is as white
As that in her hands' icy fold;
That faded, and this will be bright
When the grave-yard trees are grown old.

But longer than gleam of the stone,
The light of her life shall endure;
By the cross to us here best known,
She lives by the cross with the pure.

MY SILVER SPOON.

"Those born in June
Are worth a silver spoon."

BOTH of these conditions met in me. I was born in June; I was worth a silver spoon.

My paternal grandfather was a millionaire in his day and generation; but alas! his heirs were million—figuratively speaking, you know.

As for me, I was the seventh child of a seventh son, who had never ceased to repine that we five were daughters, and thus annihilated the possibility of the philosopher's stone ever becoming the splendid possession of our family.

My mother, a creole and a second wife, died at my birth.

"There's another slice of our property gone!" pouted Emily, the eldest at home since Sophia, Lucy, and Fan were married, and when I was first reported to have sneezed, and so, as old-wives say, broken loose from elfin spell to run riot in a spell of crying not so enchanting.

"You needn't fret, miss," quoth grandmamma, in a pet, "I'll provide for her."

"What will you do?—leave her your property?"

"Leave my property! Really, have I got so old as to be taunted with leaving any thing? Fine time o' day! However, she shall have something, and something worth waiting for, provided she doesn't throw her poor old grandmamma's age in her teeth."

"Hem!" retorted this dutiful grand-daughter. "And provided she has any teeth to receive it!"

"I wonder will the child live?" suggested Diana. Diana, not to be outdone by the huntress, was quite full enough of sentimental moonshine, and it was never the last quarter with her.

Shortly after this Grandmamma Engelhardt made her will, and I, Dolores, was provided for; at least so my father must have thought, for at his death, which occurred years later, and some months before hers, his will left me but a pittance, and perhaps he thought thereby to propitiate his other children offended by his second marriage, and who never seemed inclined to overlook my audacity in coming so inopportune-ly upon this mundane scene. Grandmamma, being on her own death-bed at the same time, never knew what disposition my father had made; and as I was too thoughtless or shrinking to tell her, you may be sure no one else would take the trouble.

"Never mind," said the appeased Emily; "there's grandmamma, who's going to give you the sun, moon, and stars in a nut-shell."

"Only you'll have to borrow Thor's hammer to crack the nut!" jeered Jerome.

"Jerome! Jerome!" from the warning voice of Diana, "never make game of the longevity of your race, lest you be cut off in the flower of youth."

"I leave all the game to you, my dear, it's your birth-right."

"What a boon it was to you when Di's name turned up!" snapped Emily.

"Yes, the boon of a new moon."

"I'm glad my name is beyond your small wit at least."

"True, Emily is entirely witless."

"Many men have many minds," objected Egmont. "You can confidently say Em-I-lie! But about grandmamma's nut-shell—it may turn out a perfect Pandora's box."

"With only hope at the bottom, and anger and disappointment flying into Dolores's face."

"I'll take care of my face and fortune without interference if the worst comes to the worst," I returned, having listened long enough to their badinage.

"Nobody 'll take exception at that."

"Nor make any!"

At this juncture the door-bell rang.

"Oh dear!" said Emily, "I hope it's not Lawrence Holland;" which was equivalent to saying, "I hope it may be;" while Di vigorously twisted her long curls that Jerome always called her moonbeams, or something relative to that luminary.

"Oh, it's one of Di's victims; she is getting her quivers ready."

"It's our German teacher," said I.

Jerome nonplused me by asking, "How do you know? Are you clairvoyant?"

"It is his hour."

"But there's no clock in the room."

"But there is the sun."

"And the moon."

"Have you your lesson, Emily?"

"Heavens, no! Is it that nuisance? Stop, make an excuse."

"She's sick, and early went to bed, And scarcely can hold up her head."

"Hush, Egmont! No, tell him I haven't got it. That will do. Who cares for their German teacher?"

Now I did.

"How absurd!" continued Egmont. "Nobody does, of course. He's nothing but a machine, wound up like a music-box, and warranted to run two hours for the pleasure of the royal family."

"Precious little music one gets from him though. His name chokes me every time I attempt it."

"What's in a name?" sighed Di.

"There's a great deal in mine—

"Great and high, The world knows only two, that's Rome and I—(Je-rome)."

I met Mr. Himmelsliedern in the library.

"And Miss Engelhardt?" he asked, impassible as a statue.

"She has no lesson to-day."

And so we went to business. Now this German teacher of mine was more beautiful than Apollo, more learned than Politian, with more fascinations than words can show, though he did nothing but entangle me in a web of verbs and idioms.

Of what were my brothers thinking to deliver me to the glamour of his presence? What blindness possessed my sisters that they delayed to follow my example? Where he glanced into my book I marked the place with a star, learned my lessons like a seraph, and recited as if they had been stolen from me by a daimon. Well, we all see with our own eyes, I suppose, when we take the trouble to look, and what's gold to one is copper to another.

One day a note came for Emily.

"Holland?" asked Di, leaning over her shoulder and brushing it with her long curls.

"Nonsense!" answered the disappointed one.

"Only the German teacher, to say he's too ill to come to-day. Bah! what do I care? I'm glad of it; it would have interfered with our excursion."

Without lingering a moment she tossed it away, and I, who would have treasured it as the apple of my eye had it been to me, saw it flutter to the floor disregarded and swept out by the maid next morning! So he was ill? and so was I—with disappointment. I declined to go on the excursion, which put out no one; and when their backs were fairly turned I meditated—what? a bouquet!

It was but a step into the conservatory, and there the flowers awaited me; I clipped an imperial white camellia, and hid it behind a hedge of delicate heath, where tiny blossoms poised like white doves pluming themselves, adding blush and tea and red-hearted roses, with heliotrope and the touch-me-not balls of the yellow acacia, and veiled all behind and under a little atmosphere of light-green feathery ferns; then I waylaid an urchin in the street, and sent it nameless to my German teacher.

Next day he came muffled in a cloak, but when he put it off there was one of my roses in his button-hole.

"He has found me out," I thought, and blushed, and would have clapped my hands if I had been alone. "But then the Germans are so fond of roses that they salt them; so, after all, perhaps it's only a nationality in him." And I stammered so with my lesson, and must have looked so hard at the bud, that, after all was said and done, he looked at me a second, unfastened it, and gave it to me.

"Ah, then, he doesn't know!" I admired, deprecated, and at last accepted.

"I have good store of them," he said; "the world blossomed for me yesterday!"

I won't say but that I was a trifle sorry he hadn't fathomed me; but in the mean while here was the rose; he had chosen it from them all; he had worn it and given it to me; so I pressed it tenderly in a volume of Goethe.

"Well!" said Emily, after he had left, she having remained stupefied during this scene, "one would think you never had a rose before, you handle it so gingerly, and make such an ado about it; what do you want with that?—there are far finer ones in the conservatory."

"Not to my eye."

Soon after this grandmamma died, and her will was read. She left something to all; but so little in comparison with what each had expected, that they waited in breathless anger to hear what should be my share. "And to my beloved grand-daughter, Dolores, one silver spoon, now in charge of the silversmith, Louis, and to be delivered upon her applying therefor."

There was an ill-suppressed titter from all but me; it was now my turn for anger.

"At Louis's?" said Egmont; "why, for Heaven's sake, is it there?"

"For Dolores's sake," returned Jerome.

"For shame, Jerome," said I; "it may stay there; I shall never trouble it till starvation troubles me!"

The others said nothing, but probably thought the more, like the parrot.

We were translating Goethe one day. I went to turn a leaf, and out flew my pressed rose as if it had borrowed wings of its lover the nightingale. Smothering an exclamation I sprang to pick it up, but Mr. Himmelsliedern was before me; he held it in his palm for me to take, and smiled; not so did I—the blood poured like an avalanche into my face.

"The rose of the world!" he said.

"Which of them?" inquired Emily, who had been regarding all with wondering owl's eyes. He blushed and laughed softly as if he had been detected.

"Both. The tea-rose is the rose for me of all the world!"

"Too commonplace: one doesn't want to remember gastronomy among flowers," persisted Emily.

"The name has very little to do with the impression; in this case I hold with Shakspeare." And we returned to lessons.

Leicester Woods was a famous spot for picnics. There was a cave where the pleasers sometimes dined, having brought torches and disposed them in the crevices of its walls; there was a waterfall that played like a timbrel close by, and natural bowers and sequestered nooks "for whispering lovers made." Wild berries and flowers abounded, and their maze stretched away, and seemed to beckon the wayfarer into the dim, brooding heart of the wood. Now, a picnic of innumerable is of all things the most disagreeable—you are bored to death, tired to death, starved to death, and catch your death a-cold; but notwithstanding all this, nothing to do but we must accept Mrs. Alcott's invitation to one, and die the death of the ennuyées! Every body went, and made believe they enjoyed it. They danced and sang, and ate and drank, and talked nonsense, and punned and proposed, and flirted and jilted, and told stories, and did pretty much as all such have done ever since the world began; and at last were photographed! Now, you may search that photograph forever, and you'll not find me there, yet I was on the picnic. Why then? Because I dislike the universal custom? To the contrary, since some one declared "you could have a real beauty taken at Black's," I have been eager to attempt it. But for this reason; after luncheon, when every one separated, some in twos and threes, whither they would, I went in search of flowers for my herbarium, followed several devious ways, and went further than I intended before it struck me I had better retrace my steps; when, to my dismay, I knew not which way to take, discovered that I was lost and the day drawing to a close. I tried to collect myself and remember if there were no signs by which I could identify my path, but all in vain; my mind was utterly blank of all data, and of every thing but the fact that I was lost in that dreadful wood and no one would miss me! Then I hallooed with all my might, and only the echo of my own voice mocked back at me; and the very squirrels seemed to stop and gibe at me—"Lost your way, aha!" and a bird above my head whistled "Lost! lost!" And then there came to mind all the stories I had ever heard of all the forests under the sun, and of this one in particular; of the ghosts and goblins and brigands that haunt such spots; and I shivered with terror, and all the while kept walking on, though feeling that every step led me further from what I sought; and all the while the day kept pace with me, and the sun went down, and the woods grew, oh! so dusky and full of shadows unfamiliar, and the mother-birds chirped their lullabies, and every thing grew so still I could hear my heart beat.

Overcome with fatigue and despair, I sat down against a tree, and awaited death or deliverance. Presently there was a flash in the sky that illuminated the woods far and wide, made every leaf visible and aglow; then a growl followed, and a few drops of rain fell. There was going to be a shower; my shawl was scarcely more than muslin, but I drew it over my head, and still awaited. Heart of man, will you believe it? As plain as day I heard far-off footsteps! Coming nearer and nearer they were yet far away, but distinct as my own heart-beats, and keeping time with them. At first I bounded up, thinking, "It is some one seeking me!" Then the alternative occurred, and I shrank back beneath my shawl, and would have transformed myself into a toad-stool if possible—at least hoped to pass for one. And still the steps approached, firm and quick and even—on, on, and, Heaven save me, stopped just under the lea of my tree, some feet in front of me! I held my breath, and would have silenced the tumult of my heart; and then the rain fell in torrents, and I could see from my peep-hole that another flash was lighting up the secret old forest, divulging all her mysteries in splendid dissolving views.

Presently my neighbor stepped backward, nearer the bole of the tree, and not seeming to discover me, I took courage and looked out cautiously. He stood sideways from me, a large book under one arm and a rifle over his shoulder, gazing intently into the hollows of the weird wood which the lightning had betrayed.

Do you know, fear fled like a phantom! I clapped my hands above my head, and stepped forward.

"Mr. Himmelsliedern," I said, "didn't you feel a presence?"

He started like one awakened from sleep; then held out his hand to me.

"Miss Dolores, how ever came you here?" in utter astonishment. Then I related.

"Poor child! But I thought you were an appearance when I first beheld you. Come, you're soaked through!" And he wrapped me in his outer coat. "I passed the hut of a charcoal burner a little way back; we will go there and get dry while nature is following suit. • See, the storm is breaking now." But yet the rain fell as if the windows of heaven were open.

As we neared the hut, and its solitary window shot a baleful lustre on the terror without, it reminded me of those forest inns where benighted travelers find their end sometimes, about which horrible mysteries hang like dank cobwebs in a damp cellar. Still, the situation of things was so sweet and strange, the incidents so picturesque, the fear so remote and beautifully vague, that I came to consider being lost the height of human bliss!

A woman carrying a child opened to us, and seated us before a blazing wood-fire with a ready hospitality becoming more enlightened regions. It was one of the rudest log-huts, roomy without division; a bed bearing a Job's trouble counterpane and linen white as milk glimmered in a distant corner; a bureau, a settle, and rush-bottomed chairs completed the furniture, while the dingy walls were adorned with glistening tins and pewter ware in the place of pictures. I wondered if she were not the identical wife of the story who exchanged all her husband's buried jewels with a tin-peddler for these more telling treasures of a housekeeper, with which to decorate her kitchen. This suspicion was speedily dissolved by the entrance of the defrauded spouse, who, though perhaps a diamond in the rough, certainly needed polish and a trifle of soap and water to disclose his virtues. He welcomed us with the voice of a thunder-bolt, dandled the child in his grimy hands, and from that moment Bedlam seemed to enter upon the scene. Talk of a woman's gift of speech! You should have heard this charcoal-burner. His tongue fairly galloped. You would have supposed it the steed that bore the good news to Aix, except that there was no such dénouement as a cessation. He told, with florid decorations, how ill the pit had burned that day; how a rabbit, the little gourmand, had stolen his dinner, and a yellow-bird had lit on the brim of his hat and taken a berry from his hand; how he had found tracks of a bear, and but for his gun being at home, would have had Bruin's nose in his money-bag and his skin on his back—with a flood of minor incidents and witticisms from the mouths of his companion-burners.

"And now, Dory, where's my supper? I'm as starved as the man in the South who hain't eat a grain since he burnt his mouth with that cold pudding and porridge!"

"And it's true you've earnt it as honest as any parson or speech-maker, with your 'tarnal twittering—just like the swallows under the eaves, who never hold their blessed tongues from morning ter night!" And she set before him a supper of pudding and milk.

"Save my soul!" said he, staring, with both hands upraised.

"Sure, that's a good wish now," quoth she.

"But where's the sausages?" quoth he.

"Rover, he stole 'm while I was out at the spring."

"The thief!—Poor fellow, belike he was hungered!"

And he made an immediate and energetic onslaught upon the pudding and milk. My first suspicion lingered yet. Surely, unless my memory cheated me, the same story told how the dog robbed the fry-pan while Madame of the tins went to draw ale in the cellar. Suddenly our host stopped and turned to us:

"Oh, the cursed beggar that I am! Sit up, strangers, and take a bite. Dory, what be ye thinking? Bring the bowls." The wife hesitated; it was evident she had put her all at the disposal of her lord. Therefore we declined with thanks.

"More for me, then," said he, returning to the contest. Being now dry, we rose to depart.

"Wait a bit," said Dory, diving into a chest and bringing hence a shawl of brilliant dyes.

"Your wife had better wear this; the trees drip yet, and she'll catch cold. I'll trust ye with it!"

I wrapped it about me, my face the color of its plaids, and stole a glance at Himmelsliedern; he was biting his lips to keep from laughing. We made our courteous adieux, promising to return the shawl next day; and the last glimpse I had of the interior showed the baby trundling a silver coin of some size across the floor, and la chère mère rushing to its rescue.

So we took our way through the forest. The clouds had skurried out of sight and left a deep illumined cope above, where moon and stars peeped out to judge if all were right. Mr. Himmelsliedern knew these woods by heart; they were his daily haunts, and this afternoon he had come out to find specimens of a rare flower he had previously seen here, and being unsuccessful, had got belated and gone further than his first intention, and so the fortunate rencontre came about. Underneath the soft moonlight we were fast making friendly acquaintance, when our felicity was rudely interrupted by a sudden turn in the path revealing the bear of our charcoal-burner burrowing with the coveted nose in the rotten trunk of a tree.

"Bruin is robbing the bees' orchard!" whispered Mr. Himmelsliedern, examining his rifle. "St. Hubert! a great hunter am I, with an unloaded piece!" and he commenced to load, glancing searchingly at me.

"Are you afraid, Miss Dolores?"

"Not in the least, only miss me no misses."

"Not unless I'm a bungler," pretending to misunderstand me; "but step behind this tree, he may spring."

"If Cæsar hide himself shall they not whisper, 'Lo, Cæsar is afraid?'"

Just then the bear detected us, left his honey-gathering for an inspection, grinned and showed his frightful teeth, then turned about and walked leisurely out of sight before Himmelsliedern was ready to relieve him from providing for future hunger.

And at last we reached home, thoroughly wearied, and the clocks striking twelve. Emily came flying forward at the approach of steps.

"Jerome! Egmont! home without her? Oh, you horrid girl! you've worn the life out of us."

"Very romantic!" she continued, after hearing my story.

"How soon did you miss me?" I asked.

"Not till we were at home; we each thought you were in one of the other carriages."

"Ah," said Di, bringing me her vinaigrette, "aren't you faint with recollection?"

"No; I'm faint with hunger."

So we had a feast, to which Mr. Himmelsliedern remained, relating our adventures to each fresh comer, till I was in danger of becoming a heroine.

"A tasty shawl," observed Jerome, after listening unusually well for him. "Do they grow in Leicester Wood?"

Of course I was silly enough to blush "with recollection" at this, instead of fainting.

"It seems to have a strong reflecting power," continued my persecutor.

"One of the little wood-people covered me with it, as the robins did the lost Babes."

That was an unlucky speech of mine. You wouldn't believe it possible, but after this night I never saw Himmelsliedern for a month and more. To be in character, I went and had a sweet little fever, the climax of picnic, rain, and bear. See if you catch me at one again! But I ought to love picnics.

I made my first appearance down stairs unexpectedly; the family were at tea; and on opening the door the first face that flashed upon me was Himmelsliedern's, where he was seated beside Di, who was deluging him with her sentimentalities. He rose immediately, brought me a seat and my tea and toast, and then, without paying me any further attention, entertained us all with fun and fancy woven together in an inextricable web. It was worth being ill to be so waited upon.

If at first I had been startled with his pallor, I was now amazed at his bloom; if a twinge of jealousy had twisted my heart-strings then, a flood-tide of belief submerged it now. Before leaving he said in an under-tone to me,

"I shall live now."

"I'm sure I hope so," said I.

"Why?"

"Guess."

"I'm a German," making a wry face.

"You've been out long enough to learn the custom."

"Well, then, because I teach well?"

"No credit to you; you've an apt pupil."

"Because I'm a quick shot?"

"You're wide of your mark."

"Because I went to the wood for a flower and found—a bear?"

"You didn't bring it away with you."

"Because—I am Max Himmelsliedern?"

"You're an impostor!"

Since the late event Jerome and Egmont had taken a fancy to his social virtues, and, desiring that they should blaze in their benefit, invited him often; and so when I recovered I found him as much at home with us as if he had been a cousin. To be sure the result was that our lessons became splendidly irregular and sublimely digressive; moreover, they were a convocation of all the family. Di brought her embroidery or crocheting, Jerome his cigar and his tongue—no unimportant instrument, and Egmont his ears and appreciation; and oftentimes grammar and translating would be tossed aside, we would go down to the water's edge, find a boat, and push off into the rippling river, while he sped the hours with pictures of the Rhine exhibited by the magic light of his enthusiasm, and hoary legends of the Hartz Mountains.

"There is something in having a fatherland," said he; "I wish you all shared mine. There is much that is so grandly historic about it. Every inch of soil seems to story some heroic genius; and its rivers flow like poems through the land."

"I wish we were there!" said I, heedlessly.

"Speak for yourself," retorted Emily, who hated traveling.

And I found I had spoken for myself.

But then it was not always so. Sometimes, when the dusk was growing, he and I together stole down the path to the river, and skimmed away out upon its quivering floor till the shore seemed a great sea-monster with glittering scales, the light-house a ruby set in chaos, the river one broad shining street of enameled silver, while the sea thundered its diapason beside us; and pausing thus amidst the mingled balm of the summer night, with the spirits of the air singing the weird score of the heaven palpitating above us, as if it fain would intone its own harmony, perhaps we sought to demonstrate that theorem of celestial geometry, "The stars are the apices of what wonderful triangles!" and perhaps we more satisfactorily demonstrated more sublunary things. Be that as it may, returning after one of these evenings, I found the family assembled in the drawing-room, and told them of a pretty little incident that had occurred in their midst, but to whose beauty they seemed blind, as usual.

"I'm engaged to—" I began to announce.

"To Hol— Oh, I mean Himmelsliedern?" interrupted Emily.

"Never mind," put in Jerome, "it's immaterial which; they both begin with H. She loves her love with an H, because he is handsome. She has taken him to the sign of the Heart, and treated him to Herself!"

"Dolores, you don't mean to waste yourself upon Himmelsliedern?" deprecated Di.

"Economize is the word for such a couple," answered Emily.

"What do you expect to live on?" she added.

"My wits, if you can spare them."

"I didn't know you had such a fortune."

"Live and learn!"

"An unprincipled business," volunteered Jerome. "But then we forget the spoon."

"The locks of six princesses shall be my marriage fee,
So heigh! bonny boat, and ho! bonny boat.
Who comes a-wooing me?"

sang Di.

"It would be difficult to say!" returned Jerome, ready to sneer at one as another.

"The old Dutch merchants used to give a tulip bulb for the dower of a daughter," Egmont remarked.

"Then perhaps the spoon won't be thought so meanly of in the Faderland," continued my other affectionate brother.

"Humph! And to think that an Engelhardt should marry one of those horrid Germans!" grieved Emily.

"The course of true-love never did run smooth!" quoted Di.

"Except when it's a race-course to Gretna Green"—the speaker, of course, was Jerome.

"That's pretty well!" said I; "papa hadn't a drop of German blood in his veins, I suppose? Engelhardt isn't a German name, is it? And our ancestors didn't make their money cheating the natives, with one foot in the scale, etc.!"

"You'll none of it."

"No. You resemble them too much!"

"But about this match; there's many a hole in the skimmer, Emily," quoth Jerome, with the air of a Grand Signor.

"Did you ever see the cream escape?" I asked.

"The cream of the joke!" said Egmont.

"There's no joke here!" cried Jerome, getting heated. "I shall put down my foot!"

"À la ancestors?" asked Emily.

"You'd better keep down your temper," said I.

"I'll do both!"

"Don't have too many irons in the fire at once."

"Well, then, I've got your money in my bank, and in my name; so marry that Dutchman, if you dare!"

"I shall marry Himmelsliedern, be you as much a rogue as you please. You had better try to pick up a little geography along with your other acquisitions, and learn that to be born in Cologne isn't being born in Holland; and if it were, Erasmus was a Dutchman."

"From Deutschland I come,
With my light wares all laden,
To dear happy England,
In summer's gay bloom!"

piped the songstress Di.

I kept my word and married Max, and Jerome kept his word and my money to boot. Having put his foot down to no effect, he expended his spleen in speaking of us as the Babes in the Wood. Well, it was a brotherly deed, though he meant it otherwise; without it I might never have known the meaning of adversity—never have known the value of a silver spoon! That is well: besides it might have been spent ere this, whereas now, like the coral isles, it is daily adding a crumb to its nucleus.

With what money Max had put by for a rainy day he bought a house—never expecting, he said, to use it for a sunshiny one instead. An aunt of mine furnished it prettily enough.

"Ah! Dolores, I had intended this money toward a fund for orphan idiots!" she delicately intimated, and forthwith her bosom became tumultuous as the crater of a volcano.

"I don't see that it will be diverted from its original channel," observed Jerome.

Max made a tolerable living with his classes in music and the languages; and then he had a gift—or rather, an ambition, perhaps—for sculpture. It amused his idle hours to model a little, and perhaps it was the insecure foundation of many a Château en Espagne; at least I know my hand and foot were often required for models when too deeply involved in domestic concerns, and the loaf of bread was beforehand in taking the cast; and if the plastic art of the studio was well represented by them, that of the kitchen scarcely suffered thereby.

And so we two lived in an atmosphere of content, for who knows whether it is content or the blithe expectancy of the to-morrow that makes the children so cheerful, when—as Dr. Dickson says all diseases are intermittent—life, that great hereditary disease of which we all die at last, its painless interval having expired, exhibited its paroxysms to us?

Max came home one day complaining of his head, and the next he knew no more than a baby of what went on about him: he was in the delirium of fever!

Oh what heavy days and nights! what a nightmare of black draughts, damp cloths, burned vinegar, groans and sighs, weariness and anxiety! What a mockery the sun became; how passionless seemed the heavens; how void life; how dark the grave; how all things centred themselves in that one darkened room, in one tossing frame, in the unintelligible murmurs of a pained and weakened voice! And then the break of day, the sunrise of hope flushing the heaven of life with its roseate beams, dissolving the mists of fear into tears of joy!

Convalescence is a charming state, provided one daily expects a passport hence, and has no pressing calls across the border into the freehold of health.

Max Himmelsliedern wasn't an easy convalescent to deal with—it was purgatory for him to lie on his back and his pupils deserting him; but the doctor admonished him that purgatory was but a foretaste of heaven or hell, according to the manner in which it was borne. He would have taken health by storm, but his superior officer commanded a siege, believing a forlorn hope the inevitable result of the former.

In the mean while, as the old ballad says,

"My purse was getting low,
And to the highway I was forced to go!"

Which, being modernized and inverted, means to the pawnbroker's, with rings, brooches, and jeweled trinkets; for this illness had been a very confiscation act, had swallowed sovereigns with the equanimity of a cannibal or a juggler! There were wines and jellies and other delicacies to be procured for the invalid, besides bread and butter for the children; and for all that my store of valuables didn't scruple to exhaust itself nor the pawnbroker to cheat me, and accordingly one day found me at my wit's end and my money's too. From whence should arrive the next bottle of wine or loaf of bread, not to mention butter, was beyond my arithmetical or financial calculations. I took the problem to bed with me, and a most uncomfortable bedfellow it proved; as often as I turned it in my mind I turned myself in my bed, and management nor imagination could contrive a plausible answer. Thus the night dragged on, and the dawn crept up the horizon, and the earliest birds sang good-morning to each other; and just as from far and near there bubbled up, as if out of the overflowing heart of nature, drawn by some incantation of day, a thousand little rills of melody, I dropped asleep; and in my dream grandmother Engelhardt came to me.

"The Engelhardts were always a proud and willful race," she said; "now that you're at the bottom of your casket, perhaps you will discover what is at the bottom of your kinsmen's hearts; at all events, go and get your spoon before you starve."

So I made my toilet in my dream, and departed to Louis. He bustled up to me with instant recognition.

"Mr. Louis, my grandmother left me a spoon here?"

"Which you wish to carry away with you? One minute." And he disappeared. "Bah! what a flourish about a spoon," I thought. "I wonder if it will allow of partridges, or only a chop;" for you see I was determined to die game. Presently he came from an inner room, bearing a kid case that would have held the silver mines of Peru, I fancied. "I may as well see one of the seven wonders, so long as it costs nothing," I thought again; "but you're putting yourself to a great deal of trouble, Monsieur Louis. My dinner doesn't lurk in that cavern. It would be like hunting for a needle in a hay-mow." All this time he was unhasping it and examining the name on the lid.

"Thought I couldn't mistake," he said; "you have never seen it, madame? No, it was placed here the week you were born; it's a superb piece of work. One of the little figures had got bent; see I straightened it!" Was the man insane, or was I not fairly awakened from my sleep? said

I to myself. There, before me, lay a large silver ladle on its velvet cushions, its bowl, lined with gold, shining and reflecting magnificently, its handle studded with jewels that glanced like so many eyes of various hues and meaning. He lifted it tenderly, and disclosed a world of bass-relief and chasing upon the underside of the bowl; tiny fawns and satyrs, bacchantes and grape-gatherers, reeling under their baskets of fruit, and every symbol of wine and the revel that an exuberant imagination could invent; while at the brim a bird, in wrought silver, poised to taste; a bee hovered there, lured by the fragrance; a girl dipped with her bucket below, and a little urchin paddled with his feet inside. Vine tendrils that had wreathed the cup with glistening leaves intertwined and formed the handle, dropping here and there a bunch of grapes, each an amythest or chrysolite, and terminating at the top in an oval surrounded with diamonds and bearing the 'scutcheon of the De Veres.

I thought of the sun, moon, and stars that Emily had suggested as grandmamma's gift; and if I was silent, Louis was voluble.

"It is very old, I understand—an heir-loom. Ah, madame! it is worth a fortune. Your grandmother has told me of it; it has been in her family four hundred years, it was her wedding dower. Your grandmother was a De Vere—fine name!" I remembered Egmont's remark then, that the old Dutch merchants gave their daughters a tulip bulb as dower, and I said as calmly as I could command:

"Yes, that's a good while. The family of Macleod, you may recollect, have a drinking-cup belonging to their ancestors when they were Kings of the Isle of Man."

So the ladle and I found ourselves at home; and whom should I meet at my own door but Jerome? He had never crossed its threshold before. He had made money of late of a surety, in two ways, speculation and marriage; or perhaps they were both included in the first. But now I confronted him with my grandmother's legacy.

"There's my silver spoon that you all made much of!"

"Humph! it's nothing new to me. I bent the urchin back myself to see if his feet wouldn't fly up, when I was a lad. Odd fish these De Veres and Engelhardts, to let a fortune rust out in a spoon! Didn't you know what it was?"

"Did you?"

"Yes. Supposed you had it in your parlor cup-board all this time."

"You increase in amiability upon closer acquaintance. Do you wish to purchase?"

"Purchase! Do you think I'm King Midas himself? That silver spoon is worth an army contract; you can afford to go home to faderland now, and live in the ancestral castles."

"That's nothing to the purpose. But you have had army contracts, and if you don't want the heir-loom to leave the family, prevent it!"

"Can't do it. Had a speculation fail the other day."

"Which? Did she have her money secured to herself?"

"No," still laughing, through his cruelty, in spite of himself. "But I'll tell you what, I'll negotiate it for you."

"No, thank you; I've had some experience of your financial abilities."

"Then if I can be of no service to you, good-morning." And he bowed himself out, for I'm sure I didn't do it. I had to run and pick up my baby, who had tumbled off his cricket; and with this spring my eyes flew open, and I found myself sitting up in bed, and the ladle a myth, while a shriek followed close upon this conviction—a shriek from one of my children, who had been vainly tugging at my eyelids, and now was declaring that I was dead. It was all an Alnaschar vision, alas!

So I pondered breakfast and my dream at once; wondered I hadn't thought of the spoon before; and whether it wasn't wrong not to give my brothers and sisters the opportunity of relieving my wants. It would be the Valley of Humiliation to ask of Jerome, indeed. Egmont was in Russia, Emily and Di didn't dare to say their souls were their own unless Jerome suggested it. Oh, let us eat the spoon first, by all means, and then, who knows, something may turn up, à la Micawber. Yes, our forefathers ate out of it; we will scorn antediluvian customs and—and eat itself.

A little breakfast and a great walk brought me to Louis, the jeweler's, in earnest; the dream had done so much. I inquired for Mr. Louis. I proposed the spoon in fear and trembling; but there was no flourish here. He smiled significantly, turned to his private desk, touched a spring and produced a case for a table-spoon.

"That's all right," said he; "suppose you'll want to see your lawyer now? It's been accumulating some time."

"Accumulating? what, the spoon?"

And I tossed aside its cabalistic-looking wrappings in order to inspect a spoon of that peculiar character. Mr. Louis arrested them.

"Madame, you are throwing away the kernel for the sake of the husk. With these you might buy my whole stock and have pin-money left."

I took them from him in a maze. "Still dreaming?" I asked myself almost wearily; but the strange words riveted my attention; it was another will in my grandmother's hand, wherein, without annulling the former one, I became owner of a fortune in stocks, houses, and land, which in the interim had been duly under the stewardship of a certain lawyer, and one of the witnesses thereto was Mr. Louis himself.

"Poor grandmother," said I, quite ashamed of myself, "she intended this for a surprise, little thinking how long before the bubble would burst; but she ought to have known something of the Engelhardts."

At home I found Max in the Slough of Despond, but trying to creep out by amusing the children with a game at catch, feebly sustained on his part, while they came out in strength and character. All the chairs not on their backs were awry, the sofa-cushions rolling under foot, the rug in a ruffle, the table-cloth hanging by its eyelids, Salome's dress torn half a yard from the waist, and my youngest crawled and crowed over the floor in danger from the heel of the oppressor. It was very lucky I hadn't named him.

"Max," said I, "I've found a name for baby."

"Is that all? you look as you had found a fortune."

"Both in one. He shall be named De Vere."

And I brought forward my treasures.

"A pretty spoonful," he said; and I believe the very knowledge that we shouldn't starve if he lounged all the year gave an impetus to his health by lifting a more than Atlas burden off his heart.

So I keep my spoon, and only use it on great occasions; as for instance, when Jerome and his wife dine with me; which they do sometimes, our feud having smouldered into ashes and been scattered by the wind of prosperity. And it's not a bad spoon in itself, though maybe a trifle old-fashioned, for it wears the escutcheon of the Engelhardts in gold and blue enamel.

And the fever of life has intermitted, and life itself has become painless and almost perfect again. I suppose the next fever will be when De Vere goes to college—but that's twenty years to come.

UPS AND DOWNS.

WHO that knows England knows not Burke—Sir Bernard Burke, the Ulster King of Arms—Sir Bernard Burke, author of "The Peerage and Baronetage," and of sundry other books of most imposing facts which touch one's ancestry, if one happen to have ancestors? He is the receptacle of all knowledge worth having concerning the aristocracy. He is the "Lightning Calculator" of a man's titles to respect. You may be called My Lord by a double score of the most expensive lackeys, but your show will have no effect on the Ulster King of Arms unless your record shows the proper length of pedigree. Nor does Sir Bernard require to examine his books; he reckons up an aristocratic sum on the spot, and could publish to the world, extempore, the hour from which your patent of nobility dated, together with each individual in the direct and collateral lines of descent, winding up with a bit of wise advice to the "present possessor of the title." With Sir Bernard heraldry is a solemn thing. Latin and Greek in the Universities, commerce in the city, and the shock of nations in the world at large are all well enough as topics with which you may pass an hour, you know; but heraldry is the real business of life. Nevertheless, there is, now and then, an unbending from the extreme severity of the subject; and it happens thus: The intimate and unapproachable knowledge of family affairs in England, gained from long study, has put the august master of heraldry in possession of strange and moving accidents which have befallen great houses, as well as various personal anecdotes concerning individual notabilities; and these entertaining items of gossip Sir Bernard gives us in one form and another from out his "Record Tower in Dublin Castle." If you have the privilege of visiting him there you will note with how fatherly an interest he surveys his family, the aristocracy, patting this member kindly on the shoulder, repressing the assumptions of that one, and adverting with bated breath of awe to the eminent standing of a third. The Ulster King of Arms will point you a moral and adorn you a tale from out his ample resources at a moment's notice. His well-filled stores of anecdote furnish us now with more materials than we can use in illustrating the vicissitudes of families.

The decay and extinction of great houses and the disappearance of titles form sad illustrations of that law of change which is said to be even altering the shape of the earth. Not one of the earldoms conferred by William of Normandy after the battle of Hastings now exists; not one of the honors conferred by William Rufus, Henry I., Stephen, Henry II., Richard I., or John. Of the English dukedoms created down to the commencement of the reign of Charles II. only Norfolk and Somerset and Cornwall remain. Winchester and Worcester are the only marquessates older than the reign of George III. The earl's coronet was very frequently bestowed under the Henrys and the Edwards; and yet, of all the earldoms created by the Normans, the Plantagenets, and the Tudors eleven only remain, six of these being merged in higher honors; so that now the only ones giving independent designation are Shrewsbury, Derby, Huntingdon, Pembroke, and Devon. The present English House of Lords has among its members no male descendant of any of the Magna Charta barons, or of any of the Peers who fought at Agincourt; while the house of Wrotesley is the solitary family among the Lords which can boast a male descent from a founder of the Order of the Garter. In 1675 the list of the English peerages created up to that time occupied fourteen closely-printed columns; to-day a single column would easily include the names of all the dignities remaining out of the whole catalogue.

Take a single instance of change in an earldom. There were the Lindsays, Earls of Crawford, who lived like princes, held courts, and had their heralds all in royal state. Pages of noble birth waited on the Earl, gentlemen of quality were the officers of his household—chamberlain, chaplains, secretary, chief mareschal, and armor-bearer. Twenty great baronies supported this splendor. Thrice did the head of the house wed immediately with the royal blood. All this grandeur was in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries. In the early part of the seventeenth century David, the twelfth Earl of Crawford, died in Edinburgh Castle, where he had been imprisoned by his family to prevent the utter ruin of the estates, he having by desperate prodigality alienated possession after possession. This Earl's only child was a daughter, who came up wholly uncared for, receiving no education, and being allowed to run wild like a gipsy. She eloped with a common crier, and at one time lived wholly by begging, finally becoming a regular "tramp." In the middle of the next century, the eighteenth, we find another David, the unquestionable head of the great house of Lindsay, an hostler at an inn at Kirkwall, in the Orkney Islands. The earldom, by some incomprehensible shifting, had passed to another branch, leaving this old man of eighty to die in a stable.

The Cromwell family furnish a striking instance of rapid and thorough decay. They were of consideration and high county standing in Huntingdonshire long before the time of the great Oliver. In 1540 we find Richard Cromwell knighted by the king. He left an enormous estate, and his son and heir, Sir Henry Cromwell, was called the "Golden Knight," from his opulence and liberality. He lived in princely state, and once, at least, entertained Queen Elizabeth. His heir, Sir Oliver, magnificently entertained James I. on his Majesty's journey from Scotland to London, and was made a Knight of the Bath. He joined the royal cause with heart and purse, and died in poverty. His eldest son, Colonel Henry Cromwell, lived a life of pecuniary anxiety, and the burial of his body after death had to be skillfully managed in order to prevent its seizure by creditors. His son died a few years after without issue. Returning now to the "Golden Knight," we find his second son, Robert, the owner of an estate worth a thousand pounds a year. His eldest son was the renowned Oliver. The family then dwindled away rapidly. The Protector's great-grandson was a grocer on Snow Hill; and his son, the last male heir of the family, died an attorney in London. On the female side the fall was much greater: one of Oliver's great-granddaughters, after seeing her husband die in the work-house of a little English town, died herself, a pauper, leaving two daughters, who became the wives respectively of a shoemaker and a menial servant.

Irish titles have been preserved to a much greater extent than those of the English peerage; but yet that strange country has been more fruitful of striking vicissitudes than any other. The Martins, Lords of Connemara, were for years upon years noted in Ireland for wealth and the most generous hospitality. The estate contained one hundred and ninety-two thousand acres, the prodigious extent of which may be imagined from the fact that the grandfather of the last possessor could truthfully boast that he had an approach from his gate-house to his hall of thirty miles length. Within this territory the Martins exercised almost a feudal rule, and every head was bared in submission. But a boundless hospitality and a carelessness of management gradually impoverished the estate, till at last, in the famine year, we see the heiress of the domain—styled “Princess of Connemara”—absolutely forced to yield up the splendid property, and to retire to the Continent, where she vainly endeavored to support herself by literary work. Failing in this, she procured from friends the scanty means required to take passage in a sailing vessel for this country, and completed the voyage hither, but died, worn out with trouble, just before she would have landed.

Ireland furnishes us also with a remarkable illustration of decadence in the history of the O’Neills; who derived their origin from the great Niul, of Scythia, and traced their course through Milesius, the redoubtable warrior of Spain, and Heremon, first monarch of Ireland, down through Conn of “the hundred battles,” and, greatest of all, perhaps, through Niall the Great, whose praise is sung by bards innumerable, and who once led in his victorious train nine princes of the royal blood as hostages from states and kingdoms conquered by his hand. For six hundred years this race occupied exclusively the throne of Ireland, the last monarch of the line ending his reign and his life in 1168. The collateral branches of the family flourish even now in various degrees, but the main stem of the tree from the twelfth century dwindled and died. From monarchs the O’Neills became princes, next chiefs, next nobles of an English creation, next English squires, and finally nothing. In 1798 Sir Francis O’Neill, sixth baronet under the English patent, lived in the village of Slane, Ireland, renting a cabin of four apartments, keeping a huxter’s shop, while his son drove a cart for hire. The old man died in 1799, and of his surviving sons one kept a small dyer’s shop, one was a working baker, another a mill-wright, while the youngest—the cousin of three peers and a duke, and the lineal descendant of a hundred kings—was within three years living on a crown pension of fifty-four cents a day, and occupying a room in the shop of his eldest son, a coffin-maker.

The Barony of Dudley, created more than five centuries ago, in England, has had among its co-heirs striking instances of Fortune’s inequality. Were the history of that famous title written in two chapters, the first would tell of chivalry, warlike achievement, and magnificent hospitality in the old castle from which the barony took its name; the second would take us to the toll-bar of an English turnpike, twenty years ago, where the gate-keeper who received our toll was a descendant and co-heir of the lords of Dudley, whose castle towered in the distance; the chapter would further state that the remains of this toll-gatherer, who died on Christmas-day, in 1846, were carried through the great gates of the castle, and buried by the side of his illustrious kindred. A small farmer, a custom-house clerk, and a butcher were at the same time co-heirs of the same barony.

We are called on to pity the sorrows of a poor old man by the sad history of one Sir Frederick Echlin. The Echlins were an Irish family of the time of James I. There was a Right Reverend Bishop of Down and Connor; there were also a Baron of the Exchequer, a member of the Irish Parliament, and sundry other important people, till we come to Sir Frederick, the fifth baronet. The “Peerage and Baronetage” tell us as much as this; but to further trace the sad history we should have to plunge into the torturing labyrinth of an Irish equity suit, which is enough like “Jarndyce and Jarndyce” to have served for the Bleak House original. It was a prolific source of sport to all the lawyers. If we wished to know how it affected the fifth baronet we should have gone, in the year 1860, to Carbury, in the county of Kildare, Ireland. There we might have seen an old man of seventy years, utterly destitute, his only means of support being sixty-two cents a week from the offerings in the parish church, and sundry donations from persons in the neighborhood. He was but little more than half-witted, unable to read or write, living a harmless but dreary existence. This was Sir Frederick Echlin, the fifth baronet, and heir to the Chancery suit. He was living in 1863, with no prospect of any improvement in his condition.

There is the family of the Norwiches, Sir Bernard tells us, after a pause. For a long time they were lords of the manor of Brampton, in Northamptonshire, and for generations they formed high and distinguished alliances. Early in 1700 we find the family grown greater still by reason of honors added and estates gained, and Sir William Norwich came into a grand property. He never married, but gave himself up to selfish pleasures, addicting himself to the gaming-table and the cup, till in a few years he lost his last estates at play with Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough. The title was afterward borne by others; but no one had sufficient means to support it. The widow of one of the baronets earned a livelihood by washing, and died in 1860. Her husband, the baronet, was, for years before his death, a wood-sawyer, and his father died in the parish work-house. The present heir of the family is said to be now in this country.

In the history of the house of Rothes we have a bit of romance, which lightens up our gloomy record somewhat, though Sir Bernard takes snuff regretfully and shakes his head very seriously as he gives us the details. The blood of the aristocracy was tampered with, and that must never be counted a light offense. But the story: Leslie is an old Scottish house, of high renown, and in 1630 the grandeur of the family culminated in the sixth Earl of Rothes, who lived in great splendor, and, years after, had a funeral almost more gorgeous than those of royalty now. Passing by many of his descendants, and mentioning him only to show from what a pinnacle of ancestral pride she stooped, we come to Lady Henrietta Anne Leslie, who, says Sir Bernard, with the most entertaining gravity, “was the unfortunate occasion of bringing the illustrious family of Rothes within the category of fallen greatness." It appears that "this young lady"—still quoting the amusing Sir Bernard—"the descendant of the noble blood of all the Leslies, the heir and representative of the great Duke of Rothes, who lived like a prince and was buried like a king, condescended to stoop to a young gardener." It is furthermore added that she made, as is reported—for Sir Bernard personally can know nothing about such matters—a most excellent, industrious, and frugal wife during many years. Sir Bernard speaks of them as "long years;" but the young wife appeared to have found them all too short to contain her own happiness. It seems that the young lady, descendant of the noble blood, etc., while walking in the garden one day, met a youthful workman, and conceived an attachment for him. The love was mutual, and all agree in saying that it was strictly correct in virtue. No one will be surprised to learn that an opportunity was shortly found for a private marriage.

"This most unfortunate step"—we are again reporting Sir Bernard—"was one without remedy." If the match had been made a few years earlier the old Countess grandmother could have resorted to some "dodge," if we may use such a word in connection with the nobility, and thus could have banished the offending girl forever "unto that obscurity which she had taken for her portion." But such a step could not be taken at the epoch of this sad event, and so, do what they would, the gardener's wife remained the undoubted heir of the titles and property of her race. In the mean time, however, she strictly conformed to her husband's circumstances; and from her marriage in 1806 to the date of her father's death in 1817 she was a most happy and respectable woman, living in contented humility, supported by her husband's earnings. In 1817 she became Countess of Rothes, but lived only two years, being followed to the grave in ten years by what Sir Bernard persists in calling "her low-born husband." Within two or three years the title has again fallen into the hands of a young lady, and Sir Bernard, in his capacity of the Peerage Protector, took occasion at that time to give her some advice which, though given and taken in solemn earnest in England, sounds to us like a pleasant but perhaps not too well-timed jest. He wrote thus: "Let me conclude with an expression of most friendly and very sincere anxiety that this young lady may avoid the rock on which her grandmother made shipwreck. She has in a great measure the fate of a splendid title in her hands. Her earldom is not only one of the most ancient in the Peerage, but boasts of many most illustrious alliances, and an uncommon share of historical importance; and her fine domain and Castle of Leslie are identified with many remarkable and striking events of feudal times. Let her carry these honors and possessions into some one of the noblest houses of Great Britain—so that the ancient stem of Rothes may be invigorated by union with a Douglas, a Howard, a Sutherland, or a Hamilton." The American reader will be pained to learn that the "young lady," with a perversity which seems to belong to human nature even under a coronet, has made an alliance according to her own preferences rather than in consonance with this advice; and neither the Douglas, the Howard, the Sutherland, or the Hamilton has had the honor of invigorating the "ancient stem of Rothes."

And now the mention of marriages suggests another of Sir Bernard's stories concerning the Earl of Breadalbane. In 1758, when the third earl held the honorable title and the immense estates thereto appertaining, he had no children, and they would naturally go to other branches: of these the nearest were an old bachelor near Edinburgh, and the son of a Highland laird, who was accustomed to call his boy Breadalbane, in anticipation of the day when he should rightfully assume that title. One day the old earl hearing again by accident what he had often heard before, that such was the habit of the father, waxed unusually wroth, and retired to bed muttering of vengeance. The next day, early, he sent an express messenger to bring the old bachelor from Edinburgh. When the brisk little gentleman had arrived the earl directed him to marry, promising to furnish him with the means of living. Old Carwhin hesitated, not from any unwillingness to oblige his lordship, but from inability to think of any one to whom to propose with any prospect of a favorable reply. The earl met this difficulty by telling him to go to a town where the court was about to meet, get introduced to the daughter of one of the judges, and offer himself to her. The obedient Carwhin set out on his errand, procured the introduction, proposed, and was rejected! Much disconcerted in his plans, he then asked advice of a near friend. His friend said, "If all you want to do is to please Breadalbane, try Betty Stonefield; I've warrant she'll no refuse you." Carwhin took the advice, went through the same form, and was accepted, the young woman having good blood, but no charms of person or tenderness of age. A son was born of this curious marriage, and the old earl chuckled with delight at having upset the plans of the Highland laird for his son. Just now, however, Carwhin's great-grandson has died childless, and the great-grandson of the disappointed youth has become Earl of Breadalbane. One day in November, 1862, saw that great-grandson residing in London on an income of a few hundreds, and the next found him in possession of a famous earldom and of forty thousand pounds a year.

It is not often that a dormant earldom goes a begging for a claimant at least; but that was the case for some time with the earldom of Huntingdon. That lay dormant from the death of the tenth earl in 1789 to the year 1817. A professional man of London conceived the notion that a client of his, one Captain Hastings of the Royal Navy, had a well-founded claim to the title; with some difficulty he gained the modest sailor's consent to work on his behalf, getting from the Captain at the same time an opinion little complimentary to his sanity. The solicitor began his researches and met with fog and darkness at every turn; to such a degree was he worried that he was on the point of giving up the matter. While in this frame of mind he was traveling on the top of a stage-coach in one of the counties of England, when he descried an old woman driving leisurely along in a market wagon wherein was a vacant seat. From some unexplainable movement of his spirit he hailed the dame, and asked permission to jog along with her. This being accorded, she gave free rein to her garrulity, and he soon found that he was in company with an ancient dependent of the Hastings family; her talk put him upon the right course, and in a twelvemonth more Captain Hastings was summoned to Parliament by the style, title, and dignity of Earl of Huntingdon.

A very sad story of decay is that of Conyers—a family dating back to the Conqueror, and very honorable then. Early in 1700 it was a glorious house; three branches of it kept royal state in hall and castle and palace, representing solidity and elegance, worth and grace, in their brightest colors. In 1810 Sir Thomas Conyers, the last of his race, was living a pauper in the work-house of Chester-le-Street, in the very county of his ancestors' greatness but a century before. As soon as his condition was made known to those of the class to which he rightfully belonged a tolerably liberal subscription was made, and the old man was removed to a private house. He soon died there, and with him expired the once splendidly famous family.

Sir Bernard tells us, in the course of his entertaining talk, of several spendthrifts through whose extravagance fine estates have been brought to ruin. One or two of these, though not of a very recent date, will yet be new to the reader: There was Sir Henry Hungerford, who inherited a property whose income was thirty thousand pounds a year as long ago as 1600. One good act, among many others, should be mentioned to his credit; he tore down an old mansion in London, and erected at his own expense the first Hungerford Market. This act of munificence may be set down against such extravagance as could expend five hundred guineas on a wig to be worn on the occasion of a court ball. For thirty-three years this lavish baronet ran a free course, and then found himself so absolutely poor that he was compelled to subsist for nearly as long a time on the charity of his friends and relations. So little, however, did the total wreck of his fortunes affect either his health or his happiness that he lived to the astonishing age of one hundred and fifteen years.

The downfall of the Myttons of Halston, in aristocratic Shropshire, is much more sad. This was a great family in the days of the Plantagenets, and frequent intermarriages with heiresses added largely to the riches of the race. In 1472, however, was made the grand alliance that brought broad lands and royal blood to the house; then Thomas Mytton married the daughter of Sir John de Burgh, Lord of Mowddwy, and through her the Lordship of Dinas Mowddwy, with thirty-two thousand acres, came to the Myttons. From that time the family greatness swelled itself by distinguished alliances, till, in 1796, one John Mytton was born to one of the most splendid inheritances in the kingdom, the growth of five hundred years. During the long minority of this heir a very large amount of ready money accumulated; so that, when he reached the age of twenty-one years, he had no check to the propensities which his early youth had developed. At ten years old he was allowed a pack of harriers; he was shortly after expelled from the schools of Westminster and Harrow; at the age of nineteen years he entered the army, but devoted his attention chiefly to gaming and racing; at twenty-three he married and left the service; in two years his wife died, and then fairly commenced his headlong career. Details of extravagance are not wanting in Sir Bernard's memory, but they all have a sameness which would become monotonous when set down in print. Let it suffice to say that Mr. Mytton, guided only by his own hot desires, and restrained by nothing, ran through his immense property at a speed which led a friend to remark, without exaggeration, that "if Mytton had had an income of two hundred thousand pounds a year he would have been in debt in five years." After heavy liabilities had been incurred, and he was thinking of alienating some of his estates, his agent assured him that, if he would content himself for six years with six thousand pounds a year, he might save the finest part of his patrimony. Mr. Mytton exclaimed, "No! no! I would not give a straw for life if it were to be passed on six thousand a year!" Within the last fifteen years of his life he squandered full half a million sterling, and sold timber to the amount of eighty thousand pounds.

There is a curious life of this spendthrift, written in a very kindly spirit by a friend, the late Mr. Apperley. The most entertaining part of the book is perhaps the colored prints, quite in the style of those which embellish that classic work, "Tom and Jerry in London." They represent Mr. Mytton duck-hunting in his shirt; riding through a sheet of water as the shortest cut home; playing the highwayman for the fun of frightening the parson and squire, who had been dining with him; entering his drawing-room, full of company, mounted on a bear; and indulging in various other vagaries, all equally incomprehensible. One of the illustrations represents a scene that is hardly credible. Mytton is depicted with his shirt in flames, and the biographer assures the reader that the subject of his story set the garment on fire with a purpose. "Oh! this horrid hiccup," said Mytton, as he stood undressed on the floor, apparently in the act of getting into bed; "but I'll frighten it away." So, seizing a candle, he applied the fire to his shirt, and in a moment was enveloped in flames, his life being saved only by the active exertions of two persons who chanced to be in the room.

The end even of such a magnificent property as that of the Myttons was at last reached, and the Times, one morning in 1831, contained an advertisement of the sale of all effects at Halston. Shortly after Mr. Mytton fled to the Continent to avoid his creditors. In France he was arrested for a paltry debt, but was soon released; and after passing a miserable existence there for a time, he returned to England and London only to find a prison and a grave. He died of delirium tremens in the King's Bench prison in 1834. The good qualities of this strange man were so numerous and shining that the announcement of his death caused profound sorrow in his county of Shropshire; and the funeral of the last Mytton, attended by three thousand persons, was long remembered as unprecedented in its display.

From spendthrifts to misers is a natural transition, and the miser of all others was Elwes. Much has been told of him in various ways; but Sir Bernard presents several new facts. It is perhaps not generally known that there were two miserly men who bore the name of Elwes; but such was the case, though the enormous stinginess of one has overshadowed the smaller reputation of the other.

We go back to Charles the Second's time, and find that monarch conferring a baronetcy on one of his boon companions, Sir Gervase Elwes, of Stoke, in Suffolk. This Elwes was a spendthrift, who reduced the family estates to a skeleton. At his death his grandson, Sir Hervey Elwes, succeeded him, finding himself nominally the possessor of some thousands a year, while his actual receipts did not exceed one hundred pounds. He had a fortune, however, said Sir Bernard, in his penurious habits; and we will call him Elwes the First. On arriving at Stoke, the ancestral seat, he declared that he never would leave it till he had entirely cleared the estate; and difficult as the fulfillment of such a resolution seemed he lived to accomplish it, and even to accumulate a great additional fortune over and above the lands he had inherited. He was in early youth given over to consumption and a premature grave; he survived, however, and retained only a chronic avarice, the baffled disease apparently taking away every other passion and taste. He was shy, timid, coldly exclusive, without friends, delighting only in accumulating gold, and in partridge setting—though even this amusement, it would seem, he followed chiefly because he gained food by it. When the weather was fine he went abroad, walking or riding a lean horse for warmth and exercise; in fall weather he paced up and down his hall to save the expense of a fire. If a farmer came in he would strike a light and put on a single stick, never adding another till the first was fully burned. He was once robbed of several thousand pounds by a gang of ruffians; but when, some years after, they were taken for another offense, strange to say, he refused to appear against them for his loss. Avarice, aided by strict temperance, seems to have been a healthy vice, in this case, at least; for Sir Hervey lived to the age of eighty-five or thereabout. When he died he lay in some sort of state in his house, and one of his tenants observed, with wit untempered with propriety, that "it was well Sir Hervey could not see it." When the old man died he left about a million of dollars in our currency, and his annual expenses did not exceed five hundred.

But the being who inherited this property so far exaggerated his ancestor's peculiarities that he must always be known, so far as he is known at all, as Elwes the Miser. His name was Jack Meggot, but by the will of his uncle he was obliged to assume the name and arms of Elwes. Jack Meggot from a youth had been avaricious and a lover of pleasure at the same time—a combination which usually makes a meaner man than any other known mixture of qualities. When he had reached manhood, and it became necessary for him to meet his uncle, whose destined heir he was, great caution was to be used in order to keep the old gentleman from being hopelessly disgusted with his nephew's habits and tastes. It became important, in the first place, for him to drop his ordinary topics of conversation and thought. This was not very difficult. Then it was equally necessary that he should appear in something beside his usual gay attire. This he accomplished by having a change of raiment at an obscure inn in the vicinity of Sir Hervey's place, with which he would clothe himself when he wished to dress in the character of a thrifty nephew. One other difficulty remained to be guarded against: Jack's appetite for food was proverbially large. This would never do. So when he proposed to pay a visit to his uncle he was accustomed to eat a dinner for two men at some friend's house, then proceed to his inn and clothe himself in threadbare breeches, darned worsted stockings with rusty iron buckles, an old worn-out coat, and a waistcoat of similar character. Thus prepared he called on the old man, had no appetite for dinner, and was welcomed as a virtuous youth. The worthy pair would sit with a single stick frostily burning in the grate, and occasionally one glass of wine between them, till the coming darkness sent them to bed to save the expense of a light.

But now, when Jack Meggot was in his fortieth year, his uncle died, and he became John Elwes, with an immense fortune at his unlimited disposal. He had always been stingy, but yet had gamed and debauched himself in various ways to some extent. Now, however, he turned over a new leaf, reformed, and began to educate himself to become the chief of misers. Began to educate himself, we say, because even he could not all at once reach the summit to which he afterward attained. For a few years he kept a pack of hounds, though this was his only extravagance, and this even was very parsimoniously administered, the whole establishment of horses, hounds, and servants costing him but three hundred pounds a year. At this time in his life, too, strange as it may seem, Elwes showed signs of a generosity which would have been remarkable in any man, and which in him was incomprehensible. In truth the opposing traits of character shown by him in this, which Sir Bernard calls the second phase of his career, are absolutely unreconcilable.

He had a great deal of property in houses, and it naturally followed that all of his residences would not be let at once. When he visited London he was accustomed to take up his abode in the first one he found vacant. If a tenant wished that he gave it up at once, and moved into another; which he could very easily do, for two beds, two chairs, a table, and one old female servant comprised the whole of his household and chattels. Connected with this servant and this strange manner of living there is a sad anecdote: Mr. Elwes went to London in the usual way, and an acquaintance who desired to see him, hearing that he was in the city, set out in search of him. For a long time he could get no clew to his whereabouts, but at last found a person who said he had seen the miser go to a certain uninhabited house. Thither the inquirer went, but could find no sign of life. He then procured the services of a blacksmith and entered the house, which seemed deserted and drear. The two men soon had their attention attracted by the sound of moanings from above. Going up they found the old miser stretched on a wretched bed, seemingly in the agonies of death. Medicines were at once administered, and the patient revived sufficiently to say that there was an old woman in the house who had herself been ill, but he supposed she had got well and taken herself off. The two men, hearing this, made a further search in the attic, and found the old woman dead on the floor, with no other couch than a ragged quilt.

Mr. Elwes once agreed to stand for Parliament on condition that it should cost him nothing. He was elected, and the only expense he incurred was eighteen pence for one dinner at a tavern. He was elected three successive times without opposition; but finding that the fourth election was to be a divided one he refused to stand on account of the cost, though he would surely have been victorious.

By the time he left parliamentary life Elwes was considerably advanced in years; and now he began to be a miser in earnest. If a window were broken, a piece of brown paper supplied the place of glass; if the roof leaked over his head, he would move his chair or his bed into a drier portion of the room: to save fuel he would walk up and down till he was tired, and then would sit with his servant in the kitchen. During harvest time he would glean on the land of his own tenants, and they would leave more grain than usual behind to please the old man. As the weather grew toward winter his morning occupation was the picking up of chips, bones, or any thing which he could burn. To keep his purse from the extortions of a butcher he would himself kill a sheep, and would then eat mutton till the whole was consumed, making no allowance for the decay of the meat. Concerning his perfect indifference to the quality of food there are instances narrated which are too revolting for publication. But at last nature revenged herself for these continual insults, and the old man succumbed to the fast-growing weakness of mind and body which preceded death but a short time. For months before his end his sleep was haunted by terrible dreams of robbery, and in the dead of night the house would often ring with the cry, "I will keep my money; I will! Nobody shall take it from me!" About this time he came near falling a victim to a matrimonial intrigue. A kitchen-maid, at whose fire the old man often warmed himself to save fuel in his own apartment, bethought herself of securing an affluent future by marrying him. She accordingly set herself to work to show him such a remarkable degree of attention that he was touched by it, even to making her the coveted offer of his hand; his relatives discovered the plot, however, and prevented the romantic dénouement. For six weeks before his death Elwes took to sleeping in his clothes, and at last he was discovered one night in bed with his shoes on his feet, an old battered hat on his head, and his staff in his hand. From that date a servant was set to watch him and take care that he undressed himself; but he was so much attached to the other way that he endeavored to bribe the guardian with the promise of "something in his will." And so he died, possessed of a constitution which, with proper training and encouragement, would have easily taken him through another twenty years. He left two fortunes: one, of half a million pounds, to two illegitimate sons; and the entailed estates, of great value, to his grand-nephew, who was to assume, and did take, the names and arms of Harvey and Elwes.

It would be curious to follow this wealth so strangely scraped together. But Sir Bernard has duties to the public, and the hour he can devote to personal reminiscences is at an end.

AUTUMN TIME.

TIME, like a wrinkled hermit, sits,

Counting his beads, each bead a day;

From his long rosary of years

Those beads drop silently away.

Or, as a sexton, one by one,

Puts out the smouldering funeral lamps,

And leaves the corpse alone and still,

Amid the charnel's dripping damps.

So dealeth Time, who strips the leaves

Of bankrupt summer's rich array,

As jailers strip the trembling fool

Whose spendthrift wealth has had its day.

Yet these are but the feeble types

Of higher dooms to sons of clay,

Of shiver'd globes and falling worlds,

And earthquakes of the latter day.

AMONG THE SHEAVES.

Among the sheaves—the golden sheaves,
 An empty heart, I walk forlorn:
 How sadly sigh the alder leaves—
 I loathe those fields of mellow corn!

Among the sheaves—the golden sheaves,
 My heart is full, new hopes are born:

My heart is faint—for Hope deceives:
 My passion may be met by scorn!

Among the sheaves—the golden sheaves,
 My love is won! No more forlorn,
 How sweet the whisp'ring alder leaves—
 I bless those fields of yellow corn!

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

IN FOUR BOOKS.—BOOK THE SECOND. BIRDS OF A FEATHER.

CHAPTER I.

OF AN EDUCATIONAL CHARACTER.

THE school at which young Charley Hexam had first learned from a book—the streets being, for pupils of his degree, the great Preparatory Establishment in which very much that is never unlearned is learned without and before book—was a miserable loft in an unsavory yard. Its atmosphere was oppressive and disagreeable ; it was crowded, noisy, and confusing ; half the pupils dropped asleep, or fell into a state of waking stupefaction ; the other half kept them in either condition by maintaining a monotonous droning noise, as if they were performing out of time and tune, on a ruder sort of bagpipe. The teachers, animated solely by good intentions, had no idea of execution, and a lamentable jumble was the upshot of their kind endeavors.

THE BIRD OF PREY BROUGHT TOWN.—[SEE CHAPTER XIV.]

It was a school for all ages, and for both sexes. The latter were kept apart, and the former were partitioned off into square assortments. But all the place was pervaded by a grimly ludicrous pretense that every pupil was childish and innocent. This pretense, much favored by the lady-visitors, led to the ghastliest absurdities. Young women old in the vices of the commonest and worst life, were expected to profess themselves enthralled by the good child's book, the Adventures of Little Margery, who resided in the village cottage by the mill; severely reprov'd and morally squashed the miller, when she was five and he was fifty; divided her porridge with singing birds; denied herself a new nankeen bonnet, on the ground that the turnips did not wear nankeen bonnets, neither did the sheep who ate them; who plaited straw and delivered the dreariest orations to all comers, at all sorts of unseasonable times. So, unwieldy young dredgers and hulking mud-larks were referred to the experiences of Thomas Twopence, who, having resolved not to rob (under circumstances of uncommon atrocity) his particular friend and benefactor, of eighteen-pence, presently came into supernatural possession of three and sixpence, and lived a shining light ever afterward. (Note, that the benefactor came to no good.) Several swaggering sinners had written their own biographies in the same strain; it always appearing from the lessons of those very boastful persons, that you were to do good, not because it was good, but because you were to make a good thing of it. Contrariwise, the adult pupils were taught to read (if they could learn) out of the New Testament; and by dint of stumbling over the syllables and keeping their bewildered eyes on the particular syllables coming round to their turn, were as absolutely ignorant of the sublime history, as if they had never seen or heard of it. An exceedingly and confoundingly perplexing jumble of a school, in fact, where black spirits and gray, red spirits and white, jumbled jumbled jumbled every night. And particularly every Sunday night. For then, an inclined plane of unfortunate infants would be handed over to the prosiest and worst of all the teachers with good intentions, whom nobody older would endure. Who, taking his stand on the floor before them as chief executioner, would be attended by a conventional volunteer boy as executioner's assistant. When and where it first became the conventional system that a weary or inattentive infant in a class must have its face smoothed downward with a hot hand, or when and where the conventional volunteer boy first beheld such system in operation, and became inflamed with a sacred zeal to administer it, matters not. It was the function of the chief executioner to hold forth, and it was the function of the acolyte to dart at sleeping infants, yawning infants, restless infants, whimpering infants, and smooth their wretched faces; sometimes with one hand, as if he were anointing them for a whisker; sometimes with both hands, applied after the fashion of blinkers. And so the jumble would be in action in this department for a mortal hour; the exponent drawling on to My Dearrr Childerrener, let us say, for example, about the beautiful coming to the Sepulchre; and repeating the word Sepulchre (commonly used among infants) five hundred times, and never once hinting what it meant; the conventional boy smoothing away right and left, as an infallible commentary; the whole hot-bed of flushed and exhausted infants exchanging measles, rashes, whooping-cough, fever, and stomach disorders, as if they were assembled in High Market for the purpose.

Even in this temple of good intentions, an exceptionally sharp boy exceptionally determined to learn, could learn something, and, having learned it, could impart it much better than the teachers; as being more knowing than they, and not at the disadvantage in which they stood toward the shrewder pupils. In this way it had come about that Charley Hexam had risen in the jumble, taught in the jumble, and been received from the jumble into a better school.

"So you want to go and see your sister, Hexam?"

"If you please, Mr. Headstone."

"I have half a mind to go with you. Where does your sister live?"

"Why, she is not settled yet, Mr. Headstone. I'd rather you didn't see her till she is settled, if it was all the same to you."

"Look here, Hexam." Mr. Bradley Headstone, highly certificated stipendiary schoolmaster, drew his right forefinger through one of the button-holes of the boy's coat, and looked at it attentively. "I hope your sister may be good company for you?"

"Why do you doubt it, Mr. Headstone?"

"I did not say I doubted it."

"No, Sir; you didn't say so."

Bradley Headstone looked at his finger again, took it out of the button-hole and looked at it closer, bit the side of it and looked at it again.

"You see, Hexam, you will be one of us. In good time you are sure to pass a creditable examination and become one of us. Then the question is—"

The boy waited so long for the question, while the schoolmaster looked at a new side of his finger, and bit it, and looked at it again, that at length the boy repeated:

"The question is, Sir—?"

"Whether you had not better leave well alone."

"Is it well to leave my sister alone, Mr. Headstone?"

"I do not say so, because I do not know. I put it to you. I ask you to think of it. I want you to consider. You know how well you are doing here."

"After all, she got me here," said the boy, with a struggle.

"Perceiving the necessity of it," acquiesced the schoolmaster, "and making up her mind fully to the separation. Yes."

The boy, with a return of that former reluctance or struggle or whatever it was, seemed to debate with himself. At length he said, raising his eyes to the master's face:

"I wish you'd come with me and see her, Mr. Headstone, though she is not settled. I wish you'd come with me, and take her in the rough, and judge her for yourself."

"You are sure you would not like," asked the schoolmaster, "to prepare her?"

"My sister Lizzie," said the boy, proudly, "wants no preparing, Mr. Headstone. What she is, she is, and shows herself to be. There's no pretending about my sister."

His confidence in her sat more easily upon him than the indecision with which he had twice contended. It was his better nature to be true to her, if it were his worse nature to be wholly selfish. And as yet the better nature had the stronger hold.

"Well, I can spare the evening," said the schoolmaster. "I am ready to walk with you."

"Thank you, Mr. Headstone. And I am ready to go."

Bradley Headstone, in his decent black coat and waistcoat, and decent white shirt, and decent formal black tie, and decent pantaloons of pepper and salt, with his decent silver watch in his pocket and its decent hair-guard round his neck, looked a thoroughly decent young man of six-and-twenty. He was never seen in any other dress, and yet there was a certain stiffness in his manner of wearing this, as if there were a want of adaptation between him and it, recalling some mechanics in their holiday clothes. He had acquired mechanically a great store of teacher's knowledge. He could do mental arithmetic mechanically, sing at sight mechanically, blow various wind instruments mechanically, even play the great church organ mechanically. From his early childhood up, his mind had been a place of mechanical stowage. The arrangement of his wholesale warehouse, so that it might be always ready to meet the demands of retail dealers—history here, geography there, astronomy to the right, political economy to the left—natural history, the physical sciences, figures, music, the lower mathematics, and what not, all in their several places—this care had imparted to his countenance a look of care; while the habit of questioning and being questioned had given him a suspicious manner, or a manner that would be better described as one of lying in wait. There was a kind of settled trouble in the face. It was the face belonging to a naturally slow or inattentive intellect that had toiled hard to get what it had won, and that had to hold it now that it was gotten. He always seemed to be uneasy lest any thing should be missing from his mental warehouse, and taking stock to assure himself.

Suppression of so much to make room for so much had given him a constrained manner, over and above. Yet there was enough of what was animal, and of what was fiery (though smouldering), still visible in him, to suggest that if young Bradley Headstone, when a pauper lad, had chanced to be told off for the sea, he would not have been the last man in a ship's crew. Regarding that origin of his, he was proud, moody, and sullen, desiring it to be forgotten. And few people knew of it.

In some visits to the Jumble his attention had been attracted to this boy Hexam. An undeniable boy for a pupil-teacher; an undeniable boy to do credit to the master who should bring him on. Combined with this consideration, there may have been some thought of the pauper lad now never to be mentioned. Be that how it might, he had with pains gradually worked the boy into his own school, and procured him some offices to discharge there, which were repaid with food and lodging. Such were the circumstances that had brought together Bradley Headstone and young Charley Hexam that autumn evening. Autumn, because full half a year had come and gone since the bird of prey lay dead upon the river-shore.

The schools—for they were twofold, as the sexes—were down in that district of the flat country tending to the Thames, where Kent and Surrey meet, and where the railways still bestride the market-gardens that will soon die under them. The schools were newly built, and there were so many like them all over the country that one might have thought the whole were but one restless edifice with the locomotive gift of Aladdin's palace. They were in a neighborhood which looked like a toy neighborhood taken in blocks out of a box by a child of particularly incoherent mind, and set up any how; here, one side of a new street; there, a large solitary public house facing nowhere; here, another unfinished street already in ruins; there, a church; here, an immense new warehouse; there, a dilapidated old country villa; then, a medley of black ditch, sparkling cucumber-frame, rank field, richly cultivated kitchen-garden, brick viaduct, arch-spanned canal, and disorder of frowziness and fog. As if the child had given the table a kick, and gone to sleep.

But, even among school-buildings, school-teachers, and school-pupils, all according to pattern and all engendered in the light of the latest Gospel according to Monotony, the older pattern into which so many fortunes have been shaped for good and evil, comes out. It came out in Miss Peecher the schoolmistress, watering her flowers, as Mr. Bradley Headstone walked forth. It came out in Miss Peecher the schoolmistress, watering the flowers in the little dusty bit of garden attached to her small official residence, with little windows like the eyes in needles, and little doors like the covers of school books.

Small, shining, neat, methodical, and buxom was Miss Peecher: cherry-cheeked and tuneful of voice. A little pin-cushion, a little housewife, a little book, a little work-box, a little set of tables and weights and measures, and a little woman, all in one. She could write a little essay on any subject, exactly a slate long, beginning at the left-hand top of one side and ending at the right-hand bottom of the other, and the essay should be strictly according to rule. If Mr. Bradley Headstone had addressed a written proposal of marriage to her, she would probably have replied in a complete little essay on the theme exactly a slate long, but would certainly have replied Yes. For she loved him. The decent hair-guard that went round his neck and took care of his decent silver watch was an object of envy to her. So would Miss Peecher have gone round his neck and taken care of him. Of him, insensible. Because he did not love Miss Peecher.

Miss Peecher's favorite pupil, who assisted her in her little household, was in attendance with a can of water to replenish her little watering-pot, and sufficiently divined the state of Miss Peecher's affections to feel it necessary that she herself should love young Charley Hexam. So there was a double palpitation among the double stocks and double wall-flowers when the master and the boy looked over the little gate.

"A fine evening, Miss Peecher," said the Master.

"A very fine evening, Mr. Headstone," said Miss Peecher. "Are you taking a walk?"

"Hexam and I are going to take a long walk."

"Charming weather," remarked Miss Peecher, "for a long walk."

"Ours is rather on business than mere pleasure," said the Master.

Miss Peecher inverting her watering-pot, and very carefully shaking out the few last drops over a flower, as if there were some special virtue in them which would make it a Jack's bean-stalk before morning, called for replenishment to her pupil, who had been speaking to the boy.

"Good-night, Miss Peecher," said the Master.

"Good-night, Mr. Headstone," said the Mistress.

The pupil had been, in her state of pupillage, so imbued with the class-custom of stretching out an arm, as if to hail a cab or omnibus, whenever she found she had an observation on hand to offer to Miss Peecher, that she often did it in their domestic relations; and she did it now.

"Well, Mary Anne?" said Miss Peecher.

"If you please, ma'am, Hexam said they were going to see his sister."

"But that can't be, I think," returned Miss Peecher: "because Mr. Headstone can have no business with her."

Mary Anne again hailed.

"Well, Mary Anne?"

"If you please, ma'am, perhaps it's Hexam's business?"

"That may be," said Miss Peecher. "I didn't think of that. Not that it matters at all."

Mary Anne again hailed.

"Well, Mary Anne?"

"They say she's very handsome."

"Oh, Mary Anne, Mary Anne!" returned Miss Peecher, slightly coloring and shaking her head, a little out of humor; "how often have I told you not to use that vague expression, not to speak in that general way? When you say they say, what do you mean? Part of speech. They?"

Mary Anne hooked her right arm behind her in her left hand, as being under examination, and replied:

"Personal pronoun."

"Person, They?"

"Third person."

"Number, They?"

"Plural number."

"Then how many do you mean, Mary Anne? Two? Or more?"

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," said Mary Anne, disconcerted now she came to think of it; "but I don't know that I mean more than her brother himself." As she said it, she unhooked her arm.

"I felt convinced of it," returned Miss Peecher, smiling again. "Now pray, Mary Anne, be careful another time. He says is very different from they say, remember. Difference between he says and they say? Give it me,"

Mary Anne immediately hooked her right arm behind her in her left hand—an attitude absolutely necessary to the situation—and replied: "One is indicative mood, present tense, third person singular, verb active to say. Other is indicative mood, present tense, third person plural, verb active to say."

"Why verb active, Mary Anne?"

"Because it takes a pronoun after it in the objective case, Miss Peecher."

"Very good indeed," remarked Miss Peecher, with encouragement. "In fact, could not be better. Don't forget to apply it, another time, Mary Anne." This said, Miss Peecher finished the watering of her flowers, and went into her little official residence, and took a refresher of the principal rivers and mountains of the world, their breadths, depths, and heights, before settling the measurements of the body of a dress for her own personal occupation.

Bradley Headstone and Charley Hexam duly got to the Surrey side of Westminster Bridge, and crossed the bridge, and made along the Middlesex shore toward Millbank. In this region are a certain little street called Church Street, and a certain little blind square, called Smith Square, in the centre of which last retreat is a very hideous church with four towers at the four corners, generally resembling some petrified monster, frightful and gigantic, on its back with its legs in the air. They found a tree near by in a corner, and a blacksmith's forge, and a timber-yard, and a dealer's in old iron. What a rusty portion of a boiler and a great iron wheel or so meant by lying half buried in the dealer's fore-court, nobody seemed to know or to want to know. Like the Miller of questionable jollity in the song, They cared for Nobody, no not they, and Nobody cared for them.

After making the round of this place, and noting that there was a deadly kind of repose on it, more as though it had taken laudanum than fallen into a natural rest, they stopped at the point where the street and the square joined, and where there were some little quiet houses in a row. To these Charley Hexam finally led the way, and at one of these stopped.

"This must be where my sister lives, Sir. This is where she came for a temporary lodging soon after father's death."

"How often have you seen her since?"

"Why, only twice, Sir," returned the boy, with his former reluctance; "but that's as much her doing as mine."

"How does she support herself?"

"She was always a fair needle-woman, and she keeps the stock-room of a seaman's outfitter."

"Does she ever work at her own lodging here?"

"Sometimes; but her regular hours and regular occupation are at their place of business, I believe, Sir. This is the number."

The boy knocked at a door, and the door promptly opened with a spring and a click. A parlor door within a small entry stood open, and disclosed a child—a dwarf—a girl—a something—sitting on a little low old-fashioned arm-chair, which had a kind of little working bench before it.

"I can't get up," said the child, "because my back's bad, and my legs are queer. But I'm the person of the house."

"Who else is at home?" asked Charley Hexam, staring.

"Nobody's at home at present," returned the child, with a glib assertion of her dignity, "except the person of the house. What did you want, young man?"

"I wanted to see my sister."

"Many young men have sisters," returned the child. "Give me your name, young man."

The queer little figure, and the queer but not ugly little face, with its bright gray eyes, were so sharp, that the sharpness of the manner seemed unavoidable. As if, being turned out of that mould, it must be sharp.

"Hexam is my name."

"Ah, indeed?" said the person of the house. "I thought it might be. Your sister will be in in about a quarter of an hour. I am very fond of your sister. She's my particular friend. Take a seat. And this gentleman's name?"

"Mr. Headstone, my schoolmaster."

"Take a seat. And would you please to shut the street door first? I can't very well do it myself, because my back's so bad, and my legs are so queer."

They complied in silence, and the little figure went on with its work of gumming or gluing together with a camel's-hair brush certain pieces of card-board and thin wood, previously cut into various shapes. The scissors and knives upon the bench showed that the child herself had cut them; and the bright scraps of velvet and silk and ribbon also strewn upon the bench showed that when duly stuffed (and stuffing too was there), she was to cover them smartly. The dexterity of her nimble fingers was remarkable, and, as she brought two thin edges accurately together by giving them a little bite, she would glance at the visitors out of the corners of her gray eyes with a look that out-sharpened all her other sharpness.

"You can't tell me the name of my trade, I'll be bound," she said, after taking several of these observations.

"You make pin-cushions," said Charley.

"What else do I make?"

"Pen-wipers," said Bradley Headstone.

"Ha! ha! What else do I make? You're a schoolmaster, but you can't tell me."

"You do something," he returned, pointing to a corner of the little bench, "with straw; but I don't know what."

"Well done you!" cried the person of the house. "I only make pin-cushions and pen-wipers to use up my waste. But my straw really does belong to my business. Try again. What do I make with my straw?"

"Dinner-mats?"

"A schoolmaster, and says dinner-mats! I'll give you a clew to my trade, in a game of forfeits. I love my love with a B because she's Beautiful; I hate my love with a B because she is Brazen; I took her to the sign of the Blue Boar, and I treated her with Bonnets; her name's Bouncer, and she lives in Bedlam.—Now, what do I make with my straw?"

"Ladies' bonnets?"

"Fine ladies'," said the person of the house, nodding assent. "Dolls'. I'm a Doll's Dress-maker."

"I hope it's a good business?"

The person of the house shrugged her shoulders and shook her head. "No. Poorly paid. And I'm often so pressed for time! I had a doll married, last week, and was obliged to work all night. And it's not good for me, on account of my back being so bad and my legs so queer."

They looked at the little creature with a wonder that did not diminish, and the schoolmaster said: "I am sorry your fine ladies are so inconsiderate."

"It's the way with them," said the person of the house, shrugging her shoulders again. "And they take no care of their clothes, and they never keep to the same fashions a month. I work for a doll with three daughters. Bless you, she's enough to ruin her husband!"

The person of the house gave a weird little laugh here, and gave them another look out of the corners of her eyes. She had an elfin chin that was capable of great expression; and whenever she gave this look she hitched this chin up. As if her eyes and her chin worked together on the same wires.

"Are you always as busy as you are now?"

"Busier. I'm slack just now. I finished a large mourning order the day before yesterday. Doll I work for lost a canary-bird." The person of the house gave another little laugh, and then nodded her head several times, as who should moralize, "Oh this world, this world!"

"Are you alone all day?" asked Bradley Headstone. "Don't any of the neighboring children—?"

"Ah, lud!" cried the person of the house, with a little scream, as if the word had pricked her. "Don't talk of children. I can't bear children. I know their tricks and their manners." She said this with an angry little shake of her right fist close before her eyes.

Perhaps it scarcely required the teacher-habit to perceive that the doll's dress-maker was inclined to be bitter on the difference between herself and other children. But both master and pupil understood it so.

"Always running about and screeching, always playing and fighting, always skip-skip-skiping on the pavement and chalking it for their games! Oh! I know their tricks and their manners!" Shaking the little fist as before. "And that's not all. Ever so often calling names in through a person's keyhole, and imitating a person's back and legs. Oh! I know their tricks and their manners. And I'll tell you what I'd do to punish 'em. There's doors under the church in the Square—black doors, leading into black vaults. Well! I'd open one of those doors, and I'd cram 'em all in, and then I'd lock the door and through the keyhole I'd blow in pepper."

"What would be the good of blowing in pepper?" asked Charley Hexam.

"To set 'em sneezing," said the person of the house, "and make their eyes water. And when they were all sneezing and inflamed, I'd mock 'em through the keyhole. Just as they, with their tricks and their manners, mock a person through a person's keyhole!"

An uncommonly emphatic shake of her little fist close before her eyes seemed to ease the mind of the person of the house; for she added with recovered composure, "No, no, no. No children for me. Give me grown-ups."

It was difficult to guess the age of this strange creature, for her poor figure furnished no clew to it, and her face was at once so young and so old. Twelve, or at the most thirteen, might be near the mark.

"I always did like grown-ups," she went on, "and always kept company with them. So sensible. Sit so quiet. Don't go prancing and capering about! And I mean always to keep among none but grown-ups till I marry. I suppose I must make up my mind to marry one of these days."

She listened to a step outside that caught her ear, and there was a soft knock at the door. Pulling at a handle within her reach, she said, with a pleased laugh: "Now here, for instance, is a grown-up that's my particular friend!" and Lizzie Hexam in a black dress entered the room.

"Charley! You!"

Taking him to her arms in the old way—of which he seemed a little ashamed—she saw no one else.

"There, there, there, Liz, all right my dear. See! Here's Mr. Headstone come with me."

Her eyes met those of the schoolmaster, who had evidently expected to see a very different sort of person, and a murmured word or two of salutation passed between them. She was a little flurried by the unexpected visit, and the schoolmaster was not at his ease. But he never was, quite.

"I told Mr. Headstone you were not settled, Liz, but he was so kind as to take an interest in coming, and so I brought him. How well you look!"

Bradley seemed to think so.

"Ah! Don't she, don't she?" cried the person of the house, resuming her occupation, though the twilight was falling fast. "I believe you she does! But go on with your chat, one and all:

'You one two three,
My com-pa-nie,
And don't mind me,'"

—pointing this impromptu rhyme with three points of her thin forefinger.

"I didn't expect a visit from you, Charley," said his sister. "I supposed that if you wanted to see me you would have sent to me, appointing me to come somewhere near the school, as I did last time. I saw my brother near the school, Sir," to Bradley Headstone, "because it's easier for me to go there than for him to come here. I work about midway between the two places."

"You don't see much of one another," said Bradley, not improving in respect of ease.

"No." With a rather sad shake of her head. "Charley always does well, Mr. Headstone?"

"He could not do better. I regard his course as quite plain before him."

"I hoped so. I am so thankful. So well done of you, Charley dear! It is better for me not to come (except when he wants me) between him and his prospects. You think so, Mr. Headstone?"

Conscious that his pupil-teacher was looking for his answer, and that he himself had suggested the boy's keeping aloof from this sister, now seen for the first time face to face, Bradley Headstone stammered:

"Your brother is very much occupied, you know. He has to work hard. One can not but say that the less his attention is diverted from his work the better for his future. When he shall have established himself, why then—it will be another thing then."

Lizzie shook her head again, and returned with a quiet smile: "I always advised him as you advise him. Did I not, Charley?"

"Well, never mind that now," said the boy. "How are you getting on?"

"Very well, Charley. I want for nothing."

"You have your own room here?"

"Oh yes. Up stairs. And it's quiet, and pleasant, and airy."

"And she always has the use of this room for visitors," said the person of the house, screwing up one of her little bony fists, like an opera-glass, and looking through it, with her eyes and her chin in that quaint accordance. "Always this room for visitors; haven't you, Lizzie dear?"

It happened that Bradley Headstone noticed a very slight action of Lizzie Hexam's hand, as though it checked the doll's dress-maker. And it happened that the latter noticed him in the same instant; for she made a double eye-glass of her two hands, looked at him through it, and cried, with a waggish shake of her head: "Aha! Caught you spying, did I?"

It might have fallen out so, any way; but Bradley Headstone also noticed that immediately after this, Lizzie, who had not taken off her bonnet, rather hurriedly proposed that as the room was getting dark they should go out into the air. They went out; the visitors saying good-night to the doll's dress-maker, whom they left leaning back in her chair with her arms crossed, singing to herself in a sweet thoughtful little voice.

"I'll saunter on by the river," said Bradley. "You will be glad to talk together."

As his uneasy figure went on before them among the evening shadows the boy said to his sister, petulantly:

"When are you going to settle yourself in some Christian sort of place, Liz? I thought you were going to do it before now."

"I am very well where I am, Charley."

"Very well where you are! I am ashamed to have brought Mr. Headstone with me. How came you to get into such company as that little witch's?"

"By chance at first, as it seemed, Charley. But I think it must have been by something more than chance, for that child— You remember the bills upon the walls at home?"

"Confound the bills upon the walls at home! I want to forget the bills upon the walls at home, and it would be better for you to do the same," grumbled the boy. "Well; what of them?"

"This child is the grandchild of the old man."

"What old man?"

"The terrible drunken old man in the list slippers and the night-cap."

The boy asked, rubbing his nose in a manner that half expressed vexation at hearing so much, and half curiosity to hear more: "How came you to make that out? What a girl you are!"

"The child's father is employed by the house that employs me; that's how I came to know it, Charley. The father is like his own father, a weak wretched trembling creature, falling to pieces, never sober. But a good workman too, at the work he does. The mother is dead. This poor ailing little creature has come to be what she is, surrounded by drunken people from her cradle—if she ever had one, Charley."

"I don't see what you have to do with her, for all that," said the boy.

"Don't you, Charley?"

The boy looked doggedly at the river. They were at Millbank, and the river rolled on their left. His sister gently touched him on the shoulder, and pointed to it.

"Any compensation—restitution—never mind the word, you know my meaning. Father's grave."

But he did not respond with any tenderness. After a moody silence he broke out in an ill-used tone:

"It'll be a very hard thing, Liz, if, when I am trying my best to get up in the world, you pull me back."

"I, Charley?"

"Yes, you, Liz. Why can't you let by-gones be by-gones? Why can't you, as Mr. Headstone said to me this very evening about another matter, leave well alone? What we have got to do, is, to turn our faces full in our new direction, and keep straight on."

"And never look back? Not even to try to make some amends?"

"You are such a dreamer," said the boy, with his former petulance. "It was all very well when we sat before the fire—when we looked into the hollow down by the flare—but we are looking into the real world now."

"Ah, we were looking into the real world then, Charley!"

"I understand what you mean by that, but you are not justified in it. I don't want, as I raise myself, to shake you off, Liz. I want to carry you up with me. That's what I want to do, and mean to do. I know what I owe you. I said to Mr. Headstone this very evening, 'After all, my sister got me here.' Well, then. Don't pull me back, and hold me down. That's all I ask, and surely that's not unconscionable."

She had kept a steadfast look upon him, and she answered with composure:

"I am not here selfishly, Charley. To please myself, I could not be too far from that river."

"Nor could you be too far from it to please me. Let us get quit of it equally. Why should you linger about it any more than I? I give it a wide berth."

"I can't get away from it, I think," said Lizzie, passing her hand across her forehead. "It's no purpose of mine that I live by it still."

"There you go, Liz! Dreaming again! You lodge yourself of your own accord in a house with a drunken—tailor, I suppose—or something of the sort, and a little crooked antic of a child, or old person, or whatever it is, and then you talk as if you were drawn or driven there. Now, do be more practical."

She had been practical enough with him, in suffering and striving for him; but she only laid her hand upon his shoulder—not reproachfully—and tapped it twice or thrice. She had been used to do so, to soothe him when she carried him about, a child as heavy as herself. Tears started to his eyes.

"Upon my word, Liz," drawing the back of his hand across them, "I mean to be a good brother to you, and to prove that I know what I owe you. All I say is, that I hope you'll control your fancies a little, on my account. I'll get a school, and then you must come and live with me, and you'll have to control your fancies then, so why not now? Now, say I haven't vexed you."

"You haven't, Charley, you haven't."

"And say I haven't hurt you."

"You haven't, Charley." But this answer was less ready.

"Say you are sure I didn't mean to. Come! There's Mr. Headstone stopping, and looking over the wall at the tide, to hint that it's time to go. Kiss me, and tell me that you know I didn't mean to hurt you."

She told him so, and they embraced, and walked on and came up with the schoolmaster.

"But we go your sister's way," he remarked, when the boy told him he was ready. And with his cumbrous and uneasy action he stiffly offered her his arm. Her hand was just within it when she drew it back. He looked round with a start, as if he thought she had detected something that repelled her in the momentary touch.

"I will not go in just yet," said Lizzie. "And you have a distance before you, and will walk faster without me."

Being by this time close to Vauxhall Bridge, they resolved, in consequence, to take that way over the Thames, and they left her; Bradley Headstone giving her his hand at parting, and she thanking him for his care of her brother.

The master and the pupil walked on rapidly and silently. They had nearly crossed the bridge when a gentleman came coolly sauntering toward them, with a cigar in his mouth, his coat thrown back, and his hands behind him. Something in the careless manner of this person, and in a certain lazily arrogant air with which he approached, holding possession of twice as much pavement as another would have claimed, instantly caught the boy's attention. As the gentleman passed, the boy looked at him narrowly, and then stood still, looking after him.

"Who is it that you stare after?" asked Bradley.

"Why!" said the boy, with a confused and pondering frown upon his face, "It is that Wrayburn one!"

Bradley Headstone scrutinized the boy as closely as the boy had scrutinized the gentleman.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Headstone, but I couldn't help wondering what in the world brought him here!"

Though he said it as if his wonder were past—at the same time resuming the walk—it was not lost upon the master that he looked over his shoulder after speaking, and that the same perplexed and pondering frown was heavy on his face.

"You don't appear to like your friend, Hexam?"

"I DON'T like him," said the boy.

"Why not?"

"He took hold of me by the chin in a precious impertinent way the first time I ever saw him," said the boy.

"Again, why?"

"For nothing. Or—it's much the same—because something I happened to say about my sister didn't happen to please him."

"Then he knows your sister?"

"He didn't at that time," said the boy, still moodily pondering.

"Does now?"

The boy had so lost himself that he looked at Mr. Bradley Headstone as they walked on side by side, without attempting to reply until the question had been repeated; then he nodded and answered, "Yes, Sir."

"Going to see her, I dare say."

"It can't be!" said the boy, quickly. "He doesn't know her well enough. I should like to catch him at it!"

When they had walked on for a time, more rapidly than before, the master said, clasping the pupil's arm between the elbow and the shoulder with his hand:

"You were going to tell me something about that person. What did you say his name was?"

"Wrayburn. Mr. Eugene Wrayburn. He is what they call a barrister, with nothing to do. The first time he came to our old place was when my father was alive. He came on business; not that it was his business—he never had any business—he was brought by a friend of his."

"And the other times?"

"There was only one other time that I know of. When my father was killed by accident, he chanced to be one of the finders. He was mooning about, I suppose, taking liberties with people's chins; but there he was, somehow. He brought the news home to my sister early in the morning, and brought Miss Abbey Potterson, a neighbor, to help break it to her. He was mooning about the house when I was fetched home in the afternoon—they didn't know where to find me till my sister could be brought round sufficiently to tell them—and then he mooned away."

"And is that all?"

"That's all, Sir."

Bradley Headstone gradually released the boy's arm, as if he were thoughtful, and they walked on side by side as before. After a long silence between them, Bradley resumed the talk.

"I suppose—your sister—" with a curious break both before and after the words, "has received hardly any teaching, Hexam?"

"Hardly any, Sir."

"Sacrificed, no doubt, to her father's objections. I remember them in your case. Yet—your sister—scarcely looks or speaks like an ignorant person."

"Lizzie has as much thought as the best, Mr. Headstone. Too much, perhaps, without teaching. I used to call the fire at home her books, for she was always full of fancies—sometimes quite wise fancies, considering—when she sat looking at it."

"I don't like that," said Bradley Headstone.

His pupil was a little surprised by this striking in with so sudden and decided and emotional an objection, but took it as a proof of the master's interest in himself. It emboldened him to say:

"I have never brought myself to mention it openly to you, Mr. Headstone, and you're my witness that I couldn't even make up my mind to take it from you before we came out to-night; but it's a painful thing to think that if I get on as well as you hope, I shall be—I won't say disgraced, because I don't mean disgraced—but—rather put to the blush if it was known—by a sister who has been very good to me."

"Yes," said Bradley Headstone in a slurring way, for his mind scarcely seemed to touch that point, so smoothly did it glide to another, "and there is this possibility to consider. Some man who had worked his way might come to admire—your sister—and might even in time bring himself to think of marrying—your sister—and it would be a sad drawback and a heavy penalty upon him, if, overcoming in his mind other inequalities of condition and other considerations against it, this inequality and this consideration remained in full force.”

“That’s much my own meaning, Sir.”

“Ay, ay,” said Bradley Headstone, “but you spoke of a mere brother. Now the case I have supposed would be a much stronger case; because an admirer, a husband, would form the connection voluntarily, besides being obliged to proclaim it: which a brother is not. After all, you know, it must be said of you that you couldn’t help yourself: while it would be said of him, with equal reason, that he could.”

“That’s true, Sir. Sometimes since Lizzie was left free by father’s death, I have thought that such a young woman might soon acquire more than enough to pass muster. And sometimes I have even thought that perhaps Miss Peecher—”

“For the purpose, I would advise NOT Miss Peecher,” Bradley Headstone struck in with a recurrence of his late decision of manner.

“Would you be so kind as to think of it for me, Mr. Headstone?”

“Yes, Hexam, yes. I’ll think of it. I’ll think maturely of it. I’ll think well of it.”

Their walk was almost a silent one afterward until it ended at the school-house. There one of neat Miss Peecher’s little windows, like the eyes in needles, was illuminated, and in a corner near it sat Mary Anne watching, while Miss Peecher at the table stitched at the neat little body she was making up by brown paper pattern for her own wearing. N.B. Miss Peecher and Miss Peecher’s pupils were not much encouraged in the unscholastic art of needle-work by Government.

Mary Anne with her face to the window held her arm up.

“Well, Mary Anne?”

“Mr. Headstone coming home, ma’am.”

In about a minute, Mary Anne again hailed.

“Yes, Mary Anne?”

“Gone in and locked his door, ma’am.”

Miss Peecher repressed a sigh as she gathered her work together for bed, and transfixed that part of her dress where her heart would have been if she had had the dress on with a sharp, sharp needle.

back. The person of the house had attained that dignity while yet of very tender years indeed through being the only trust-worthy person in the house.

“Well Lizzie-Mizzie-Wizzie,” said she, breaking off in her song. “What’s the news out of doors?”

“What’s the news in doors?” returned Lizzie, playfully smoothing the bright long fair hair which grew very luxuriant and beautiful on the head of the doll’s dress-maker.

“Let me see, said the blind man. Why the last news is, that I don’t mean to marry your brother.”

“No?”

“No-o,” shaking her head and her chin.

“Don’t like the boy.”

“What do you say to his master?”

“I say that I think he’s bespoke.”

Lizzie finished putting the hair carefully back over the misshapen shoulders and then lighted a candle. It showed the little parlor to be dingy, but orderly and clean. She stood it on the mantle-shelf, remote from the dress-maker’s eyes, and then put the room-door open, and the house-door open, and turned the little low chair and its occupant toward the outer air. It was a sultry night, and this was a fine-weather arrangement when the day’s work was done. To complete it, she seated herself in a chair by the side of the little chair, and protectingly drew under her arm the spare hand that crept up to her.

“This is what your loving Jenny Wren calls the best time in the day and night,” said the person of the house. Her real name was Fanny Cleaver; but she had long ago chosen to bestow upon herself the appellation of Miss Jenny Wren.

“I have been thinking,” Jenny went on, “as I sat at work to-day, what a thing it would be if I should be able to have your company till I am married, or at least courted. Because when I am courted, I shall make Him do some of the things that you do for me. He couldn’t brush my hair like you do, or help me up and down stairs like you do; but he could take my work home, and he could call for orders in his clumsy way. And he shall too. I’ll trot him about, I can tell him!”

Jenny Wren had her personal vanities—happily for her—and no intentions were stronger in her breast than the various trials and torments that were, in the fullness of time, to be inflicted upon “him.”

“Wherever he may happen to be just at present, or whoever he may happen to be,” said Miss Wren, “I know his tricks and his manners, and I give him warning to look out.”

“Don’t you think you are rather hard upon him?” asked her friend, smiling, and smoothing her hair.

“Not a bit,” replied the sage Miss Wren, with an air of vast experience. “My dear, they don’t care for you, those fellows, if you’re not hard upon ’em. But I was saying If I should STILL EDUCATIONAL.

THE person of the house, doll’s dress-maker and manufacturer of ornamental pin-cushions and pen-wipers, sat in her quaint little low arm-chair, singing in the dark, until Lizzie came be able to have your company. Ah! What a large If! Ain't it?"

"I have no intention of parting company, Jenny."

"Don't say that, or you'll go directly."

"Am I so little to be relied upon?"

"You're more to be relied upon than silver and gold." As she said it Miss Wren suddenly broke off, screwed up her eyes and her chin, and looked prodigiously knowing. "Aha!

"Who comes here?"

"A Grenadier."

"What does he want?"

"A pot of beer."

And nothing else in the world, my dear!"

A man's figure paused on the pavement at the outer door. "Mr. Eugene Wrayburn, ain't it?" said Miss Wren.

"So I am told," was the answer.

"You may come in, if you're good."

"I am not good," said Eugene, "but I'll come in."

He gave his hand to Jenny Wren, and he gave his hand to Lizzie, and he stood leaning by the door at Lizzie's side. He had been strolling with his cigar, he said (it was smoked out and gone by this time), and he had strolled round to return in that direction that he might look in as he passed. Had she not seen her brother to-night?

"Yes," said Lizzie, whose manner was a little troubled.

Gracious condescension on our brother's part! Mr. Eugene Wrayburn thought he had passed my young gentleman on the bridge yonder. Who was his friend with him?

"The schoolmaster."

"To be sure. Looked like it."

Lizzie sat so still that one could not have said wherein the fact of her manner being troubled was expressed; and yet one could not have doubted it. Eugene was as easy as ever; but perhaps, as she sat with her eyes cast down, it might have been rather more perceptible that his attention was concentrated upon her for certain moments, than its concentration upon any subject for any short time ever was elsewhere.

"I have nothing to report, Lizzie," said Eugene. "But, having promised you that an eye should be always kept on Mr. Riderhood through my friend Lightwood, I like occasionally to renew my assurance that I keep my promise, and keep my friend up to the mark."

"I should not have doubted it, Sir."

"Generally, I confess myself a man to be doubted," returned Eugene, coolly, "for all that."

"Why are you?" asked the sharp Miss Wren.

"Because, my dear," said the airy Eugene, "I am a bad idle dog."

"Then why don't you reform and be a good dog?" inquired Miss Wren.

"Because, my dear," returned Eugene, "there's nobody who makes it worth my while. Have you considered my suggestion, Lizzie?"

This in a lower voice, but only as if it were a graver matter; not at all to the exclusion of the person of the house.

"I have thought of it, Mr. Wrayburn, but I have not been able to make up my mind to accept it."

"False pride!" said Eugene.

"I think not, Mr. Wrayburn. I hope not."

"False pride!" repeated Eugene. "Why, what else is it? The thing is worth nothing in itself. The thing is worth nothing to me. What can it be worth to me? You know the most I make of it. I propose to be of some use to somebody—which I never was in this world, and never shall be on any other occasion—by paying some qualified person of your own sex and age so many (or rather so few) contemptible shillings to come here certain nights in the week, and give you certain instructions which you wouldn't want if you hadn't been a self-denying daughter and sister. You know that it's good to have it, or you would never have so devoted yourself to your brother's having it. Then why not have it: especially when our friend Miss Jenny here would profit by it too? If I proposed to be the teacher, or to attend the lessons—obviously incongruous!—but as to that, I might as well be on the other side of the globe, or not on the globe at all. False pride, Lizzie. Because true pride wouldn't shame, or be shamed by, your thankless brother. True pride wouldn't have schoolmasters brought here, like doctors, to look at a bad case. True pride would go to work and do it. You know that well enough, for you know that your own true pride would do it to-morrow if you had the ways and means, which false pride won't let me supply. Very well. I add no more than this. Your false pride does wrong to yourself, and does wrong to your dead father."

"How to my father, Mr. Wrayburn?" she asked, with an anxious face.

"How to your father? Can you ask! By perpetuating the consequences of his ignorant and blind obstinacy. By resolving not to set right the wrong he did you. By determining that the deprivation to which he condemned you, and which he forced upon you, shall always rest upon his head."

It chanced to be a subtle string to sound, in her who had so spoken to her brother within the hour. It sounded far more forcibly, because of the change in the speaker for the moment; the passing appearance of earnestness, complete conviction, injured resentment of suspicion, generous and unselfish interest. All these qualities, in him usually so light and careless, she felt to be inseparable from some touch of their opposites in her own breast. She thought, had she, so far below him and so different, rejected this disinterestedness because of some vain misgiving that he sought her out, or heeded any personal attractions that he might descry in her? The poor girl, pure of heart and purpose, could not bear to think it. Sinking before her own eyes as she suspected herself of it, she drooped her head as though she had done him some wicked and grievous injury, and broke into silent tears.

"Don't be distressed," said Eugene, very, very kindly. "I hope it is not I who have distressed you. I meant no more than to put the matter in its true light before you; though I acknowledge I did it selfishly enough, for I am disappointed."

Disappointed of doing her a service. How else could he be disappointed?

"It won't break my heart," laughed Eugene; "it won't stay by me eight-and-forty hours; but I am genuinely disappointed. I had set my fancy on doing this little thing for you and for our friend Miss Jenny. The novelty of my doing any thing in the least useful had its charms.

I see now that I might have managed it better. I might have affected to do it wholly for our friend Miss J. I might have got myself up, morally, as Sir Eugene Bountiful. But upon my soul I can't make flourishes, and I would rather be disappointed than try."

If he meant to follow home what was in Lizzie's thoughts, it was skillfully done. If he followed it by mere fortuitous coincidence, it was done by an evil chance.

"It opened out so naturally before me," said Eugene. "The ball seemed so thrown into my hands by accident! I happen to be originally brought into contact with you, Lizzie, on those two occasions that you know of. I happen to be able to promise you that a watch shall be kept upon that false accuser, Riderhood. I happen to be able to give you some little consolation in the darkest hour of your distress, by assuring you that I don't believe him. On the same occasion I tell you that I am the idlest and least of lawyers, but that I am better than none, in a case I have noted down with my own hand, and that you may be always sure of my best help, and incidentally of Lightwood's too, in your efforts to clear your father. So it gradually takes my fancy that I may help you—so easily!—to clear your father of that other blame which I mentioned a few minutes ago, and which is a just and real one. I hope I have explained myself, for I am heartily sorry to have distressed you. I hate to claim to mean well, but I really did mean honestly and simply well, and I want you to know it."

"I have never doubted that, Mr. Wrayburn," said Lizzie; the more repentant the less he claimed.

"I am very glad to hear it. Though if you had quite understood my whole meaning at first, I think you would not have refused. Do you think you would?"

"I—I don't know that I should, Mr. Wrayburn."

"Well! Then why refuse now you do understand it?"

"It's not easy for me to talk to you," returned Lizzie, in some confusion, "for you see all the consequences of what I say as soon as I say it."

"Take all the consequences," laughed Eugene, "and take away my disappointment. Lizzie Hexam, as I truly respect you, and as I ridiculous than before, it would have been his so displaying himself.

"Here's but seven and eight-pence half-penny!" exclaimed Miss Wren, after reducing the heap to order. "Oh, you prodigal old son! Now you shall be starved."

"No, don't starve me," he urged, whimpering.

"If you were treated as you ought to be," said Miss Wren, "you'd be fed upon the skewers of cats' meat;—only the skewers, after the cats had had the meat. As it is, go to bed."

When he stumbled out of the corner to comply, he again put out both his hands, and pleaded: "Circumstances over which no control—"

"Get along with you to bed!" cried Miss Wren, snapping him up. "Don't speak to me. I'm not going to forgive you. Go to bed this moment!"

Seeing another emphatic "What" upon its way, he evaded it by complying, and was heard to shuffle heavily up stairs, and shut his door, and throw himself on his bed. Within a little while afterward Lizzie came down.

"Shall we have our supper, Jenny dear?"

"Ah! bless us and save us, we need have something to keep us going," returned Miss Jenny, shrugging her shoulders.

Lizzie laid a cloth upon the little bench (more handy for the person of the house than an ordinary table), and put upon it such plain fare as they were accustomed to have, and drew up a stool for herself.

"Now for supper! What are you thinking of, Jenny darling?"

"I was thinking," she returned, coming out of a deep study, "what I would do to Him, if he should turn out a drunkard."

"Oh, but he won't," said Lizzie. "You'll take care of that, beforehand."

"I shall try to take care of it beforehand, but he might deceive me. Oh, my dear, all those fellows with their tricks and their manners do deceive!" With the little fist in full action. "And if so, I tell you what I think I'd do. When he was asleep, I'd take a spoon red-hot, and I'd have some boiling liquor bubbling in a sauce-pan, and I'd take it out hissing, and I'd open his mouth with the other hand—or perhaps he'd sleep with his mouth ready open—and I'd pour it down his throat, and blister it and choke him."

"I am sure you would do no such horrible thing," said Lizzie.

"Shouldn't I? Well; perhaps I shouldn't. But I should like to!"

"I am equally sure you would not."

"Not even like to? Well, you generally know best. Only you haven't always lived among it as I have lived—and your back isn't bad and your legs are not queer."

As they went on with their supper Lizzie tried to bring her round to that prettier and better state. But the charm was broken. The person of the house was the person of a house full of sordid shames and cares, with an upper room in which that abased figure was infecting even innocent sleep with sensual brutality and degradation. The doll's dress-maker had become a little quaint shrew; of the world, worldly; of the earth, earthy.

Poor doll's dress-maker! How often so dragged down by hands that should have raised her up; how often so misdirected when losing her way on the eternal road, and asking guidance. Poor, poor little doll's dress-maker!

CHAPTER III.

A PIECE OF WORK.

BRITANNIA, sitting meditating one fine day (perhaps in the attitude in which she is presented on the copper coinage), discovers all of a sudden that she wants Veneering in Parliament. It occurs to her that Veneering is "a representative man"—which can not in these times be doubted—and that Her Majesty's faithful Commons are incomplete without him. So, Britannia mentions to a legal gentleman of her acquaintance that if Veneering will "put down" five thousand pounds, he may write a couple of initial letters after his name at the extremely cheap rate of two thousand five hundred per letter. It is clearly understood between Britannia and the legal gentleman that nobody is to take up the five thousand pounds, but that being put down they will disappear by magical conjuration and enchantment.

The legal gentleman in Britannia's confidence going straight from that lady to Veneering, thus commissioned, Veneering declares himself highly flattered, but requires breathing-time to ascertain "whether his friends will rally round him." Above all things, he says, it behooves him to be clear, at a crisis of his importance, "whether his friends will rally round him." The legal gentleman, in the interests of his client can not allow much time for this purpose, as the lady rather thinks she knows somebody prepared to put down six thousand pounds; but he says he will give Veneering four hours.

Veneering then says to Mrs. Veneering, "We must work," and throws himself into a Hansom cab. Mrs. Veneering in the same moment relinquishes baby to Nurse; presses her aquiline hands upon her brow, to arrange the throbbing intellect within; orders out the carriage; and repeats in a distracted and devoted manner, compounded of Ophelia and any self-immolating female of antiquity you may prefer, "We must work."

Veneering having instructed his driver to charge at the Public in the streets, like the Life-Guards at Waterloo, is driven furiously to Duke Street, Saint James's. There, he finds Twemlow in his lodgings, fresh from the hands of a secret artist who has been doing something to his hair with yolks of eggs. The process requiring that Twemlow shall, for two hours after the application, allow his hair to stick upright and dry gradually, he is in an appropriate state for the receipt of startling intelligence; looking equally like the Monument on Fisk Street Hill, and King Priam on a certain incendiary occasion not wholly unknown as a neat point from the classics.

"My dear Twemlow," says Veneering, grasping both his hands, "as the dearest and oldest of my friends—"

("Then there can be no more doubt about it in future," thinks Twemlow, "and I AM!")

"—Are you of opinion that your cousin, Lord Snigsworth, would give his name as a Member of my Committee? I don't go so far as to ask for his lordship; I only ask for his name. Do you think he would give me his name?"

In sudden low spirits, Twemlow replies, "I don't think he would."

"My political opinions," says Veneering, not previously aware of having any, "are identical with those of Lord Snigsworth, and perhaps as a matter of public feeling and public principle Lord Snigsworth would give me his name."

"It might be so," says Twemlow; "but—" And perplexedly scratching his head, forgetful of the yolks of eggs, is the more discomfited by being reminded how sticky he is.

"Between such old and intimate friends as ourselves," pursues Veneering, "there should in such a case be no reserve. Promise me that if I ask you to do any thing for me which you don't like to do, or feel the slightest difficulty in doing, you will freely tell me so."

This Twemlow is so kind as to promise, with every appearance of most heartily intending to keep his word.

"Would you have any objection to write down to Snigsworthy Park, and ask this favor of Lord Snigsworth? Of course if it were granted I should know that I owed it solely to you; while at the same time you would put it to Lord Snigsworth entirely upon public grounds. Would you have any objection?"

Says Twemlow, with his hand to his forehead, "You have exacted a promise from me."

"I have, my dear Twemlow."

"And you expect me to keep it honorably."

"I do, my dear Twemlow."

"On the whole, then;—observe me," urges Twemlow, with great nicety, as if, in the case of its having been off the whole, he would have done it directly—"on the whole, I must beg you to excuse me from addressing any communication to Lord Snigsworth."

"Bless you, bless you!" says Veneering; horribly disappointed, but grasping him by both hands again, in a particularly fervent manner.

It is not to be wondered at that poor Twemlow should decline to inflict a letter on his noble cousin (who has gout in the temper), inasmuch as his noble cousin, who allows him a small annuity on which he lives, takes it out of him, as the phrase goes, in extreme severity; putting him, when he visits at Snigsworthy Park, under a kind of martial law; ordaining that he shall hang his hat on a particular peg, sit on a particular chair, talk on particular subjects to particular people, and perform particular exercises: such as sounding the praises of the Family Varnish (not to say Pictures), and abstaining from the choicest of the Family Wines unless expressly invited to partake.

"One thing, however, I can do for you," says Twemlow; "and that is, work for you."

Veneering blesses him again.

"I'll go," says Twemlow, in a rising hurry of spirits, "to the club;—let us see now; what o'clock is it?"

"Twenty minutes to eleven."

"I'll be," says Twemlow, "at the club by ten minutes to twelve, and I'll never leave it all day."

Veneering feels that his friends are rallying round him, and says, "Thank you, thank you. I knew I could rely upon you. I said to Anastatia before leaving home just now to come to you—of course the first friend I have seen on a subject so momentous to me, my dear Twemlow—I said to Anastatia, 'We must work.'"

"You were right, you were right," replies Twemlow. "Tell me. Is she working?"

"She is," says Veneering.

"Good!" cries Twemlow, polite little gentleman that he is. "A woman's tact is invaluable. To have the dear sex with us is to have every thing with us."

"But you have not imparted to me," remarks Veneering, "what you think of my entering the House of Commons?"

"I think," rejoins Twemlow, feelingly, "that it is the best club in London."

Veneering again blesses him, plunges down stairs, rushes into his Hansom, and directs the driver to be up and at the British Public, and to charge into the City.

Meanwhile Twemlow, in an increasing hurry of spirits, gets his hair down as well as he can—which is not very well; for, after these glutinous applications it is restive, and has a surface on it somewhat in the nature of pastry—and gets to the club by the appointed time. At the club he promptly secures a large window, writing materials, and all the newspapers, and establishes himself, immovable, to be respectfully contemplated by Pall Mall. Sometimes, when a man enters who nods to him, Twemlow says, "Do you know Veneering?" Man says, "No; member of the club?" Twemlow says, "Yes. Coming in for Pocket-Breaches." Man says, "Ah! Hope he may find it worth the money!" yawns, and saunters out. Toward six o'clock of the afternoon Twemlow begins to persuade himself that he is positively jaded with work, and thinks it much to be regretted that he was not brought up as a Parliamentary agent.

From Twemlow's, Veneering dashes at Podsnap's place of business. Finds Podsnap reading the paper, standing, and inclined to be oratorical over the astonishing discovery he has made, that Italy is not England. Respectfully entreats Podsnap's pardon for stopping the flow of his words of wisdom, and informs him what is in the wind. Tells Podsnap that their political opinions are identical. Gives Podsnap to understand that he, Veneering, formed his political opinions while sitting at the feet of him, Podsnap. Seeks earnestly to know whether Podsnap "will rally round him?"

Says Podsnap, something sternly. "Now, first of all, Veneering, do you ask my advice?"

Veneering falters that as so old and so dear a friend—

"Yes, yes, that's all very well," says Podsnap; "but have you made up your mind to take this borough of Pocket-Breaches on its own terms, or do you ask my opinion whether you shall take it or leave it alone?"

Veneering repeats that his heart's desire and his soul's thirst are, that Podsnap shall rally round him.

"Now, I'll be plain with you, Veneering," says Podsnap, knitting his brows. "You will infer that I don't care about Parliament, from the fact of my not being there?"

Why, of course Veneering knows that! Of course Veneering knows that if Podsnap chose to go there, he would be there, in a space of time that might be stated by the light and thoughtless as a jiffy.

"It is not worth my while," pursues Podsnap, becoming handsomely mollified, "and it is the reverse of important to my position. But it is not my wish to set myself up as law for another man, differently situated. You think it is worth your while, and is important to your position. Is that so?"

Always with the proviso that Podsnap will rally round him, Veneering thinks it is so.

"Then you don't ask my advice," says Podsnap. "Good. Then I won't give it you. But you do ask my help. Good. Then I'll work for you."

Veneering instantly blesses him, and apprises him that Twemlow is already working. Podsnap does not quite approve that any body should be already working—regarding it rather in the light of a liberty—but tolerates Twemlow, and says he is a well-connected old female who will do no harm.

"I have nothing very particular to do to-day," adds Podsnap, "and I'll mix with some influential people. I had engaged myself to dinner, but I'll send Mrs. Podsnap and get off going myself, and I'll dine with you at eight. It's important we should report progress and compare notes. Now, let me see. You ought to have a couple of active, energetic fellows, of gentlemanly manners, to go about."

Veneering, after cogitation, thinks of Boots and Brewer.

"Whom I have met at your house," says Podsnap. "Yes. They'll do very well. Let them each have a cab, and go about."

Veneering immediately mentions what a blessing he feels it to possess a friend capable of such grand administrative suggestions, and really is elated at this going about of Boots and Brewer, as an idea wearing an electioneering aspect and looking desperately like business. Leaving Podsnap, at a hand-gallop, he descends upon Boots and Brewer, who enthusiastically rally round him by at once bolting off in cabs, taking opposite directions. Then Veneering repairs to the legal gentleman in Britannia's confidence, and with him transacts some delicate affairs of business, and issues an address to the independent electors of Pocket-Breaches, announcing that he is coming among them for their suffrages, as the mariner returns to the home of his early childhood: a phrase which is none the worse for his never having been near the place in his life, and not even now distinctly knowing where it is.

Mrs. Veneering, during the same eventful hours, is not idle. No sooner does the carriage turn out, all complete, than she turns into it, all complete, and gives the word "To Lady Toppins's." That charmer dwells over a stay-maker's in the Belgravian Borders, with a life-size model in the window on the ground-floor, of a distinguished beauty in a blue petticoat, stay-lace in hand, looking over her shoulder at the town in innocent surprise. As well she may, to find herself dressing under the circumstances.

Lady Toppins at home? Lady Toppins at home, with the room darkened, and her back (like the lady's at the ground-floor window, though for a different reason) cunningly turned toward the light. Lady Toppins is so surprised by seeing her dear Mrs. Veneering so early—in the middle of the night, the pretty creature calls it—that her eyelids almost go up, under the influence of that emotion.

To whom Mrs. Veneering incoherently communicates, how that Veneering has been offered Pocket-Breaches; how that it is the time for rallying round; how that Veneering has said, "We must work;" how that she is here, as a wife and mother, to entreat Lady Toppins to work; how that the carriage is at Lady Toppins's disposal for purposes of work; how that she, proprietress of said bran-new elegant equipage, will return home on foot—on bleeding feet, if need be—to work (not specifying how) until she drops by the side of baby's crib.

"My love," says Lady Toppins, "compose yourself: we'll bring him in." And Lady Toppins really does work, and work the Veneering horses too; for she clatters about town all day, calling upon every body she knows, and showing her entertaining powers and green fan to immense advantage, by rattling on with, My dear soul, what do you think? What do you suppose me to be? You'll never guess. I'm pretending to be an electioneering agent. And for what place of all places? Pocket-Breaches. And why? Because the dearest friend I have in the world has bought it. And who is the dearest friend I have in the world? A man of the name of Veneering. Not omitting his wife, who is the other dearest friend I have in the world; and I positively declare I forgot their baby, who is the other. And we are carrying on this little farce to keep up appearances, and isn't it refreshing! Then, my precious child, the fun of it is that nobody knows who these Veneerings are, and that they know nobody, and that they have a house out of the Tales of the Genii, and give dinners out of the Arabian Nights. Curious to see 'em, my dear? Say you'll know 'em. Come and dine with 'em. They sha'n't bore you. Say who shall meet you. We'll make up a party of our own, and I'll engage that they shall not interfere with you for one single moment. You really ought to see their gold and silver camels. I call their dinner-table the Caravan. Do come and dine with my Veneerings, my own Veneerings, my exclusive property, the dearest friends I have in the world! And above all, my dear, be sure you promise me your vote and interest and all sorts of plumpers for Pocket-Breaches; for we couldn't think of spending sixpence on it, my love, and can only consent to be brought in by the spontaneous thingummies of the incorruptible whatdoyoucallums.

Now the point of view seized by the bewitching Tippins, that this same working and rallying round is to keep up appearances, may have something in it, but not all the truth. More is done, or considered to be done—which does as well—by taking cabs, and “going about,” than the fair Tippins knew of. Many vast vague reputations have been made, solely by taking cabs and going about. This particularly obtains in all Parliamentary affairs. Whether the business in hand be to get a man in, or get a man out, or get a man over, or promote a railway, or jockey a railway, or what else, nothing is understood to be so effectual as scouring nowhere in a violent hurry—in short, as taking cabs and going about.

Probably because this reason is in the air, Twemlow, far from being singular in his persuasion that he works like a Trojan, is capped by Podsnap, who in his turn is capped by Boots and Brewer. At eight o'clock, when all these hard workers assemble to dine at Veneering's, it is understood that the cabs of Boots and Brewer mustn't leave the door, but that pails of water must be brought from the nearest baiting-place, and cast over the horses' legs on the very spot, lest Boots and Brewer should have instant occasion to mount and away. Those fleet messengers require the Analytical to see that their hats are deposited where they can be laid hold of at an instant's notice; and they dine (remarkably well though) with the air of firemen in charge of an engine, expecting intelligence of some tremendous conflagration.

Mrs. Veneering faintly remarks, as dinner opens, that many such days would be too much for her.

“Many such days would be too much for all of us,” says Podsnap; “but we'll bring him in!”

“We'll bring him in,” says Lady Tippins, sportively waving her green fan. “Veneering forever!”

“We'll bring him in!” says Twemlow.

“We'll bring him in!” say Boots and Brewer.

Strictly speaking, it would be hard to show cause why they should not bring him in, Pocket-Breaches having closed its little bargain, and there being no opposition. However, it is agreed that they must “work” to the last, and that if they did not work, something indefinite would happen. It is likewise agreed that they are all so exhausted with the work behind them, and need to be fortified for the work before them, as to require peculiar strengthening from Veneering's cellar. Therefore, the Analytical has orders to produce the cream of the cream of his bins, and therefore it falls out that rallying becomes rather a trying word for the occasion; Lady Tippins being observed gamely to inculcate the necessity of rearing round their dear Veneering; Podsnap advocating roaring round him; Boots and Brewer declaring their intention of reeling round him; and Veneering thanking his devoted friends one and all, with great emotion, for rarullarulling round him.

In these inspiring moments Brewer strikes out an idea which is the great hit of the day. He consults his watch, and says (like Guy Fawkes), he'll now go down to the House of Commons and see how things look.

“I'll keep about the lobby for an hour or so,” says Brewer, with a deeply mysterious countenance; “and if things look well, I won't come back, but will order my cab for nine in the morning.”

“You couldn't do better,” says Podsnap.

Veneering expresses his inability ever to acknowledge this last service. Tears stand in Mrs. Veneering's affectionate eyes. Boots shows envy, loses ground, and is regarded as possessing a second-rate mind. They all crowd to the door, to see Brewer off. Brewer says to his driver, “Now, is your horse pretty fresh?” eying the animal with critical scrutiny. Driver says he's as fresh as butter. “Put him along, then,” says Brewer; “House of Commons.” Driver darts up, Brewer leaps in, they cheer him as he departs, and Mr. Podsnap says, “Mark my words, Sir. That's a man of resource; that's a man to make his way in life.”

When the time comes for Veneering to deliver a neat and appropriate stammer to the men of Pocket-Breaches, only Podsnap and Twemlow accompany him by railway to that sequestered spot. The legal gentleman is at the Pocket-Breaches Branch Station, with an open carriage with a printed bill “Veneering forever!” stuck upon it, as if it were a wall; and they gloriously proceed, amidst the grins of the populace, to a feeble little town-hall on crutches, with some onions and boot-laces under it, which the legal gentleman says are a Market; and from the front window of that edifice Veneering speaks to the listening earth. In the moment of his taking his hat off, Podsnap, as per agreement made with Mrs. Veneering, telegraphs to that wife and mother, "He's up."

Veneering loses his way in the usual No Thoroughfares of speech, and Podsnap and Twemlow say Hear hear! and sometimes, when he can't by any means back himself out of some very unlucky No Thoroughfare, "He-a-a-r He-a-a-r!" with an air of facetious conviction, as if the ingenuity of the thing gave them a sensation of exquisite pleasure. But Veneering makes two remarkably good points; so good, that they are supposed to have been suggested to him by the legal gentleman in Britannia's confidence, while briefly conferring on the stairs.

Point the first is this. Veneering institutes an original comparison between the country and a ship; pointedly calling the ship the Vessel of the State, and the Minister the Man at the Helm. Veneering's object is to let Pocket-Breaches know that his friend on his right (Podsnap) is a man of wealth. Consequently says he, "And, gentlemen, when the timbers of the Vessel of the State are unsound and the Man at the Helm is unskillful, would those great Marine Insurers, who rank among our world-famed merchant-princes—would they insure her, gentlemen? Would they underwrite her? Would they incur a risk in her? Would they have confidence in her? Why, gentlemen, if I appealed to my honorable friend upon my right, himself among the greatest and most respected of that great and much-respected class, he would answer No!"

Point the second is this. The telling fact that Twemlow is related to Lord Snigsworth must be let off. Veneering supposes a state of public affairs that probably never could by any possibility exist (though this is not quite certain, in consequence of his picture being unintelligible to himself and every body else), and thus proceeds: "Why, gentlemen, if I were to indicate such a programme to any class of society, I say it would be received with derision, would be pointed at by the finger of scorn. If I indicated such a programme to any worthy and intelligent tradesman of your town—nay, I will here be personal, and say Our town—what would he reply? He would reply, 'Away with it!' That's what he would reply, gentlemen. In his honest indignation he would reply, 'Away with it!' But suppose I mounted higher in the social scale. Suppose I drew my arm through the arm of my respected friend upon my left, and, walking with him through the ancestral woods of his family, and under the spreading beeches of Snigsworthy Park, approached the noble hall, crossed the court-yard, entered by the door, went up the staircase, and, passing from room to room, found myself at last in the august presence of my friend's near kinsman, Lord Snigsworth. And suppose I said to that venerable earl, 'My Lord, I am here before your lordship, presented by your lordship's near kinsman, my friend upon my left, to indicate that programme;' what would his lordship answer? Why, he would answer, 'Away with it!' That's what he would answer, gentlemen. 'Away with it!' Unconsciously using, in his exalted sphere, the exact language of the worthy and intelligent tradesman of our town, the near and dear kinsman of my friend upon my left would answer in his wrath, 'Away with it!'"

Veneering finishes with this last success, and Mr. Podsnap telegraphs to Mrs. Veneering, "He's down."

Then dinner is had at the Hotel with the legal gentleman, and then there are in due succession, nomination, and declaration. Finally Mr. Podsnap telegraphs to Mrs. Veneering, "We have brought him in."

Another gorgeous dinner awaits them on their return to the Veneering halls, and Lady Tippins awaits them, and Boots and Brewer await them. There is a modest assertion on every body's part that every body single-handed "brought him in;" but in the main it is conceded by all that that stroke of business on Brewer's part, in going down to the House that night to see how things looked, was the master-stroke.

A touching little incident is related by Mrs. Veneering in the course of the evening. Mrs. Veneering is habitually disposed to be tearful, and has an extra disposition that way after her late excitement. Previous to withdrawing from the dinner-table with Lady Tippins she says, in a pathetic and physically weak manner:

"You will all think it foolish of me, I know, but I must mention it. As I sat by Baby's crib, on the night before the election, Baby was very uneasy in her sleep."

The Analytical chemist, who is gloomily looking on, has diabolical impulses to suggest "Wind" and throw up his situation; but represses them.

"After an interval almost convulsive, Baby curled her little hands in one another and smiled."

Mrs. Veneering stopping here, Mr. Podsnap deems it incumbent on him to say: "I wonder why!"

"Could it be, I asked myself," says Mrs. Veneering, looking about her for her pocket-handkerchief, "that the Fairies were telling Baby that her papa would shortly be an M.P.?"

So overcome by the sentiment is Mrs. Veneering that they all get up to make a clear stage for Veneering, who goes round the table to the rescue and bears her out backward, with her feet impressively scraping the carpet: after remarking that her work has been too much for her strength. Whether the fairies made any mention of the five thousand pounds, and it disagreed with Baby, is not speculated upon.

Poor little Twemlow, quite done up, is touched, and still continues touched after he is safely housed over the livery-stable yard in Duke Street, Saint James's. But there, upon his sofa, a tremendous consideration breaks in upon the mild gentleman, putting all softer considerations to the rout.

"Gracious Heavens! Now I have time to think of it, he never saw one of his constituents in all his days until we saw them together!"

After having paced the room in distress of mind, with his hand to his forehead, the innocent Twemlow returns to his sofa and moans:

"I shall either go distracted, or die, of this man. He comes upon me too late in life. I am not strong enough to bear him!"

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 1st of October. We have the details of Sherman's movements by which the capture of Atlanta was effected. These and Sheridan's brilliant operations in the Valley of the Shenandoah form the main topics of our military record for the month.

After the failure of M'Cook's and Stoneman's raids against the Macon Road, and the very limited success which attended Kilpatrick, Sherman's army seemed to many to have come to a dead-lock before Atlanta. Ever from the commencement of the campaign Sherman had held fast to the Chattanooga Railroad. After he had reached Atlanta it became more than ever necessary to preserve his hold upon that road, which was the sole artery through which his army was sustained with food and replenished with ammunition. So long as his cavalry remained to him in full force the military problem was a very simple one. Holding the Chattanooga Road he could extend his lines in an easterly direction to the Augusta Road; indeed, after crossing the Chattahoochee, he firmly held Decatur on that road with the army of the Tennessee under M'Pherson, and was able to destroy the eastern communications of Hood quite effectually; but it was hardly possible to maintain this hold for any length of time. Having so completely destroyed it as to make it useless to Hood for some weeks, Sherman, after having fought the battles of the 20th and 22d of July, threw his left around, and, maintaining his hold on the Chattanooga Road, extended his lines nearly to the West Point Road on the west side of Atlanta. Then was fought the battle of July 28, which, like those of the 20th and 22d, resulted favorably. Sherman now depended upon his cavalry to destroy the West Point and Macon roads. M'Cook's and Stoneman's expeditions not only failed, but resulted disastrously, for one-half of Sherman's cavalry horses and equipments fell into the hands of the rebels. Kilpatrick then tried his hand at raiding; but though promising much he accomplished little. It then appeared, as we said before, that Sherman had come to a dead-lock; and but for Hood's rashness, which might safely be calculated on, it would have so proved. Hood, thinking it would now be his best move to disturb Sherman's rear, sent General Wheeler with a cavalry force estimated at ten thousand toward Chattanooga. Hood's temerity was Sherman's opportunity. Sherman knew that the rebel army was supplied now almost entirely by the Macon Road, and that, while the great dépôts for provision were on that road, only one or two days' rations at a time passed into Atlanta. He determined, therefore, to plant his entire army, with the exception of the Twentieth, Slocum's Corps, on the Macon Road, just below the junction of that road with the West Point Road. A single corps securely intrenched would, in the absence of the Confederate cavalry, be sufficient to guard the immense dépôts of supplies and the fords of the Chattahoochee. Sherman, therefore, with his army broke camp on the 25th of August and left Atlanta. Already three thousand wagons and one thousand ambulances had been selected for the use of the main column; the rest were sent across the Chattahoochee by three different crossings, viz.: Pace's Ferry, the Railroad Bridge, and Turner's Ferry. The Twentieth Corps followed on the 25th, supported by the Fourth. The next morning Slocum's command were securely intrenched on the bank of the Chattahoochee nearest Atlanta. The same day the Fourth Corps, appearing to follow toward the river, took the Newman Road and moved southwest. The army of the Tennessee, under Howard, followed toward Fairburn on the West Point Road, taking the extreme right of the moving column. Schofield's Corps remained behind to cover the left, but on the 28th also withdrew. On that day Jeff C. Davis, with the Fourteenth Corps, reached Red Oak on the West Point Road, thirteen miles from Atlanta, and began the destruction of the road, in which they were soon joined by the Fourth Corps.

The Army of the Tennessee moved from Fairburn to Reupo Place, near Jonesborough; the Army of the Cumberland from Red Oak, via Shoal Creek Church, to Conch's; the Army of the Ohio, via Red Oak and Mims, to Maury's Hill. Thus the entire army, with the exception of Slocum's Corps, was now on the march. The Confederates thought Sherman was in full retreat. The Army of the Tennessee approached Jonesborough; Thomas, with the Army of the Ohio, was further to the left, holding the centre of the moving column; while Schofield, with the Army of the Cumberland, held the extreme left. The Army of the Cumberland on the 1st of September held a strong position on the Macon Road, below Rough and Ready; Thomas another position on the road farther South; while Howard and Jeff C. Davis were fighting Hardee and Lee at Jonesborough.

The Confederates at first assumed the offensive and were repulsed. Davis at 5 P.M. struck the road above Jonesborough, and cut off Hardee and Lee at that place from Stewart's Corps, which Hood retained at Atlanta. Davis made an attack on Hardee, and flanked him on the left, the Fourth Corps at the same time flanking on the right. The Fourteenth Corps then charged, and the Confederates, overpowered by numbers, gave way, leaving their works and a thousand prisoners in the hands of the Federals. While mentioning Davis's fight at Jonesborough, Logan's of the day before should also be recorded. The Fifteenth Corps, holding the left of the Army of the Tennessee, was attacked by the Confederates. The affair did not last long—not more than an hour; but the enemy was driven back, leaving in Logan's hands 800 prisoners, including a major-general and a brigadier.

On the night of September 1 Hardee and Lee retreated toward Macon. The same night Hood evacuated Atlanta. Slocum's corps immediately took possession, and Sherman's army has been concentrated at Atlanta. This city is to be made a grand military post. All the inhabitants, loyal and disloyal, were ordered to leave, and a truce of ten days, commencing September 14, was established to carry out the order. On the 10th of September Governor Brown of Georgia withdrew from Hood's army the militia of that State, "in the hope that he should be able to return it, with greater numbers and equal efficiency, when the interest of the public service requires it."

In the week commencing Sunday, September 18, Sheridan defeated Early, and drove him to Staunton. On Sunday, the 18th, General Gordon's Division of the Confederate Army of the Shenandoah attacked Averill's corps at Martinsburg and was driven back to Darkesville. Sheridan's command had for some days held a strong position in the vicinity of the railroad from Harper's Ferry to Winchester; his right wing, under General Crook, and consisting of the Army of Western Virginia, posted at Summit Point, while the left rested on the Winchester and Berryville pike a few miles further south. When Gordon made his attack on Sunday, the great mass of Early's army was gathered together in the vicinity of Bunker Hill and Stephenson's Dépôt, and northwest of the position held by Sheridan. A rapid advance along the Winchester pike and across the Opequan River westward would place the Federal army directly in Early's rear. The opportunity as soon as offered was embraced. Sunday afternoon Sheridan had his troops under arms. His plan was to advance at three o'clock on the morning of the 19th, with the Sixth and Nineteenth Corps; Crook, following two hours afterward, was to join the main column at the crossing of the Opequan. In order to divert the enemy's attention, Torbert and Averill, with a large cavalry force, were to demonstrate on his left. Wilson's Cavalry Division crossed the Opequan, followed by the Sixth Corps. The Nineteenth Corps was delayed, and this gave Early time to draw in his left. The Federal advance was therefore stubbornly resisted. Indeed the first and second lines were thrown into some confusion. As soon, however, as Sheridan had placed his artillery order was restored, and then followed one of the most fiercely contested battles of the war. The opposing lines at some points were not more than 200 yards apart. At a critical point of the battle a cavalry charge was ordered on the right, which decided the fortunes of the day in Sheridan's favor. Early's army was driven from the field in confusion and retreated to Fisher's Hill, three miles south of Strasburg. He was closely pursued by Sheridan, who attacked him at Fisher's Hill on the 22d. The attack was made late in the afternoon. Crook's command advanced on Early's left and rear, while the Sixth and Nineteenth Corps attacked in front. The position held by the Confederates was thought to be impregnable, but it was taken with twenty guns and between one and two thousand prisoners. The pursuit was still continued toward Staunton. It is impossible accurately to report the losses on either side. In the battle of Winchester Sheridan lost quite heavily, but at Fisher's Hill his loss was very light. In both battles, and during the hot pursuit, over ten thousand of Early's forces were put out of combat before he reached Staunton. At Winchester Generals Rhodes and Godwin were killed; among the wounded were Fitz-Hugh Lee, son of the General-in-Chief. On the Federal side General David A. Russell was killed. After the battle of Winchester Torbert's command was sent around to push up the Luray Valley and intercept Early's retreat; but meeting a heavy force of Confederate Cavalry at Luray Court House he was detained from his main object, although he succeeded in defeating the force opposed to him.

The capture, by the Confederate General Hampton, of 2500 beeves at Harrison's Landing, September 16, was one of the most annoying occurrences of the war. Estimating each beef at 800 pounds, Hampton by this success obtained a month's supply for Lee's army, allowing each soldier one pound of meat per day.

John C. Frémont and John Cochrane, who were nominated at Cleveland for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency, have withdrawn. Mr. Frémont, in his letter of withdrawal, says that the canvass has been entered upon in such a way as to make the union of the Republican Party a paramount necessity. The Chicago platform is simply separation; McClellan's letter of acceptance re-establishment with slavery; the Republican candidate is pledged to the re-establishment of the Union without slavery. Between these issues he could have no doubt; and he therefore withdrew, not to aid the triumph of Lincoln, but to do his part toward preventing the election of the Democratic candidate. In respect to Mr. Lincoln he reiterated what he had said in his letter of acceptance. "I consider," he says, "that his administration has been politically, militarily, and financially a failure, and that its necessary continuance is a cause of regret for the country." The Cleveland Convention was to have been such an expression of opinion as would have rendered Mr. Lincoln's nomination impossible; but circumstances had given him the nomination, and "established for him a character among the people which leaves now no choice. United, the Republican party is reasonably sure of success; divided, the result of the Presidential election is at least doubtful."—Mr. Cochrane, in declining the nomination, says: "Peace and division, or war and the Union. Other alternative there is none. And as I am still of the mind that once led me to the field with the soldiers of the Republic, I can not now hold a position which, by dividing, hazards the success of those who, whatever their differences at other points, agree as upon the question of first consequence that the restoration of the Union can not be effected without the uninterrupted continuation of the war."

State elections have been held in Vermont and Maine. Both States went strongly Republican. In Vermont the vote showed an increase of about 2600 over that of the last election, of which the Republicans gained 2000, the Democrats 600; the Republican majority for Governor being 18,000 in a vote of 42,000.—In Maine the total vote was about 8000 less than at the last election, the two parties losing almost exactly in proportion to their respective votes. The Republican majority for Governor was about 16,000 in a vote something more than 100,000. The Legislatures of both States are strongly Republican. In New York the Democrats have nominated for re-election as Governor Hon. Horatio Seymour. The Union candidate is Hon. Reuben E. Fenton, a prominent member of Congress, originally elected as a Democrat.

Literary Notices.

Crusoe's Island, with Adventures in California and Washoe, by J. ROSS BROWNE. (Harper and Brothers.) A dozen years ago there appeared in this Magazine a series of papers under the title of "Crusoe Life." A vessel in which the writer was voyaging from New York to California was becalmed off the Island of Juan Fernandez. He with ten others put off in a small boat for the island, some seventy miles distant. They reached it with some difficulty, remained there a couple of days exploring the island, and then regained the ship. Upon this slight foundation was built up a series of strange adventures, "founded on fact," which gave promise that Mr. Browne would prove to be the most original and genial American humorist. This promise was abundantly justified a few years later by his book "Yusef," a record of a tour through Sicily and the Holy Land. Subsequently the pages of this Magazine have been enriched with accounts of Mr. Browne's varied travels in divers portions of the globe—California and Iceland, Washoe and Germany, Norway and Arizona. These are all marked by the peculiar characteristics of the author. At the bottom of all is sound common sense, keen observation, and a quick perception of odd phases of character; or rather, perhaps, the odd phases of even the most commonplace characters. If there is any thing quaint or humorous in any person whom he meets, it is sure to be drawn out by the magnetic attraction of Mr. Browne's genial humor. His sketches of character are just enough heightened and exaggerated to render them perfect likenesses. Hundreds of travelers have been "dragomaned" from Beirût to Damascus by the renowned Yusef (the Arabic for Joe) Badra; several had published accounts of their journey, but nobody saw in him any thing worth writing about. Browne saw him, caught the salient features of the man, heightened them a little here and there, and made him immortal. So Geir Zoëga had guided travelers by scores to the Icelandic Geysers, and doubtless seemed to them a good, stolid, matter-of-fact fellow; but under Browne's genial influence the inner man peeped out, one of the finest, quaintest fellows imaginable. In nothing is Browne more happy than in hitting off the traveling John Bull, whether with the infallible Murray in his hand he studies art in Italian galleries, or, equipped with patent rod, silver-mounted reel, and flies warranted to kill, he patiently whips the Norwegian streams for impossible trout; or provided with the thousand and one absolute necessities of a gentleman, he undertakes to "rough it" in the wilds of California. Leech does not more cleverly hit off the Englishman at home than Browne does the Briton abroad, with pen and pencil, for he is as clever with one as the other. There is nothing ill-humored in Mr. Browne's humor. He likes the world, and every body in it; and so every body likes him. He can not travel a day in the strangest country without making friends. With just Italian enough to grope his way through the lingua-franca of the Oriental shores of the Mediterranean, with just German enough to enable him to guess at an occasional word of Norwegian, he manages to find out more about the people of these extreme regions than most travelers who have spent half a life-time among them. It is really a matter of congratulation that the miscellaneous writings of this keen observer and genial humorist are to be collected in a series of volumes, of which this is the first.

Azarian, by HARRIET E. PRESCOTT. No other of the rising writers of our day manifests so marked an individuality of style as Miss Prescott. Its most obvious characteristic is its affluence of diction. This consists not merely in an apparently inexhaustible wealth of words, which the dullest writer may attain by diligent study of the dictionary, but quite as much in the rare artistic skill with which she uses them. Her style, as truly as that of Thackeray, though in a quite different way, is of itself a delight. In mere description she has no living rival. Beyond the writings of the Brontë sisters, and hardly within them, we know of nothing in their way equal to the tide and storm scenes in "Yet's Christmas Box," the lonely, livid marshes in the "Tale of the Trefethness," and the miasmatic Southern lagoons in "Madeleine Schaffer." No person, we think, ever painted in words such pictures of jewels, embossed cups, and chased rings; of flowers, fruits, and wines. The words sparkle and glow like diamonds and rubies, like roses, nectarines, and golden wine. She has shown equal power over certain phases of character, portraying them with the intuitive power of genius; and even when she fails, the very failure is of a kind that demonstrates her ability to have succeeded. It is true that she often wastes her wonderful word-embroidery upon a worthless fabric. The plots of many of her stories are trivial, and those of some repulsive. Of these we trust that the last has been written; that Miss Prescott has passed the "Storm and Stress" period of her literary career. We accept "Azarian" as an augury of this. It is a work of art in a far higher sense than any thing she has before produced. If the colors are less brilliant, it is not only because the subject demanded a more subdued tone, but because they are more harmoniously blended. It is a study of life and character, without startling events or improbable situations, but far enough removed from the beaten paths of life to relieve it from tameness and insipidity. She styles the book "an Episode," which we conceive to be nearly equivalent to a "Fragment," or a "Study." Indeed, we must consider all that Miss Prescott has yet written as trials and studies. It rests with herself to say whether she shall produce a great "work." (Published by Ticknor and Fields.)

Two additions have been made to the admirable "School and Family Series" edited by MARCIUS WILLSON and published by Harper and Brothers, for which the younger portions of the rising generation have cause to be grateful. The Primary Speller, with its hundreds of graphic illustrations of familiar objects, renders easy that terrible first step to recorded knowledge by which the four-year-old child learns the mysterious connection between the three unmeaning characters, c-a-t, and the whiskered mouser purring before the fire. That one step taken, the barrier to all the wisdom contained in books is broken down.—The Larger Speller is a cheerful guide to children of a larger growth through the mazes of our most irregular system of orthography. No one can fairly appreciate the worth of these two little books, and the amount of thought bestowed upon their preparation, unless he will take the trouble to compare them with the books which undertook to perform a similar work in his childhood.

Captain Brand, by "HARRY GRINGO." Viewed simply as a dashing sea-story, this novel, by Captain HENRY A. WISE, now the chief of the Ordnance Department of the United States Navy, is among the very best of the class, which includes the best works of Cooper and Marryatt, of the author of "Tom Cringle's Log" and "The Green Hand." The author knows the sea in every clime, and the ships that sail upon it, and the sailors who man them. He is familiar with every aspect of ocean and sky in storm or calm. Besides the merit of Captain Brand as a picture of nautical life, the story of the novel is of the most high-wrought, tragic interest. The reader who demands excitement in a novel can not fail to be abundantly gratified by this. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

The Blennerhassett Papers, edited by WILLIAM H. SAFFORD. The biographers of Harman Blennerhassett, foremost among whom is the editor of this volume, were aware that this unfortunate man left behind him many papers of considerable value. But they were in the hands of the surviving members of his family, who would not allow free use to be made of them. These scruples were at last overcome, and the papers passed into the hands of Mr. Safford. The story of the beautiful home in the Calypso's Island in the Ohio, was well known. No one who knew any thing of the character of poor Blennerhassett supposed that any thing that he could say would throw new light upon the political movement in which he was for a few months so strangely involved in connection with Aaron Burr, the second and least detestable of the three arch-traitors in American history. The writer of this notice perused these papers months before Mr. Safford was able to obtain them. There were a few letters from Burr, but, as might have been foretold, he would write nothing of importance to any man, certainly not to one like Blennerhassett. Some portions of the papers, however, give new information as to the latter days of poor Blennerhassett, and of his unfortunate family. There is in all biography hardly any thing more mournful than the story, set forth in his own letters, of the man returning, at threescore, penniless and broken-hearted, to the country which he had left in the prime of manhood rich and hopeful. How he begged this old friend to get him some post, at home or abroad, by which he and his children—more helpless than himself—might live. Could not that get him a judicial appointment in Canada? or another an assistant-barristership in Ireland, or the agency of an estate? Would not another like a companion whose habits were those of a literary man, and who was a proficient in music, though he could accommodate himself to any mode of life? Could not another gain for him a place under the government of the South American republic of Colombia? Or still another a public situation in Portugal, legal or diplomatic; or, if worst came to worst, in the Church?—for he was, as he asserted in strict confidence, un bon Catholique. Or perhaps another could get him two or three pupils to whom he would impart all the knowledge necessary to fit them for any profession in life: would a hundred pounds a year from each be too much for him to expect?—if so, he would take less. And then the letters from his poor wife, who had come to America with him a quarter of a century before, rich, beautiful, and accomplished, with a future apparently as bright as that of any woman on the continent.

How she had to tell of one son, their eldest, whom, in the heyday of the great Burr scheme, hardly a dozen years before, she expected to see the heir of a dukedom, in the golden empire of Aaron I., now a poor imbecile drunkard, selling for rum the clothes with which charity had supplied him, and at last wandering off to New Orleans and disappearing from human sight. And then of the second son—good, kind, docile, apparently intelligent, well educated, but somehow incapable of earning his bread. These are some of the new points in the story of Blennerhassett brought out in these "Papers." If Mr. Safford had contented himself with writing a new Life of Blennerhassett, by the aid of these papers, instead of almost hiding them under a mass of cumbrous history of the "Wilkinson and Burr Revolution," and an "account of the Spanish Association of Kentucky," he would have made a smaller, and we think a much better book. Still, if he has not made the best possible use of his materials, he has made a good use of them, and his work is a valuable acquisition to the domain of American History. (Published by Moore, Wiltach, and Baldwin.)

Among the recent additions to "Harper's Library of Select Novels" are the following: Lindesfarn Chase, by T. ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE, in which the author has put himself fairly into competition with his more celebrated brother, the author of "Orley Farm," as a delineator of life and manners in a quiet cathedral town and among the surrounding gentry. The single character of Marguerite, the English girl who has been bien élevée by a French kinswoman, and of her mari, Mr. Frederick Falconer, the calculating young banker, are as carefully studied and skillfully developed as any personages in Balzac.——Not Dead Yet, by J. CORDY JEAFRESON, is a very successful story of the Wilkie Collins school, in which the main interest lies in the plot, and the reader is kept in a state of perpetual suspense as to how every thing will come out. The story is exceedingly well managed.——Maurice Dering, by the author of "Guy Livingston," is characterized in no small degree by that intense "muscular un-Christianity" by which that famous story startled novel readers some ten years ago. While this novel falls somewhat below "Guy Livingston," it certainly rises above any of the works of the author which immediately succeeded it.

The Cruise of the Alabama, by RAPHAEL SEMMES. Although this work is not ostensibly prepared by Captain Semmes, it is almost wholly made up from his journals, an anonymous editor merely supplying a few pages of biographical laudation. To all real intents it is an autobiography. When the rebellion broke out Raphael Semmes, a native of Maryland, for thirty-five years an officer in the navy of the United States, in which he had risen to the rank of Commander, and was moreover a member of the Light-house Board, offered his services to the Confederacy. The offer, written from Washington, was accepted, and he was ordered to repair to Montgomery. Having telegraphed that he would come at once, he resigned his commission in the United States Navy. The message summoning him to Montgomery and his reply passed unquestioned over the telegraphic line to and from Washington. From Montgomery he was sent North to purchase arms and munitions. Thence he was recalled to take command of a steamer, to be known as the Sumter, fitting out at New Orleans. He left his wife and young daughters in Washington, and while he was burning American vessels they were safe and unmolested in the United States, where, for aught we know, they still are.

The Sumter escaped the blockade at the close of July, 1861, and began her work of destruction in the Gulf and on the coast of South America. She then shot across the Atlantic, and finally put into the port of Gibraltar, where, being closely blockaded by the Tuscarora and Kearsarge, she was dismantled and sold. Her cruise lasted six months, during which she captured 18 American vessels. Semmes then went to England to take command of a new vessel which was building for the Confederates by the notorious John Laird, a member of the British Parliament. This vessel, escaping by fraud from the British port, steamed for the Portuguese island of Fayal, where she was joined by another British steamer, with her guns and munitions. She was there equipped as a man-of-war, in violation of the laws of neutrality. Her crew consisted of the sweepings of the Liverpool grog-shops, who had been shipped under false pretenses, in the expectation that they would enlist when fairly at sea.

The vessel, which was now formally christened the Alabama, commenced her cruise early in September, 1862. By the close of October she had destroyed 21 vessels in the North Atlantic, running within 200 miles of New York. She then cruised among the West India islands and in the neighboring waters, capturing in December the steamship Ariel, with 700 passengers, among whom were 120 American marines; and in January sinking the United States war-steamer Hatteras. This was the only action in which the Alabama was ever engaged until the final one in June, 1864, when she was sunk. After that she cruised in the Middle and South Atlantic; then shot over to the African coast, stopping at the Cape of Good Hope, and thence passing to the Indian seas; whence she sailed again for Europe in March, 1864, arriving at Cherbourg on the 11th of June. On the 19th of that month she was sunk by the Kearsarge. The details of that action, and the disgraceful conduct of Semmes and the captain of the English yacht Deerhound, are too recent to need description. Semmes always sailed under false colors, sometimes making use of British, sometimes French, sometimes American. Having thus lured the prize within reach, it was seized, the crew taken prisoners, put in irons, if the captors saw fit, chronometers and valuables removed, and the vessel burned. The primary object of the cruise was destruction. The career of the Alabama lasted a month and ten days less than three years. During this time she captured 63 vessels, of which all but nine were burned. Their total value, as set down by Semmes himself, was nearly four and three quarter millions of dollars. A quarter of a million would probably cover all the value of stores, provisions, and valuables actually gained by the captors; all the rest was wantonly destroyed. But this is only a small part of the actual damage inflicted upon us by this vessel. American commerce was almost swept from the open sea. In a single year 450,000 tons of American shipping passed from our flag to that of our commercial rival.

The career of Semmes, as narrated by himself, combines every possible element of the basest treason. He is a traitor to the nation to which he had sworn allegiance, and by whom he had been supported for five-and-thirty years. He is a traitor to the State to which, according to Confederate theory, he owes primary allegiance; for Maryland has never even sought to secede from the Union. He has forsworn his military oath, the most sacred obligation known among men. He had not even the poor grace to resign his commission in the navy of the Union before not merely commencing but actually consummating his treachery. He was, and still is in a measure, a pet among a certain class of British gentlemen and traders, but the better portion of the British press were forced by a decent self-respect to denounce him. Thus the London Athenæum says: "Semmes is actually in arms against the land of his own birth, and stands condemned by the existing laws of his own State. He is a rebel in his own city, a deserter from the service, a traitor to his country." We are glad that he was ill-advised enough to publish his biography; that it was issued in England, and has been republished in America. (Published by G. H. Carleton.)

Political History of the Great Rebellion, by EDWARD MCPHERSON. The Clerk of the House of Representatives has in this volume undertaken and most admirably performed a task which entitles him to the gratitude of every student of the history of the rebellion. It is an ample summary of the legislation of the United States upon every topic connected with the war during the last four years, the votes upon each question being given. The subjects are so arranged and indexed that they can be referred to with ease. Hardly a question can arise in which this single volume will not supersede the necessity of consulting the ponderous files of the Congressional Globe. The political history of the Confederate States is also given, in documentary form, as far as it is accessible. No one who has not been obliged by his professional duties to undertake for himself a work of this nature can appreciate the labor which it involves; and no one who has not occasion to use such a work for constant reference can appreciate the admirable manner in which this has been executed. (D. Appleton and Company.)

Next to the pleasure of reading a really good new book is that of having an old favorite in a worthy shape. It is a matter of congratulation that publishers are now finding it for their interest to put forth handsome editions of standard authors. By "handsome editions" we do not mean books of luxury, profuse in illustrations, morocco-clad, and gilt; but copies from good legible type, tastefully arranged, clearly printed upon good paper, and neatly bound; books for reading, not for display. Of these we have before had occasion to speak of the "Household Edition" of DICKENS, now issued by Sheldon; of Appleton's fine edition of MERVILLE's Roman Empire; and of many others, alike creditable to the printers, the publishers, and the public. To the list we may add the fine three-volume edition of Gil Blas, published by Little and Brown; and a neat two-volume edition of the elder DISRAELI'S Amenities of Literature, by Hurd and Houghton. Equal to any of these, and to the finest editions put forth by Moxon or Pickering, if we may judge from the proof-sheets, will be found the uniform edition of the works of WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY, in course of preparation by Harper and Brothers, embracing all of those great works, the production of his literary manhood, by which he wished to be remembered, or by which his warmest admirers could wish to remember him.

Editor's Easy Chair.

THE centennial anniversary of a college is an event which does not occur every year. But there is no day more interesting to its children. The annual Commencement is full of tender and pathetic interest; but the feast whose return only our grandchildren and great-grandchildren can celebrate is a very inspiring and even a very solemn time. Fortunately it is usually observed by a dinner, which relieves the solemnity; for at a college dinner there will inevitably be sparkling and amusing reminiscences; jolly songs; humorous verses; anecdote, wit, eloquence, as well as the minor music of memory.

To most college-bred men the annual Commencement, if it be held in a small city, a town, or village, is probably the pleasantest day in the year. It is not that they were really so very happy in college, but that they think they were. It is not that college chums were the flower of men, but they meet us "trailing clouds of glory" as they come, because they come to us out of the enchanted land, out of the sunny realm of youth. Upon the whole, it is a very prosaic Jones and a remarkably commonplace Jenkins that we slap on the back in the college grounds on Commencement morning. But the day, the place, the association, act like an elixir. The Reverend Mr. Jones laughs with a cheerful sense of refreshment, and the torpid Jenkins revives like a toad long buried in the rock, and suddenly restored to sun and air.

There is another peculiar interest; and that is, the pleasure kings have when they abdicate and see their successors crowned. We go to Commencement and behold our second selves, our posterity in the first degree, filling our old places. They sit on the same hard benches whittled to pieces. They inveigh against the same relentless bell that rang us to early prayers. They con the same page in chapel to be ready for recitation. They play the same tricks in the same college "entries" and down the same stairs. They paint the President's old horse. They milk his cow. They muffle the early bell. Yes; and at last, silken-gowned and high-hearted, they march after the music in the grave procession. They behold in the old church the shining company in the galleries waving fans and murmuring and rustling. They ascend the platform, and are conscious of the hush, the eager glances, the sound of their own voices, the loud applause, the bow, the descent, the triumphal burst from the band.

And we, fond and foolish old Easy Chairs, we sit there, bald trustees and gray-haired members of the corporation, and our dim eyes see not only the bright youth of the hour, graceful, ardent, eloquent; full of hope, and aspiration, and resolution; but we see ourselves standing there in the glistening gown, ourselves yet them—the morning of thirty years ago, yet to-day—above in the glittering galleries, mothers in whom our hearts repose, yet smiling daughters for whom they yearn and ache. It is all a mystery, a miracle. The music dies away. It is we who are "hos juvenes," and these parchment rolls so fresh and fair bear our names recorded. Yet surely in the drawer at home there is the stained and dusty roll which attests in sound Latin our proficiency in letters and arts—long, long before these handsome youths were born.

It is a kind of sentimental pleasure and bewilderment, but it is none the less real. The world stops for a little while, and perhaps we find we have grown giddy with its incessant whirl, and do not exactly know whether we stand upon our heads or our heels. Commencement is the one day in the year when it is permitted to the most prosaic to feel poetic, and to the most steady-going back to curvet and prance like a newly-caught colt. The personal feeling to the college, which is expressed by the phrase alma mater, is the key to the illusion of the hour. There is a sense of coming home, of sitting at the maternal table; and all the day the alma mater is a vast, invisible, but still human and benignant presence in the air.

This was especially so at the Centennial Anniversary of Brown University at Providence, Rhode Island, which was celebrated in the beginning of September of this year. It is the custom of most of our colleges to hold their Commencements at midsummer, when the heat is overpowering; but old Brown has always given to her great festival the first Wednesday in September, except for two or three years, when the venerable lady maundered, and tried to change the unchangeable, and confer degrees in July. But the weakness passed, and with all her pristine vigor she now sits serene in a Brown old age, and every year gives birth to a new family upon the old birthday.

This year she celebrated her Centennial Thanksgiving. The great family of Brown she invited home again. "Come," she said; "to-day I know no oldest, no youngest, no dearest. I have no Reuben, no Joseph, nor Benjamin. Coats of many colors and of all colors I welcome. The black coat I reverently salute. The blue coat, grim with battle-smoke, or stained with loyal blood, I gratefully bless. Let all my children come and sit together at the maternal feast."

They came from far and wide. There could not have been less than eight or nine hundred of them; and after a hard storm the air was fresh and the sun shone brightly. The gathering point of the clans was on the college green in front of the Library, or Manning Hall. The grave, erect form of the President, the orator of the day, in his academic robes, was the only figure especially marked by costume, until a look of eager admiration announced the presence of another uniform; and one of the bravest and most skillful of our soldiers, and one of the noblest and most purely patriotic of men, took his place in the procession, when General Burnside joined it, the stars of his rank shining upon his shoulders, and the gold medal of the glorious Ninth Corps, heroes of North Carolina and of East Tennessee, upon his breast. Near him in the line were Bancroft the historian, Professor Goldwin Smith of Oxford, Ex-Secretary Chase, Senators Anthony and Foster, with Ex-Governor Clifford of Massachusetts, President of the day, and various venerable and distinguished men. It was the goodliest procession that the college green ever saw; and following the music, it descended the steep street that plunges from the top of the college hill into the very heart of the city to the market-place by the river.

Passing to the church, the first Baptist church, erected, according to the vote, "to worship God and hold Commencements in," and one of the finest, plain, old-fashioned, white wooden churches in New England, the procession opened, and, in the words of a witty alumnus of '48, "began to swallow its tail." The dignitaries at the end filed through and entered the church. It was soon crowded, and the organ took up the wondrous tale from the band. Then came a prayer by a graduate of fifty-one years ago. Then a fine ode, most nobly sung by a glee club, and the oration. It was naturally purely historical, yet not without a certain warmth in some passages indicating the touching of contested points. For there is a contest even about the true history of the origin of Brown. But the dignified orator carried it triumphantly his own way in his discourse, and at its close earnestly besought the friends of the alma mater not to forget how graciously she received and appreciated their benefactions.

Upon the church green the procession formed again, and marched up the hill to the Library—an admirable collection of thirty thousand volumes, with little rubbish among them, and, as Dr. Wayland says, "one of the best working libraries in the country." There was a spacious tent, pitched upon the green in the rear of the Library, and to that the company repaired and found a banquet spread. Every thing was neat, and plentiful, and cheerful. Eight hundred people sat down, and as the eye looked up and down the tables, it was impossible not to remember that a hundred years ago Brown University was a school in the little town of Warren upon Narragansett Bay, with one teacher called a President, and three scholars. But here, this day, she sat upon her sunny hill, surrounded by hundreds of her children, looking down the Bay to her cradle, which was visible, glistening faint and far in the afternoon light, and her sons had all been looking with his clear eyes who had told her story, through the backward vista of a century, to her dim beginnings there. The vast family sat happily together, to part on the morrow with a more cordial sympathy for each other and renewed affection for her.

It was a pleasant scene even to the dullest eye and mind. For these college festivals are in our day, and to us, what the evening hour of repose and story-telling was to the weary Greek and the wandering Arab. "Also in all truly fine verses," say the Bedouen, as they listen under the stars in the desert to the romance of Antar and the heroes—"in all truly fine verses there should be palm-trees and fresh springs." Was not this festival such a poem in the midst of our resounding war? Was not the history the children had heard of their mother like the image of a benignant palm bearing innumerable dates? Was not every sincere and eloquent word spoken at the feast a fresh spring of the pleasantest exhilaration?

The President of the day opened the discourse that followed the dinner in the most genial, kindly, and graceful manner. The predecessor of President Sears, Dr. Wayland, responded to the toast in his honor with all his old fire and force. No man's presence conveys an impression of more power than Dr. Wayland's; and this day it was wonderfully softened by feeling. As the Doctor sat down a choir of trained manly voices sang "Auld lang syne." Goldwin Smith, one of our most faithful and able friends in England, spoke literally like a scholar and a gentleman. His face was grave and scholarly; his voice had the long, swinging cadence of the best English speech; he stood leaning a little forward, without gesture; and every word was simple, clear, and direct. When he began by saying that he had never spoken but at one public meeting in his life, and that at the Free Trade Hall in Manchester, to protest against the outrages of the Alabama, the jubilant thunders of the applause showed how fully his brave position was recognized. There was nothing finer than the earnest tone of his speech. This, too, marked Burnside's, who, on rising, was received with the shouts of the whole multitude and the roll of drums. His words were hearty and inspiring. "The soldiers will return dissatisfied if peace is made without removing the cause of quarreling." And again: "There can be no cessation of hostilities until every citizen acknowledges the authority of the Government." The plain, manly directness of all he said, enforced by his noble person and the remembrance of the great services he has done the country—none greater than his silent endurance of unmerited obloquy—may well be contemplated with admiration at the Second Centennial of Brown.

As he spoke for the children who were giving their lives to the country, it was not possible to forget those who had already given them. No one called the sad but sacred roll, yet it was written on all hearts. Yet not for those dead children did the alma mater lay aside her festive garland. She remembered Xenophon sacrificing at the altar with the wreath upon his head. When he was told that his son was killed in battle, he lifted the crown and laid it down. But when it was added that his son fell bravely fighting, he raised it again to his head and completed the sacrifice. No names upon the heroic roll were called except one in a poem by Major Hay. And certainly, remembering the benefactor whose name the University so gratefully bears; recalling the quaint and dignified figure of the old merchant, which is still to so many returning children of the college a visionary presence in the streets, suggesting to their imaginations the stately gentlemen of the days of Washington; remembering this, it was fit that the name of one of the dead young heroes should be mentioned, the grandnephew of Nicholas Brown, from whom the college takes its name, Robert Hale Ives, Jun., who fell at Antietam. Yet, as the company sat and listened to the verses, and, when his name was mentioned, remembered the blooming youth, it was not the mother college, it was the mother country they heard repeating it, with that of all his brave brothers from the college and the shop, from the field and the office, who have fallen for us all, saying of each one, with the ancient parent, "I would not exchange my dead son for any living one in Christendom."

The sun was setting while yet the pleasant company lingered. Of all Commencement festivals save that on which they graduated, this was to be the most memorable to each one of them. The band had already gone. The undergraduates were moving away in groups. The ladies who had pressed in now stood aloof. It was clear that the last word had been spoken, and nothing remained but to go. So the kind President rose, and the Centennial celebration of Brown University was over. One old Easy Chair, at least, rolled pensively away, lost in a flood of tender memories.

"Ah! sure if mine had been the painter's hand
To express what then I saw, and add the gleam,
The light that never was, on sea or land,
The consecration and the poet's dream.

raid in King and Queen County, Virginia. As the raid was intended as a punishment for the brutal murder of the gallant young Dahlgren, the men were allowed much more liberty than is common even on such occasions, and great was the havoc inflicted upon the natives in the way of private excursions among the hen-houses, and many were the remarks created among the "smokes." One interesting fellow brought in, with his supply of poultry, an exceedingly lean and thin hen. This fact being observed by one of his comrades, gave rise to the following remark:

"Golly! I tho't I'se berry good for'ger, but neb-ber seen a man afore could cotch de shadder of a hen!"

WHILE at Fort Powhatan, at work one day in upsetting an old chimney, which seemed inclined to fall toward the west rather than in the desired direction, the same fellow, after scratching his head the proper length of time, finally broke out with,

"Golly! dat's rebel chimney!—fall back toward Richmond!"

AND again, the other evening, as we were moving into the trenches, the "rebs" took occasion to toss us a few shells, whereupon one of my men says, "Dose Johnnies always trows dere shell when we's comin' up dis hill." And another instantly rejoins with, "You's a no account fellar! you can't tell when dey's comin'. Why, boy, dose shells is like de Quakers, dey comes when de spirit moves 'em!"

An agent of the United States Sanitary Commission at New Orleans writes:

Feeling myself a debtor to the Drawer, not only for the feasts of fat things which I have myself enjoyed, but also for the hundreds of sick and wounded soldier boys whose eyes have been made to glisten with pleasure as I have handed them the familiar magazine, I take the liberty of sending you a little anecdote which struck me as rather rich.

The ideas of the negroes and "poor whites" of the slaveholding States in reference to the marriage relation are exceedingly vague. Any man who can read is considered competent to perform the marriage ceremony. Negroes who have been married legally under the old dispensation consider it necessary to have the rite repeated "under the flag," and chaplains are frequently called upon to marry parties who have been peaceably united in lawful wedlock for a score of years. But this is only preliminary.

General John M'Neil, who believes in hard fighting and no favors to rebels, was once visited in his camp in Southern Missouri by a raw-boned, tallow-faced specimen of womankind, dressed in the inviting style peculiar to Southern females of the lower class. Politely inquiring in what way he could serve her, the following colloquy ensued:

"I want my husband."

"Well, how can I help you to your husband?"

"Why, he's one of you 'uns."

"What is his name?"

"Pears like I disremember his name; but any how I was married to him last Sunday arternoon. He went off Monday, and I hain't seen him since."

"Ah! who married you?"

"Why, your chaplain."

"Oh! then you are all right. The chaplain will know whom he married. Orderly, take this woman to the chaplain."

Off went the bereaved fair one, but soon returned in mingled sorrow and anger.

"That isn't any chaplain," said she.

"Orderly, you took her to the chaplain?"

"Yes, Sir."

"No, Sir-ee, that wasn't a chaplain; he didn't have on a uniform."

"All right, my good woman; chaplains don't always wear uniforms."

"Anyways, that wasn't the chap that married us; that chaplain had two yellow stripes on his arm."

The General gave her permission to search the camp; but the delinquent husband and the two-striped chaplain were not identified.

THE humors of picket duty are quite refreshing. A correspondent at Bermuda Hundred, Virginia, wrote last summer as follows:

Since the picket firing on our front has ceased our pickets have become quite familiar with those of the enemy, and a conversation or an exchange of papers is eagerly sought for by both parties. A few nights since one of our corporals was visiting his vidette posts, and getting outside of our line and a little too close to the rebs one of their pickets called out,

"Are you the corporal of these posts?"

"Yes," answered the corporal.

"Well, I want you to put a veteran on that vidette post; that recruit has been asleep for the last hour."

"All right; I'll attend to him," said the corporal, and seeing the sleeping grayback almost at his feet he turned and quietly moved back to his own side of the house.

ON our left, where our lines are close to the rebs, two videttes from opposite sides were moved out toward the same tree. After remaining for some time near the tree unknown to each other our vidette discovered that he had lost his cap-box, and commenced calling for the corporal. After calling several times without effect the reb vidette called out, "I say, Yank, what's the matter on your side of the tree?" The "Yank" immediately replied that he wanted to go for some water. "Well, go ahead," answered "Johnny;" "I'll watch both sides till you come back."

DURING the raid into Maryland last summer, on the train captured at Magnolia Station were a great many boxes for rebel prisoners. The contents of said boxes were speedily eaten by the followers of Gilmore, with evident relish, until a negro, who was attending his raiding master on the expedition, came to get his share. Sambo's eyes watered as he glanced from one luxury to another in search of something to please his refined taste, until he had taken a complete survey of the eatables, when, with contempt displayed on every lineament of his ebony face, he exclaimed, "Oh, pshaw! they ain't got no sardines."

WHILE I was in Norfolk, Virginia, having a curiosity to see how the colored people conduct their religious meetings, I dropped into the church of Thomas Henson, D.D., one evening. I was early, and found only the minister and an old negro present. The "Doctor" never neglected an opportunity to impart gospel truths to his followers. Listening attentively I caught the words of Paul issuing from the lips of the instructor, "and you will heap coals of fire on his head," and the reply of the sable descendant of the ancient Cushites, "Golly, Doctor, wouldn't like to have 'em try't on dis chile!"

THE appearance of Harper's Magazine at our house is an event of great importance with my children. The illustrations in it are the chief cause of this. When the February number came to hand the pictures illustrating "Simon Kenton" set them all half wild with excitement. They were particularly taken with the illustration of Kenton running at full speed with Boone on his back, and the Indians in full chase after him. The evening was spent in reading the article and looking at the engravings. The next morning one of my little boys sprang out of bed at an early hour and hastened to get the Magazine, and turning to the page alluded to, with a smile of delight, exclaimed to the rest of his brothers and sisters, "The Indians didn't catch Kenton yet!"

A WAG in the West says the following is true:

Worthy C—— is one of the best representatives of Young America that can be found in the fast city of Chicago. Standing on the steps of the Tremont a few evenings ago chatting with half a dozen of the "boys," their attention was attracted toward two young and evidently respectable ladies enjoying an evening promenade. "Bet drinks," says Worthy, "that I make those ladies follow and keep pace with me, whether I walk fast or slow, for the next ten minutes." The bet was taken by Charley H——, and he was invited by Worthy to come along and see that all was fairly done. By this time the girls were passing. Worthy linked arms with Charley, and, apparently not seeing the ladies, stepped in the same direction and directly in front of them, and just near enough to let them hear his harangue. "The wedding was to be at nine o'clock. The President, the Cabinet, all the foreign Ministers, and the élite of the city were expected to be present; and Bishop——, with half a dozen assisting clergymen, was to officiate." By this time the girls had overheard sufficient to enlist their earnest attention, and, almost unconsciously, were closely following the gentlemen. Worthy proceeded with a minute and eloquent description of the (imaginary) wedding. The bride, bridesmaids, and the ladies present, with their dresses, jewelry, etc., etc., were elaborately portrayed; and for nearly fifteen minutes did the girls follow in close and attentive pursuit, without regarding either the distance or the direction of their promenade. Worthy, however, had gradually turned corners and crossed streets until the Tremont was again attained, when the gentlemen joined their confederates; and the ladies passed on, in blissful ignorance of the cruel "sell" by which they had been so unmercifully victimized.

A FAIR correspondent down East sends the following:

When the temperance movement had banished the well-filled decanters from our side-board we consoled ourselves with root-beer, which an old cook who had been long in the family made to perfection. The bottles were usually kept in a large closet in one of our sleeping apartments. One night a stranger arrived and was shown to this room. Just toward morning, when we were all enjoying our soundest slumbers, we were aroused by a cry of "Thieves! murder! help! help!" My mother, always courageous, was the first to open her door, when, to her astonishment, she beheld our stranger guest rushing up and down the hall in the most elegant deshabille. In answer to her inquiries she was pointed to the closet door, where she was informed the thieves were concealed, and where they had been firing off their pistols. It proved to be some half dozen bottles of beer which had exploded, and so terrified the occupant of the chamber.

JUDGE LOVE, the humorous editor of the Wire Grass Reporter, attempted to investigate the cause, nature, and effect of the cattle disease, which was making fearful ravages among the deer and cows. He relates his experience as follows:

A faithful old servant gave information that a fine cow belonging to us was affected, and gave it as his opinion that it was murrain, and not the black tongue, although her mouth seemed to be a little sore. He asked us to go down and examine the beast, which we accordingly proceeded to do. We went into the pen, and passed along by the side of the cow, giving a casual scrutiny as we passed, intending to make a stand in front of her for a few moments. Just as we got before her she threw up her head, looked wildly at us for a few seconds, and then, with a snort, a lowered head, and elevated tail, made at us. We 'bout-faced instantly, and marched through the pen at the rate of about a mile a minute, and cleared an eight-rail fence without laying hands thereon. We then looked back, and the cow was standing where we left the earth and committed ourself to the air, looking more astonished than angry. The old servant was at the other side of the pen, with one hand on the fence and the other on his bowels, bent almost to the ground in a fit of laughter. Straightening himself up and gathering breath, he exclaimed:

"My Lord, master, you ain't gettin' old yit!" and he bowed himself again in cachinatory paroxysm. Not seeing any thing particularly funny in the transaction, ourself, and feeling indisposed to pursue our investigations in regard to the cattle epidemic, we left the place. If it should be our misfortune to lose any more of our stock we would as soon lose that cow as any other.

THE Drawer gets this from California:

Two gentlemen (?) were debating the respective virtues of whisky straight and claret clear, Farmer G—— claiming that the former was the thing for a campaign in the wilderness, while Lawyer B—— claimed that the latter contained both nutriment and "liquiment." Finally they came to words, and at last bowie-knives were brought in sight. Soon they were advancing, each declaring that he would annihilate the other. At this stage of the proceedings "friends" interfered, and some little difficulty was found to hold them, especially the farmer, as he was much stronger than the lawyer. Farmer G—— was about to free himself from their hold, when the lawyer shouted, "Hold us, boys! hold us! Two of you hold him; one can hold me!"

NEAR Atlanta is stationed the officer who writes to the Drawer:

A "gentleman of color," whom we had hired for "rough work," was moving a cask marked in large characters, "Shoulders," when he was asked by one of his colored brethren what it was. Straightening himself up, and looking as wise as an owl, he exclaimed, "Jim, if I can read, dat am Hams!"
